Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.346

243
MARX TO NIKOLAI DANIELSON
IN ST PETERSBURG†450
Page me45.346
London, 28 November 1878

*My dear Sir,

I have received the three books with best thanks.†a I was prepared, by some Russian friends, to expect, on the part of Mr Tshitscherin, a very feeble production, but my expectations have been surpassed. He is evidently unacquainted with the very elements of Political Economy and fancies that, by being edited under his name, the trivialities of the Bastiat school become transformed into original and self-evident truths.
Page me45.346

Last week I was prevented from looking at the Capital. I have now done so, and find that — save the changes which the translator must make by comparing the second German edition with the French one — only a very few alterations are necessary, the which you will find later on in this letter.
Page me45.346

The two first sections* ('Commodities and Money' and 'The Transformation of Money into Capital') are to be translated exclusively from the German text. There, p. 86, line 5 from bottom READ: 'And, as a matter of fact, the value of each single yard is but the materialised form of a part of the social labour expended on the whole number of yards.'†455
Page me45.346

In Chapter XVI of the French edition (not contained in Chapter XIV of the German edition) the added passage on J. St. Mill, p. 222, column II, line 12 from bottom, should read: 'I always assume, he says, the actual state of affairs which predominates wherever workers and capitalists are distinct classes, etc.!'†b†456 The following two sentences, viz.: 'It is a strange optical illusion to see everywhere a state of affairs which as yet exists as an exception in this world of ours! But to continue' — are to be struck out, and the following sentence is to be read thus:
Page me45.346

'Mr Mill would like to think there is no absolute necessity that such should be the case — even in an economic system where workers and capitalists are distinct classes.'†457

Page Break me45.347
Page me45.347

The crisis and ensuing work stoppages, the closure of factories and bankruptcies *proceed boisterously in the industrial counties, but here at London, in order not to frighten the general public, the newspapers do their best to hush these unpleasant but stubborn 'incidents'. One reading only the London money articles gets indeed but very scanty information.

Yours most sincerely,
A. Williams*†a
Page me45.347
First published abridged, in Russian, in Minuvshiye gody, No. 1, St Petersburg, 1908 and in full, in German, in Die Briefe von Karl Marx und Friedrich Engels an Danielson, Leipzig, 1929

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

244 ENGELS TO ERNST DRONKE IN LIVERPOOL
Page me45.347
[Draft]
London, 29 November 1878
My dear Dronke,

I hear from Messrs Whitley and Maddock that you informed them of your intention not to have the assignment of the Policy executed.†b Moreover I have not had a word of reply or explanation from yourself. Under these circumstances I can only again repeat, that the Policy belongs to Mrs Dronke and that you had no right whatever to dispose of it. It is therefore no security for me unless assigned by her in the form prescribed by law. Unless this is done, I shall know how to qualify the transaction, and of course shall not pay any premium to keep it in existence.

Yours truly
Page me45.347
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 34, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.348

245
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER
IN GENEVA
Page me45.348
London, 12 December 1878
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.
Dear Old Man,

We are all most sorry to hear that things are going so badly with you and, so that you may at least have some help straight away, I have taken out a money order for you for £2 sterling on which, according to the information here, you will be paid 50 frs 40 over there. I have been told to retain the order here, as an order will be sent you by the Swiss post office in Basle, so unless this is done at once, you must complain. I shall see if I can get hold of some more money for you very shortly.
Page me45.348

It will, if my own experience is anything to go by, be virtually impossible to obtain any agencies for you here. Having been out of business for almost ten years, I have seen all my commercial connections gradually die a natural death; when a man no longer has anything to haggle over, you see, he's no longer of any interest to those gentlemen. However, I shall see if there's anyone I might be able to sound out, although I can't for the time being hold out any prospects for you.
Page me45.348

As for the Précurseur, by the way, if the paper doesn't pay for itself I wouldn't, if I were you, expend a single sou on it.†458 I cannot see why you should sacrifice yourself for the benefit of the Genevan workers and their local Genevan politics. If they want a paper, let them pay for it themselves. It's enough in all conscience that you should have to bear the brunt of the worry and the work. Considering all the sacrifices you have made, you really do have the right to call these people together and tell them that you can't go on paying, and that if they want to keep the paper going they must provide the resources themselves.
Page me45.348

Today the news has reached us by telegraph that the Federal Council proposes to suppress the magnanimous Guillaume's Avant-garde.†a I don't know whether it will really happen, but if for one reason or another the last Bakuninist organ were to disappear, and the Genevans proved unwilling to provide the resources, the Précurseur could all the more readily succumb.

Page Break me45.349
Page me45.349

Borkheim is still at Hastings, on the coast, confined to bed with the left side of his body paralysed and will recover, if at all, only very slowly. In other respects he seems cheerful enough, and writes from time to time.
Page me45.349

Luckily the Prussians have now also placed a ban on my Dühring.†a Henceforth nothing may be sold in Germany that is directed against bogus socialist rowdies. Thus every anti-Bakuninist publication by Greulich.†b myself, etc., has been banned. In Bismarck's estimation, anarchist and Dühringian cliquishness should lessen our people's cohesion and bring about what he most ardently desires — an attempted coup that would enable him to shoot. Despite all this, our workers in Germany are behaving altogether admirably, and I hope that they will bring the entire Prussian empire to rack and ruin. This much, however, Mr Bismarck will have achieved: When the set-to begins in Russia — and it won't be long now — things will also be pretty well au point in Germany.
Page me45.349

With warmest regards from Marx and his wife, and hoping to hear better news of you soon, from your old friend,

F.E.
Page me45.349
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.350

1879

246
MARX TO HUGO HELLER†459
[IN OXFORD]
Page me45.350
[Extract]
[London,] 29 January 1879
Dear Friend,

... You would oblige me by copying for me verbatim the passage in Busch [OR Buret?]†a in which I am taxed with the bad taste of having preserved the life of the Champagne phiz...†460
Page me45.350
First published, in the language of the original (German), in the catalogue Sotheby Parke Bernet and Co, London, 1963

Printed according to the catalogue

Published in English for the first time

247
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER
IN GENEVA
Page me45.350
London, 30 January 1879
Dear Old Man,

It hardly needed a postcard from you for me to bestir myself on your behalf.†461 From a friend in Manchester†b I have received one pound to be used for victims of the Anti-Socialist Law.†462 I could not put it to better use than by passing it on to you, and I have also added a second, for which you should get a remittance of 50 frs 40 from Basle and get it, probably, the day after you receive this letter. I have retained the receipt. Anything more that can be done later on, will be done.

Page Break me45.351
Page me45.351

As to agencies, there's nothing doing.†a Business here is absolutely rotten, and no one wants to take any chances.
Page me45.351
So far as the Précurseur is concerned, I would, if I were you, tell the people in Geneva once and for all that I was not in a position to pay out anything whatever in respect of the paper. It is a crying shame. Not only do you take upon yourself all the worry and the work, getting nothing in return, but on top of that you are expected to cough up the expenses. But the Genevans have always been like that. Ever since Calvin and his predestination,†463 they have regarded themselves as the chosen people and expected everything to fall into their laps. It was thus in the case of the Égalité, when Utin had to supply both the work and the cash. It was thus in the case of the great building workers' strike, when the International had to provide the cash,†464 but knocked in vain at the Genevans' doors when there were strikes elsewhere.
Page me45.351
We were much tickled by the news that, like Achilles, the great Guillaume has withdrawn sulking into his tent.†465 This was bound to happen. The anarchists weren't worthy of the name until anarchy broke out in their own midst. Still, Guillaume was at least the great Bakunin's successor — but that an upstart like Brousse should propose to turn the world upside down — why, it's positively ludicrous.
Page me45.351
Over here Most is publishing a little sheet, the Freiheit, for the communist Workers' Society†55; so far it has sold well.†466 We wish it all prosperity but otherwise, of course, have nothing to do with it, nor are we in any way responsible for its contents.
Page me45.351
In Germany, by the way, things are going rapidly downhill. A walloping for the Reichstag†467 — such is the latest and best [piece of news]. Only let it carry on like this, with more and more taxes on top, and the good Bismarck will yet be surprised by his petty bourgeois, who are going to the devil fast enough as it is. Apart from the unavoidable suffering it will bring down upon individuals, nothing could be of greater advantage to us on the whole than what is now happening. Any harm Bismarck could do us, he has already done; what he is now doing affects our opponents, the petty bourgeois men of Progress,†312 and, with time, will also affect the liberal big bourgeoisie.

Page Break me45.352
Page me45.352
So let him keep it up! And aside from this, affairs in Russia are going ahead splendidly, and that's the main thing. If there's an explosion there, then William,†a too, might as well pack his bags.

Your
F.E.
Page me45.352
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

248
ENGELS TO WILHELM LIEBKNECHT
IN LEIPZIG
Page me45.352
London, 1 March 1879
Dear Liebknecht,

We have again tried to come to an arrangement with The Whitehall Review through Barry, if only in regard to the Reichstag reports, but the jackass insisted on the articles being signed; so we had to give him a flat refusal and let him go. The negotiations lasted a pretty long time and, until matters had reached the stage of oui ou non,†b there was, of course, nothing we could tell you.
Page me45.352
The election in Breslau†468 has made a splendid impression here too. Still more, however, the speed with which Bismarck is ruining himself. He really is coming 'one cropper after another'†469 — going de chûte en chûte. He has now lost virtually all of his apologists in the English press — even The Times, which was very deeply involved with him, is trying to extricate itself.†470 Now that he's become a protectionist, the English, of course, are all the more reluctant to have anything further to do with him. Even in Germany, come to that, a reversion to the protectionist system would be downright reactionary. Still, it's excellent that Monsieur Bismarck should again be drifting towards dissolution.†467 Only let him drive the German philistines really wild and even they will lose patience in the end, particularly if their pockets are affected.

Page Break me45.353
And as for the MUDDLE Bismarck is making in the field of foreign policy, that is altogether beyond compare.
Page me45.353
Most's little paper†a seems to be making good progress — he turns up from time to time, but not often, and we cannot, of course, accept any responsibility at all for its contents. But we wish it success, of course, as we do anything that is moving in the right direction, however imperfect its methods may be.

Your
F.
Page me45.353
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

249

MARX TO NIKOLAI DANIELSON†471
IN ST PETERSBURG†450
Page me45.353
London, 10 April 1879
My dear Sir,

When I received your letter of February (and at the same time the valuable prints, which have come to my hands like the others you mention†472) my wife had fallen so ill that the doctors doubted whether she was likely to survive the attack, and meanwhile my own state of health underwent some serious shocks. (In point of fact, since, consequent upon the state of things in Germany and Austria, I was precluded from paying my annual visit to Karlsbad,†b I have never enjoyed a comparative state of ease.) Under these circumstances which have only improved a very short time since, I could not study the papers sent me. In the meantime I had sent you a letter†12 by a German on the way to St Petersburg, limiting myself to an acknowledgement of your letter and recommending the bearer, but, to my great astonishment, he reappeared yesterday here and told me that, consequent upon some incidents, he had not got farther than Berlin and renounced altogether visiting Petersburg.

Page Break me45.354
Page me45.354
And now, primo, I am obliged to tell you (cela est tout á fait confidentiel†a) that I have been informed from Germany, my second volume†b could not be published so long as the present régime was maintained in its present severity. This news, considering the status quo, did not surprise me, and, I must confess, was far from annoying me — for these reasons†473:
Page me45.354
Firstly: I should under no circumstances have published the second volume before the present English industrial crisis had reached its climax. The phenomena are this time singular, in many respects different from what they were in the past, and this — quite apart from other modifying circumstances — is easily accounted for by the fact that never before the English crisis was preceded by tremendous and now already 5 years lasting crisis in the Unites States, South America, Germany, Austria, etc.
Page me45.354
It is therefore necessary to watch the present course of things until their maturity before you can 'consume' them 'productively', I mean 'theoretically'.
Page me45.354
One of the singular aspects of the present state is this: There have, as you know, been crashes of banks in Scotland and in some of the English counties, principally the Western (of Cornwall and Wales) ones. Still the real centre of the money-market — not only of the United Kingdom, but of the world — London has till now been little affected. On the contrary, save a few exceptions, the immense joint-stock bank companies, like the Bank of England, have as yet only profited of the general prostration. And what this prostration is, you may judge from the utter despair of the English commercial and industrial philistine of seeing ever better times again! I have not seen the like, I have never witnessed a similar moral dislocation although I was in London in 1857 and 1866†474!

Page me45.354

There is no doubt, one of the circumstances favourable to the London money-market is the state of the Bank of France, which, since the recent development of the intercourse between the two countries, has become a succursale†c to the Bank of England. The Bank of France keeps an immense amount of bullion, the convertibility of its banknotes being not yet re-established, and at the signal of any perturbation of the London stock-exchange French money flows in to buy securities momentarily depreciated. If, during last autumn, the French money had been suddenly withdrawn, the Bank of England would certainly have had refuge to its last remedy in extremis, the suspension of the Bank Act,†475 and in that case we would have had the monetary crash.

Page Break me45.355

Page me45.355

On the other hand, the quiet way in which the restauration of cash payments was effected in the United States, has removed all strain from that corner upon the resources of the Bank of England. But what till now mainly contributed to prevent an explosion within the London money-market, is the apparently quiet state of the banks of Lancashire and the other industrial districts (saving the mining districts of the West), though it is sure and ascertained, that these banks have not only invested great part of their resources in discounting of bills of, and advances upon, unprofitable transactions of the manufacturers, but have, as f.i. at Oldham, sunk a great part of their capital in the foundation of new fabrics. At the same time stocks, mainly of cotton produce, are daily accumulating not only in Asia (India principally) whither they are sent on consignment, but at Manchester, etc., etc. How this state of things could pass away without a general crash among the manufacturers, and, consequently, among the local banks, reacting directly upon the London money-market — is difficult to foresee.

Page me45.355

Meanwhile strikes and disturbance are general.

Page me45.355

I remark en passant that during the past year — so bad for all other business — the railways have been flourishing, but this was only due to extraordinary circumstances, like the Paris exhibition,†476 etc. In truth, the railways keep up an appearance of prosperity, by accumulating debts, increasing from day to day their capital account.

Page me45.355

However the course of this crisis may develop itself — although most important to observe in its details for the student of capitalistic production and the professional théoricien — it will pass over, like its predecessors, and initiate a new 'industrial cycle' with all its diversified phases of prosperity, etc.

Page me45.355

But under the cover of this 'apparently' solid English society, there lurks another crisis — the agricultural one which will work great and serious changes in its social structure. I shall recur to this subject on another occasion.†a It would lead me too far at present.

Page me45.355

Secondly: The bulk of materials I have received not only from Russia, but from the United States, etc., make it pleasant for me to have a 'pretext' of continuing my studies, instead of winding them up finally for the public.

Page Break me45.356

Page me45.356

Thirdly: My medical adviser†a has warned me to shorten considerably my 'working-day' if I were not desirous to relapse into the state of 1874 and the following years where I got giddy and unable to proceed after a few hours of serious application.

Page me45.356

In regard to your most remarkable letter I shall confine myself to a few observations.

Page me45.356

The railways sprang first up as the 'couronnement de l'oeuvre'†b in those countries where modern industry was most developed, England, United States, Belgium, France, etc. I call them the 'couronnement de l'oeuvre' not only in the sense, that they were at last (together with steamships for oceanic intercourse and the telegraphs) the means of communication adequate to the modern means of production, but also in so far as they were the basis of immense joint-stock companies, forming at the same time a new starting point for all other sorts of joint-stock companies, to commence by banking companies. They gave in one word an impetus never before suspected to the concentration of capital and also to the accelerated and immensely enlarged cosmopolitan activity of loanable capital, thus embracing the whole world in a network of financial swindling and mutual indebtedness, the capitalistic form of 'international' brotherhood.

Page me45.356

On the other hand, the appearance of the railway system in the leading states of capitalism allowed, and even forced, states where capitalism was confined to a few summits of society, to suddenly create and enlarge their capitalistic superstructure in dimensions altogether disproportionate to the bulk of the social body carrying on the great work of production in the traditional modes. There is, therefore, not the least doubt that in those states the railway creation has accelerated the social and political disintegration, as in the more advanced states it hastened the final development, and therefore the final change, of capitalistic production. In all states, except England, the governments enriched and fostered the railway companies at the expense of the public Exchequer. In the United States they received as a present a great part of the public land, not only the land necessary for the construction of the lines, but many miles of land along both sides [of] the lines, covered with forests, etc. They became so the greatest landlords, the small immigrating farmers preferring of course lands so situated as to ensure their produce ready means of transport.

Page me45.356

The system inaugurated in France by Louis Philippe, of handing over the railways to a small band of financial aristocrats, endowing them with long terms of possession, guaranteeing the interest out of the public pocket, etc., etc., was pushed to the utmost limit by Louis Bonaparte whose régime, in fact, was essentially based upon the traffic in railway concessions, to some of which he was so kind as to make presents of canals, etc.

Page Break me45.357

Page me45.357

But in Austria, and Italy above all, the railways were a new source of unbearable state indebtedness and grinding of the masses.
Page me45.357

Generally, the railways gave of course an immense impulse to the development of Foreign Commerce, but this commerce in countries which export principally raw produce increased the misery of the masses. Not only that the new indebtedness, contracted by the governments on account of the railways, increased the bulk of imposts weighing upon them, but from the moment every local production could be converted into cosmopolitan gold, many articles formerly cheap, because invendible to a great degree, such as fruit, wine, fish, deer, etc., became dear and were withdrawn from the consumption of the people, while, on the other hand, the production itself, I mean the special sort of produce, was changed according to its greater or minor suitableness for exportation, while formerly it was principally adapted to its consumption in loco. Thus f.i. in Schleswig-Holstein agricultural land was converted into pasture, because the export of cattle was more profitable, but, at the same time, the agricultural population was driven away. All these changes [were] very useful indeed for the great landed proprietor, the usurer, the merchant, the railways, the bankers and so forth, but very dismal for the real producer!
Page me45.357

It is, to conclude by this my letter (since the time for putting it to post draws nearer and nearer), impossible to find real analogies between the United States and Russia. In the former the expenses of the government diminish daily and its public debt is quickly and yearly reduced; in the latter public bankruptcy is a goal more and more appearing to become unavoidable. The former has freed itself (although in a most infamous way, for the advantage of the creditors and at the expense of the menu peuple†a) of its paper-money, the latter has no more flourishing fabric than that of paper-money. In the former the concentration of capital and the gradual expropriation of the masses is not only the vehicle, but also the natural offspring (though artificially accelerated by the Civil War†453) of an unprecedented rapid industrial development, agricultural progress, etc.; the latter reminds you rather of the times of Louis XIV and Louis XV, where the financial, commercial, industrial superstructure, or rather the façade of the social edifice, looked (although they had a much more solid foundation than in Russia) like a satire upon the stagnant state of the bulk of production (the agricultural one) and the famine of the producers. The United States have at present much overtaken England in the rapidity of economical progress, though they lag still behind in the extent of acquired wealth, but at the same time the masses are quicker, and have greater political means in their hands, to resent the form of a progress accomplished at their expense. I need not prolong the antitheses.

Page Break me45.358
Page me45.358

Apropos. Which do you consider the best Russian work on credit and banking?

Page me45.358

Mr Kaufman was so kind as to send me his book on 'theory and practice of banking',†a but I was rather astonished that my former intelligent critic in the Petersburger Messager de l'Europe†477 had converted himself into a sort of Pindar of modern Stock-Exchange swindling. Besides, considered merely — and I expect generally nothing else of books of this kind — from Fachstandpunkt,†b it is far from original in its details. The best part in it is the polemics against paper-money.

Page me45.358

It is said that certain foreign bankers with whom a certain government desired to contract new loans, have asked as a guarantee — a constitution. I am far from believing this, because their modern method of doing the business was, till now at least, and could be, very indifferent as to forms of government.

Yours truly,
A. Williams†c

Page me45.358

First published, in Russian, in Minuvshiye gody, No. 1, St Petersburg, 1908

Reproduced from the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me45.359

250

MARX TO RUDOLPH MEYER
IN LONDON

Page me45.359

[Draft]
[London,] 28 May 1879
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

Page me45.359

Dear Sir,

I enclose the letter from Mr Reichenbach intended for yourself†478; at the same time I am sending you issue 10†a per BOOK-POST.

Page me45.359

I shall be pleased to make your personal acquaintance, having made sundry vain attempts to acquaint myself with your Politische Gründer.†b If you are not already otherwise engaged, you will find me at home tomorrow at any time between 10 o'clock in the morning and 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

I am, Sir, Your obedient Servant
Karl Marx

To R. Meyer, ESQ.

Page me45.359
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

251
ENGELS TO J. GUGENHEIM
IN LONDON
Page me45.359
[Draft]
[London,] 16 June 1879

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your esteemed letter of 29 May and regret that under present circumstances I cannot comply with the wish expressed in the same that I deliver a lecture to your Society.†479

Page Break me45.360
Page me45.360
The organ of that Society, the Freiheit, has thought fit publicly to attack the attitude of Social-Democratic deputies in the Reichstag.†480 Now even though statements have been made in the Reichstag by certain of our members which I, too, regard as inept (and about which I have not hesitated to express my views privately and in an appropriate place),†481 I can in no way declare myself in agreement with the kind of criticism chosen by the Freiheit and still less with its having felt obliged to pursue this kind of criticism in public.
Page me45.360
You will understand that if I were willing to deliver a lecture to the Society under these circumstances, this would inevitably give rise to the view in Germany and elsewhere that I condoned the attitude adopted by the Freiheit.
Page me45.360
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

252
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†482
IN ZURICH
Page me45.360
[Draft]
[London,] 17 June [1879]

In reply to your esteemed note of the 13th, which did not reach me until yesterday, I regret to inform you that I am not in a position to give you the name of a person capable of producing the articles you desire in a really competent manner.†483
Page me45.360

For a number of years the English workers' movement has been going round and round bootlessly in a confined circle of STRIKES for wages and the reduction of working hours — not, mark you, as an expedient and a means of propaganda and organisation, but as the ultimate aim. Both on principle and statutorily the TRADES UNIONS actually exclude any political action and hence participation in any general activity on the part of the working class as a class. Politically the workers are divided into Conservatives and Liberal-Radicals, into supporters of a Disraeli (Beaconsfield) administration and supporters of a Gladstone administration. So one can speak of a workers' movement here only to the extent that STRIKES take place which, victorious or otherwise, do not advance the movement by one single step. In my view only harm can come of inflating STRIKES such as these into struggles of world-historical importance (as does e.g. the Freiheit here), STRIKES which were, moreover, as often as not deliberately engineered by the capitalists in the late years of depression so as to have an excuse for closing down their factories, STRIKES in which the working class makes no progress whatsoever. No attempt should be made to conceal the fact that at this moment a genuine workers' movement in the continental sense is non-existent here, and hence I don't believe you will miss much if, for the time being, you don't get any reports on the doings of the TRADES UNIONS here.

Page Break me45.361
Page me45.361
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

253
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN
IN ZURICH
Page me45.361
[Draft]
London, 26 June 1879
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.
Dear Comrade,

I am sorry you didn't tell me from the start that in making your inquiry you had my reporting in mind†a; had you done so, you would have received a definite answer straight away.
Page me45.361

When, after being much pressed to do so, I decided to tackle the tedious Mr Dühring, I told Liebknecht that this was positively the last time I would allow journalistic activities to interfere with my more substantial work†484 unless political events made this absolutely imperative — something I alone must decide.†b During the nine years I have spent here in London, I have learnt that it's no good trying to complete more substantial works while simultaneously engaging in practical agitation. I grow no younger with the passage of time and must at long last restrict myself to definite tasks if I am to get anything done at all. I wrote and told Mr Wiede as much when he founded the Neue Gesellschaft.†a

Page Break me45.362
Page me45.362

As for Mr Höchberg, you are mistaken if you think that I feel any 'antipathy' towards him. When Mr Höchberg founded the Zukunft, we got invitations to contribute signed 'the Editorial Board'.†313 Unless I am much mistaken, Mr Höchberg was not even known to us by name at that time, and it goes without saying that we paid no attention to anonymous communications of this kind. Soon after, Mr Höchberg made known his programme of the Zukunft,†b according to which socialism was to arise out of the concept of 'justice'. Such a programme directly excluded from the outset all those who ultimately regarded socialism, not as the logical outcome of any idea or principle such as justice, etc., but as the ideal product of a material-economic process, of the social process of production at a given stage. Thus Mr Höchberg had himself precluded all possibility of our collaborating with him. But aside from the above programme, nothing has come to my notice on the strength of which I could form any authentic idea of Mr Höchberg's philosophical views. Not that all this is in any way a reason for feeling any 'antipathy' towards him, or prejudice against a literary venture for which he is responsible. On the contrary, I adopt the same attitude towards it as I do towards any other prospective socialist publication until I know what's going to be in it — one of sympathy and expectation.
Page me45.362

But that is all by the way — the fact of the matter is that I must restrain myself from contributing to journals if I mean to finish work that really ought to be of greater importance to the movement as a whole than an article or two in periodicals. And, as you can see, I have for several years observed this rule impartially vis-á-vis all-comers.
Page me45.362

I am also interested to see from your letter that people over here have led you to believe that I, and presumably Marx as well, am 'in complete agreement' with the policy of the Freiheit. Precisely the reverse is true. We have not seen Mr Most since he began his attacks on the Social-Democratic deputies.†480 Nor was he able to learn what we thought of this until the middle of the month when I replied to an invitation from the secretary†a of the Workers' Society†55 to go and lecture there.†b I refused outright because it could only lead people in Germany, etc., to conclude that I agreed with the kind of polemic the Freiheit is conducting, and publicly at that, against the Social-Democratic deputies; little though I may approve of certain statements in the Reichstag, this is by no means the case.

Page Break me45.363
Page me45.363

As we have heard much the same thing from another quarter, we would be glad to be in a position that would enable us to scotch these misrepresentations once and for all. The simplest way of doing this would be for you, if you would be so kind, to let us have a copy of the relevant passages from letters so that we may know precisely what has been said about us and conduct ourselves accordingly. Your allusions could, of course, be only of a general nature, but for that very reason it is all the more desirable that we should have some definite information so that we can act upon it direct. After almost forty years, revolutionary tittle-tattle is something that has ceased to surprise us.
Page me45.363

Should Mr Most fall into the hands of the anarchists, or even of Russians of Tkachov's stamp, it would at most spell his own undoing. These chaps will fall victim to the anarchy they have themselves created. Which is not to say that it mightn't be quite a good thing to knock them on the head every now and again.
Page me45.363

Unless one or two of the works you mention are still to be had at the booksellers, I would not be able to get hold of copies for you; I myself no longer possess a copy of some of them and have tried in vain to get them second-hand.
Page me45.363

As regards the French movement, besides our contacts with party members over here, we also maintain direct relations with Paris nor, for that matter, were the links we established at the time of the International ever broken at all. Thus, for instance, only quite recently we received a new socialist paper appearing in Oporto, O operario.
Page me45.363

First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.364

254

ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER†485
IN GENEVA
Page me45.364

London, 1 July 1879

Dear Old Man,

The new half year has brought me in some money and I therefore hasten to notify you that I have sent off a money order to you for £4 sterling = 100 francs 80 centimes; you will doubtless get it straight after receipt of this letter. I hope it will be enough to relieve your chronic ill-luck, if only for a short spell. I wish we could do more than just offer you an occasional helping hand, but as you know, recent events have led to heavier demands from all sides.
Page me45.364

Liebknecht's unseasonable mildness in the Reichstag†486 has, understandably enough, created a most disagreeable impression in the Latin countries of Europe, as it has among Germans everywhere. Indeed, we immediately wrote and told him as much.†481 Agitation of the old, easy-going, lackadaisical sort, interspersed with an occasional 6 weeks-6 months in quod, is a thing of the past where Germany is concerned. No matter how the present state of affairs comes to an end, the new movement is starting off on a more or less revolutionary basis and hence its character must be far more resolute than in the first period of the movement, now concluded. Either the maxim about the peaceable attainment of the goal will no longer be necessary, or else no one will continue to take it seriously. By making that maxim impossible and giving a revolutionary cast to the movement, Bismarck has done us a tremendous service which more than outweighs the bit of harm caused by interference with agitation.
Page me45.364

On the other hand, the aforementioned tame speech in the Reichstag has meant that big-mouthed revolutionary charlatans have again begun to raise their heads, and are trying to disorganise the party by cliquism and intrigue. At the hub of these machinations is our local Workers' Society†55 which still harbours braggarts of '49 vintage, á la Weber, Neustadt an der Hardt and family. After the revival of the movement in Germany, the people over here had lost such significance as they may still have possessed in the years 1840-62; now they see an opportunity of pushing their way to the top. Even in recent years young Weber, one Kaufmann and others have constituted themselves the central committee of the European-American working men's movement on at least six occasions, but have always been obstinately ignored by the irreverent world. Now they intend to force it through and have discovered an ally in Most. The Freiheit is shouting for revolution by fire and sword which, for the worthy Most, is, of course, a quite unprecedented pleasure in which he could never before have allowed himself to indulge. Moreover, it has grossly exaggerated the goings-on in the Reichstag and made them a pretext for disrupting the party and forming a new one. This is to exploit the present exigency and enforced silence in Germany for the benefit of a few nitwits whose ambition is notably disproportionate to their capabilities — and if, as we have heard, Most has let it be known that he has our support, then he is lying. Since he embarked on this role he's kept well out of sight. Au fond,†a it's as well that he should unmask himself like this, thus ruining any prospects he might subsequently have in Germany; he is not without talent, but horribly vain, undisciplined and ambitious, and so it's better that he should go and put his foot in it. Come to that, the Freiheit won't, presumably, survive much longer, and then all this will quietly relapse into oblivion.

Page Break me45.365
Page me45.365

With most cordial regards from Marx and

Your
F.E.
Page me45.365

First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

255
MARX TO CARLO CAFIERO†487 IN NAPLES
Page me45.365
[Draft]
London, 29 July 1879
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.
Page me45.365
Dear Citizen,

My sincerest thanks for the two copies of your work†488! Some time ago I received two similar works, one written in Serbian, the other in English (published in the United States),†341 but both of them err in that, by seeking to provide a succinct and popular résumé of Capital, they also devote themselves in too pedantic a manner to the scientific form of the argument. Thus it seems to me that they more or less lose sight of their principal object, which is to make an impression on the public for whom these résumés are intended. And it is here that your work is vastly superior!

Page Break me45.366
Page me45.366
As to the concept of the thing, I believe I am not mistaken when I find an apparent gap in the views set out in your preface, which is that there is no proof that the material conditions indispensable to the emancipation of the proletariat are engendered in spontaneous fashion by the progress of capitalist production.†a
Page me45.366
Moreover, I share your opinion — if I have interpreted your preface aright — that one ought not to overload the minds of the people one is proposing to educate. There is nothing to prevent your making, at the right moment, a further attempt aimed at placing greater emphasis on this materialist basis of Capital.
Page me45.366
Once again many thanks.

Yours very sincerely,
Karl Marx
Page me45.366
First published in La Vie ouvriére, No. 57, Paris, 5 février 1912

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

Published in English in full for the first time

256
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL†489
IN LEIPZIG
Page me45.366
[Copy]
London, 4 August 1879
Dear Bebel,

Since I last wrote on 25 July†b15 Hirsch has informed us of his correspondence with Bernstein and Liebknecht about the new paper.†490 To judge by this, matters would appear to be materially different from what your letter had entitled us to assume.

Page Break me45.367
Page me45.367
Since Hirsch's altogether justifiable inquiries as to what arrangements had been made and who would be running the paper, on the one hand financially, on the other administratively, met with no other reply from Liebknecht save: 'the party plus Höchberg',†491 and the reiterated assurance that everything was in order — we could only assume, even then, that the paper would be financed by Höchberg and that the 'we' to whom, according to E. Bernstein's letter, 'the production and supervision' would be entrusted,†492 would, once again, be Höchberg and his secretary Bernstein.†a
Page me45.367
From Bernstein's second letter to Hirsch just received, it transpires that such is indeed the case.†493
Page me45.367
You will not, I presume, fail to perceive that the errors against which I warned in my last [letter] will now almost inevitably form an intrinsic part of the paper. Höchberg has shown himself to be exceedingly muddle-headed in matters of theory and, in practice, impelled by an irresistible urge to fraternise with all and sundry who profess to be, not merely socialist, but also and even simply social. He showed his true colours in the Zukunft, discrediting the party both as regards theory and in practice.
Page me45.367
What the party needs above all is a political organ. And really Höchberg is at best a wholly unpolitical man, not even a social democrat, but a social philanthropist. Nor, according to Bernstein's letter, is the paper to be in the least political, but socialist on principle, which, in such hands, necessarily means social-fantastic, a new edition of the Zukunft. A paper of this kind would represent the party only if the latter were willing to degrade itself and become a mere appendage to Höchberg and his armchair socialist friends. If the party leaders were really to try and bring the proletariat under the leadership of Höchberg and his ambiguous friends, the workers would be unlikely to go along with them; dissension and disorganisation would inevitably result; but Most and the ranters over here would experience their greatest triumph.

Page Break me45.368
Page me45.368
In these circumstances, which were quite unknown to us when I wrote my last letter, we believe that Hirsch is absolutely right in refusing to have anything to do with the matter. The same applies to Marx and myself. Our consent regarding contributions was given in respect of a genuine party organ and hence was applicable only to such — not, however, to a private organ of Mr Höchberg's masquerading as a party organ. To that we would in no circumstances contribute.†a Marx and I therefore specifically ask that you should kindly ensure we are not named as contributors.
Page me45.368
First published in Die Kommunistische Internationale, Heft 23, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the copy checked against the manuscript of the draft

Published in English for the first time

257
MARX TO RUDOLPH MEYER
IN LONDON
Page me45.368
[London,] 7 August 1879
Dear Mr Meyer,

I am today sending you your Gründer†b PER BOOK-POST.
Page me45.368
My departure†494 was held up as a result of Longuet's having fallen ill: he is feared to have gastric fever, and we shall probably hear today what the verdict is. If the thing's serious I shall have to abandon the trip to Jersey (which I wanted to visit because the place is new to my companion — my youngest daughter†c) and go to a seaside resort near London. I shall be going to one of these in any case, even after my return from Jersey, along with Madame Lafargue and my grandson,†a and look forward to your visiting me there.

Page Break me45.369
Page me45.369
Should anything unforeseen happen to precipitate your departure, perhaps you would be so kind as to return the volumes of periodicals (the Leipzig and Paris ones), at the same time letting me know (all letters will be forwarded to me from my house) whether the January issue (1879) of the Österreichische Monatsschrift für Gesellschaftswissenschaften was followed by a second.
Page me45.369

With best wishes for your future, and cordial regards from my wife and my daughter, Eleanor,

Yours very sincerely,
Karl Marx
Page me45.369
First published in Die Rote Fahne, Nr. 294, Berlin, 14. Dezember 1928, Beilage

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

258
MARX TO ENGELS†495
IN LONDON
Page me45.369
St Aubin's, 14 August 1879
Trafalgar Hotel
Dear FRED,

I am sending this note to your London address since — to go by your letter to my wife†15 — there is no knowing that you will still belong to the population of Eastbourne after today.†496
Page me45.369
Herewith letter from Hirsch to me,†497 ditto letter from Louise Juta to Pumps.
Page me45.369
Our crossing from Southampton to Jersey†494 was made altogether too watery by a tremendous downpour of rain; we arrived dripping wet at St Hélier where it was also 'pouring' hard. Since then the weather, after occasional vacillations and transitions and set-backs, has been very good. The farmers in Jersey thought the end of the world was at hand; they maintain that they've never had such a bad spring and summer. Tomorrow we are moving to the Hôtel de l'Europe, St Hélier. We are leaving our present lodgings in St Aubin's because Tussy and I cannot stand the monotonous daily fare of lamb or MUTTON in consequence of which I have, during the past few days, become an involuntary VEGETARIAN. We could find nowhere else to stay — we spent a great deal of time hunting round — in these parts. When we arrived in Jersey, it was still comparatively empty, but as time went on there was immigration on a massive scale, notably of FRENCHIES. When we made inquiries at the Hôtel de l'Europe this morning, it so happened, fortunately for us, that 60 French people were just getting ready to leave, whereas on the other hand the STEAMERS laden with fresh human scum had not yet come in.

Page Break me45.370
Page me45.370
On leaving London from Waterloo Station, we met Harney, who was seeing his wife off to Jersey. Luckily she already had a first class TICKET, whereas we were travelling second. On the BOAT we met again. Like us, she is not prone to SEA SICKNESS, but was in other respects unwell. On landing we again went our different ways, but she gave us the address of her brother with whom she is staying. Since then, we have paid a short visit of 'condolence'. The woman is utterly IMPRACTICABLE. Although a native of Jersey, she can provide no information other than what may be found in the GUIDE. A good woman, but not JUST THE PERSON for such as are travelling for recreation. I have been at long last sleeping properly here, only I have not quite shaken off a cold caught as a result of the abominable weather. But in this mild climate it will no doubt soon disappear of its own accord. Tussy ALL RIGHT.

Page me45.370

Two Derbyshire farmers, father and son, were until recently our companions at table in the Trafalgar Hôtel. The day before yesterday they went on a sailing trip to St Malo and, having 'been to France' for the first time in their lives, returned with an immoderately inflated opinion of themselves. The father even felt half-inclined to go with his son on a TRIP to the MEDITERRANEAN, but thought it would be 'too hot' there. 'BY NO MEANS,' said his son, who is the BOOK-LEARNED man of the two, 'BY NO MEANS, THERE IT IS NOW — WINTER!' I was likewise informed by the old man (who is, by the by, in his prime and A SHARP FELLOW, WITH THE TRUE BUSINESS EYE) that St Malo was situated on the south-west coast of France. On the other hand, both are well-versed in the sphere of agriculture and other FARMERS' QUESTIONS.
Page me45.370

Tussy finds that bathing presents no difficulties worth mentioning, and has so far been bathing alternately in St Brelade's Bay

Page Break me45.370a

Jenny and Charles Longuet, early 1870s

Page Break me45.370b

The house in London, 41 Maitland Park Road, where Marx lived from March 1875 till the end of his life and St Hélier's Bay, and now alternately in the latter and St Clement's Bay.

Page Break me45.371
Page me45.371

From my wife's letter, I see that Schorlemeyer was ill when he arrived; I hope to have better news of him soon.
Page me45.371

Since my arrival here I haven't looked at any newspapers, have read nothing at all save Carleton's Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry, FIRST VOLUME. It was hard enough work, getting through the first volume; the second I shall save up for better times. They are UNCONNECTED TALES in which Irish peasant life is portrayed now from this angle now from that — hence not suitable for consumption all at one go. For that very reason it's a book one ought to buy and own in order to regale oneself á fur et mesure,†a now with one dish, now with another. Carleton is neither a good stylist nor a good compiler, but his originality consists in the fidelity of his descriptions. As the son of an Irish peasant, he knows his subject better than any Levers or Lovers.

Page me45.371
With kindest regards from Tussy and self to all of you

Your
Moor
Page me45.371
First published in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

259
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET†498
IN RAMSGATE
Page me45.371
St Hélier, 19 August 1879
Hôtel de l'Europe
My dear beloved Jennychen,

Long live the little citizen of the world!†499 Il faut peupler le monde de garçons d'autant plus que la statistique anglaise montre un excés de filles.†b I'm glad that the catastrophe has proceeded auspiciously so far, though unfortunately under somewhat difficult circumstances. The ARRANGEMENT made by Mamma strikes me as being *far from the most convenient. At all events, Tussy and myself leave to-morrow for London and then I shall be very soon at your side†500 and everything will be quietly settled. Here the rainy time — otherwise so unknown to this delicious island — has again set in, so that we had already commenced discussing our departure, the whole aspect of our sojourn here having changed with the climatic and meteorologic changes.

Page Break me45.372
Page me45.372
The Hôtel de l'Europe is excellent and one day we must go here together, toute la famille.
Page me45.372
I can hardly expect to-morrow morning when the boat will start from here to Southampton. I feel so anxious with you and little Johnny.
Page me45.372
In the meantime my best compliments to Mamma and Longuet.* Just don't fret or worry, my child, everything will turn out all right.

Your trusty

OLD NICK†a
Page me45.372
You must excuse the brevity of this note, the reason being that the letter has to be posted at once.
Page me45.372
First published, in the languages of the original (German, French and English), in Annali, an. I, Milano, 1958

Printed according to the original

260
ENGELS TO MARX
IN ST HÉLIER†494
Page me45.372
Eastbourne,†496 20 August 1879
53 Grand Parade
Dear Moor,

I return herewith the letters from Hirsch,†497 ditto one from Liebknecht which I have just answered.†501 I've drawn his attention to his strange contradictions, viz.: 'you wrote to Hirsch saying that the paper was backed by “the party + Höchberg”, which must surely mean, if Höchberg is in any way a plus, his purse, for in other respects he's a negative quantity. You now write and tell me that Höchberg hasn't contributed a penny. Maybe somebody can make sense of that, I GIVE IT UP.' Also that it was absurd to say that Hirsch had 'misinterpreted' Bernstein's letter†492 'in an even sillier way', since that letter admitted of no misinterpretation at all, Bernstein having plainly made himself out therein to be the effective head of the editorial board. Naturally, I went on, Liebknecht believed that he had arranged everything for the best, but Hirsch was entitled to see for himself and Liebknecht was preventing him from doing so by withholding the relevant material; so if Hirsch were to refuse, it would be Liebknecht's fault. 'As for ourselves, this much is certain: If Hirsch does not accept, we shall have to consider very carefully what we should do; we certainly shan't take the bait without knowing who in fact “The Party” is that is backing the paper.'†490 For it was precisely now, I told him, when all the rotten and conceited elements were able to push themselves to the fore without let or hindrance, that the time had at last come to abandon a policy of dissimulation and conciliation and even, if necessary, to be undeterred by a few rows and rumpuses. A party that would sooner let itself be hoodwinked by any and every blockhead, rather than summon up the courage to disavow him in public, might as well pack up. E.g. Kayser.†502

Page Break me45.373
Page me45.373
The Lafargues have been here since Monday†a and are staying until the day after tomorrow; we shall see if we can keep Laura here a few days longer. She brought us news that Jenny's catastrophe had gone off all right in Ramsgate,†499 as probably everyone, apart from herself and Longuet, had predicted. Otherwise everything there seems to be going on as well as can be expected.

Page me45.373

Since yesterday the weather has been very uncertain, which isn't particularly good for Jollymeier; he had pretty well recovered, fever gone, appetite restored, little pain, but there's now been some kind of check and his improvement is no longer so rapid, though so far he's not actually any worse. Today we had the regatta, on which occasion some rain is de rigueur.†b As you are further to the south-west and nearer the Atlantic, I'm afraid you are getting it worse and more at first hand.

Page me45.373

Also enclosed an embarrassed letter from Bernstein which I have not yet answered. It would be best if you kept everything until further notice; there's no hurry about Bernstein and the noble Jahrbuch can remain quietly in London until I arrive.†503

Page Break me45.374

Page me45.374

From Schorlemmer's point of view, it's a good thing that we stayed here and, indeed, shall be staying here at any rate until the 28th; what happens then will depend on his condition and, of course, the weather. If possible, a few days in the Isle of Wight and places nearby.

Page me45.374

Old Ruge, in the youthful guise of a NIGGER†a SERENADER, has been trotting round the pier today selling programmes for a fireworks' display.

Page me45.374

Lafargue and Laura send their love and join us in hoping that you are all still keeping well. Best wishes from Pumps and me to Tussy and you.

Your
F.E.

Page me45.374

First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

261
ENGELS TO MARX
IN RAMSGATE†500

Page me45.374

Eastbourne, 25 August 1879
53 Grand Parade
Dear Moor,

I hope you got my letter†b sent to the Hôtel de l'Europe, St Hélier, together with an enclosure from Liebknecht to me and a letter (returned) from Hirsch to you.

Page me45.374

In the meantime Hirsch has been arrested in Paris and after two days in detention he was compelled to leave the country. He is in London, staying with Lessner.†504 Yesterday I got from him a whole parcel of correspondence to do with the newspaper affair†490; very interesting. In my view he has acted quite correctly. (He knew my address, as I had sent him a few excerpts, omitting anything offensive, from the letter of Liebknecht's I passed on to you.)†505

Page Break me45.375

Page me45.375

I've just received 1. a letter from Höchberg in Scheveningen and 2. one from Bebel,†506 the purpose of both being to induce us to contribute. There's no hurry about a reply as Vollmar, the editor taken on in place of Hirsch, won't be out of jug for another three weeks! A really excellent prelude, this.

Page me45.375

I'd send you the whole bag of tricks if I was sure of your address. According to your wife it is 62 Plains of Waterloo, while Laura maintains it's 71. As soon as I know for certain where you are, I'll send you the lot. What an unholy muddle these people have again got themselves into. Liebknecht, Bebel, Viereck, Höchberg, Schramm, Bernstein, they all of them write something different and there's nothing but confusion and contradiction. So all we can do is wait, and at least there'll be no need for us to be disturbed by this business during our holiday.

Page me45.375

I wrote at once to Hirsch†15 and told him I'd be back in London next Thursday.†a

Page me45.375

You will in the meantime have heard from the Lafargues that they have been here. Unfortunately the weather wasn't up to much.

Page me45.375

How's Jenny getting on? As well as could be expected, according to the last news I got from your wife. I hope this is still the case. Give her my love and congratulate her on her strapping boy.†b Your refound ability to sleep will, I trust, continue, thereby removing the chief obstacle that prevents you feeling really fit. Let's hope the Ramsgate weather will suit your wife too. Jollymeier is much better, but the changeable weather is a sharp reminder to him that something is still slightly amiss between muscles and joints. Pumps is ALL RIGHT; as usual sea-bathing is doing me a power of good; I think I'm getting properly fat.

Page me45.375

If you don't write tomorrow, then better [write] to London. The postal facilities here are antediluvian; a letter posted on Wednesday would not arrive until after our departure.

Page me45.375

Best wishes to all of you, and see to it that Jenny doesn't take it upon herself to return home too soon. How long are you staying there?

Your
F.E.

Page Break me45.376
Page me45.376
Do you have Kovalevsky's London address, or can I get it from Tussy?
Page me45.376
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

262
MARX TO ENGELS†507
IN EASTBOURNE†496
Page me45.376
Ramsgate, 25 August 1879
62 Plains of Waterloo
Dear FRED,

My letter from Jersey†12 and yours from Eastbourne†a have evidently crossed.
Page me45.376
Last Wednesday,†b the very day after we had heard by telegraph of the catastrophe at Ramsgate,†499 we left for London first thing in the morning. For Tussy's sake I was sorry to cut short her stay in Jersey but knew that, for various reasons, my presence had become necessary in Ramsgate. I arrived there on Thursday amidst thunder, lightning and torrents of rain. On Friday it was fine, on Saturday IT RAINED DOGS AND CATS from morn till night, fine again yesterday, outlook uncertain today. Place is full of Jews and fleas.
Page me45.376
The main thing is that Jennychen has got safely through the 9 critical days and, CONSIDERING THE CIRCUMSTANCES, is reasonably well. For the time being she is feeding the baby herself; most desirable that she should go on being able to do so. My wife is making slow progress but is better nonetheless.
Page me45.376
My head's not quite ALL RIGHT yet. Yesterday, by way of a test, I glanced at certain mathematical notebooks I had brought with me, but very soon had to abandon the premature JOB which was done only as a — TEST.
Page me45.376
I have not taken and am not taking sea baths, but only warm sea baths; for in consequence of the frightful weather when we arrived in Jersey, my throat trouble got worse and was compounded by a sudden toothache, neither being quite gone yet, although much alleviated, and only reminding me by an occasional twinge that they are still lurking in the background.

Page Break me45.377

Page me45.377

Hirsch is in London†a; he had left his visiting card at my house, but I had no time to look him up (he's staying with Lessner) because of my abrupt departure from London. The enclosed letter from Kaub will inform you of the very odd circumstances attending Hirsch's renewed expulsion from Paris.

Page me45.377

I hope that there has been an improvement in Schollymeyer's condition. Kindest regards to him and Pumps to whom in addition Johnny asks to be specially recommended.

Page me45.377

Have you read Allman's — or whatever he's called — inaugural speech?†508 It's something I would have been capable of myself, although NO MAN OF SCIENCE.

Page me45.377

Adio, OLD BOY.

Your
Moor

Page me45.377

Wright, the head of the Massachusetts LABOR STATISTICS BUREAU, has sent me the complete set of REPORTS FROM 1874 to 1879 (so doesn't know about Harney's earlier consignments), together with the compendium of the Massachusetts Census, and has, at the same time, written to say THAT 'HE SHALL BE PLEASED, IN FUTURE, TO SEND YOU OUR PUBLICATIONS AS SOON AS ISSUED'.

Page me45.377

Such 'politesses' come to us only from Russia and the UNITED STATES.

Page me45.377

Dana, my old patron, CALLED LAST FRIDAY†b AT Maitland Park, Tussy SENT ME HIS CARD.

Page me45.377

First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Page Break me45.378

263

ENGELS TO MARX
IN RAMSGATE†500

Page me45.378

Eastbourne,†496 26 August 1879

Dear Moor,

Have at last got your letter†a and, with it, your exact address which I needed if I was to send you all the rubbish ad vocem†b party organ.†490 Since, for Hirsch's sake, I couldn't put off replying to Höchberg, I wrote him the enclosed note,†c which is unlikely to gratify him.

Page me45.378

As you will see from Bebel's letter it contains exactly the same arguments as Liebknecht used in his last letter.†501 From this it may be deduced that Liebknecht has not shown him my last letter†509 although expressly instructed by me to do so. I now intend, as soon as you have sent the stuff back to London, 1. to instruct Bebel to make sure that letter is shown to him, so that he may see that all this palaver has already been answered, 2. to set out side by side for his benefit all the contradictions contained in the various letters written to C. Hirsch, so that he may see what a beastly mess they've gone and made of things again with their free and easy ways. If this is put to him properly, Bebel is, I think, just the man to take advantage of it. I shall, of course, first submit the letter to you for approval, likewise to Hirsch, cujus res agitur.†d
Page me45.378

We were all very glad to hear that Jenny is doing well. I altogether agree that, if at all possible, she should go on feeding the child herself,†499 give up the School†177 and thus at last rid herself of the BOTHER with NURSES and SERVANTS, the root of that trouble being after all her constant and enforced absence from home. As for you and your wife, you must stay at the seaside for just as long as you possibly can. You both have a lot of leeway to make up and ought not to come back until your head and her digestive organs have again condescended to function pretty well normally. It's not as though there's any hurry now and, besides, the weather is gradually becoming, if not brilliant and settled, at any rate more changeable in a nicer way than of late. It seems much the same where you are as it is here. Jollymeier would be ALL RIGHT if he could have a week of constant sunshine.
Page me45.378

I hope, when I again see Tussy, to find her in an improved state of health as a result of sea bathing. If you'd only written and told us, she could have come over here on Saturday†a and gone on bathing until the day after tomorrow! In the event, it wasn't till Sunday morning that I learned from the Lafargues that you were in Ramsgate and not where she was at all.

Page Break me45.379
Page me45.379

By the way, my three weeks at the seaside have nothing like satisfied me, I'm chewing over all manner of plans for the time when Jollymeier, whom London will probably suit better than the sea, is once again fit to travel. Do you think it would be a good idea if, in about 14 to 18 days' time and WEATHER PERMITTING, we three were to shake off the Eternal-Feminine†b for once and go and play at being BACHELORS somewhere or other for a week or two?
Page me45.379

Warmest regards from all of us to all of you.

Your
F.E.
Page me45.379

First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

264
ENGELS TO KARL HÖCHBERG
IN SCHEVENINGEN†510
Page me45.379
Eastbourne, 26 August 1879
Dear Mr Höchberg,

As I do not know how long you will be staying in Scheveningen, I hasten to advise you in reply that you have been misled in regard to the information allegedly given us by C. Hirsch. He did not assure us that the new newspaper†c was to be 'your private property', or that it was to 'adopt a moderate attitude'.†511 Our view of the affair is based, not upon Hirsch's assurances, but upon our appraisal of all the relevant correspondence conducted between Leipzig and Zurich on the one hand and C. Hirsch on the other. I must refrain from going into the whole comedy of errors these letters represent, and in which nobody has been more blameless than Hirsch. In my view his conduct in the whole affair has been perfectly rational, frank and honourable. Hence I must wholeheartedly approve of his decision to refuse the editorship on the terms mooted which have not yet even been settled between the interested parties in Leipzig and Zurich, and at this juncture my only concern is to deflect from him a reproach he does not deserve.

Page Break me45.380
Page me45.380
With Social-Democratic greetings,

Yours faithfully,
F. Engels
Page me45.380
Back in London as from day after tomorrow.†496
Page me45.380
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

265
MARX TO ENGELS
IN EASTBOURNE†496

Page me45.380
Ramsgate, 27 August 1879
62 Plains of Waterloo
DEAR FRED,

Our letters keep crossing. No doubt you will have had mine (posted last Monday†a); yours — of 25 August†b — together with enclosures safely received.
Page me45.380
I am only writing a line or two, as my wife is having to go somewhere near the post office, so you will get this acknowledgement of your letter before you leave.
Page me45.380
I enclose for the amusement of yourself, Jollymeyer and Pumps, a letter from Tussy to my wife. PLEASE RETURN IT AT ONCE AFTER PERUSAL.

Page Break me45.381
Jennychen is doing well†499; is not allowed to leave her room until next Monday and will then have to spend at least another week with us,†500 as Longuet is going back to London earlier.
Page me45.381
The weather has been deteriorating from day to day, but it's always tolerable for an hour or two and the SEA BREEZE is beneficial, showers notwithstanding. It is Liebknecht himself who deserves the 'jackass' label he is seeking, with his habitual loutish courtesy, to pin on Hirsch — something he always does when 'caught' in flagrante.
Page me45.381
Best wishes to everyone.

Your
Moor
Page me45.381
Kovalevsky's address: 42 Gower Street.
Page me45.381
First published in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

266
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me45.381
[Ramsgate,] 28 August 1879
DEAR FRED,

The enclosed letter from Master Most, forwarded by Tussy,†512 has just arrived. You must let me know by return what sort of answer you consider suitable. What Most wants is obviously something which he for his part might 'misuse'; on the other hand what Mr Lübeck does is inspired by Mr Bernstein.†a
Page me45.381
A beautiful morning today; whether the weather will hold for the rest of the day is another matter.
Page me45.381
Salut.

Your
Moor

Page Break me45.382
Page me45.382
PLEASE RETURN THE MOST LETTER.
Page me45.382
Yesterday evening, after the rain had stopped, we took Johnny†a down to the beach. *Some people said: 'That little boy looks like a prince.' Johnny turned fiercely round and retorted: 'I look like a little Jollymeyer!'
Page me45.382
From a letter received from the house Lafargue I see that the other Meyer†b — not the Jollymeyer — had another scene at Lafargues. Poor fellow!*
Page me45.382
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

267
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me45.382
Ramsgate, 3 September 1879
62 Plains of Waterloo
Dear Engels,

Meyer (R.) wrote†c and announced his intention of visiting me, while at the same time saying, on the other hand, that I was to let him know, i.e. telegraph him, 'DO NOT COME', should I be otherwise engaged. FIRSTLY, therefore, I telegraphed him in the 'negative', secondly, however, proceeded to write him a letter†12 to this effect, that in consequence of Mrs Marx's bad health my whole time is taken up 'presently'. I am telling you this in order that you may know how things stand, should he raise the matter with you. In fact my wife is IMPROVING only very slowly and hence BY NO MEANS ANXIOUS TO SEE MEYER HERE.

Page me45.382
Jennychen had her first outing today, a fifteen minute walk†499; SHE PROGRESSES FAVOURABLY.

Your
Moor
Page me45.382
How is Jolly getting on?
Page me45.382
First published in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.383

268
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER
IN GENEVA
Page me45.383
London, 8 September 1879
Dear Old Man,

I am sorry to hear that you are still in the clutches of misfortune and it's not within my power to extricate you from them altogether. In the meantime I have been able to place two pounds at your disposal, and have also received a third from a friend,†a who is both a chemist and a communist of the first water; I have just taken out a money order for you in respect of these three pounds, vulgo 75 fr. 60, and hope it will be paid you without delay. It goes without saying, of course, that you need feel absolutely no embarrassment where I am concerned; anything I can do for you will always be done without fail, and always with pleasure, and it's disgraceful we shouldn't have reached the stage of ensuring our veterans a carefree existence.
Page me45.383
The Freiheit is unlikely to survive until the new year, unless it derives a new importance from the stupidities of its opponents. It is intended to set up an official party organ in Zurich†490 and to entrust its management — under the ultimate control of the Leipzigers — to Germans in Zurich of whom it cannot be said that they inspire me with confidence. At any rate, in the Jahrbuch for social science edited by Höchberg, one of their number, there are some rather extraordinary things: the party was wrong in making itself out to be a workers' party, brought the Anti-Socialist Law†462 upon itself by otiose attacks on the bourgeoisie, what was wanted wasn't revolution, but slow, peaceful development, etc.†513 This cowardly twaddle, needless to say, is all of it grist to Most's mill, and he is all agog to exploit it, as you will see from recent numbers of the Freiheit.†514 We had been invited by Leipzig to contribute to the new organ†b and had, indeed, consented; but since learning who is to be immediately responsible,†c we have again cried off, nor, after this Jahrbuch, can there be any intercourse whatever with men who are trying surreptitiously to introduce such twaddle and such toadyism into the party — with Höchberg and Co. The Leipzigers will discover soon enough what kind of allies they have landed themselves with. All in all, it's just about time we took a stand against the philanthropic big and petty bourgeois, the students and professors who are forcing their way into the German party and seeking to water down the proletariat's class struggle against its oppressors till it becomes an institution for universal fraternisation, and this at a moment when the bourgeois, with whom we are supposed to fraternise, have outlawed us, destroyed our presses, disrupted our meetings and delivered us up sans phrase†a to the caprices of the police. The German workers are hardly likely to join in such a campaign.

Page Break me45.384
Page me45.384

Our people in Russia have scored a signal victory — they have disrupted the Russo-Prussian alliance.†b If they hadn't, by their ruthless action, put the fear of God into the Russian government, it would probably have succeeded in overcoming the internal discontent felt by the aristocracy and middle classes over the English ban on the entry of troops into the open city of Constantinople†515 and the ensuing diplomatic defeat in Berlin.†430 But as it was, blame for those defeats had to be shifted onto another country, onto Prussia. Though uncle and nephew may have temporarily patched things up at Alexandrovo,†516 the breach is now beyond repair. And, unless there's a catastrophe in Russia very soon, there will be war between Russia and Prussia, a war predicted by the General Council as the inevitable consequence of the French war while this last was still in progress, and which was avoided only with the utmost difficulty in 1873.†517
Page me45.384

Well, keep your pecker up, and drop us a line again soon — a proper letter, since in a mere postcard you can't really get things off your chest.
Page me45.384

Warmest regards from Marx and

Your old friend,
F.E.
Page me45.384
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.385

MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me45.385
Ramsgate, 9 September 1879
62 Plains of Waterloo
Dear FRED,

Various INCIDENTS have meant that money is visibly running out, whereas I wish to spend another week here,†500 despite the weather which, since Sunday evening, has been very uncertain.
Page me45.385
You will hear more about our sojourn here, which has done me, in particular, a great deal of good, from the Lafargues.
Page me45.385
Enclosed a letter from Sorge. Since I haven't got Becker's address with me, and you are corresponding with him anyhow, PLEASE write and tell him to send me the form for the power of attorney.†a
Page me45.385
How are things with Jollymeyer?

Your
K.M.
Page me45.385
First published in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

270
ENGELS TO MARX
IN RAMSGATE†500
Page me45.385
London, 9 September 1879
Dear Moor,

Herewith something from Liebknecht, together with enclosures, in which there would appear to be little that is new, which is why I have been in no hurry to send them. For obvious reasons I have told Hirsch nothing about all this stuff, it being better to avoid unnecessary rows.

Page Break me45.386
Page me45.386
Höchberg has written to Hirsch from Scheveningen, virtually asking him to invite him over here and assure him of a good reception, to which Hirsch hasn't deigned to reply. On receiving a further postcard from Höchberg, Hirsch sent him a ditto, saying you weren't back yet and he himself, Hirsch, was likewise about to leave for the coast. So we probably shan't be bothered by the man.

Page me45.386
Meanwhile it might be a good thing if you were to return the documents to me. I really ought to reply to Bebel at long last†506 1. on account of Hirsch, who would like to see his personal business clarified vis-á-vis Bebel and is getting a bit impatient and 2. because by good fortune the Jahrbuch Kovalevsky brought you will enable us quite simply to give the chaps definite reasons why it's absolutely impossible for us to contribute to an organ in which Höchberg has any say at all. The articles concerned are:
Page me45.386
1. 'Rückblicke auf die sozialistische Bewegung in Deutschland' by (Höchberg and, probably, Bernstein and Lübeck),†513
Page me45.386
2. Critiques by C.L. (Lübeck), notably of Cohn's 'Was ist Sozialismus',†a concluding part,
Page me45.386
3. Report from Germany No. 1 by M. Sch. (Max Schlesinger in Breslau).†b
Page me45.386
Höchberg declares outright that the Germans made a mistake when they turned the socialist movement into a mere workers' movement and, by unnecessarily provoking the bourgeois, drew down upon themselves the Anti-Socialist Law†462! The movement ought, he says, to be placed under the direction of bourgeois and educated elements, its character to be wholly that of peaceable reform, etc. You can imagine with what GUSTO Most embraces these lamentable propositions, and once again makes himself out to be the genuine representative of the German movement.†514
Page me45.386
Enfin,†c I believe — and no doubt you will share my opinion — that, after this business, we would be well-advised to establish our standpoint — vis-á-vis the Leipzigers, at least. If the new party organ plays the same tune as Höchberg, we might be compelled to do so publicly as well.†a

Page Break me45.387
Page me45.387
If you will let me have the things (I've still got one copy of the Jahrbuch here), I will draft a letter to Bebel and send it to you; needless to say, there's no need for you to interrupt your holiday on account of this trifle. But something has got to be done soon, otherwise Hirsch will again start writing private letters to all and sundry, thus lending the affair much too exclusively a personal character.
Page me45.387
Ever since Russian diplomacy has had to allow events inside Russia dictate its goals, everything's been going wrong for it. At the very time when nihilists and pan-Slavs are so thoroughly demolishing its German alliance†b that any apparent patching-up can at most be short-lived, at this same time, its agents in Afghanistan are driving England — in the event of war with Germany — into the arms of Bismarck. Bismarck, I am sure, is doing everything he can to bring about war with Russia. In concert with Austria and England, he could risk it all right: England would ensure Denmark's neutrality, probably Italy's and maybe even that of France. But it would be better if things were to come rapidly to a head in Russia, and the prospect of war be eliminated by an internal upheaval. The position is beginning to favour Bismarck too much. A simultaneous war against Russia and France would become a struggle for national survival and the resulting outburst of chauvinism would put paid to our movement for years to come. And on top of that, the odds would be greatly in Bismarck's favour the moment England acceded: a long, hard fight, but at 3:2 the eventual outcome would be much as in the Seven Years' War.†518

Page me45.387

Sam Moore writes to say that the sale of the ESTATE has so far been going very well, most of it having been sold for 39-40 times the amount of the gross rent; nothing remains unsold but the moors and woods which they assess at £11,600, including stocks of timber, and think they can hang on to until business improves in Sheffield, when they might succeed in getting a better price.
Page me45.387

What has become of the Lafargues? Since Pumps went to see them a week ago on Friday†c we've neither heard nor seen anything of Paul.
Page me45.387

Jollymeier is still tinkering away at his rheumatism which refuses to budge. Gumpert advised him to go to Buxton and yesterday he said that, unless it gets better soon, he would go there at the end of the week. He, Pumps and I send you all our cordial regards and trust that life at the seaside is doing you good. What are your plans about coming back†500? Put it off as long as you possibly can; what with the changeable weather, I know what will happen once you're back here — nowt as anyone could wish for.†a

Page Break me45.388

Your
F.E.
Page me45.388
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

271
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me45.388
Ramsgate, 10 September 1879
62 Plains of Waterloo
DEAR FRED,

Yesterday I got a note from Kovalevsky saying he had had a letter from Russia which necessitated his immediate return to the land of his birth. He didn't send me the Jahrbuch.†b

Page me45.388

Laura spent a week with us, and Paul a few days every now and again; the day before yesterday he returned with her to London. Laura, by the by, had let Pumptia know she was leaving.

Page me45.388

My wife is still making very slow progress; I have got much better.†500 The air down here suits me extraordinarily well. Besides, I was kept in mouvement perpétuel†c by Laura.

Page me45.388

Herewith the letters received from you today. (The others will go off at the same time, but under separate cover.) Liebknecht has no discernment. The letters prove what they are intended to refute, namely our original view that the business was bungled in Leipzig, whereas the men in Zurich proceeded in accordance with the terms prescribed for them.†490 Incidentally, their HORROR at the attack made by the otherwise so innocuous Laterne on that scoundrel Kayser†519 shows more clearly than anything else what is the calibre of these chaps. Schramm, though a sound man in other respects, has always been a philistine. The Leipzigers for their part are already so 'parliamentarily minded' that they regard criticism of one member of their Reichstag côterie as a crime de lése majesté.

Page Break me45.389

Page me45.389

I altogether agree with your view that no further time should be lost in stating our views, forcibly and ruthlessly, as to the Jahrbuch bunkum,†513 i.e. pro nunc†a 'presenting' it to the Leipzigers in black and white. Should they proceed to go ahead with their 'party organ' in this way, we shall have to disavow them publicly. In such matters, the line has to be drawn somewhere.

Page me45.389

I haven't replied to Most,†b nor shall I do so; as soon as I'm in London I shall write, inviting him to turn up in person. You ought to be present at the meeting.

Page me45.389

The most typical thing about Bismarck is the way in which he came to be at odds with Russia. He wanted Gorchakov removed and Shuvalov put in his place. Since this miscarried, the obvious conclusion was — voilá l'ennemi!†c And you may be pretty sure that Bucher did not fail to exacerbate his master's irritation. On retourne toujours á son premier amour.†d From the point of view of our movement and of Europe generally, nothing could be more injurious than the implementation of Bismarck's plan. So long as old William†e is alive, this won't be so easy; it might always happen that Bismarck himself falls victim to the reaction he sparked off with the Anti-Socialist Law.†462 En attendant,†f the black cloud†520 in the east is already doing him a service; once again he is the 'man they need' and the liberals now feel it to be their 'patriotic' duty to kiss his arse. Not only will the iron military budget be renewed at the next sitting of the Reichstag; it might be 'perpetuated', as William originally wished. The secret of Russian diplomacy's success ABROAD was the deathly silence OF RUSSIA AT HOME, the spell being broken by the movement in that country. Its final victory was the Treaty of Paris of 1856.†521 Since then, nothing but blunders.

Page me45.389
I HOPE POOR SCHOLLYMEYER'S HEALTH WILL IMPROVE. MY BEST WISHES FOR HIM.

Your
Moor
Page me45.389
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.390

272
ENGELS TO MARX
IN RAMSGATE†500
Page me45.390
London, 11 September 1879
Dear Moor,

Letters received.†a Yesterday Hirsch called at my house where he also encountered the Lafargues and Henry Juta; he is going to bring me the stuff I had returned to him earlier on, and then I shall set to work forthwith.†b
Page me45.390
Laura and Paul, i.e. notably the latter, said they would be coming again next Sunday evening.†c Much though we appreciate this, it is a matter that calls for careful consideration on account of Tussy. Since our return, she has been dining with us on Sundays and I shall, needless to say, invite her for next Sunday as well. As Paul had said the Longuets would be returning this week, I had thought of going to see Jenny tomorrow or the day after and asking her to help me out of this quandary by taking over Tussy for the evening. But on leaving, Laura said that Jenny wouldn't be back till Saturday, and so I have no other recourse than to contrive things in this way. If it's feasible, let me know at once; if not, some other way out must be found. The Lafargues never arrive before 7 o'clock.
Page me45.390
Kindest regards. For three days now Jollymeier has been much better — Buxton probably not necessary.†d

Your

F.E.
Page me45.390
First published in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.391

273
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me45.391
[Ramsgate,] 11 September 1879
62 Plains of Waterloo
DEAR FRED,

Letter and enclosure†a received with many thanks.
Page me45.391
The Longuet family will be 'making' for London, as Lessner puts it, on Saturday (next).†b So far all has gone well with Jennychen, although she still has a bit of asthma, but she proposes — obstinately, á la Lupus†c — to combine feeding her child†d with teaching.†177
Page me45.391
Yesterday, to my intense surprise, Meyer†e suddenly materialised in front of me on the SANDS. To my relief, he immediately explained that he had taken lodgings for the day in Margate whither he would be returning in a few hours' time, and that all he wanted was to inquire about 'madame's'†f health, etc. I did the honours of the place for a while and then handed him over to Longuet so that he might speed him on his way. He — Meyer — is going to Edinburgh for the TRADES UNION CONGRESS.†522 I'm glad this 'crisis' was so short-lived. The good fellow's tendency towards Ramsgate has been IRREPRESSIBLE. He told Longuet, by the by, that his liver had got much worse so that he could no longer 'take' the accustomed amount of 'spirits' without their going to his head. An attempt, no doubt, to gloss over his recent ACCIDENTS at Maitland Park, etc.
Page me45.391
The weather here is partly good and partly bad, the latter having a tendency to predominate.

Your
Moor
Page me45.391
First published in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.392

274
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me45.392
[Ramsgate,] 14 September 1879†523
Dear FRED,

Tell Tussy that she is invited to 2 o'clock dinner at Jenny's on Sunday and to a display of Edgar 'Marcel' Longuet who was today registered a British citizen at Ramsgate.
Page me45.392
For Jennychen and suite leave for London tomorrow; ditto Helene†a to give her SUPPORT.
Page me45.392
CHEQUE encashable Monday.
Page me45.392
I have discovered another letter from Hirsch to myself which belongs in the dossier†b of the case; I enclose it.
Page me45.392
Salut.

Your
Moor
Page me45.392
First published in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

275
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER
IN GENEVA
Page me45.392
London, 15 September 1879
Dear Old Man,

I trust you got my last letter†c and the money order for 75 frs by post.
Page me45.392
Sorge writes saying that he has written to you, too, about the necessity of renewing the power of attorney in respect of Lingenau's will, since Geib's death might otherwise put the lawyers of the contending party into the position of being able to declare the old power of attorney invalid and thus bring about new delays.†348

Page Break me45.393
Page me45.393
Marx, who is still at the seaside†500 and has apparently made a wonderful recovery, has just written telling me to ask you to send him the form for the power of attorney†a so that he can attend to the same. Would you therefore be so good as to do this as soon as possible. If it involves you in any expense, write and tell me at once what it amounts to and I will send you the money. The sooner this is done the better. The power of attorney should, of course, be exactly the same as before, only omitting Geib's name, or else mentioning him as deceased.
Page me45.393
The business of the German party organ in Zurich†490 is becoming more and more of a lark. The Zurich editorial committee which, under the general management of the Leipzigers, is to supervise and censor the paper, consists of Höchberg, Schramm and Bernstein. But now, in the Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik, published in Zurich by Höchberg, Schramm, Höchberg and Bernstein have printed an article 'Rückblick auf die sozialistische Bewegung in Deutschland'†513 in which all three are revealed to be common or garden bourgeois and pacific philanthropists; they accuse the party of having been too exclusively a 'workers' party', and of having provoked the hatred of the bourgeoisie, and claim that leadership of the movement should be entrusted to 'educated' bourgeois of their own stamp. That's really going a bit too far.
Page me45.393
Luckily Höchberg dropped in on me unexpectedly the day before yesterday, whereupon I gave him a piece of my mind. The unfortunate lad — not a bad chap, au fond,†b but alarmingly naive — came down to earth with a bang when I pointed out to him that we couldn't think of lowering the proletarian flag which we had held aloft for nigh on 40 years, still less join in the general petty-bourgeois fraternisation fantasies against which we had been fighting, again for nigh on 40 years. In short, now he at last knows where he stands with us and also why, whatever the Leipzigers may say or do, we can't march shoulder to shoulder with people of his ilk.
Page me45.393
We shall likewise supply Bebel with a quite categorical statement as to our standpoint vis-á-vis these allies of the German party,†c and then wait and see what they will do. If the party organ adopts the standpoint of the said bourgeois article, we shall publicly declare our opposition to it. However, they're unlikely to let things go so far.

Page Break me45.394
Page me45.394
Write soon, then.
Page me45.394
Warmest regards from Marx and

Your old friend,

F. Engels
Page me45.394
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

276
MARX and ENGELS
TO AUGUST BEBEL, WILHELM LIEBKNECHT, WILHELM BRACKE AND OTHERS†524
(CIRCULAR LETTER)†525
IN LEIPZIG
Page me45.394
[Draft]
[London, 17-18 September 1879]
Dear Bebel,

The delay in replying to your letter of 20†a August has been due, on the one hand, to Marx's prolonged absence†500 and, on the other, to a number of incidents: first, the arrival of the 'Richter' Jahrbuch,†513 secondly that of Höchberg himself.†b
Page me45.394
I can only conclude that Liebknecht did not show you the last letter I wrote him, although I specifically instructed him to do so. Otherwise you would certainly not have adduced the same reasons as had been put forward by Liebknecht, and to which I had already replied in the aforesaid letter.†509
Page me45.394
Let us now run through the individual points with which we are concerned here.

I. THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH CARL HIRSCH
Page me45.394
Liebknecht asked Hirsch whether he would undertake to edit the party organ that was about to be founded in Zurich. Hirsch sought information as to the financing of the paper: what funds were available and who was providing them? Firstly, so as to know whether the paper might not peter out within a few months. Secondly, to ascertain who held the purse-strings, thus having the final say as to the paper's stance. Liebknecht's reply, telling Hirsch that 'everything is in order; you will be getting further information from Zurich' (Liebknecht to Hirsch, 28 July), didn't arrive.†526 But what did reach Hirsch from Zurich was a letter from Bernstein (24 July) in which Bernstein informed him that 'We are being entrusted with the production and supervision (of the paper)'. A discussion had taken place 'between Viereck, Singer and ourselves' during which it was suggested 'that your position might be rendered somewhat difficult by the differences of opinion which you, as a Laterne man, have had with individual comrades, though I myself do not consider this objection carries much weight'.

Page Break me45.395

Page me45.395
Not a word about the financing.
Page me45.395
Hirsch answered by return on 26 July, enquiring about the paper's material circumstances. Which comrades had undertaken to cover the deficit? Up to what amount and for how long? — The question of the editor's salary didn't enter into this at all; Hirsch merely wanted to know whether 'means have been secured to ensure the paper's continued existence for at least a year'.
Page me45.395
On 31 July, Bernstein replied, saying that any deficit there might be would be covered by voluntary contributions of which some (!) had already been subscribed. Hirsch's remarks about the stance he thought the paper should adopt, of which more below, elicited deprecating remarks and injunctions:

'It is all the more necessary for the supervisory committee to insist on it in that it, in turn, is subject to control, i.e. is responsible. On these points, therefore, you must come to an understanding with the supervisory committee.'
Page me45.395
They asked him to reply by return preferably by telegraph.
Page me45.395
Hence, instead of getting a reply to his justified questions, Hirsch was informed that he was to be editor under a supervisory committee based in Zurich, with views differing very materially from his own and members of whose names he wasn't even informed!
Page me45.395
Hirsch, quite justifiably outraged by this treatment, chose rather to come to an understanding with the Leipzigers. His letter of 2 August to Liebknecht must be known to you, since Hirsch expressly demanded that it be shown to you and Viereck. Hirsch is even willing to submit to a supervisory committee in Zurich, inasmuch as the latter is to put its comments to the editor in writing and these may be referred for decision to the controlling committee in Leipzig.†527

Page Break me45.396
Page me45.396
In the meantime Liebknecht had written to Hirsch on 28 July:

'Of course finance is available for the undertaking, seeing that it is backed by the entire party + (INCLUSIVE) Höchberg. But I'm not concerned with the details.'
Page me45.396
Nor does Liebknecht's next letter contain anything about the financing — only an assurance that the Zurich committee is not an editorial committee, but is only to be entrusted with administration and the financial side. As late as 14 August, Liebknecht wrote to me along the same lines, and asked that we persuade Hirsch to accept. You yourself, as late as 20 August were still so little acquainted with the actual circumstances that you wrote to me saying:

'He' (Höchberg) 'has no more say in the editing of the paper than any other well-known member of the party.'
Page me45.396

Finally, Hirsch received a letter from Viereck, dated 11 August, containing the admission that 'the 3 men domiciled in Zurich are to, qua editorial committee, apply themselves to founding the paper and, subject to the agreement of the three Leipzigers, select an editor ... so far as I recall, the resolutions that were sent them also asserted that the (Zurich) founding committee mentioned under 2., was to assume both political and financial responsibility towards the party.... From this state of affairs it follows, or so it seems to me, that ... there can be no question of anyone assuming the editorship without the concurrence of the 3 men domiciled in Zurich and entrusted with the founding by the party'.

Page me45.396

Here as last was something definite, at least, for Hirsch to go on, if only in regard to the position of the editor vis-á-vis the Zurichers. They were an editorial committee; they were also politically responsible; without their concurrence no one could assume the editorship. In short, Hirsch was simply instructed to come to an understanding with 3 men in Zurich whose names had still not been disclosed to him.
Page me45.396

But to make the confusion worse, Liebknecht added a postscript to Viereck's letter:

'Singer from Berlin was here just now and informed us that the supervisory committee in Zurich is not, as Viereck imagines, an editorial committee, but essentially an administrative committee which is financially responsible to the party, i.e. to ourselves, for the paper; of course, its members also have the right and the duty to discuss the editing with you (a right and a duty of which, by the way, every member is possessed); they are not empowered to place you under their guardianship.'
Page me45.396

The Zurich trio and one member of the Leipzig committee — the only one†a present at the discussions — insist that Hirsch is to be subject to official direction by Zurich, while another Leipzig member†a contests this outright. And yet Hirsch is to make up his mind before these gentlemen are agreed amongst themselves! The fact that Hirsch was entitled to acquaint himself with the resolutions they had adopted and which embodied the conditions with which he was expected to comply, was entirely overlooked, the more so since it never seems to have occurred to the Leipzigers that they themselves should become properly acquainted with those resolutions. How, otherwise, can the above-mentioned inconsistency be accounted for?

Page Break me45.397

Page me45.397
If the Leipzigers were unable to agree upon the powers vested in the Zurich people, the latter harboured no doubts on this score.
Page me45.397
Schramm to Hirsch, 14 August:

'Had you not written at one time that in a similar case' (as that of Kayser),†b 'you would do just as you had done before, thus holding out the prospect of a similar modus operandi,†519 we would not be wasting words on the subject. As it is, however, and in view of that statement of yours, we must reserve the right to have the casting vote as to what articles the new paper should take.'
Page me45.397
The letter to Bernstein in which Hirsch was alleged to have said this was dated 26 July, long after the conference in Zurich at which the Zurich trio's powers were laid down. But so much were those in Zurich already revelling in the sense of their own bureaucratic authority that, in reply to this subsequent letter of Hirsch's, they were already laying claim to new powers, namely the decision as to what articles should be included. The editorial committee was already a censorship committee.
Page me45.397
Not until Höchberg arrived in Paris did Hirsch learn from him the names of the members of the two committees.†528
Page me45.397
If, then, discussions with Hirsch broke down, what was the cause?
Page me45.397
1. The obstinate refusal, on the part of both Leipzig and Zurich, to give him any hard and fast information about the paper's financial basis and hence the likelihood of keeping it afloat, if only for a year. Not until he was over here did he learn from me (following your communication to me†506) how much had been subscribed. Hence, the only conclusion it was really possible to draw from previous communications (the party + Höchberg) was either that the paper was already being largely financed by Höchberg or that it would soon be entirely dependent on his subsidies. And this latter eventuality is still far from being excluded. The sum of — if I read it right — 800 marks is precisely the same (40 pounds sterling) as had to be contributed by the local association, Freiheit,†529 during the first half year.

Page Break me45.398
Page me45.398
2. Liebknecht's repeated assurances, which have since proved totally erroneous, that Zurich was to have no official control whatever over the editorship, and the resulting comedy of errors;
Page me45.398
3. The certainty finally established that not only were the Zurich people to control the editing, they were actually to censor it, and that the only role that would redound upon him, Hirsch, would be that of the man of straw.

Page me45.398

His refusal at that juncture is something we cannot but approve. The Leipzig committee, or so we hear from Höchberg,†530 has received reinforcements in the shape of two more who do not live in the place†a and hence that committee can intervene quickly only if the three Leipzigers are agreed. As a result, the real centre of gravity has altogether shifted to Zurich, and Hirsch or, for that matter, any true revolutionary and proletarian-minded editor, would not have been able to work with the people there for any length of time. More about this later.

II. THE PROPOSED STANCE OF THE PAPER

Page me45.398

As early as 24 July Bernstein had informed Hirsch that the differences he, as a Laterne man, had had with individual comrades would render his position more difficult.

Page me45.398

Hirsch replied†b that in his view the paper's stance would in general have to be the same as that of the Laterne, i.e. such as to avoid prosecution in Switzerland and not cause undue alarm in Germany. He inquired who those comrades might be and continued:

'I know of only one and can promise you that in a similar case of undisciplined conduct I should deal with him in exactly the same way.'

Page me45.398

Whereupon Bernstein, conscious of his newly acquired dignity as official censor, replied:

'Now as regards the paper's stance, it is the view of the supervisory committee that the Laterne should not serve as a model; in our view the paper should be less taken up with political radicalism, but rather adopt a line that is socialist on principle. Instances such as the attack upon Kayser, which was frowned on by all comrades without exception' (!), 'must under all circumstances be avoided.'†c

Page me45.398

And so on and so forth. Liebknecht called the attack on Kayser 'a bloomer', and so dangerous did it seem to Schramm that he immediately imposed censorship on Hirsch.†d

Page Break me45.399

Page me45.399

Hirsch again wrote to Höchberg, saying that a case such as that of Kayser

'could not occur should an official party organ exist, whose lucid expositions and friendly hints could not be so presumptuously brushed aside by a deputy'.

Page me45.399

Viereck also wrote, saying that what was required of the new paper was that it adopt a

'dispassionate attitude and, in so far as possible, bury the hatchet'; it ought not to be an 'enlarged version of the Laterne' and 'the most Bernstein can be reproached with is that he holds views that are too moderate, if reproach it be at a time when we cannot, after all, crowd on sail'.

Page me45.399
Well, now, what is this Kayser case, this unpardonable crime Hirsch is supposed to have committed? In the Reichstag, Kayser spoke in favour of and voted for protective tariffs, the only one of the Social-Democratic deputies to do so. Hirsch accused him of having infringed party discipline, in that Kayser
Page me45.399
1. voted for indirect taxation, the abolition of which is expressly demanded by the party programme†a;
Page me45.399
2. voted Bismarck funds, thus infringing the first and fundamental rule of our party tactics: not a farthing for this government.
Page me45.399
Hirsch is undeniably right on both counts. And, after Kayser had spurned, on the one hand, the party programme to which the deputies, by their resolution in congress, had in effect been solemnly pledged and, on the other hand, the most imperative and all-important rule of party tactics, after he had voted Bismarck funds, out of gratitude for the Anti-Socialist Law,†462 Hirsch was again perfectly justified in our opinion in handling him as roughly as he did.
Page me45.399
We have never understood how it was that this attack upon Kayser could have aroused such a furore in Germany. I am now told by Höchberg that it was the 'faction' which gave Kayser permission to act as he did, and Kayser is held to be covered by that permission.
Page me45.399
If such is the case, then it is really too bad. In the first place, Hirsch could have known no more than the rest of the world about this secret resolution.†b Then, again, the discredit incurred by the party, for which previously Kayser alone could have been blamed, is all the greater for this affair, as is Hirsch's merit in having brought to light in public and for all the world to see Kayser's preposterous phraseology and his even more preposterous vote, thus saving the honour of the party. Or has German Social-Democracy indeed been infected with the parliamentary disease, believing that, with the popular vote, the Holy Ghost is poured upon those elected, that meetings of the faction are transformed into infallible councils and factional resolutions into sacrosanct dogma?

Page Break me45.400
Page me45.400
Admittedly, a bloomer has been made — not by Hirsch, however, but by the deputies who gave Kayser the protection of their resolution. And if those upon whom, above all others, it is incumbent to see that party discipline is maintained, themselves so glaringly infringe that party discipline by a resolution of this kind, then so much the worse. But it is even worse still if they have the audacity to believe that it was not Kayser, by his speech and vote, or the other deputies by their resolution, who infringed party discipline, but Hirsch, inasmuch as he attacked Kayser despite that resolution about which, moreover, he knew nothing.

Page me45.400

For the rest, there can be no doubt that the policy the party had adopted towards the question of protective tariffs was as muddled and vacillating as it has always been in regard to virtually all economic questions — e.g. imperial railways†531 — when they have become a practical issue. The reason for this is that the party organs, notably the Vorwärts, rather than subject such questions to a thorough discussion, have preferred to apply themselves to the construction of the future social order. When, subsequent to the Anti-Socialist Law, the question of protective tariffs suddenly became a live issue, views on the subject diverged, assuming a wide variety of nuances, and there was absolutely no one to hand possessing the qualification that would have enabled him to form a lucid and accurate opinion, namely a knowledge of conditions in German industry and the latter's position in the world market. Again, as was bound to happen, protectionist tendencies cropped up here and there amongst the electorate; tendencies which, it was felt, ought also to be taken into consideration. The only possible way out of the confusion would have been to take a purely political view of the question (as was done in the Laterne), but this was not pursued with any determination. Thus it was inevitable that in this debate, the party acted for the first time in a hesitant, uncertain and muddled way and ended up by thoroughly discrediting itself through the person of and in company with Kayser.

Page Break me45.401
Page me45.401

The attack on Kayser is now being used as a pretext to admonish Hirsch, in tones ranging through the whole gamut, to the effect that the new paper must on no account repeat the excesses of the Laterne, must be less taken up with political radicalism and rather adopt a line that is socialist on principle and dispassionate. And this from Viereck no less than from Bernstein who, precisely because he is too moderate, appears to the former to be the right man, seeing that just now we cannot, after all, crowd on sail.
Page me45.401

But why go abroad at all, unless one intends to crowd on sail? Abroad, there's nothing to prevent this being done. In Switzerland there are no German press, combination and penal laws. Hence, not only can one say things there, which could not, even before the Anti-Socialist Law, be said at home because of the ordinary German laws, but one is actually duty-bound to do so. For here one is under the eyes, not of Germany alone, but of Europe and it is one's duty, insofar as the Swiss laws allow, openly to proclaim for Europe's benefit the methods and aims of the German party. Anyone in Switzerland seeking to abide by the German laws would only prove that he is deserving of those German laws and that he has, in effect, nothing to say save what he was allowed to say in Germany before the Exceptional Law. Nor should any account be taken of the possibility that the editors might be temporarily deprived of the chance to return to Germany. Anyone who is not prepared to run that risk is not fit to occupy so exposed and honourable a post.
Page me45.401

More. If the German party was ostracised by the Exceptional Law, this was precisely because it was the only serious opposition party in Germany. If, in an organ published abroad, it renders thanks to Bismarck by abandoning its role as the only serious opposition party, by behaving in a nice, docile manner and adopting a dispassionate stance when kicked, it only proves that it deserved to be kicked. Of all the German émigré papers that have appeared abroad since 1830, the Laterne is undoubtedly one of the most moderate. If, however, even the Laterne was too insolent — then the new organ could not but compromise the party in the eyes of sympathisers in non-German countries.

III. THE MANIFESTO OF THE ZURICH TRIO

Page me45.401

In the meantime we have received Höchberg's Jahrbuch, containing an article, 'Rückblicke auf die sozialistische Bewegung in Deutschland',†a which, as Höchberg himself informed me, was actually written by the three members of the Zurich committee.†b Here we have their authentic critique of the movement up till now, and hence their authentic programme for the new paper's stance insofar as this is dependent on them.

Page Break me45.402

Page me45.402

At the very start we read:

'The movement, regarded by Lassalle as an eminently political one, to which he sought to rally not only the workers but all honest democrats, and in the van of which were to march the independent representatives of science and all men imbued with a true love of mankind, was trivialised under the chairmanship of J.B. von Schweitzer into a one-sided struggle of the industrial workers to promote their own interests.'†c

Page me45.402

I shall not inquire whether and to what extent this is historically true. The specific charge against Schweitzer is that Schweitzer trivialised Lassalleanism, here regarded as a bourgeois democratic-philanthropic movement, into a one-sided struggle of the industrial workers to promote their own interests — trivialised it by emphasising its character as a class struggle of industrial workers against the bourgeoisie.†d He is further charged with having 'repudiated bourgeois democracy'.†e But has bourgeois democracy any business to be in the Social-Democratic Party at all? If it consists of 'honest men', it surely cannot wish to join, and if it nevertheless wishes to join, this can only be for the purpose of stirring up trouble.

Page Break me45.403

Page me45.403

The Lassallean party 'chose to present itself in a most one-sided manner as a workers' party'.†a The gentlemen who wrote those words are themselves members of a party which presents itself in the most one-sided manner as a workers' party, and now hold office in the same. Here we have a complete incompatibility. If they think as they write, they ought to leave the party or at least resign from office. If they don't, it is tantamount to admitting that they intend to use their official position to combat the party's proletarian character. Hence the party is betraying itself if it allows them to remain in office.

Page me45.403

Thus, in the view of these gentlemen the Social-Democratic Party ought not to be a one-sided workers' party but a many-sided party of 'all men imbued with a true love of mankind'. This it is to prove, above all, by divesting itself of crude proletarian passions and applying itself, under the direction of educated philanthropic bourgeois, 'to the formation of good taste' and 'the acquisition of good manners' (p. 85). After which the 'seedy appearance' of some of the leaders would give way to a respectable 'bourgeois appearance'.†b (As though the outwardly seedy appearance of those referred to here were not the least that could be held against them!) After which, too,

'there will be an influx of supporters from the ranks of the educated and propertied classes. These, however, must first be won over if the ... agitation engaged in is to have perceptible results...'. German socialism has laid 'too much stress on winning over the masses, thus omitting to prosecute vigorous' (!) 'propaganda amongst the so-called upper strata of society'. For 'the party still lacks men who are fit to represent it in the Reichstag'. It is, however, 'desirable and necessary to entrust the mandates to men who have had the time and the opportunity to become thoroughly conversant with the relevant material. Only rarely and in exceptional cases do ... the simple working man and small master craftsman have sufficient leisure for the purpose'.†c

Page me45.403

Therefore elect bourgeois!

Page me45.403

In short, the working class is incapable of emancipating itself by its own efforts. In order to do so it must place itself under the direction of 'educated and propertied' bourgeois who alone have 'the time and the opportunity' to become conversant with what is good for the workers. And, secondly, the bourgeois are not to be combatted — not on your life — but won over by vigorous propaganda.

Page me45.403

If, however, you wish to win over the upper strata of society, or at least their well-intentioned elements, you mustn't frighten them — not on your life. And here the Zurich trio believe they have made a reassuring discovery:

Page Break me45.404

'Now, at the very time it is oppressed by the Anti-Socialist Law, the party is showing that it does not wish to pursue the path of forcible, bloody revolution, but rather is determined ... to tread the path of legality, i.e. of reform.'†a

Page me45.404

If, therefore, the 5-600,000 Social-Democratic voters, 1/10 to 1/8 of the total electorate — and dispersed, what is more, over the length and breadth of the country — have sense enough not to beat their heads against a wall and attempt a 'bloody revolution' with the odds at one to ten, this is supposed to prove that they will, for all time, continue to deny themselves all chance of exploiting some violent upheaval abroad, a sudden wave of revolutionary fervour engendered thereby, or even a people's victory won in a clash arising therefrom! Should Berlin ever be so uneducated as to stage another 18 March,†532 it would behove the Social-Democrats not to take part in the fighting as 'louts besotted with barricades' (p. 88) but rather to 'tread the path of legality', to placate, to clear away the barricades and, if necessary, march with the glorious army against the one-sided, crude, uneducated masses. Or if the gentlemen insist that that's not what they meant, then what did they mean?

Page me45.404
But there's better in store.

'Hence, the more calm, sober and considered it' (the Party) 'shows itself to be in its criticism of existing circumstances and its proposals to change the same, the less likelihood is there of a repetition of the present successful move' (introduction of the Anti-Socialist Law) 'by means of which conscious reaction has scared the bourgeoisie out of their wits by holding up the red spectre' (p. 88).
Page me45.404
In order to relieve the bourgeoisie of the last trace of anxiety, it is to be shown clearly and convincingly that the red spectre really is just a spectre and doesn't exist. But what is the secret of the red spectre, if not the bourgeoisie's fear of the inevitable life-and-death struggle between itself and the proletariat, fear of the unavoidable outcome of the modern class struggle? Just abolish the class struggle, and the bourgeoisie and 'all independent persons' will 'not hesitate to go hand in hand with the proletarians'!†b In which case the ones to be hoodwinked would be those self-same proletarians.
Page me45.404
Let the party, therefore, prove, by its humble and subdued demeanour, that it has renounced once and for all the 'improprieties and excesses'†a which gave rise to the Anti-Socialist Law. If it voluntarily undertakes to remain wholly within the bounds of the Anti-Socialist Law, Bismarck and the bourgeoisie will, no doubt, oblige by rescinding what would then be a redundant law!

Page Break me45.405

'Let no one misunderstand us'; we don't want 'to relinquish our party and our programme,†b but in our opinion we shall have enough to do for years to come if we concentrate our whole strength, our entire energies, on the attainment of certain immediate objectives which must in any case be won before there can be any thought of realising more ambitious aspirations.'†c
Page me45.405
Then, too, the bourgeois, petty-bourgeois and workers, who 'are now scared off ... by ambitious demands',†d will join us en masse.
Page me45.405
The programme is not to be relinquished, but merely postponed — for some unspecified period. They accept it — not for themselves in their own lifetime but posthumously, as an heirloom for their children and their children's children. Meanwhile they devote their 'whole strength and energies' to all sorts of trifles, tinkering away at the capitalist social order so that at least something should appear to be done without at the same time alarming the bourgeoisie. Here I can only commend that communist, Miquel, who gives proof of his unshakable belief in the inevitable downfall of capitalist society within the next few hundred years by swindling it for all he's worth, contributing manfully to the crash of 1873,†395 and thus really doing something towards the collapse of the existing order.†533

Page me45.405
Another offence against good manners was the 'exaggerated attacks on the Gründer',†118 who, after all, were 'only children of their time'; hence 'the vilification of Strousberg and suchlike men ... would have been better omitted'.†e Sadly we are all 'children of our time', and if this be sufficient grounds for excuse, it is no longer permissible to attack anyone, and we for our part would have to desist from all polemic, all struggle; we would calmly submit whenever kicked by our opponents, because we would know in our wisdom that they are 'only children of their time' and cannot act otherwise than they do. Instead of repaying them their kicks with interest, we should rather, it seems, feel sorry for the poor fellows.
Page me45.405
Similarly, our support for the Commune had one drawback, at any rate, namely

'that it put off people otherwise well-disposed towards us, and generally increased the hatred felt for us by the bourgeoisie'. Moreover, the party 'cannot be wholly exonerated from having brought about the October Law, for it had needlessly exacerbated the hatred of the bourgeoisie'.†a

Page Break me45.406
Page me45.406
There you have the programme of the three censors of Zurich. As regards clarity, it leaves nothing to be desired. Least of all so far as we're concerned, since we are still only too familiar with all these catch-phrases of 1848. There are the voices of the representatives of the petty bourgeoisie, terrified lest the proletariat, impelled by its revolutionary situation, should 'go too far'. Instead of resolute political opposition — general conciliation; instead of a struggle against government and bourgeoisie — an attempt to win them over and talk them round; instead of defiant resistance to maltreatment from above — humble subjection and the admission that the punishment was deserved. Every historically necessary conflict is reinterpreted as a misunderstanding and every discussion wound up with the assurance: we are, of course, all agreed on the main issue. The men who in 1848 entered the arena as bourgeois democrats might now just as well call themselves Social-Democrats. To the former, the democratic republic was as unattainably remote as the overthrow of the capitalist order is to the latter, and therefore utterly irrelevant to present political practice; one can conciliate, compromise, philanthropise to one's heart's content. The same thing applies to the class struggle between proletariat and bourgeoisie. On paper it is recognised because there is no denying it any longer, but in practice it is glossed over, suppressed, emasculated. The Social-Democratic Party should not be a workers' party, it should not bring upon itself the hatred of the bourgeoisie or, for that matter, of anyone else; above all, it should prosecute vigorous propaganda amongst the bourgeoisie; instead of laying stress on ambitious goals which are calculated to frighten off the bourgeoisie, and unattainable anyway in our own generation, it should rather devote all its strength and energies to those petty-bourgeois stop-gap reforms which provide new props for the old social order and which might, perhaps, transform the ultimate catastrophe into a gradual, piecemeal and, as far as possible, peaceable process of dissolution. These are the same people who keep up an appearance of ceaseless activity, yet not only do nothing themselves but also try to ensure that nothing at all is done save — chin-wagging; the same people whose fear of any kind of action in 1848 and '49 held back the movement at every step and finally brought about its downfall; the same people who never see reaction and then are utterly dumbfounded to find themselves at last in a blind alley in which neither resistance nor flight is possible; the same people who want to confine history within their narrow philistine horizons, and over whose heads history invariably proceeds to the order of the day.

Page Break me45.407
Page me45.407

As for their socialist import, this has already been adequately criticised in the Manifesto, Chapter: 'German, or “True” Socialism'. Wherever the class struggle is thrust aside as a distasteful, 'crude' manifestation, the only basis still left to socialism will be a 'true love of mankind' and empty phrases about 'justice'.
Page me45.407

It is an inevitable manifestation, and one rooted in the process of development, that people from what have hitherto been the ruling class also join the militant proletariat and supply it with educative elements. We have already said so clearly in the Manifesto. But in this context there are two observations to be made:
Page me45.407

Firstly, if these people are to be of use to the proletarian movement, they must introduce genuinely educative elements. However, in the case of the vast majority of German bourgeois converts, this is not the case. Neither the Zukunft nor the Neue Gesellschaft has contributed anything that might have advanced the movement by a single step. Here we find a complete lack of genuinely educative matter, either factual or theoretical. In place of it, attempts to reconcile superficially assimilated socialist ideas with the most diverse theoretical viewpoints which these gentlemen have introduced from the university or elsewhere, and of which each is more muddled than the last thanks to the process of decay taking place in what remains of German philosophy today. Instead of first making a thorough study of the new science, each man chose to adapt it to the viewpoint he had brought with him, not hesitating to produce his own brand of science and straightaway assert his right to teach it. Hence there are, amongst these gentlemen, almost as many viewpoints as there are heads; instead of elucidating anything, they have only made confusion worse — by good fortune, almost exclusively amongst themselves. The party can well dispense with educative elements such as these for whom it is axiomatic to teach what they have not learnt.
Page me45.407

Secondly, when people of this kind, from different classes, join the proletarian movement, the first requirement is that they should not bring with them the least remnant of bourgeois, petty-bourgeois, etc., prejudices, but should unreservedly adopt the proletarian outlook. These gentlemen, however, as already shown, are chock-full of bourgeois and petty-bourgeois ideas. In a country as petty-bourgeois as Germany, there is certainly some justification for such ideas. But only outside the Social-Democratic Workers' Party. If the gentlemen constitute themselves a Social-Democratic petty-bourgeois party, they are fully within their rights: in that case we could negotiate with them and, according to circumstances, form an alliance with them, etc. But within a workers' party they are an adulterating element. Should there be any reason to tolerate their presence there for a while, it should be our duty only to tolerate them, to allow them no say in the party leadership and to remain aware that a break with them is only a matter of time. That time, moreover, would appear to have come. How the party can suffer the authors of this article to remain any longer in their midst seems to us incomprehensible. But should the party leadership actually pass, to a greater or lesser extent, into the hands of such men, then the party will be emasculated no less, and that will put paid to its proletarian grit.

Page Break me45.408
Page me45.408

As for ourselves, there is, considering all our antecedents, only one course open to us. For almost 40 years we have emphasised that the class struggle is the immediate motive force of history and, in particular, that the class struggle between bourgeoisie and proletariat is the great lever of modern social revolution; hence we cannot possibly co-operate with men who seek to eliminate that class struggle from the movement. At the founding of the International we expressly formulated the battle cry: The emancipation of the working class must be achieved by the working class itself.†a Hence we cannot co-operate with men who say openly that the workers are too uneducated to emancipate themselves, and must first be emancipated from above by philanthropic members of the upper and lower middle classes. If the new party organ is to adopt a policy that corresponds to the opinions of these gentlemen, if it is bourgeois and not proletarian, then all we could do — much though we might regret it — would be publicly to declare ourselves opposed to it and abandon the solidarity with which we have hitherto represented the German party abroad. But we hope it won't come to that.
Page me45.408

It is intended that this letter should be communicated to all five members of the committee in Germany, and also to Bracke....
Page me45.408

Nor have we any objection to its being communicated to the people in Zurich.
Page me45.408
First published in Die Kommunistische Internationale, XII. Jahrg., Heft 23, Berlin, 15, Juni 1931

Printed according to Engels' manuscript

Page Break me45.409

277
MARX TO CARL HIRSCH†534
IN LONDON
Page me45.409
[London,] 18 September 1879
Dear Hirsch,

Arrived in London!†500

Greetings,
Yours
K.M.
Page me45.409
First published in: Marx/Engels, Werke, Bd. 39, Berlin, 1973
Page me45.409
Printed according to the original
Page me45.409
Published in English for the first time

278
MARX TO NIKOLAI DANIELSON
IN ST PETERSBURG
Page me45.409
London, 19 September 1879
41 Maitland Park Road,
Haverstock Hill, N.W.
My dear Sir,

I have just returned to London after almost two months rustication in the isle of Jersey†494 and at other sea-side places.†500 I was forced to do so and suspend all work during that time on medical advice because of nervous derangement. For this reason I was also unable to do justice to the mental food you were so kind as to forward me, but now I feel much reinvigorated and shall set at work with a will.
Page me45.409
The book of Kowalewsky I got from himself.†535 He is one of my 'scientific' friends who every year comes to London in order to explore the treasures of the British Museum.

Page Break me45.410
Page me45.410
You will receive a longer letter so soon as I have disposed of some urgent work accumulated during my absence.
Page me45.410
In the meantime, with my best wishes

Yours sincerely
A. Williams†a
Page me45.410
First published, in Russian, in Minuvshiye gody, No. 1, St Petersburg, 1908

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

279
MARX TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE†41
IN HOBOKEN
Page me45.410
London, 19 September 1879
41 Maitland Park Road,
Haverstock Hill, N.W.
Dear Friend,

It was not till the day before yesterday that I got back to London after a seven-week stay, first in Jersey and after that in Ramsgate. But I had at least made provision that business matters and commissions contained in your letters be immediately attended to by Engels. However, I have not yet had from old Becker†b the form for the power of attorney which you want me to sign, and which Engels asked him to send me.†c As soon as the thing arrives I'll fill it in.†348 My LONG RUSTICATION was due to my nervous condition — (complicated by the fact that, because of Bismarck, Karlsbad has been inaccessible to me for the past two years) — which has latterly made all brain work virtually 'unfeasible'. But I'm much better now.
Page me45.410
The new edition of Weitling†d hasn't reached me. The only American journal I am sent is the by no means very substantial Paterson Labor Standard. The things you sent last, Labor Bureau

Page Break me45.411
Statistics of Pennsylvania, Ohio and Massachusetts, received with thanks (likewise Steward's speech). I am delighted that the CHIEF of the Massachusetts Bureau,†a as he tells me in a letter, should from now on be sending me the PUBLICATIONS direct (also the census) immediately they come out.†b
Page me45.411
As for Most and Co., our attitude towards them is a 'passive' one, i.e. we maintain no sort of relations with them, although I do see Most himself from time to time at my own house. To say that Engels and I had made any kind of 'statement' condemning Most or the Freiheit is a lie on Mr Lübeck's part. According to a letter Engels received from little Jew Bernstein in Zurich, Most had written to Switzerland and Germany claiming he had our support. To this Engels replied that if Bernstein could adduce any proof of this, he would make a public statement refuting these untruths.†c But Bernstein (nephew of the Berlin rabbi Rebenstein, of the Berlin Volks-Zeitung) was IN FACT unable to adduce an atom of proof. Instead he confided the bogus secret to that jackass Lübeck who, with the usual discretion of such PENNY-A-LINERS, sold it forthwith to the United States.
Page me45.411
The issues upon which we differ from Most in no way tally with those of the gentlemen in Zurich, the trio 'Dr Höchberg-Bernstein (his secretary)-and C.A. Schramm'. Our complaint against Most is not that his Freiheit is too revolutionary; our complaint is that it has no revolutionary content, but merely indulges in revolutionary jargon. Again, our complaint is not that he criticises the party leaders in Germany, but, in the first place, that he kicks up a row in public instead of telling these men what he thinks in writing, as we do, i.e. by letter; in the second, however, that he merely used this as a pretext to make himself look important and to disseminate the silly secret conspiracy-mongering of Messrs Weber JUNIOR†d and Kaufmann. Long before his arrival these laddies had felt it was their vocation to take the 'general working men's movement' under their august wing and, in their numerous attempts to realise this 'gracious' venture, had gone plotting and scheming all over the place. The good John Most, a man of the most childish vanity, actually believes that, because the self-same Most is no longer domiciled in Germany but in London, the whole world has been turned upside down. The man's not without talent, but he kills what he has by writing so profusely. Moreover, he has no esprit de suite.†a With every change of wind he turns now this way, now that, like a weathercock.

Page Break me45.412
Page me45.412

However, things might well come to such a pass that Engels and I would feel compelled to issue a 'public statement' against the Leipzigers and their allies in Zurich.
Page me45.412

This is how matters stand. Bebel wrote telling us that they intended to found a party organ in Zurich†b and asked that we lend our names to it as contributors. Hirsch was named as putative editor. Whereupon we accepted and I wrote to Hirsch†12 (then in Paris, from which he has since been expelled for the second time†504), telling him to accept the editorship since he alone could give us the guarantee that the kind of graduate, undergraduate, etc., rabble and armchair socialist riff-raff who had filled the columns of the Zukunft, etc., and were already invading those of the Vorwärts, were fended off and the party line rigorously adhered to. But now it transpired that Hirsch had unearthed a hornets' nest in Zurich. The five men, Dr Höchberg (who used his money to buy his way into the party, a cousin of Sonnemann's, the sentimental drooler), little Jew Bernstein, his secretary, C.A. Schramm, philistine, if a well-meaning one, and Leipzig's emissary, Viereck (also a philistine lout, natural son of the German Emperor†c) and a Berlin businessman, Singer (petty bourgeois, paunch, called on me a few months ago); these five men constituted themselves — by supreme authority of the Leipzigers — a constituent committee and appointed an administrative committee in Zurich, also responsible for supervising the editorial side and consisting of the trio (Höchberg-Bernstein-C. A. Schramm) which was to decide in the first instance, but must defer to a court of the last instance composed of Bebel, Liebknecht and a few other German leaders. Well, what Hirsch wanted to know first was whom the money was coming from; Liebknecht wrote, saying from the 'party+Dr Höchberg'; Hirsch deducted the rhetorical flourish and reduced this quite correctly to 'Höchberg'. Secondly, Hirsch did not wish to subordinate himself to the trifolium Höchberg-Bernstein-C.A. Schramm, in which he was the more justified for having received from Bernstein, in reply to a letter asking for information, a bureaucratic dressing down,†493 condemning his Laterne for — mirabile dictu†d — being ultrarevolutionary, etc. After protracted correspondence, in which Liebknecht played a by no means brilliant role, Hirsch withdrew; Engels wrote to Bebel saying that we, too, would withdraw,†a just as, from the very start, we had refused to contribute to the Zukunft (Höchberg)†313 and the Neue Gesellschaft (Wiede).†296 These laddies, nonentities in theory and nincompoops in practice, are seeking to draw the teeth of socialism (which they have rehashed in accordance with academic formulae) and of the Social-Democratic Party in particular, to enlighten the workers or, as they put it, to provide them, out of their confused and superficial knowledge, with 'educative elements' and, above all, to make the party 'respectable' in the eyes of the philistines. They are poor counter-revolutionary windbags. WELL. The weekly organ is now appearing (or is to appear) in Zurich, under their supervision and the general supervision of the Leipzigers. (Editor, Vollmar.)

Page Break me45.413
Page me45.413

In the meantime Höchberg†b came over here to rope us in. He found only Engels who, in a critical discussion of the Jahrbuch Höchberg had brought out (under the pseudonym Dr L. Richter), showed him how deep was the gulf between him and us. (Have a look at the lamentable concoction: the article signed with 3* is the triumvirate Höchberg-Bernstein-C. A. Schramm.†513) (But the good John Most also figures therein, in the sycophantic article about that quill-pusher Schäffle.†c) Never has anything more discreditable to the party appeared in print. What a lot of good Bismarck did, not to himself but us, by imposing silence on Germany and thus giving these laddies a chance of making themselves plainly heard. Höchberg came down to earth with a bang after Engels had given him a piece of his mind; he's a partisan of 'peaceable' development and, in point of fact, expects proletarian emancipation to be achieved solely by 'educated bourgeois', i.e. people like himself. After all, hadn't he been told by Liebknecht that au fond†d we were all of us agreed, that everyone in Germany — i.e. all the leaders — shared his view, etc.?
Page me45.413

In fact Liebknecht, having made the tremendous blunder of treating with the Lassalleans, flung wide the door to all these demi-men and thus, malgré lui,†e paved the way for demoralisation within the party which could be eliminated only by the Anti-Socialist Law.†462
Page me45.413

Now should the 'weekly' — the party organ — in fact go ahead along the lines laid down in Höchberg's Jahrbuch, we shall be compelled to make a public protest against this debauching of party and theory! Engels has written a circular (letter) to Bebel, etc.†a (just for private circulation among the German leaders, of course), in which our point of view is plainly set forth. So the gentlemen are forewarned and, moreover, are well enough acquainted with us to know that this means bend or break! If they wish to compromise themselves, tant pis†b! In no circumstances shall we allow them to compromise us. To what depths they have already been brought by parliamentarianism will be evident to you from the fact that they impute it a dire crime in Hirsch to have — what? — handled that scoundrel Kayser somewhat roughly in the Laterne, on account of his disgraceful speech regarding Bismarck's customs legislation†519! But, or so they now maintain, the party, i.e. the handful of the party's parliamentary representatives, had authorised Kayser to speak as he did. More shame to that handful! But even this is a pitiful evasion. In fact they had been silly enough to allow Kayser to speak for himself and in the name of his constituents; he, however, spoke in the party's name. Be that as it may; they are already so far infected with parliamentary cretinism as to believe themselves above criticism and to denounce criticism as a crime de lése majesté!

Page Break me45.414

Page me45.414

As regards the Communist Manifesto, nothing has so far been done because now Engels, now I, had not enough time.†148 But it must at long last be proceeded with.
Page me45.414

I hope that your next letter will bring reassuring news as to the health and prosperity of you and yours. MEANWHILE — my wife sends her most cordial regards — I remain,

Yours very truly,
Karl Marx
Page me45.414

John Most wrote and told me about Lübeck's tittle-tattle in the Chicago paper.†512 I didn't reply; but now that I'm in London, I shall ask him to come and see me in person, and shall tell him what I think by word of mouth.
Page me45.414

Hirsch has been here since his expulsion from Paris. I haven't seen him yet since he could not, of course, have found me at home while I was away.
Page me45.414

I am using a 'registered' envelope only because I could find no other and yet wanted to avoid any further delay.
Page me45.414

First published in Briefe und Auszüge aus Briefen von Joh. Phil. Becker, Jos. Dietzgen, Friedrich Engels, Karl Marx u. A. an F.A. Sorge und Andere, Stuttgart, 1906

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me45.415

280
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER
IN GENEVA
Page me45.415
London, 24 September 1879
Dear Old Man,

Your postcard†a received. I have taken out a money order for £1 12s. which should come to 40.20 francs, so that you won't be in a hole if the cost of the power of attorney†b amounts to a bit more. Marx is back,†500 apparently in the very best of health, so no doubt work on the 2nd volume of Capital†62 can now go briskly ahead.

Page me45.415

As regards the progress of negotiations with our people in the land of the philistines, I shall let you have further news in due course.†490

Page me45.415

In haste.

Your old friend,
F.E.

Page me45.415

First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

281
ENGELS TO MARX†536
IN LONDON

Page me45.415

[London, after 8 October 1879]

Didn't you send the noble Barry the notes I put into Fraser†c? I put them there under Pumps' own eyes and in such a way that they were visible from outside. If not, send them off to him.

Your
F.E.

Page me45.415

First published in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.416

282
MARX TO BERTHA AUGUSTI†16
IN KOBLENZ

Page me45.416

[London,] 25 October 1879

Dear Mrs Bertha,

I have a (tiresome) visitor sitting next to me, but do not wish to miss the opportunity of telling you in all haste how grateful I am to you for the pleasure afforded me by reading your novel in the Kölnische.†a Great talent is discernible by all, but the achievement is particularly surprising to one who is aware of the confined and cloistered conditions in which you work. Moreover I would take the liberty of adding that I am a great heretic as far as German novels are concerned, think nothing of them and have been greatly spoiled by the best French, English and Russian novelists. Hence it was also with my habitual mistrust that I embarked on the reading of your Verhängnisvolles Jahr.

Page me45.416

Wishing you all prosperity,

Most cordially yours,
Karl Marx
Page me45.416
First published in Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Arbeiterbewegung, Nr. 5, Berlin, 1966

Printed according to the original

283
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL†485
IN LEIPZIG
Page me45.416
London, 14 November 1879†537
Dear Bebel,

Many thanks for your communications, as also those of Fritzsche and Liebknecht,†538 which have at last enabled us to get a clear idea of the facts.

Page Break me45.417
Page me45.417

That things have not, from the start, been exactly straightforward, however, is evident from earlier letters from Leipzig and the muddles and misunderstandings with Hirsch generally.†a The latter could not have happened if, from the start, the Leipzigers had put paid to Zurich's pretensions to censorship. Had they done so and informed Hirsch of the fact, everything would have been all right. But since they didn't, I can only conclude, after again comparing commissions with omissions, present communications with previous letters from all concerned, that Höchberg wasn't altogether wrong when he told me that Zurich had imposed censorship solely on Hirsch's account, it being unnecessary in the case of Vollmar.
Page me45.417

As regards the financing,†b I'm not particularly surprised that you should take matters so lightly. For this is the first time you've had a go at the thing. But Hirsch had already been through this particular mill with the Laterne and, as for us, who have so often witnessed such things and even experienced them in person, we can only endorse his request that careful consideration be given to this point. Freiheit, despite all subsidies, is left at the end of its third quarter with a deficit of £100 = 2,000 marks. I have never known a German paper, banned at home, that could have survived without substantial subsidies. Do not allow yourselves to be dazzled by initial successes. The real difficulties involved in smuggling become manifest only with time, and multiply constantly.†539

Page me45.417

What you say about the attitude of the deputies and of the party leaders generally to the protective tariffs question corroborates every word of my letter.†c It was bad enough, in all conscience, that a party which prides itself on being so superior to the bourgeois in the sphere of economics should, when first put to the test in that sphere, prove just as divided, just as ignorant, as the National Liberals†540 who could at least plead a genuine clash of bourgeois interests in extenuation of their inglorious collapse. But it was even worse that that split should have been seen to happen, that your attitude should have been wavering and uncertain. Once you knew that unity was unattainable, there was only one thing to do — declare the question to be a purely bourgeois question, which indeed it is, and abstain from voting.†a But the worst thing of all was permitting Kayser to make his lamentable speeches and to vote for the Bill at its first reading. It was not until after that division that Hirsch attacked him,†519 and if Kayser later, at the third reading, voted against the Bill, he only made matters worse, not better.

Page Break me45.418
Page me45.418

The resolution in congress is no excuse.†541 If the party proposes to regard as binding all the earlier resolutions made by congress in the easy-going days of peace, it will be placing itself in fetters. The constitutional basis upon which a living party functions must not only be self-created, it must also and at all times be susceptible to change. Inasmuch as the Anti-Socialist Law†462 makes congresses and hence the amendment of earlier congressional resolutions impossible, it also abolishes the binding force of those resolutions. A party that is deprived of the opportunity of passing binding resolutions can only look for its laws to its living and ever changing needs. But if it seeks to subordinate those needs to earlier resolutions that are now dead as a doornail, it will be digging its own grave.
Page me45.418

So much for the formal aspect. However, it is the content of that resolution that really invalidates it. In the first place it is incompatible with the programme in that it admits of voting indirect taxation. Secondly it is incompatible with essential party tactics inasmuch as it permits taxation to be voted for the present-day state. Thirdly, however, it implies, translated into plain language:
Page me45.418

The congress admits to not being well enough informed about the question of protective tariffs to pass a definite resolution, for or against. Hence it declares itself incompetent in this matter, inasmuch as it restricts itself, for the benefit of the dear public, to the enunciation of a few commonplaces, some of them meaningless, some incompatible either with each other or with the party programme, and then proceeds gladly to wash its hands of the whole affair.
Page me45.418

And is this declaration of incompetence whereby what was, in peace-time, a purely academic question was swept under the carpet, — is this declaration,†b now that, in time of war, the question has become a burning one, to be considered as binding upon an entire party until legally invalidated by a new resolution which present circumstances preclude?

Page Break me45.419
Page me45.419

This much is certain: whatever the impression made on the deputies by Hirsch's attacks upon Kayser, those attacks reflect the impression made by Kayser's irresponsible action upon Social-Democrats abroad, whether German or non-German. And it is high time it was realised that the reputation of the party has to be kept up, not only within its own confines, but also in the eyes of Europe and America.
Page me45.419

And this brings me to the report.†542 However good it may be at the start and however skilful — in the circumstances — the treatment of the protective tariffs debate, this does not atone for the concessions made to the German philistines in the third part. Why the altogether superfluous passage about 'civil war', why such deference to 'public opinion' which, in Germany, will always be that of the beer-swilling philistine; why, at this point, the total obliteration of the movement's class character? Why give the anarchists that pleasure? And, what is more, all these concessions are utterly useless. The German philistine is cowardice incarnate; he has no respect for anyone who does not inspire fear in him.†a But anyone who tries to curry favour with him he regards as one of his own kind and accords him no more respect than he accords to his own kind, which is to say none at all. And now that the storm of beer-swilling philistine indignation known as public opinion has, as is generally admitted, died down and the burden of taxation has in any case reduced these people to pulp, why go on with this billing and cooing? If only you knew what it sounded like abroad! It's a good thing for a party organ to be managed by men immediately involved in the party and the struggle. But were you to spend only six months abroad, you would feel quite differently about this quite uncalled-for self-abasement of the party deputies before the philistines. The storm that broke over the French socialists after the Commune was, after all, a very different kind of thing from the uproar about Nobiling†406 in Germany. And how much prouder and more self-confident was the bearing of the French! Where, in their case, may such weaknesses, such kow-towing to opponents, be discerned? They remained silent when they could not speak freely, they let the philistines shout till they could shout no more, they knew their time would surely come, and now it is here.

Page Break me45.420
Page me45.420

I can well believe what you say about Höchberg.†543 Indeed, I have absolutely no objection to him as a private individual. I also believe that it was only the anti-socialist campaign that made him realise what, in his heart of hearts, he wanted. That what he wanted was bourgeois and not proletarian was something I tried — probably in vain — to make him see.†a But once he had formulated a programme, I must have credited him with more than German philistine weakness had I assumed that he would not try to gain recognition for it. Höchberg before and Höchberg after that article†513 are, indeed, two different persons.†b

Page me45.420

But now, in No. 5 of the Sozialdemokrat, I find a contribution from the Lower Elbe†c in which Auer uses my letter as a pretext†d to accuse me — without mentioning my name but leaving small room for doubt — of 'sowing the seeds of suspicion in regard to the trustiest comrades', i.e. of calumniating them (for otherwise I should be perfectly justified in so doing).†e Not content with that, he falsely attributes to me things as stupid as they are infamous, and which were not contained in my letter at all. Auer, or so it would seem, supposes that I want something or other of the party. But as you know, it is not I who want anything of the party; on the contrary, it is the party that wants something of me. As you and Liebknecht know, all I have ever asked of the party is that it should leave me in peace so that I can complete my theoretical works.†169 You know that, for the past sixteen years, I have nevertheless been approached over and over again with the request that I write for party organs, and that I have actually done so, that I have written whole series of articles, entire pamphlets at Liebknecht's express behest — such as The Housing Question and Anti-Dühring. I won't go into details about the kindnesses the party has bestowed on me in return — e.g. the agreeable transactions in congress on the subject of Dühring.†286 Again, you know that Marx and I have voluntarily conducted the defence of the party against its opponents abroad throughout the party's existence, and that we have never asked anything of the party in return, save that it should not be untrue to itself.

Page Break me45.421

Page me45.421

But if the party asks of me that I should contribute to its new organ,†a it is only to be expected that it should at least ensure that, while negotiations are still in progress, I should not be calumniated as a calumniator in the self-same organ and, what is more, by one†b of its nominal co-proprietors. There is, so far as I am aware, no literary or other code of honour to which this would conform, and I believe that even a reptile†408 would not stand for such treatment. Hence I must ask you:

1. What satisfaction can you proffer me for this unprovoked and rotten insult?
2. What guarantees can you offer that nothing of the kind will ever happen again?

Page me45.421

For the rest, all I want to say about Auer's insinuations is that we over here underestimate neither the difficulties the party has to contend with in Germany, nor the significance of the victories won in the face of them and the hitherto exemplary conduct of the party masses. It goes without saying that every victory gained in Germany gladdens our hearts as much as any gained elsewhere — more so, indeed, seeing that from the very start the German party developed in accordance with our theoretical propositions. But for that very reason we cannot but be particularly concerned that the practical conduct of the German party, and notably the public utterances of the party leadership, should continue to accord with the general theory. Undoubtedly our criticism will be displeasing to some; yet no amount of uncritical praise could, after all, be of such value to the party†c as the presence abroad of a couple of men who, uninfluenced by confusing local conditions and the minutiae of the†d struggle, compare from time to time what has been said and what has been done with the theoretical tenets valid for any modern proletarian movement, and in whom that party may see reflected the impression its actions have made outside Germany.

Most cordially yours,
F. Engels
Page me45.421
First published in: A. Bebel, Aus meinem Leben, Teil III, Stuttgart, 1914

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me45.422

284
MARX TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE
IN HOBOKEN
Page me45.422
London, 14 November 1879
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.
Dear Sorge,

I am at last able to send you all the powers of attorney.†a I didn't get the others until the end of the week before last; they arrived when I was confined to the house by a most INFAMOUS cold and then, after that, my worthy SOLICITOR contrived to spin out the affair for another week, and only today did I finally receive my power of attorney. The account both for these and the first one will be sent to you later. The other 3 (or rather 4) powers of attorney will go off to you at the same time as this letter — but under separate cover.
Page me45.422
You will doubtless have got my letter†b in which I told you about the latest goings-on in the bosom of the party. Since then Höchberg and his associates†c in Zurich have been removed, at least nominally, from the editorial committee which now sits in Leipzig, while Vollmar functions as editor in Zurich. His paper, Der Sozialdemokrat, isn't worth much. But at any rate all our associates worth mentioning, Liebknecht, Bebel, Bracke, etc., have disowned Dr Höchberg's, alias Richter's, Jahrbuch,†544 though as yet only — in private.
Page me45.422
You will have seen in the papers that the anti-communist gang, composed of very heterogeneous elements, was finally defeated at the Marseilles Congress.†545
Page me45.422
My wife is still dangerously ill and I myself am not yet completely fit.
Page me45.422
With kindest regards from my family.

Your
Karl Marx
Page me45.422
First published in Briefe und Auszüge aus Briefen von Joh. Phil. Becker, Jos. Dietzgen, Friedrich Engels, Karl Marx u. A. an F.A. Sorge und Andere, Stuttgart, 1906

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.423

285
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL
IN LEIPZIG
Page me45.423
London, 24 November 1879
Dear Bebel,

I had good reasons for assuming that Auer was alluding to myself.†a The date proves nothing. He expressly excludes Most. So go and ask him yourself whom he meant; then we shall see what he says. I'm positive that the misunderstanding was not on my side.†546
Page me45.423
Höchberg did, to be sure, make the statement in question.†b
Page me45.423
I know that you were mostly away while the negotiations with Hirsch were going on and it never occurred to me to hold you personally responsible for what happened.
Page me45.423
As regards the question of tariffs, your letter wholly corroborates what I have said.†c If feelings were divided, as was indeed the case, and if it was thought desirable to take those divided feelings into consideration, what was called for was, of course, abstention, no less. Otherwise it would have meant taking one side only into consideration. But why the protectionist section was more deserving of consideration than the free trade one is difficult to see. You say you cannot adopt a purely negative attitude in Parliament. But since everyone ultimately voted against the Bill, their attitude was, after all, purely negative. All I'm saying is, they ought to have known from the start how they intended to conduct themselves; they ought to have acted in conformity with the final vote.
Page me45.423
Questions which enable Social-Democratic deputies to abandon a purely negative attitude are very narrowly circumscribed. All are questions which immediately involve the relation of workers to capitalists: factory legislation, the normal working-day, employer's liability, payment in goods, etc. Perhaps also improvements in the purely bourgeois sense such as constitute a positive step forward: standardisation of coins and weights, freedom of movement, extension of personal freedom, etc. You're unlikely to be troubled with these for the time being. In the case of all other economic questions, such as protective tariffs, nationalisation of the railways, assurance companies, etc., Social-Democratic deputies must always uphold the vital principle of consenting to nothing that increases the power of the government vis-á-vis the people. And this is made all the easier in that feelings within the party itself will, of course, invariably be divided in such cases and hence abstention, a negative attitude, is automatically called for.

Page Break me45.424
Page me45.424

What you say about Kayser makes the matter even worse. If he speaks in favour of protective tariffs in general, why does he vote against them†502? If he intends voting against them why does he speak in favour of them? If, however, he has studied the subject with great diligence, how can he vote for tariffs on iron? Had his studies been worth a penny, he couldn't fail to have discovered that there are two ironworks in Germany, the Dortmunder Union and the Königs- und Laurahütte, either of which is capable of meeting the entire domestic demand; besides these there are many smaller ones; hence that a protective tariff is utter nonsense in this case; that the only remedy in this case is the capture of the foreign market, hence unadulterated free trade or bankruptcy; also that the iron-masters themselves can only want a protective tariff if they have formed a ring, a conspiracy which imposes monopoly prices on the domestic market, so that they are better able to sell off their surplus products abroad at cut prices, which they are in fact already doing at this moment. It was in the interests of this ring, this conspiracy of monopolists that Kayser was speaking and, insofar as he voted in favour of tariffs on iron, was also voting, and Hansemann of the Dortmunder Union and Bleichröder of the Königs- und Laurahütte will be laughing in their sleeves at the stupid Social-Democrat who has, for good measure, studied the subject with diligence!
Page me45.424

You must at all costs get hold of Rudolph Meyer's Politische Gründer in Deutschland. Without a knowledge of the material assembled here on the swindles, the crash and the political corruption of recent years, it is impossible to form an opinion on present conditions in Germany. How is it that this store of riches was not exploited at the time for the benefit of our press†547? The book is banned, of course.
Page me45.424

The passages in the report†542 I particularly have in mind are†a 1. those in which so much emphasis is laid on winning over public opinion — to have this factor against you was to be hamstrung; it was a matter of life and death that 'this hatred be turned into sympathy', etc. — sympathy! from people who just before, during the Terror,†406 had shown themselves to be dirty blackguards. There was no need to go to such lengths, especially as the Terror had long since ended; — 2. those to the effect that the party, which condemns war in any shape or form (hence also the one which it is forced to wage, which it wages notwithstanding) and whose goal is the universal fraternisation of all men (in terms of a slogan the goal of every party, in terms of immediate reality that of none, for not even we wish to fraternise with the bourgeois so long as they wish to remain bourgeois), cannot envisage civil war (hence not even in a case where civil war is the only means to the end). This proposition may also be construed as follows: that a party which condemns bloodshed in any shape or form cannot envisage either blood-letting or the amputation of gangrenous limbs, or scientific vivisection. Why all these empty phrases? I'm not asking that all your language should be 'vigorous', I am not reproaching the Report for saying too little — on the contrary, there is much that would have been better left unsaid. The next part is much better and so Hans Most†a has fortunately overlooked the few passages out of which he could have made capital.

Page Break me45.425

Page me45.425

But it was a blunder to insert a solemn announcement in the Sozialdemokrat to the effect that Liebknecht had taken the Saxon oath of allegiance. Hans won't let that one pass by,†548 and his anarchist friends will be sure to embroider on it. Marx and I don't consider the matter itself to be as dangerous as, e.g., Hirsch took it to be in the heat of the moment. You people must know whether 'Paris vaut bien une messe',†b as Henri IV said when he became a Catholic, thus sparing France a thirty years' war,†549 and whether the advantages are of a kind to justify such inconsistency and the taking of an oath which, moreover, is the only one which cannot entail a prosecution for perjury. But once it had been taken, nothing ought to have been said about it until others had kicked up a fuss; that would have been time enough to go on to the defensive. But for the Sozialdemokrat, Hans wouldn't have heard a word about it.

Page me45.425

I was delighted at the lambasting you gave the notorious drunkard and wastrel.†550 We shall see that this is spread about in Paris, though we are stumped for the French words that would convey the foregoing pithy expressions.

Page me45.425

We are, by the way, fully aware that it is all very well, as they say, for us here to talk, and that your position is much more difficult than ours.

Page me45.425

That the petty bourgeois and peasants should be joining us is, I grant you, a sign of the movement's rapid progress, but it also constitutes a danger to the movement, once one forgets not only that these people have got to come, but also that they are coming simply because they have got to. Their joining us proves that the proletariat really has become the leading class. But since the ideas and ambitions they bring with them are those of the petty bourgeois and the peasant, it must not be forgotten that the proletariat would forfeit its leading historical role were it to make concessions to those ideas and ambitions.

Page Break me45.426

Most cordially yours,
F. Engels

Page me45.426

Herewith another loose postscript.†a

Page me45.426

First published in: A. Bebel, Aus meinem Leben, Teil III, Stuttgart, 1914

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

286
MARX TO ACHILLE LORIA
IN MANTUA
Page me45.426
London, 3 December 1879
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.
Dear Sir,

For reasons of health I was compelled to absent myself from London for a time. On my return today I found awaiting me your letter of 23 November and your work.†b I hasten to acknowledge receipt and at the same time express my thanks to you.

Yours very truly,
Karl Marx
Page me45.426
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 34, Moscow, 1964

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.427

287
MARX TO AN UNKNOWN CORRESPONDENT†551
IN LONDON
Page me45.427
[London,] 11 December 1879
My dear Sir,

Will you come to dinner next Sunday†a at 2 o'clock?

Yours truly
Karl Marx
Page me45.427
First published (facsimile) in: G. P. Browe, I. S. Pemezov, L. Dekav, Pis'mo G. P. Browe. Poslednyaya kommunarka 1871 g. Les Anciennes. P. Kropotkin. P. L. Lavrov, Paris, 1924

Reproduced from the original

288
MARX TO CHARLES WALSTONE (WALDSTEIN)†552
IN LONDON
Page me45.427
[London,] 13 December 1879

Liebes†b Waldhörnlein,†c
Page me45.427
You will — I hope — be so good as to come and dine with us tomorrow (Sunday) at 2 o'clock. There will be a young Russian†d who is worth studying, being a 'type'. Don't be frightened! He carries neither daggers nor revolvers nor explosive 'chemicals' about himself. Besides, your name does not yet figure on the 'black' list.

And now vale faveque†e
Karl Marx
Page me45.427
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 50, Moscow, 1981

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.428

289
ENGELS TO THOMAS ALLSOP†553
IN LIMINGTON
Page me45.428
London, 14 December 1879
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.
My dear Friend,

I am very sorry indeed to learn that you have been ill and are not yet completely restored to health. I hope your legs will soon be all right again so as to allow you to stir about — I know how you will miss your usual exercise.
Page me45.428
We are all pretty well here so far, our patients and half-patients seem to come round gradually.
Page me45.428
The man in The P.M.G.†a does indeed to some extent divine that there are breakers ahead, but as a true Philistine, he seems unable to distinguish appearances from reality. No doubt the crash in Russia is impending and may break out any time. And no doubt, the collapse of Russian despotism must re-act with immense force upon Germany and Austria. But whether an immediate outbreak there be probable or whether it even have chances of success, is more than I pretend to know. The man is quite right, too, in saying that the system of drilling the whole male population, as is now the rule all over the continent, will end in revolutionising these monster armies from within. But this is a process requiring some little time, and as far as Germany goes, it is only lately showing itself. This constant penetration of fresh revolutionary elements into the army, noticed with every new yearly batch of recruits, has been the principal motive for introducing the [Anti-]Socialist law.†462 And how little this Socialist Law, with all its terrorism, has effected, has again been shown last Thursday. At the last election in 1878, at Magdeburg, our candidate†b only got 1/3 of the votes given; now there was a fresh election there, and he†c very near got the full half of the votes, and stands a chance of passing at the second ballot.†554 The joke of the thing is, that this candidate of ours is a natural son of old William, the emperor, by an actress, Miss Viereck, whilom the old fellow's mistress.

Page me45.428

Anyhow, the outbreak in Russia must hasten the movement in Central and Western Europe. The governments of Vienna and Berlin will lose heart when they have no longer that unfailing mainstay of all reaction — the absolute Russian government. And the moral effect of a revolutionary successful movement in Russia upon the masses in Central Europe must be immense.

Page Break me45.429
Page me45.429

The worst would be, to us, if Russia, to avoid revolution, launched into foreign war. But so long as they have not the French Alliance, they scarcely venture.
Page me45.429

Anyhow, by next spring this Russian crisis, which we think here is the most important one since 1848, must come to a head either one way or another, and I hope you will recover your full strength so as to enjoy the stirring times which are, it appears, still in store for you.

Very faithfully yours
F. Engels
Page me45.429
First published in the language of the original (English, facsimile) and in German, in Neues Deutschland, Nr. 107, Berlin 19. April 1970

Reproduced from the original

290
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL†127
IN LEIPZIG
Page me45.429
London, 16 December 1879
Dear Bebel,

I find it incomprehensible that Auer should now say he had meant Most amongst others, since in the article he all but specifically excepted him.†546 But let it rest at that.
Page me45.429

In No. 10 of the Sozialdemokrat there are 'Preßgeschichtliche Rückblicke' which unmistakably stem from one or other of the three asterisks.†a Here we read that it can only be an honour for Social-Democrats to be compared with belletrists such as Gutzkow and Laube, i.e. with men who, long before '48, had already laid to rest such political character as they still had left, if indeed they ever had any. Again:
'The events of 1848 were bound to come, either accompanied by all the blessings of peace, if governments had responded to the demands of the time, or, alas — since they did not do so — the only recourse that remained was violent revolution.'†555

Page Break me45.430
Page me45.430

In a paper in which it is possible actually to deplore the revolution of 1848 which, for the first time, opened wide the door to Social-Democracy, in such a paper there is no room for us. From this article and from Höchberg's letter, it is plainly evident that the three asterisks claim the right to advocate in the Sozialdemokrat — and this on an equal footing with proletarian views — their own petty-bourgeois socialist opinions first clearly enunciated in their Jahrbuch.†513 And, now that things have gone so badly off the rails, I fail to see how you people in Leipzig propose to prevent this without an actual breach. Now as before, you regard these men as party members. We cannot do so. The dividing line created between us and them by the Jahrbuch article is distinct and absolute. We cannot even negotiate with these people so long as they claim to belong to the same party as ourselves. The points that have arisen in this case are ones which no longer admit of being discussed in any proletarian party. To subject them to discussion within the party would mean jeopardising the whole of proletarian socialism.
Page me45.430

In these circumstances it might, in fact, be better if we did not contribute. We would be constantly protesting and would, after a few weeks, have to give public notice of our resignation, which would do nothing to promote the cause.
Page me45.430

We regret very much being unable, at this time of repression, to give you our unqualified support. So long as the party in Germany remained true to its proletarian character, we were prepared to set aside all other considerations. But now that the petty-bourgeois elements you have admitted have come out in their true colours,†a it's a different matter. The moment they are permitted to insinuate their petty-bourgeois ideas piecemeal into the organ of the German party, that organ, by the same token, is closed to us,†b no more nor less.
Page me45.430

The matter of the oath†548 is of very little concern to us. It might have been possible, as you yourself wished, to find some other procedure that would to some extent have eliminated the disagreeable impression, but it's of no great moment.†556 Discretion shall be observed, as you request.

Page Break me45.431

Page me45.431

Malon's journal†a might have a salutory effect, for 1. Malon is not the kind of man to do much damage and 2. his collaborators among the French will see to it that the thing is kept on its proper course. If Höchberg imagines it will provide an arena for his petty bourgeoiserie, he'll find that he's thrown his money down the drain.
Page me45.431

We were very pleased about the Magdeburg election.†554 The staunchness of the working-class masses in Germany is admirable. The letters from working men in the Sozialdemokrat are the only good things in it.
Page me45.431

I return herewith Höchberg's letter. The man's completely hopeless. If we refused to do anything in company with the Zukunft people, this was, it seems, out of personal vanity. But a third of these people's names were, and still are, completely unknown to us, and approximately another third are notorious petty-bourgeois socialists. And a thing like that called itself a 'scientific' journal! And Höchberg still believes it had an 'enlightening' effect. Testifies to the much vaunted lucidity of his own intellect which, right up to this very day, and despite my every endeavour, has been unable to grasp the difference between petty-bourgeois and proletarian socialism. All differences of opinion are 'misunderstandings'. Exactly as in the case of the democratic wailers†557 of '48. Or else 'over-hasty' deductions. Of course, since any deduction is over-hasty which deduces a specific meaning from the chatter of these gentry. For they aren't just trying to say such and such, but also, as likely as not, the opposite.
Page me45.431

Apart from this, world history proceeds on its course untroubled by these philistine advocates of prudence and moderation. In Russia things will surely come to a head within a few months. Either absolutism will be overthrown and then, immediately after the overthrow of that great storehouse of reaction, a new wind will blow across Europe. Or else there will be a European war, and the present German party, too, will be submerged in the inevitable struggle of each individual people for its national existence. A war such as that would, for us, be the greatest of misfortunes; it might set the movement back by twenty years. But the new party that must surely emerge from it at last would, in all European countries, be freed of a host of hesitations and pettinesses such as presently hamper the movement everywhere.

Page Break me45.432

Most cordially yours,
F.E.
Page me45.432
First published in: A. Bebel, Aus meinem Leben, Teil III, Stuttgart, 1914

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

291
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER
IN GENEVA
Page me45.432
London, 19 December 1879
Dear Old Man,

I was supposed to be getting some money yesterday and it had long been understood that you would thereupon at once be sent a remittance. But it came too late for me to draw a money order that same day, and all through the afternoon I kept thinking: A letter's bound to arrive from Philipp this evening! And sure enough, it did arrive. So you've deprived me of the pleasure of giving you an unexpected Christmas treat. Well then, I have drawn a money order for five pounds sterling, against which, according to the rate here, 126 frs should be paid to you over there — as will, no doubt, be done without delay.
Page me45.432
Over here we are all so-so; I can't complain, Marx is fitter than last year, although he still isn't really up to the mark. Mrs Marx has long been subject to bouts of indigestion and is seldom entirely well. The second volume†a is making slow progress, nor is it likely to progress any faster until a summer better than the last one enables Marx to recover properly for once.†62
Page me45.432
Yesterday I wrote and told Bebel†b that we couldn't contribute to the Sozialdemokrat. From Höchberg's subsequent letters it emerges that he intends, as a matter of course, to continue advocating in the Sozialdemokrat the views expressed in the Jahrbuch.†513 And as long as the Leipzigers remain on their present footing with him and his philistine colleagues, I cannot see how they can refuse to allow this. But it also means that we are excluded. Having combatted this same petty-bourgeois socialism ever since the Manifesto†a (indeed, since Marx's anti-Proudhon piece†b), we cannot go hand in hand with it at a moment when it is using the Anti-Socialist Law†462 as a pretext for raising its banner again. And it is better so. We would involve ourselves in an endless debate with these gentry, the Sozialdemokrat would become a battleground, and in the end we should after all be forced publicly to announce our resignation. Not that all this would be of use to anyone save the Prussians and the bourgeois, and so we would rather avoid it. But this should not be regarded as a model by other people — those who, unlike us, have not themselves been forced by these particular negotiations to pick up the gauntlet thrown down by Höchberg and Co. I see no reason at all why you, for example, should not contribute to the paper.†558 The articles from German working men are the only things in it that give one any pleasure, and things of yours could only enhance the paper; and since it does exist, a paper that's as good as it's possible to make it is, after all, preferable to one that is merely bad. I say this on the assumption that these people pay you properly, for it would be asking altogether too much of a man in your position that he should, into the bargain, work for nothing. In fact, we're not particularly incensed against the Leipzigers over this business. We saw it coming for years. For Liebknecht cannot resist mediating and making friends left and right, nor is he exactly fussy about what elements have been imported so long as the party gives the appearance of being really strong and having plenty of members and, if possible, funds. And so he'll go on until one day he burns his fingers. When that happens the better men will no doubt revert to the right course.

Page Break me45.433

Page me45.433
The Freiheit is all sound and fury, quite devoid of content or meaning, and Most, who in other respects is not without talent, has here shown himself incapable of producing a single idea since he uprooted himself from the bedrock of the party. If I've got to have undiluted abuse, then give me the late Karl Heinzen any day; he succeeded in being even more ham-handed.
Page me45.433
The powers of attorney have all gone off to New York,†c since when nothing more has been heard. There's no relying on

Page Break me45.434
Liebknecht's expectations, of which he always has more than is good for him.
Page me45.434
For years Lessner has had nothing much to do with the Society here†55; he seldom turns up, and then doesn't do anything much except grumble and grouse about the course of things generally.
Page me45.434
In Russia matters are going splendidly! They'll soon come to blows there. And when that happens, the bowels of the great men of the German Empire will instantly turn to water — a veritable flux! That will be the next turning point of world history.
Page me45.434
You shouldn't allow the poor anarchists to irritate you so.†559 They, too, are in a truly forlorn state. In the West they have nothing left to do save be anarchical amongst themselves and tear one another's hair out, and in Russia all their murderous deeds achieve — as they have just discovered to their dismay — is pulling the Constitutionals'†560 chestnuts out of the fire for them!
Page me45.434
Regards from Marx and

Your
F.E.
Page me45.434
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

292
ENGELS TO AMÉLIE ENGEL†561
IN LONDON
Page me45.434
[Draft]
[London, around 1879-1880]
Madame,

Many years of experience have impressed upon me the principle that under no circumstances should one give financial aid to strangers.
Page me45.434
Moreover I cannot at this moment raise the sum you want. Were I able to do so, I should be under an obligation to use it, as I do every penny I can spare, for the relief of our German party comrades who are being persecuted by Bismarck.

Page Break me45.435
Page me45.435
Besides, since you have connections that will procure you audiences with princesses, you are unlikely to experience difficulty in extricating yourself from this momentary embarrassment.
Page me45.435
Finally, I cannot refrain from mentioning that, while your visit came as a surprise to me, I have since then been equally certain of receiving a request of the kind contained in your letter.

Yours very truly
Page me45.435
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXIX, Moscow, 1946

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.436
Page Break me45.437

APPENDICES

Page Break me45.438
Page Break me45.439

1
BRIEF ACCOUNT OF MARX'S LETTERS TO CARL HIRSCH†562

IN PARIS
Page me45.439
On 31 January 1875 K. Marx sends Hirsch a letter relating to the work Misére de la Philosophie†a printed at his expense (1,500 copies) by a Mr Vogler, a publisher in Brussels. In this letter he says also that Vernouillet, who sends him letters, is a very sensible man; finally he asks him how long it is since he saw Freund and Mesa; the last address which he had for Freund was: 53, route de Versailles (Auteuil).
Page me45.439
On 10 December 1875 Karl Marx, 41 Maitland Park Road, London, N.W., writes to Hirsch concerning his book Le Capital, speaks of Lachâtre in Vevey (Switzerland) and of Kaub.
Page me45.439
On 16 February 1876 Karl Marx invites Hirsch to pay a visit to his good friend Lopatin, 25, rue Gay Lussac, and advises him to make his acquaintance.
Page me45.439
On 4 May 1876 Karl Marx informs C. Hirsch that a certain Henri Oriol, 177, rue St Denis, an employee at the Lachâtre bookshop, has written to him that the Rappel asked him for a review of the work Le Capital, and Mr Oriol is asking me, Marx says, for an article about this work, a kind of key which could also serve as an introduction.†563
Page me45.439
K. Marx also asks for news of Kaub.

Page Break me45.440
Page me45.440
On 23 September 1876 K. Marx writes to Hirsch: The day before yesterday I came back from Karlsbad.†178 On my arrival I found a letter from Lavrov relating to the book Le Capital, the publication of which is to be banned in France, as he was told by his agent in Paris, Guyot of the Palais Royal.†a He sends greetings from the Kaub family.
Page me45.440
On 10 April 1877 Karl Marx asks Hirsch for information about the Galliffet and Madame de Beaumont affair.†308 He adds that the Vorwärts called Galliffet a 'dog'. He also asks him for the result of the scandalous trial of the 'simpleton' Louis Blanc (sic) against the Russian Panayev.
Page me45.440
On 14 May 1877, in a letter to Hirsch, K. Marx speaks of gens†b Kaub, hostile to the Tsar, whom he calls a 'Kindernhund',†c child murderer.†564 But the sentry protects him.
Page me45.440
On 1 August 1877 K. Marx writes a socialist letter to Hirsch in which the names of Höchberg, Engels, Elisée Reclus and Arnould figure, and against the Protestant pastors of Germany.
Page me45.440
On 20 February 1878 Karl Marx informs Hirsch that he has learnt from Lissagaray that a large number of people, supporters of the F. Pyat Commune, are working again to restore that harlequin Thiers who has done so much harm to the Commune; further on he says: Louis Blanc at least had the courage not to lick the boots of Mr Thiers as J. Favre, Simon, etc., did.

Page me45.440
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 34, Moscow, 1964

Printed according to C. Hirsch's file from the archives of the Paris Prefecture of Police

Translated from the French

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.441

2
ELEANOR MARX TO CARL HIRSCH
IN PARIS
Page me45.441
London, 25 October 1875
41 Maitland Park Road
Dear Mr Hirsch,

I enclose herewith a short appreciation, written by my mother, of an English actor Mr Irving. Mama would be pleased if you could arrange for its insertion in the Frankfurter Zeitung.†565
Page me45.441
If he had enough time, Papa would himself have written an appreciation of Mr Irving in whom we are greatly interested (although we do not know him personally). First, because he is a man of exceptional talent and, secondly, because the entire English press, in consequence of the most wretched intrigues, has set about him, and engineered what can only be described as a plot against him. By getting the Frankfurter to print Mama's appreciation, you would be doing us a great service.†566
Page me45.441
I should also like to ask you on behalf of a friend, a Russian lady, if you think it might be possible to have an appreciation of Mr Irving published in the Journal des Débats,†a or else in the Temps or Le Siécle.
Page me45.441
I very much hope you will forgive me for bothering you like this, but you have so many contacts with the French and German press, and your influence is so great that you are the only person to whom we could turn. I hope that you will excuse me, and not hold it too much against me.
Page me45.441
Papa asks me to say how grateful he is to you for the newspapers you were good enough to send him. He also sends his warm regards, as do we all, to our friend Kaub. Mama thanks you in advance and, as for myself, I remain

Yours ever,
Eleanor Marx
Page me45.441
Mama asks me to say that she does not wish her name to appear in the Frankfurter, but that if you want to say who wrote the appreciation, you may do so 'as between friends'.
Page me45.441
First published in the language of the original (French) in Society for the Study of Labour History, Bulletin No. 8, Leeds, 1964

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.442

3
JENNY MARX TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER
IN GENEVA
Page me45.442
[London, between 16 and 20 August 1876]
My dear and esteemed Friend,

You really have heaped coals of fire on my head, and having just looked at the date of your first dear letter and even that of the second I must needs cover myself with sackcloth and ashes. I come to you with a sincere Pater peccavi.†a As soon as I got your first letter I meant to write straight away; then something intervened and I put it off, and to put off letter-writing is the surest way of killing it dead. One only has to start putting it off and a day turns into a week and a week into a month, and as for the speed with which the moons mount up to a year, that is something the gods and we old people are best qualified to know. The older one gets and the worse the times become, the quicker they pass and the faster the hours fly by. That's how it is with me, at any rate. And there must surely be something to be said in favour of old age. After all it's utterly wretched and miserable to be no longer young, and lively and 'sound'; one senses this particularly when, on top of old age, ill-health supervenes, as has recently happened to me, and this is probably the best plea in my favour for having neglected my duty of writing to so old and well-tried a friend. For months I have suffered from such severe headaches, etc., etc., that I often felt dazed and giddy and if only for that reason could not write. A three weeks' stay in Brighton has more or less set me up again. Last Friday†b my husband and my youngest daughter†c left for Karlsbad,†178 both of them unfortunately for reasons of health — or rather ill-health. This exceedingly expensive trip means there can be no question of other excursions or visits to loyal friends near and far, and, greatly though my husband would welcome an opportunity of paying his respects to Mont Blanc and old Becker, he must perforce adhere scrupulously to his cure and eschew any extra trips. Nor shall I myself be able to pack my knapsack this year; and I puff and I blow hot and cold in the diabolical heat. I got a letter from Karlsbad yesterday. After many tribulations they finally arrived at the institute for afflictions of the liver. In

Page Break me45.443
Nuremberg they spent hours trotting about in search of a bed.†a Nothing to be had, not even in the meanest pothouse. The bakers were holding a convention, while from all directions the trombones and trumpets of the future,†185 the Siegfrieds, Valkyries and Götterdämmerung†b heroes were pouring into Nuremberg which they had to leave without having sampled its wares. Then they got on the wrong train and it was only after a truly Don Quixote-like series of to-ings and fro-ings, which continued for 28 hours, that they arrived in the country of springs.
Page me45.443
Your news was all of it most interesting, and if I don't reply en détail you should put it down to this cruel heat, which must be the scapegoat for a great deal just now. I can't tell you how sorry I am for not having provided you with any material so far.†c It would seem that there's nothing to be done with the manager. I've written to him so often. My husband had a letter from Borkheim not long ago†d in which he says he is in fact a bit better. I think the best and safest course would be for you to approach him personally. He knows best where the things are kept and so can give orders for them to be looked out and sent to you. As for the other books, papers, etc., you want, I shall approach our old friend Lessner about them. Engels and my husband no longer have any connection whatsoever with the old Workers' Society†55 which is now very very much run down and has become a rowdy society of louts.
Page me45.443
Whatever ingenuity Lessner may have expended hitherto on keeping it together, he is now heartily sick of the thing. But he can be more helpful to you than anyone else, and is an honest, reliable man who in politics has always behaved exceptionally well and honestly. One of the old guard 'qui meurt mais ne se rend pas'†e!†567 I shall be visiting our friend Engels in Ramsgate next week†f and therefore want to settle everything with Lessner beforehand so far as I can. I'm positive you had best deal with Borkheim direct. His address is:

S. Borkheim, Esq.
1 Denmark Place, Hastings
Page me45.443
And now, my esteemed friend, goodbye for the present.
Page me45.443
This time next year, I trust, we shall all be 'over there', i.e. in our 'beloved fatherland'†a so that we may see all our old comrades again at last. In which case we shall also make a bee-line for Papa Becker. With warmest regards,

Page Break me45.444

Your old friend,

Jenny Marx
Page me45.444
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 34, Moscow, 1964

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

4
ELEANOR MARX TO CARL HIRSCH
IN PARIS
Page me45.444
[London,] 25 November 1876
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.
Dear Sir,

For several weeks past I have been on the point of writing to you — I have actually started a letter on several occasions, but one thing and another always prevents my finishing it.
Page me45.444
Just now in particular I have little time, since I am very busy with the election for the 'SCHOOL BOARD'. This committee, which is entrusted with the management of the public schools and with compulsory instruction, is a pretty important one and is chiefly concerned with combatting the so-called 'CHURCH PARTY' which seeks the outright abolition of compulsory instruction. I am working to promote the candidature of a woman — a MRS Westlake — who, though essentially bourgeois like almost all Englishwomen, is at any rate very much a free thinker and worth more than any of the men who are offering themselves as candidates. I go from house to house canvassing votes and you would never believe the comical things I see and hear. At one house they demanded that we teach 'religion above all' — at another I was informed that 'instruction is the curse of the country, that education will be the ruin of us', etc., etc. All in all it is amusing, but also sad at times, when you call on a workman who tells you that he would like to 'consult his employer' first.

Page Break me45.445
Page me45.445
We receive the Révolution†a every day. What do you make of it? Can it long survive? I have my doubts about it. Tell us what you think.
Page me45.445
Next week you will have a visit from Mr Kistemaeckers — the publisher of Lissagaray's book†b — a very good, very honest man. He is going to Paris to introduce the book in Paris and nothing should be said about his visit for fear of alerting the police.
Page me45.445
Papa (who for the past few weeks has been very unwell on account of a heavy cold and bronchitis) is very vexed at not having had any news from Paris. As you know, he sent a case of instalments to Paris, hoping to receive in exchange sewn copies of the book — and not only has he received nothing, he hasn't even had any news.†568 If you know anything about this, please let him know, I beg you, dear Sir.

Page me45.445
But I see I have come to the end of my paper. So I shall bid you adieu for today. I told you in my last letter how well my pince-nez suits me — I grow more delighted with it every day.
Page me45.445
Many good wishes from everyone here to Kaub, as also to yourself

and Believe me,
Yours very sincerely,
Eleanor Marx
Page me45.445
First published in the language of the original (French) in Society for the Study of Labour History, Bulletin No. 8, Leeds, 1964

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

Published in English for the first time

5
JENNY MARX TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE
IN HOBOKEN
Page me45.445
[London, 20 or 21 January 1877]
41 Maitland Park Road, Haverstock Hill
My dear Friend,

It's a long, long time since you had news of me or so much as a reminder of my existence; I did not even break my silence when fate struck you yet another terrible blow and you might, with perfect justification, have expected a few words of commiseration from your friends.†569 Let me assure you that it was not lack of sympathy that caused me to remain silent. If I failed to write, it was because the tragic news literally bereft me of speech, nor did I wish to impinge on your great sorrow with all the commonplaces of sympathy and condolence. I know only too well how difficult it is and how long it takes to regain one's own balance after losses of this sort; it is then that life comes to our aid, with its little joys and big worries, with all its little, day-to-day drudgeries and petty vexations, and the greater sorrow is deadened by lesser, hourly ills and, without our noticing it, the violence of the pain abates; not that the wound has ever healed, and this is specially so of the mother's heart, but little by little there awakens in one's breast a fresh sensibility, a fresh sensitivity even, to new sorrows and new joys, and thus one goes on and on living, with a sore if ever hopeful heart, until at last it ceases to beat and gives way to eternal peace.

Page Break me45.446

Page me45.446

On the whole (though always and everywhere there are clouds) things have gone quite well with us. This year my husband and Tussy (our youngest) were again compelled to visit Karlsbad which had done them so much good on a previous occasion. This time, too, my husband found the treatment most beneficial. But alas, immediately on his return to this damp, foggy country of ours he caught so bad a cold that he has not hitherto been able to rid himself of the really frightful sneezing and coughing which have become almost chronic. Even a minor operation to shorten what is known as the uvula in his throat — it had become relaxed and elongated and was causing a constant excess of phlegm — does not so far seem to have done very much good. Tussy fell seriously ill in Karlsbad and came home pale and emaciated. She is better again now and busy doing various translations from German or French into English. As a member of the Shakespeare Society, she translated a pamphlet by Professor Delius of Bonn on the epic element in Shakespeare,†241 to the complete satisfaction of all concerned, and Professor Delius wrote her the most flattering letter in which he congratulated himself and the Society on the acquisition of such a 'FELLOW WORKER'. This SUCCESS will give her the entrée to literary circles and magazines where she might be able to find paid work and thus be released from her teaching, which is onerous and takes an undue toll of her health. Lissagaray, to whom she is engaged, has brought out his book on the Commune†a in Brussels. It has turned out really well, seems to be selling well, and is presently being translated into German†a and English.†570

Page Break me45.447
Page me45.447

As for my husband, he is at this moment DEEPLY IN THE EASTERN QUESTION AND HIGHLY ELATED by the firm, honest bearing of the sons of Mohammed vis-á-vis all the Christian HUMBUGS and hypocritical ATROCITY MONGERS.†187 (As may be gathered from today's telegrams, the Russians — the civilisers according to Gladstone, Bright and all the FREEMEN AND STILLMEN AND MERRYMEN — would seem to be pulling out in real earnest.)
Page me45.447

Preoccupied though he is with this great political question, he is no less interested in the victory of the socialists in Germany†237; not that they will be sending so very many more 'men' into parliament, but the number of votes they got everywhere, even in the bureaucratic bigwigs' districts of Berlin, is truly overwhelming and seems to have infuriated the climbers and speculators [Gründer]†118 and slave-drivers.
Page me45.447

Longuet fell ill this spring of a nervous fever from which he is recovering only very gradually and which has left him still very much on edge and irritable. He is as excitable, vociferous and argumentative as ever, but in his favour be it said that he has given his lessons at King's College regularly and to the satisfaction of his superiors.†177 On 10th May Jenny gave birth to another little boy†b who at first looked very weak, small and ailing. Now he has one little tooth and eats so well that he has become a fine, fat, sturdy lad who is the pride of the whole family. When he drives up in his CARRIAGE AND FOUR, i.e. in the parental PERAMBULATOR, everyone rushes out joyously to meet him in the hope of being the first to pick him up, OLD GRANNY at their head. Jenny continues to suffer from asthma and a persistent cough, but that doesn't prevent her from carrying out her onerous duties at school and at home, nor does it diminish her embonpoint†c or the fresh bloom of her rosy cheeks. Lafargue and Laura also live quite close by. Unfortunately their business, printing by the procédé Gillot,†d hasn't been doing very well.†94 Always and everywhere, the competition of big capital stands in their way. In an attempt to overcome it, Lafargue has thrown himself into the breach and works like a NIGGER†e. Laura has likewise given proof of wondrous energy, courage and extreme application in all spheres, whether at home or elsewhere. Indeed, one might apostrophise Lafargue with 'cobbler stick to your last'. It is a shame he should have deserted old Father Aesculapius.†571 But all the same, prospects of success would seem to have improved somewhat of late. Larger orders are coming in and Lafargue, who always sees everything through rose-tinted spectacles, is now hoping for a big 'JOB'. Laura has completely recovered her health and looks fresh and blooming and so youthful that she's addressed as 'MISS' by everyone who doesn't know her to be a married woman of nine years' standing.

Page Break me45.448
Page me45.448

Our friend Engels is as flourishing as ever. He is always healthy, vigorous, cheerful and in good spirits, and he thoroughly relishes his beer (especially when it's the Viennese variety). I cannot tell you much about our other acquaintances because we see only very few of them now, particularly the French — no Le Moussus, no Serrailliers, above all no Blanquists. WE HAD ENOUGH OF THEM. Wróblewski keeps in touch with the Turkish minister so that he can go to Turkey as soon as war breaks out. He'd have been far better advised to have gone there long since, for poverty and wounds have made his life a very hard one. Should there not be a war he will go under completely here, particularly after the terrible state of excitation he's been in. It will be a pity if he doesn't find something suitable to do. He has a really excellent brain and is a sterling fellow. Of the English working men á la Mottershead, Eccarius, Hales, Jung, etc., I would rather say nothing. They are all of them arch-blackguards, corrupt and corruptible, and chasing BY HOOK AND BY CROOK after the HONEST SHILLING. A truly abject lot!†a
Page me45.448

But enough for today. My husband has been awaiting — so far in vain — the promised Tribune†b articles got together by Weydemeyer. You would greatly oblige him if you would look into the matter and send them to him.†c He needs them urgently.
Page me45.448

And now there's only a small corner left in which to say goodbye and to convey the most cordial wishes, both for your own prosperity and for that of your family, from my husband, my children and, above all, from your old friend

Jenny Marx

Page me45.448

[Postscript, written at the head of the first page of the letter]

Page me45.448

Lessner is doing fairly well with his LODGING HOUSE; a baby every year — breeding like a rabbit.

Page me45.448

First published abridged in Briefe and Auszüge aus Briefen von Joh. Phil. Becker, Jos. Dietzgen, Friedrich Engels, Karl Marx u. A. an F.A. Sorge und Andere, Stuttgart, 1906 and in full in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 34, Moscow, 1964

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me45.449

6

ELEANOR MARX TO CARL HIRSCH
IN PARIS

Page me45.449

London, 8 June 1878†a

Dear Mr Hirsch,

I owe you my excuses for having neglected to reply to your kind letter and trust that you won't take it too much amiss. To begin with, I have been suffering from neuralgia for the past few weeks, as well as from bouts of atrocious toothache — and, if you have ever had toothache, you will understand my lack of inclination to write. Next, I am working just now for several literary societies (CHAUCER SOCIETY, SHAKESPEARE SOCIETY, PHILOLOGICAL SOCIETY etc.) at the BRITISH MUSEUM and this work leaves me very little time.†b Finally, I was so ashamed of my idleness that I no longer dared write. Today, however, I have taken my courage in both hands, for Papa has instructed me to drop you a line on his behalf. He is very unwell at the moment and in his present state of health it is impossible for him to let you have anything for your journal.†c He has, I think, been working too hard latterly and will be absolutely forced to do nothing for some time. I feel sure you will excuse him and that you will tell this to your colleagues on the Égalité.

Page me45.449

I must thank you for asking me to collaborate on your journal, but at the moment I cannot — every bit of my day is taken up with work at the MUSEUM.

Page me45.449

What do you make of Nobiling?†406 Do you know anything about the man? The English press is indignant — more so, perhaps, than the German. One can see how delighted they would be to lay everything at the door of socialists of all countries, so as to resume their persecution. They are delighted that Germany is about to have a bit of reaction and terrorism — if only they could treat themselves to a bit of that over here! I fear it will be a bad business for our friends Liebknecht and the others. A little persecution can be beneficial, but not reaction, which suppresses newspapers, MEETINGS — in other words every means of propaganda. As yet we know nothing definite about Nobiling, for one cannot believe the reactionary press. The effect here was overwhelming when news of the second attempt at assassination came through — nothing but cries of indignation on all sides, cries made more indignant by the fact that the bourgeois are terribly afraid. So if you know anything about Nobiling, write and tell us.

Page Break me45.450
Page me45.450
We have seen Mr Zanardelli once or twice. Is he not a little bit of a hothead? I didn't see him long enough to judge, but that is how he struck me.
Page me45.450
Lissa[garay] has left for Jersey — before his departure he asked me to send you his best compliments. Papa also sends you a cordial handshake, likewise to Kaub.
Page me45.450
Shall we see you soon in London? You really ought to come and spend a few days here.

Yours sincerely,
Eleanor Marx
Page me45.450
First published in the language of the original (French) in Society for the Study of Labour History, Bulletin No. 8, Leeds, 1964

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

Published in English for the first time

7
JULES GUESDE TO KARL MARX†572
IN LONDON
Page me45.450
[Excerpt]
Paris, [March-April 1879]
Hôpital Necker, Rue de Sévre
Very dear Citizen,

I could not be more grateful to you for the sympathy and esteem which you have been kind enough to show me, and I ask you to believe that, for my part, although I find myself in disagreement with you on the subject of the International,†573 I have always professed the deepest admiration for the author of the Communist Manifesto†a and Capital.
Page me45.450

In fact this disagreement, I can say it now, would never have arisen — on my part at least — had I known you better.
Page me45.450
For everything that you express in your letter coincides with what I think — and have always thought.

Page Break me45.451
Page me45.451
If I am a revolutionary, if I believe like you in the need for force to solve the social question in a collectivist or communist way, I am also like you the convinced opponent of movements á la Cafiero which — useful though they may be in Russia — do not correspond in France, or in Germany, or in Italy, to any of the demands of the situation. You were able to see this from my campaign in the Radical against the Comic Opera insurgents in Benevento.†574
Page me45.451
Like you I am convinced that before thinking of action, one must set up a party, a conscious army, by means of active, continuous propaganda.
Page me45.451
Finally, like you I do not believe that the simple destruction of what exists will be enough to build what we want, and I think that for a more or less considerable period the impulse, the direction should come from above, from those who are 'better informed'.†a
Page me45.451
It is in these conditions that, since my return, I have been busy setting up this 'independent and militant workers' party' which you so rightly declare to be 'of the highest importance' in view of the events which are being prepared.
Page me45.451
But for this party to be both 'independent' and 'militant', it is essential that the French proletariat which is to constitute it should be delivered from the dupery of bourgeois Radicalism and that, on the other hand, it should be persuaded that its emancipation can only be achieved through struggle...
Page me45.451
If I were not so ill — and so poor — I would announce my next visit to you,†575 so much would I like to have a long talk with you. But I do not dispose of myself either physically — or pecuniarily. And I must limit myself to sending you all my thanks and assuring you of my complete devotion

To you and to the Revolution
Jules Guesde
Page me45.451
First published in full in the language of the original, French, in Le Combat marxiste, No. 19, Paris, mai 1935

Printed according to the journal

Translated from the French

Page Break me45.452

8
MARX TO MAXIM KOVALEVSKY†576
IN MOSCOW
Page me45.452
[London, April 1879]

Mr Kareyev's work†577 is excellent. However, I do not quite share his view of the Physiocrats.†260 I take the theory of capital, i.e., of the contemporary structure of society. From Petty to Hume, this theory was developed only piecemeal — a bit here, a bit there — according to the requirements of the period when the author lived. Quesnay was the first to put political economy on its real, i.e., capitalist, basis, and the curious thing is that he did so apparently as a landowner's tenant. Mr Kareyev is definitely wrong in saying that the Physiocrats opposed only one social occupation, namely agriculture, to others, i.e., industry and commerce, but never went, unlike Smith, so far as to oppose social classes to each other. If Mr Kareyev had recalled the main idea of Ricardo's Preface to his famous creation,†a in which he examines three classes of the state (landowners, capitalists, and workers, the latter tilling the soil by their labour), he would have seen that the first invention of the three classes in the economic sphere and their mutual relations could find a place only in the system of agriculture, where Quesnay put it. In addition, a writer should distinguish between what an author really gives and what he gives only in his own imagination. This is true even of philosophical systems; thus, what Spinoza considered the cornerstone of his system and what actually constitutes that cornerstone are two entirely different things. It is not surprising, therefore, that some of Quesnay's adherents, such as Mercier de la Riviére, saw the essence of the whole system in its paraphernalia while the English Physiocrats writing in 1798 were the first to demonstrate — on the basis of Quesnay's concepts and contrary to Adam Smith's — the need to abolish private ownership of land.†578
Page me45.452
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Byloye, No. 20, Leningrad, 1922

Printed according to the magazine

Translated from the Russian

Page Break me45.453

NOTES AND INDEXES

Page Break me45.454
Page Break me45.455

NOTES
Page me45.455

†1 This letter was published in English for the first time in Letters to Dr. Kugelmann by Karl Marx, Co-operative Publishing Society of Foreign Workers in the USSR, Moscow-Leningrad, 1934. — 3, 17, 21, 31, 32
Page me45.455
†2 Worried by the report of Marx's illness in the Frankfurter Zeitung, Ludwig Kugelmann wrote to Engels on 13 January 1874 asking him for more information concerning the state of Marx's health. — 3
Page me45.455
†3 Marx, accompanied by his daughter Eleanor, took a rest cure at Harrogate between 24 November and 15 December 1873. — 3, 17
Page me45.455
†4 In the Reichstag elections of 10 January 1874, the German Social Democrats scored a significant victory. The number of votes cast for them rose from 41,461 in 1871 to 171,351; six deputies (including Wilhelm Liebknecht and August Bebel, who were serving a prison sentence at the time) were elected, as against two at the 1871 elections. For the first time, three seats went to the General Association of German Workers which polled 180,319 votes.
Page me45.455
Alongside the left-wingers, the clerical Party of the Centre (see Note 423) also managed to strengthen its position. Marx referred to its members as the 'ultramontanes'. The latter advocated unlimited authority for the Catholic Church and opposed the Kulturkampf (see Note 35) pursued by Bismarck.
Page me45.455
Engels learned about the results of the elections from Kugelmann's letter of 13 January 1874. — 3, 6, 43
Page me45.455
†5 The Geneva Congress of the International Working Men's Association took place between 8 and 13 September 1873. Marx and Engels reversed their original intention to take part in its work, since the mounting reprisals against the working-class movement and financial difficulties precluded its being a truly international assembly. Unable to send their own delegations, nearly all the International's organisations handed over their mandates to the delegates of Romance Switzerland.
Page me45.455
When debating the Rules, the majority led by Johann Philipp Becker confirmed the Hague Congress resolutions (see Note 20) to extend the sphere of competence of the General Council, notwithstanding the opposition of the Swiss delegates Henri Perret and Theodore Duval. The congress emphasised the need for the working class to wage a political struggle. New York remained the seat of the General Council.

Page Break me45.456
Page me45.456
The Geneva Congress of 1873 was the last congress of the International Working Men's Association. — 4
Page me45.456

†6 The reference is to the address 'Compagnons, notre Association traverse...' issued in Geneva in August 1873 and signed by H. Perret, C. Bernard, T. Duval, M. Josseron, P. Detallancourt, H. Renauld and Laplace. Timed to coincide with the Geneva Congress (see Note 5), it was directed against some of the Hague Congress resolutions (see Note 20) on organisational issues. — 4
Page me45.456
†7 The Ligue universelle des Corporations ouvriéres was set up in late 1873-early 1874 by Perret and other members of the Swiss working-class movement. The attempts by the League's founders to involve German and British trade unions in its work having failed, the League ceased to exist. — 5
Page me45.456
†8 On 14 January 1874, the Sheffield trade union congress refused to declare its solidarity with the Ligue universelle des Corporations ouvriéres (see Note 7). — 6
Page me45.456
†9 In the Reichstag elections of 10 January 1874, Johann Jacoby failed to obtain a majority vote in any of the constituencies where he had been nominated. At the second ballot held on 27 January, he was elected in the Leipzig Constituency, but refused to take up his seat in protest at the Imperial Constitution. As a result, the Social-Democrats lost one seat in the Reichstag. Jacoby's conduct was criticised by Der Volksstaat, 20 February 1874. — 7, 9
Page me45.456
†10 In 1873-74, Engels concentrated on research into German history as he was planning a treatise on the subject. His intention, however, failed to materialise. Judging by the preparatory materials, Engels planned to cover the period right up to 1873 with particular emphasis on the time since the French Revolution. Part of Engels' manuscript, entitled Varia on Germany, is to be found in Vol. 23 of the present edition, and a more detailed version, in Marx-Engels Archives, Russian Edition, Vol. X, Moscow, 1948. — 7
Page me45.456
†11 This letter from Marx to George Moore, like that of 28 March, dealt with the business of the firm holding a patent for engraving work; the partners were Paul Lafargue, Benjamin Le Moussu and George Moore. In late summer 1873, Lafargue withdrew from the firm and Marx took his place. The firm fell apart in the spring of 1874. — 10
Page me45.456
†12 Marx's letter has not been found. — 10, 31, 33, 34, 75, 176, 189, 193, 222, 270, 276, 311, 353, 376, 382, 412
Page me45.456
†13 An excerpt from this letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx, On History and People, McGraw Hill Book Company, New York, 1977. It appeared in English in full in The Letters of Karl Marx, selected and translated with explanatory notes and an introduction by Saul K. Padover, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979. — 13, 135
Page me45.456
†14 Tennyson's poem, written on the occasion of the arrival in Britain of Grand Duchess Maria Alexandrovna, fiancée of Prince Alfred, the Duke of Edinburgh, was entitled 'A Welcome to Her Royal Highness Maria Alexandrovna, Duchess of Edinburgh, 7 March 1874'; each stanza ended with the word 'Alexandrovna!'. — 14

Page me45.456
†15 Engels' letter has not been found. — 14, 15, 24, 38, 66, 130, 132, 134, 159, 180, 184, 195, 201, 219, 243, 257, 271, 316, 345, 369, 375
Page me45.456
†16 This letter was published in English for the first time in The Letters of Karl Marx, selected and translated with explanatory notes and an introduction by

Page Break me45.457
Saul K. Padover, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979. — 15, 34, 37, 45, 55, 87, 143, 188, 191, 267, 416
Page me45.457
†17 A reference to the French edition of the first volume of Capital. An attempt to translate Marx's principal work into French was first made by Charles Keller, a member of the Paris Section of the International. Between October 1869 and April 1870, he translated about 400 pages which he sent to Marx for editing, After the defeat of the Paris Commune, however, Keller was forced to emigrate to Switzerland, where he embraced Bakuninist views, after which Marx terminated co-operation with him.
Page me45.457
In December 1871, Paul Lafargue assisted Marx in concluding a contract for the publication of Capital with the progressive French journalist and publisher Maurice Lachâtre. The contract was signed on 15 February 1872. Under it, Capital was to appear in 44 instalments, one printer's sheet each. The work appeared between 1872 and 1875 in two instalments at a time, but was sold in series of five instalments each, making nine series in all.
Page me45.457
The last instalments having come out, the series were stitched together and sold as separate books.
Page me45.457
The first volume of Capital was translated into French by Joseph Roy. Marx did not think much of the effort and made a vast number of alterations, in fact, revised the book. As he himself said, the authorised French translation had an independent scientific value alongside the German original.
Page me45.457
In this edition, the first volume of Capital is published in Engels' authorised English translation with the interpolations from the French edition given in the Appendix (see present edition, Vol. 35). — 15, 16, 17, 26, 56, 57, 58, 70, 75, 80, 93, 113, 166, 276, 282, 287
Page me45.457
†18 Marx is referring to Rudolph Meyer's book Der Emancipationskampf des vierten Standes, which appeared in Berlin in 1874 in instalments. The second instalment was sent to Marx by Kugelmann on 15 April 1874. — 17
Page me45.457
†19 The agricultural labourers' movement for shorter working hours and higher wages in the central and eastern counties of England began in March 1872 with a strike in Warwickshire, where the Agricultural Labourers' Union was set up. In May 1872, the National Agricultural Labourers' Union was formed under Joseph Arch's leadership and by late 1873 its membership had reached about 100,000. By April 1874, the strikers managed to win a pay rise. — 18, 29

Page me45.457
†20 The Hague Congress (2-7 September 1872) of the International Working Men's Association was the most representative in its history. Present at the congress were 65 delegates from 15 countries. It took stock of the campaign against Bakuninism within the International and mapped out a programme of action suited to the new conditions that had emerged after the Paris Commune. Its main decision was to endorse the London Conference (1871) resolution on the political action of the working class concisely formulated as Art. 7a of the International's Rules. The congress also reached a number of decisions aimed at consolidating the Association's organisational structure.
Page me45.457
After the congress, the Bakuninists declared their disagreement with its resolutions, causing what amounted to a split in the International. The Hague Congress laid the foundation for future political parties of the working class in various countries. — 18, 42, 114, 156, 157, 184, 214, 258, 339
Page me45.457
†21 In May 1874, Alexander II arrived in England to strengthen Russia's contacts with the British government. The stated purpose of the Tsar's visit was to see his daughter Maria Alexandrovna, the Duke of Edinburgh's wife. — 18

Page Break me45.458
Page me45.458
†22 The Crimean War (1853-56), or the Eastern war, was waged by Russia against the allied forces of Britain, France, the Kingdom of Piedmont and Turkey for supremacy in the Levant. It ended in Russia's defeat and the signing of the Paris Peace Treaty in 1856. In accordance with this treaty, Russia renounced its claims to the 'protection' of the Christian subjects of the Turkish Empire, agreed to the neutralisation of the Black Sea and was forbidden to have military bases and warships there, and recognised the collective protectorate of the great powers over Serbia, Moldavia and Wallachia, which remained under the Sultan's sovereignty. Russia also pledged not to erect fortifications on the 197land Islands. — 18, 272
Page me45.458
†23 The international conference involving Russia, Britain, Austria-Hungary, Germany, France, Italy and Turkey, held in London in January-March 1871, produced a convention that revoked articles XI, XIII and XIV of the 1856 Paris Treaty. The ban on the presence of Russian and Turkish warships and strongholds in the Black Sea area was lifted. — 18
Page me45.458
†24 The Ermen-Engels partnership contract signed on 30 June 1864 for a term of five years, which had made Engels a co-owner of the Manchester firm of Ermen & Engels, expired in the summer of 1869.
Page me45.458

The terms of Engels' withdrawal from the business were set forth in the draft agreement drawn up by him on 2 December 1868: '1) Mr Engels retires from business on the 30th June 1869 and engages not to be interested, either directly or indirectly, as principal or assistant, in any similar or competing business either in England or on the Continent for the term of five years after that date. 2) Mr Engels consents that Mr G. Ermen, if he should think proper to do so, continues the firm of Ermen and Engels as long as he is a partner in the concern. 3) Mr G. Ermen pays Mr Engels on 30th June 1869 the sum of £1750, seventeen hundred and fifty Pounds St. 4) Mr Engels to have the right of keeping £5000 in the concern at 5% Interest between 30th June 69 to 30th June 1870. Manchester, December 2nd 1868.'
Page me45.458
In 1 July 1869, Engels left the Manchester firm of Ermen & Engels and wholly devoted himself to party, scientific and journalistic pursuits. — 19
Page me45.458
†25 The Court of Chancery or Court of Equity — one of the high courts of England, which after the judicial reform of 1873 became a division of the High Court of Justice. The jurisdiction of the court, presided over by the Lord Chancellor, covered matters concerning inheritance, contractual obligations, joint-stock companies, etc. In a number of cases the powers of this court overlapped those of other high courts. In contrast to the English common law accepted in other courts, the legal proceedings in the Court of Chancery were conducted on the basis of the so-called law of equity. — 20
Page me45.458
†26 An excerpt from this letter was published in English for the first time in The Letters of Karl Marx, selected and translated with explanatory notes and an introduction by Saul K. Padover, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979. — 21, 82, 222, 324
Page me45.458
†27 In the second half of July 1874, Marx took a rest cure in Ryde on the Isle of Wight. Engels was in Ramsgate (Eastbourne) between mid-July and mid-August 1874. — 21, 43
Page me45.458
†28 In late July 1874, Brussels was the venue for a conference of European states convened on the initiative of Russia to discuss new rules of warfare. Being unwilling to discuss maritime rights, an issue that Russia intended to raise again, Britain refused to take part. — 22

Page Break me45.459
Page me45.459
†29 Bismarck spent July and August 1874 at Bad Kissingen where an assassination attempt was made on him on 13 July. It was organised by the Catholic clergy enraged by the Kulturkampf policy he was pursuing (see Note 35). Bismarck was wounded by a shot fired by the artisan Kullmann. — 23, 24, 312
Page me45.459
†30 On 20 November 1873, the French National Assembly passed a law on the septennium, which allowed Mac-Mahon to hold the post of president of the republic for seven years (up to 20 November 1880). This signified consolidation of the President's individual power and bolstered the monarchists' position.

Page me45.459
The monarchist parties' attempts to have the National Assembly dissolved and the monarchy restored made in the summer of 1874 provoked indignation in republican quarters. Fearing an outburst on the part of the republican-minded masses, on 9 July Mac-Mahon issued an address to the Assembly stating that he would use all available means to retain the power granted him for the term of seven years. At the same time, he demanded an early introduction of new laws that would, to all intents and purposes, secure his dictatorship. Specifically, he demanded that the President be given a right to dissolve the Assembly, announce new elections and form the majority in parliament. — 23, 24
Page me45.459
†31 The Rurals (the Assembly of the Rurals, the French Rural Assembly) — a derogatory nickname of the French National Assembly convened in February 1871 in Bordeaux and made up mostly of provincial landowners, officials, rentiers and tradesmen elected in the rural constituencies. The majority of the deputies (430 out of 630) were monarchists. — 23, 57
Page me45.459
†32 In 1870, the Gladstone government introduced a reform of public education which provided for the opening of secular schools controlled by locally elected school boards (alongside parish schools) at which religious instruction was no longer compulsory. The reform was attacked by the Conservatives. In mid-July 1874, one of them, Lord Sandon, proposed an amendment to the law of 1869 which had established the Endowed Schools Commission. He suggested that the money be henceforth distributed by the Charity Commission, which would have allowed the church to regain the ground it had lost in school education. Sandon's Bill was strongly opposed by the Liberals. — 24, 67
Page me45.459
†33 Pierre Magne, the finance minister in the Mac-Mahon government, tried to eliminate the enormous budget deficit of 1873 (149 million francs), among other things by greatly increasing indirect taxes on all everyday necessities. In July 1874, his proposals were discussed in the French National Assembly. They were opposed by the left-wing deputies, who feared discontent and possible mass protests. After a stormy debate, some of Magne's proposals were rejected, and he was forced to resign. — 24
Page me45.459
†34 In July 1874, Padua and Arqua (Italy), Avignon and Vaucluse (France) hosted a festival to mark the quincentenary of the death of Petrarch, the great Italian lyric poet. The choice of venues was not accidental. The 'new man', as Petrarch has been called, spent his last years in Arqua near Padua. In Avignon, the Popes' residence from 1309, he was ordained, which gave him access to the papal court. In Vaucluse near Avignon, Petrarch spent four years (1337-41) in total seclusion, and later repeatedly returned there to work and rest. It was here that he wrote or conceived most of his works. — 25
Page me45.459
†35 Kulturkampf (struggle for culture) — the name given to a system of measures implemented by the Bismarck government in the 1870s against the Catholic Church and the Party of the Centre which was closely associated with it (see Note 423). Using the pretext of a campaign for 'secular culture', the Bismarck government sought to subjugate the clergy and cripple the Party of the Centre. With this end in view, it passed laws (1871-75) curtailing the rights of the Catholic clergy and abolishing the Catholic Church's right of supervision over the schools. Bismarck used the anti-Catholic campaign to bolster Prussian influence in the Polish lands under Prussian jurisdiction. In the second half of the 1870s and the early 1880s, as the working-class movement began to grow, Bismarck effected a reconciliation with the Catholic Church in an effort to consolidate the forces of reaction, and most of these laws were repealed. — 25, 84

Page Break me45.460

Page me45.460

†36 In his letter of 24 June 1874 Lachâtre requested Marx to pass on his proposal to start a joint magazine or newspaper in London to the French émigré journalist Rochefort. — 25

Page me45.460

†37 Marx (accompanied by his daughter Eleanor) took a cure at Karlsbad from 19 August to 21 September 1874. Having returned to London on 3 October, he resumed work on the French translation of the first volume of Capital and finished editing the last instalments in late January 1875 (see this volume, pp. 55-56). — 26

Page me45.460

†38 Under the contract signed by Marx and Maurice Lachâtre in February 1872 (see Note 17), the French edition of the first volume of Capital was to appear in instalments. The delay in the publication, which took four years (1872-75), was caused, alongside the circumstances mentioned in this letter, by the growth of political reaction following the Paris Commune. In mid-1875, the French government transferred legal rights over Lachâtre's publishing house in Paris to Adolph Quêst, an official who procrastinated with the printing of the last instalments of Capital and did his best to obstruct its dissemination. — 26, 153, 227

Page me45.460

†39 Jenny Longuet's health was shaken by the death of her first son, Charles, in late July 1874. On 6 August, Marx took her to Ramsgate, where Engels was on holiday at the time. Marx stayed with them until 9 August. In the second half of August, Engels with his family and Jenny Longuet took a trip to Jersey and returned to London on 5 September. — 27, 38

Page me45.460

†40 Before leaving for Karlsbad for medical treatment in August 1874, Marx applied for British naturalisation to the Home Office as a precaution against possible reprisals by the Austrian authorities. The application was, however, turned down, ostensibly because Marx had failed to be 'loyal to his own King and Country' (see present edition, Vol. 24, p. 564). — 28, 29, 35

Page me45.460

†41 An extract from this letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx and F. Engels, Letters to Americans. 1848-1895. A Selection. International Publishers, New York, 1953. — 28, 410

Page me45.460
†42 Marx is referring to the inaugural congress of the Austrian Social-Democratic Workers' Party illegally held in Neudörf on 5 and 6 April 1874. Present at it were 74 delegates, 10 of them representing Czech workers' organisations that favoured a single Austrian Social-Democratic Party incorporating workers' organisations in the Slav territories. The congress founded the party and elected its leading bodies. The Délnické listy (Workers' Paper) published in Prague in Czech was to become the party's central printed organ alongside the Gleichheit. — 30
Page me45.460
†43 On 15 August 1874 Marx, accompanied by his daughter Eleanor, left for Karlsbad (Karlovy Vary) on doctors' recommendations, where he stayed from 19 August to 21 September. On the way back to London, Marx stopped off in

Page Break me45.461
Dresden, Leipzig, Berlin and Hamburg. In Leipzig, where he stayed approximately from 25 to 28 September, he had talks about the state of the German working-class movement with Wilhelm Liebknecht and Wilhelm Blos, as well as with members of the Leipzig party branch. While in Hamburg on 29 September-1 October, Marx met Social-Democratic leaders. — 32, 33, 35, 43, 45, 48, 53, 58, 119
Page me45.461
†44 An excerpt from this letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx. On Education, Women and Children. Arranged and edited with an introduction and new translations by Saul K. Padover. McGraw-Hill Book Company, New York, 1975. — 33
Page me45.461
†45 In November 1873-March 1874, Russia witnessed mass arrests among the revolutionary-minded intellectuals and students in St Petersburg, Moscow, Kiev, Odessa and some other cities. The arrests broke up the Narodnik (Populist) group of the so-called Chaikovists (after the name of N.V. Chaikovsky, one of its founders). The members of the group conducted propaganda among the workers, in particular they read extracts from the first volume of Capital and published revolutionary literature. They were the first to issue Marx's work The Civil War in France in Russian. The majority of those arrested were involved in the 'trial of the 193' in 1877-78, the biggest political trial of the Narodniks in Tsarist Russia. — 33
Page me45.461
†46 A reference to the abortive attempts by Italian anarchists to launch an uprising in Bologna and Apulia early in the morning of 8 August 1874. — 35
Page me45.461
†47 The French Marshal Bazaine, who had surrendered the Metz fortress in October 1870 during the Franco-Prussian war, was charged with high treason and sentenced to death in December 1873. Two days later, the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment. In August 1874, after eight months in prison, Bazaine fled to Spain. — 35, 251
Page me45.461
†48 On 30 August 1874, the Viennese newspaper Der Sprudel reported: 'The long-standing leader of the International, Marx, and the head of the Russian Nihilists, the Polish Count Plater, have arrived at Karlsbad for a cure.' The next issue (No. 19, 6 September 1874) stated that Count Plater was associated neither with the Russian Nihilists nor with the International. — 37

Page me45.461
†49 This letter was published in English for the first time, in an abridged form, in: K. Marx, F. Engels, Selected Letters. The Personal Correspondence, 1844-1877. Edited by Fr. J. Raddatz, Boston, Toronto, [1981]. — 38, 243
Page me45.461
†50 Engels is probably referring to José Mesa's letter of 24 August 1874. The latter wrote that despite his enforced move to Paris he still kept in touch with members of the Spanish section of the International Working Men's Association in Madrid, on which Engels could rely, and supplied a number of addresses. — 39, 43
Page me45.461
†51 Engels spent the time between 28 July and 8 November 1857 at seaside resorts, including St Hélier in Jersey, where Marx visited him in early October. — 39
Page me45.461
†52 An extract from this letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, Correspondence. 1846-1895, Martin Lawrence Ltd., London, 1934. — 40, 122, 258, 275, 282, 299
Page me45.461
†53 Sorge withdrew from the General Council on 12 August 1874 and informed Engels about this on 14 August; his official resignation followed on 25 September. — 41

Page Break me45.462
Page me45.462
†54 On 7-13 September 1874, a number of organisations that had found themselves outside the International due to their refusal to recognise the Hague Congress resolutions (see Note 20) held a congress in Brussels that declared itself the seventh congress of the International Working Men's Association. It was attended by members of anarchist groups from Switzerland, Spain and Belgium, two Lassalleans — members of German workers' organisations in Belgium — and Eccarius, who had been delegated by the breakaway faction of the British Federation. The congress revealed disagreement among the participants, including the anarchists themselves, on the issue of the working class' attitude to the state. — 42, 49
Page me45.462
†55 The reference is to the German Workers' Educational Society in London founded in February 1840 by Karl Schapper, Joseph Moll and other members of the League of the Just. After the establishment of the Communist League in 1847, the leading role in the Society was assumed by the League's local communities. Marx and Engels were actively involved in its work in 1847 and 1849-50. On 17 September 1850, Marx, Engels and some of their followers left the Society in protest at the domination of the Willich-Schapper group, and rejoined it only in the late 1850s. After the foundation of the International Working Men's Association, the Society with Lessner among its leaders, became its German section in London. The London Educational Society existed until 1918, when it was closed down by the British government. — 49, 351, 363, 364, 434, 443
Page me45.462

†56 The plan to start a workers' newspaper called the Neue Rheinische Zeitung in Cologne failed to materialise at that time. — 50
Page me45.462
†57 Engels is referring to John Tyndall's inaugural address to the 44th congress of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, which opened in Belfast on 19 August 1874 (the address was published in Nature, No. 251, 20 August 1874), and to Henry Huxley's speech 'On the Hypothesis that Animals Are Automats, and Its History' made at the Association's meeting of 24 August (Nature, No. 253, 3 September 1874).
Page me45.462
Engels used Tyndall's speech in his Dialectics of Nature (see present edition, Vol. 25, p. 481). — 50
Page me45.462
†58 The only passage of this letter by Engels to have survived is the one quoted by Hermann Lopatin in his letter to Pyotr Lavrov of 27 October 1874. Engels wrote this letter in reply to Lopatin's letter of 15 October dealing with Engels' articles Refugee Literature. Lavrov was sharply criticised in one of them for his conciliatory attitude towards the Bakuninists (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 19-21). Lopatin quotes the passage in English and introduces it in the following way: 'Engels himself sent me his short article. In the letters that we exchanged in this connection he assures that he has tried to show restraint and did not wish exploiter á fond this issue.' — 53
Page me45.462
†59 The reference is to the reprint of Marx's Revelations Concerning the Communist Trial in Cologne (see present edition, Vol. 11) in Der Volksstaat (28 October-18 December 1874) (see also Note 137). It was the first time that Marx was named the author of this work.
Page me45.462
The epilogue, written for the Revelations and dated 'London, 8 January 1875', was printed in Der Volkstaat, No. 10, 27 January 1875 (see present edition, Vol. 24). In the first half of 1875, a separate edition of the work (based on the publication in Der Volksstaat) appeared in Leipzig. — 54, 73
Page me45.462
†60 An incorrect explanation of the French term (Fleurs de lys, Lilies — the symbol of legitimist monarchy) was given in an editorial footnote to Chapter IV of

Page Break me45.463
Revelations Concerning the Communist Trial in Cologne printed by Der Volksstaat, No. 140, 2 December 1874. After Marx's intervention, the error was set right in the supplement to Revelations published in Der Volksstaat, No. 7, 20 January 1875 (see also present edition, Vol. 11, p. 442). — 54
Page me45.463
†61 In his letter to Marx of 29 December 1874, Max Oppenheim wrote that he was regularly receiving The International Gazette from Berlin. He believed that Marx was the paper's London correspondent. — 56
Page me45.463
†62 Following the publication of Part One of A Contribution to the Critique of Political Economy in 1859 (see present edition, Vol. 29), Marx wrote a lengthy economic manuscript in 1861-63. It was a second rough draft of Capital (the first being the 1857-58 manuscript). In 1863, he definitively decided that the work was to have four books, the first three being theoretical, and the fourth, presenting a historical and critical survey. In August 1863, having completed work on the manuscript of 1861-63, Marx began preparing Capital for the press.

Page me45.463
This work resulted in a third rough draft of Capital — the Economic Manuscript of 1863-65, consisting of three theoretical books. The draft for the fourth book (Theories of Surplus Value) formed part of the 1861-63 manuscript. Subsequently, Marx returned to the first book. On Engels' advice, Marx decided it would be the first to be published, and was preparing it for the press throughout 1866 and the first half of 1867. The first German edition of the book appeared in September 1867 as Volume One of Capital. Under the plan agreed with the publisher Otto Meissner, the second and third books, analysing the process of circulation of capital and the forms of capitalist process as a whole, were to appear as Volume Two, and the fourth book, dealing with 'the history of economic theories', as the third and final volume of Capital.
Page me45.463
Marx, however, did not manage to prepare the second and third volumes of Capital for the press. After his death, Engels completed the work and published Marx's manuscripts of the second and third books as Volume Two (1885) and Volume Three (1894). Engels also intended to prepare for the press and publish the above-mentioned manuscript of the fourth book as Volume Four of Capital but died before this plan had been carried out. In the present edition of the Collected Works of Marx and Engels, this book of Capital has been included in the Economic Manuscript of 1861-63 (vols 30-34), while the first three volumes of Capital make up vols 35-37 respectively. — 57, 115, 343, 415, 432
Page me45.463
†63 This excerpt from Marx's letter to Juste Vernouillet is the passage from Marx's original letter quoted by the Munich antique dealer Emil Hirsch in his letter to Dr Pappenheim of 9 September 1899. Marx's letter, according to Hirsch, was dated 'London, 3 February 1875', took up two pages and dealt with the publication of Marx's manuscript by Louis Lahure (probably a reference to the French translation of the first volume of Capital; see this volume, Marx's letter to Maurice Lachâtre of 30 January 1875). According to Hirsch the quoted passage was to be found in the concluding part of the letter. Marx's addressee was not mentioned. — 57
Page me45.463
†64 On 21 January 1875, the French National Assembly began debating the draft 'law on the organisation of public authority' which formed part of the 1875 Constitution. The fundamental issue — the nature of the state system in France — was to be solved in the debate on the amendments to the Bill held on 29 and 30 January. By the final vote on 30 January the Constitution indirectly recognised the state system as a republic. — 57

Page Break me45.464
Page me45.464
†65 This letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx and F. Engels, Letters on 'Capital', New Park Publications Ltd., London, 1983. — 58

Page me45.464
†66 'What's Going on at Home?' — a section in the Vperyod! (Forward!) magazine published by Pyotr Lavrov. It carried reports from Russia. — 58
Page me45.464
†67 The section 'What's Going on at Home?' in Vperyod! (Vol. III, London, 1874) carried an anonymous article from Irkutsk dated February 1874; its actual author was Hermann Lopatin, who described a group of religious dissenters he met in Siberia called 'Not Ours'. They denied the existence of God and opposed government authority, property, family and all existing laws and customs in protest against the existing system in Russia. — 58
Page me45.464
†68 Marx finally received both books mentioned here. The name of the first appears on his list 'Russisches in my bookstall'.
Page me45.464
Marx intended to use the results of his research into the agrarian relations in Russia when putting the finishing touches to the section on ground rent in the second volume of his Capital (see Note 62). However, this intention was not fulfilled. After the Russian translation of the first volume of Capital appeared in print in 1872, Marx continued his study of Russian economic writings, making copious notes as he went along. — 58
Page me45.464
†69 Marx wrote this letter on the cover of Tkachov's pamphlet Offener Brief an Herrn Friedrich Engels, Zurich, 1874. Tkachov's work was written in reply to Engels' third article in the Refugee Literature series carried by Der Volksstaat on 6 and 8 October 1874 (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 19-28). In his letter to Engels of 1 February 1875 Wilhelm Liebknecht proposed that Engels write a refutation to the pamphlet. Marx may have read the pamphlet in February or March and passed it on to Engels with his comments. A short while later, Engels wrote articles IV and V in the Refugee Literature series, which were printed by Der Volksstaat on 28 March and 2, 16, 18 and 21 April 1875.
Page me45.464
This letter was published in English for the first time in: Marx and Engels, Collected Works (present edition, Vol. 24, Note 44). — 59
Page me45.464
†70 This is a short record of a reply to Hermann Ramm's letter to Engels of 7 February 1875. Ramm wrote that the Volksstaat publishers planned to purchase a plot of land to build new premises for the party printing office in Leipzig and requested Engels to help collect the necessary funds. This plan is also mentioned in Engels' letter to August Bebel of 15 October 1875 (see this volume, pp. 123-25). — 59
Page me45.464
†71 At the Gotha Congress, which met between 22 and 27 May 1875, the two trends in the German working-class movement — the Social-Democratic Workers' Party (the Eisenachers) led by August Bebel and Wilhelm Liebknecht and the Lassallean General Association of German Workers — united to form the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany. This put an end to the split in the German working class. The draft programme of the united party, which Marx and Engels subjected to fierce criticism, was adopted by the congress with only insignificant amendments. — 59, 69, 97, 257

Page me45.464
†72 This letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx, Critique of the Gotha Programme, Lawrence, London, [1933]. — 60, 94, 97
Page me45.464
†73 This letter is closely connected with the Critique of the Gotha Programme by Marx (see present edition, Vol. 24). It sets out Marx's and Engels' shared opinion on the merger of the two German workers' parties, the Eisenachers (see Note 75) and the Lassalleans, which was likely to take place in early 1875. The letter was occasioned by the publication on 7 March 1875 of the draft programme of the future united Social-Democratic Party of Germany in Der Volksstaat (the organ of the Eisenachers) and the Neuer Social-Demokrat (the organ of the Lassalleans). This draft was approved with only minor amendments by the unity congress at Gotha held on 22-27 May 1875 and came to be known as the Gotha Programme.

Page Break me45.465
Page me45.465
Marx and Engels welcomed the merger of the two parties, but believed that the Eisenachers should have shown greater dedication to principle and refused to make theoretical and political concessions to the Lassalleans.
Page me45.465
Engels' letter was first published by Bebel, only 36 years later, in his book Aus meinem Leben, Zweiter Teil, Stuttgart, 1911. — 60
Page me45.465
†74 A reference to one of Ferdinand Lassalle's programme theses providing for the establishment of workers' producer associations with the aid of the state. Lassalle and his followers repeatedly stressed that what they had in mind was a state in which power would pass into the hands of the working people through universal suffrage. — 60
Page me45.465
†75 This refers to the Programm und Statuten der sozial-demokratischen Arbeiter-Partei, adopted at the general German workers' congress in Eisenach in August 1869 and published in the Demokratisches Wochenblatt on 14 August 1869. The congress founded the Social-Democratic Workers' Party of Germany, subsequently known as the Eisenachers. For the most part the programme complied with the principles of the International Working Men's Association. — 60, 70
Page me45.465
†76 The German People's Party, founded in September 1868, embraced the democratic section of the bourgeoisie, mostly in the South-German states, which campaigned against Prussian hegemony in Germany and called for a federative German state. — 61, 70, 95, 97
Page me45.465
†77 A reference to the following articles of the draft Gotha Programme:
Page me45.465
'The German workers' party demands as the free basis of the state:
Page me45.465

'1. Universal, equal and direct suffrage by secret ballot for all males who have reached the age of 21, for all elections in the state and in the community. 2. Direct legislation by the people with the right to initiate and to reject bills. 3. Universal military training. A people's militia in place of the standing army. Decisions regarding war and peace to be taken by a representative assembly of the people. 4. Abolition of all exceptional laws, in particular the laws on the press, associations and assembly. 5. Jurisdiction by the people. Administration of justice without fees.
Page me45.465
'The German workers' party demands as the intellectual and moral basis of the state:
Page me45.465
'1. Universal and equal education of the people by the state. Compulsory school attendance. Free instruction. 2. Freedom of science. Freedom of conscience.' — 61
Page me45.465
†78 The League of Peace and Freedom was a pacifist organisation set up in Switzerland in 1867 with the active participation of Victor Hugo, Giuseppe Garibaldi and other democrats. The League asserted that it was possible to prevent wars by creating the 'United States of Europe'. Its leaders failed to expose the social sources of wars and often confined anti-militarist activity to mere declarations. At the General Council meeting of 13 August 1867 Marx spoke against the International's official participation in the League's inaugural congress, since this would have meant solidarity with its bourgeois programme, but recommended that some members of the International should attend the congress in their own right in order to make it adopt revolutionary-democratic decisions (see present edition, Vol. 20, pp. 426-27, and Marx's letter to Engels of 4 September 1867, present edition, Vol. 42). — 61

Page Break me45.466
Page me45.466
†79 The so-called iron law of wages was formulated by Ferdinand Lassalle in his Offnes Antwortschreiben an das Central-Comité zur Berufung eines Allgemeinen Deutschen Arbeitercongresses zu Leipzig, Zurich, 1863, pp. 15-16. — 62
Page me45.466
†80 Philippe Joseph Buchez, one of the first ideologists of the so-called Christian socialism, put forward a plan to set up workers' producer associations with the aid of the state. — 62
Page me45.466
†81 Engels is referring to Wilhelm Bracke's work Der Lassalle'sche Vorschlag. Ein Wort an den 4. Congreß der social-demokratischen Arbeiterpartei (1873), which criticised Article 10 of the Eisenach programme. As an immediate target it demanded that the party campaign for 'state promotion of co-operatives and state credit for the free producer associations with democratic guarantees'. Bracke proposed that this provision be replaced by a statement of the need to set up an all-embracing trade union organisations, 'to abolish private ownership of what at present constitutes capital', and to 'attain the international unity of the proletariat'. — 62, 97
Page me45.466

†82 In March 1872, August Bebel and Wilhelm Liebknecht were sentenced to two years' imprisonment for their membership of the International Working Men's Association, their socialist convictions and democratic politics. At another trial, on 6 July 1872, Bebel was sentenced to additional nine months' imprisonment and deprived of his seat in the Reichstag for 'insulting His Imperial Highness William I.'
Page me45.466
Liebknecht was released on 15 April 1874, while Bebel was freed only on 1 April 1875. — 65
Page me45.466
†83 In his letter to Engels of 25 March 1875, Bracke wrote: 'The programme, submitted for the “unity congress” and signed by Liebknecht and Geib, forces me to write these lines. The adoption of this programme is impossible as far as I am concerned, and Bebel is of the same opinion for his part.' Bracke particularly drew attention to the points of the programme which proclaimed the introduction of producers' co-operative societies with state aid. 'The Lassalleans have evidently made this point a conditio sine qua non for unification, and our representatives, Liebknecht and Geib included, have endorsed the same for the sake of unification. In order to “bring about” unification, they have discarded their convictions and given their consent to something of whose wrongness they are convinced... However, since Bebel seems determined to take up the struggle, I would at least feel moved to support him to the best of my abilities. But before that I should like to know what you and Marx think of the affair. Your experience is greater, and your understanding better, than mine.' — 66
Page me45.466
†84 In a letter to August Bebel (which has not come to light), Engels invited him and Liebknecht to visit London. In his reply of 23 February 1875 Bebel wrote that he was too busy with party matters to make a trip in 1875. He did not visit Marx and Engels in London until 1880. — 66
Page me45.466
†85 The original of this letter is kept at the Engels family archive in Engelskirchen. — 66
Page me45.466
†86 This is a covering letter to Marx's Marginal Notes on the Programme of the German Workers' Party, which went down in history as Critique of the Gotha Programme (see present edition, Vol. 24). Marx's letter to Bracke was first published by

Page Break me45.467
Engels, together with the Critique of the Gotha Programme, in 1891 in Die Neue Zeit, Vol. 1, No. 18.
Page me45.467
An excerpt from this letter was published in English for the first time in The Socialist Series, number one, under the title 'The Socialist Programme. By Karl Marx', The Socialist Labour Press, Glasgow [1918]. It appeared in English in full in: K. Marx and F. Engels, Selected Works. In two volumes, Moscow-Leningrad, 1936. — 69
Page me45.467
†87 A reference to Marx's Critique of the Gotha Programme which analyses the draft programme of the future united Social-Democratic Party of Germany formed as a result of the merger of the Eisenachers and the General Association of German Workers. The work significantly promoted the fundamental theoretical issues of scientific socialism and set an example of uncompromising struggle against opportunism. The Critique of the Gotha Programme was written in April-early May 1875, and was intended for the Eisenachers' leaders (see Note 75). Marx's letter to Bracke of 5 May 1875 was in fact an integral part of the Critique of the Gotha Programme (see Note 86).

Page me45.467

Despite opposition from the opportunist Social-Democratic leaders, Engels had the Critique of the Gotha Programme published in 1891, together with his foreword and Marx's letter to Bracke, in the theoretical organ of the German Social-Democratic Party, Die Neue Zeit, Vol. 1, No. 18. As his letter to Kautsky of 23 February 1891 makes clear, he was forced to tone down some of the more outspoken passages and appraisals and to make a number of deletions in Marx's manuscript (see present edition, Vol. 49). — 69, 75
Page me45.467
†88 Later, Marx and Engels decided against publicly opposing the Gotha Programme, considering such action inexpedient when the merger of the two German working-class organisations was already a fait accompli. Their attitude to the united party formed in Gotha was based on the belief that, in the long run, the elimination of the organisational rift in the German working-class movement would be conducive to the struggle of the German proletariat for its emancipation. — 69
Page me45.467
†89 The original plan was to hold the unity congress in Gotha on 23-25 May 1875, the Lassalleans' congress prior to it, and the Eisenachers' congress on 25-27 May. In reality, the unity congress took place on 22-27 May, and the Eisenachers' and the Lassalleans' congresses were held during it. — 70, 94.
Page me45.467
†90 Marx is most probably referring to Schramm's letter of 31 March 1875, in which the latter wrote of his intention to contribute a series of popular articles about Capital to Der Volksstaat. Schramm requested Marx to explain to him some points on the theory of ground rent. Judging from Schramm's letter to Marx of 14 May (see Note 91), Marx actually did so, but his letter, written between 8 and 14 May, has not been found. The following year, Schramm published a book, Grundzüge der National Oekonomie. Abth. 1, Leipzig, 1876, a copy of which he probably sent to Marx. This book has been found in Marx's library. — 73
Page me45.467
†91 Replying to Marx, Schramm wrote on 14 May 1875: 'Many thanks for your kind and detailed letter which is particularly valuable to me in view of its explanations of ground rent. As you requested, I am sending you the desired addresses below: the owners, Bamberger and Bernstein, are both known to me personally, and I think I can vouch for their reliability.'

Page Break me45.468
Page me45.468

Probably a reference to the Berlin wholesale firm of Bamberger & Co., Leinen- und Baumwollwaren engros, Breitestraße 22. It was owned jointly by Jacob Bamberger and Ad. Bernstein. — 73
Page me45.468
†92 Annolied (The Song of Anno) — a poem written by an unknown author in the late 11th century in Middle High German in praise of Anno, Archbishop of Cologne. — 74
Page me45.468
†93 In his letters of 29 March and 25 April 1875, E. Glaser de Willebrord asked Marx to contribute to the socialist weekly La Réforme sociale he was planning to start in Brussels. — 75
Page me45.468
†94 After his withdrawal from the engravers' firm in the summer of 1873 (see Note 11), Lafargue bought a photolithographic and etching workshop in the hope of solving his financial problems. — 75, 132, 447
Page me45.468
†95 This is a draft of Engels' reply to Patrick John Coleman's letter of 19 May 1875. It was written down on the last page of Coleman's letter informing Engels about his intention to go into trading business and requesting him to become security for him. — 76
Page me45.468
†96 An extract from this letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx and F. Engels, Letters on 'Capital', New Park Publications Ltd., London, 1983. — 78, 205, 206, 207, 287, 308
Page me45.468
†97 Traube's artificial cells — inorganic formations representing a model of living cells; they were created by the German chemist and physiologist Moritz Traube by mixing colloidal solutions. He read a paper on his experiments to the 47th Congress of German Naturalists and Physicians in Breslau on 23 September 1874. Marx and Engels thought highly of Traube's discovery. — 78
Page me45.468
†98 Marx elaborated these ideas in Chapter XXV of the French edition of the first volume of Capital (see Note 17). Engels did not include this passage in the English translation of the volume which is to be found in Vol. 35 of the present edition. — 78
Page me45.468
†99 This is Marx's reply to Juste Vernouillet's letter of 11 July 1875. — 79
Page me45.468
†100 Marx is referring to the delay in the printing and distribution of the French edition of the first volume of Capital (see notes 17 and 38). The obstacles put up by the French government in the way of Capital are described in Marx's letter to Peter Imandt of 27 September 1875 (this volume, p. 92). — 79
Page me45.468
†101 The copyright treaty was signed by the free city of Hamburg and Great Britain on 16 August 1853. Article 2 of the treaty covered translations. — 80
Page me45.468
†102 The Basle Congress of the International Working Men's Association was held between 6 and 11 September 1869. Present at it were 78 delegates from eight major European countries. For the first time the International's congress was attended by an American, the delegate of the National Labor Union of the United States, Andrew Carr Cameron.

Page me45.468
The congress heard a report written by Marx on the instructions of the General Council and stressing the International's role in leading the strike movement.
Page me45.468
The issues of landed property and the right of inheritance figured prominently at the congress. To all intents and purposes the Basle Congress resolution confirmed that of the Brussels Congress on the abolition of private ownership of land. No decision was taken on the question of abolishing the right of inheritance as the resolution submitted for consideration by the congress failed to win the required number of votes.

Page Break me45.469
Page me45.469
There was almost no disagreement on the resolution recommending the workers to set up trade unions in all industries and to form associations on a nationwide scale. Defence of the workers' interests and a campaign to replace the wage labour system by 'associated free labour' were proclaimed the trade unions' main tasks.
Page me45.469
The Basle Congress also took a number of decisions directed at consolidating the International's organisation, extending the functions of the General Council and enhancing its role as the leading body of the International Working Men's Association. Paris was chosen as the venue for the next congress, scheduled for 1870. — 81
Page me45.469
†103 Engels was on holiday in Ramsgate between mid-August and 22 September 1875. — 82, 91, 94
Page me45.469
†104 Between 15 August and 11 September 1875, Marx was in Karlsbad for a second time taking treatment. On his way there, he stopped over in Frankfurt am Main (see Note 109). On his way back to London, he spent several days in Prague visiting Max Oppenheim. — 82, 86, 89, 90, 92, 94
Page me45.469
†105 The notion of the 'average man' was elaborated in the works of the Belgian statistician Lambert Adolphe Jacques Quetelet. According to him, the 'average man' was the perfect, 'true type', while individuals were merely its distorted representatives. Marx used the English translation of Quetelet's main work, A Treatise on Man and the Development of His Faculties, Edinburgh, 1842. — 82
Page me45.469
†106 Referendar — a junior official in Germany, usually a lawyer, doing a training course at a court of law or in the civil service. — 83
Page me45.469
†107 6 August 1875 was a birth centenary of David O'Connell, leader of the Irish national liberation movement. — 84

Page me45.469
†108 The red International — a name for the International Working Men's Association that came into use in the 1860s.
Page me45.469
The black International — a name for the Order of Jesus that became current after the publication in 1873 of N. Steffen's article 'Brief eines Luxemburgers an einem Landsmann. Dritter Brief' in Die Grenzboten, No. 42, p. 119. — 85
Page me45.469
†109 The 'Frankfurter Angelegenheiten' column of the Frankfurter Zeitung (No. 229, 17 August 1875) featured the following note: 'Frankfurt, 17 August. Late last week Mr Karl Marx arrived here from London. His friends were pleasantly struck by his healthy looks and high spirits. He was on his way to Karlsbad, where he intended to stay for about four weeks.'
Page me45.469
Marx passed through Frankfurt am Main around 13-14 August 1875. — 85
Page me45.469
†110 A reference to one of the trials against the Frankfurter Zeitung. The immediate cause of the reprisals against the newspaper was the publication on 25 March 1875 of an article on Kulturkampf and of an article on the reptile fund on 30 March (see notes 35 and 408). The editors were sentenced to imprisonment for their refusal to name the authors of those articles. Leopold Sonnemann, editor-in-chief and publisher, was arrested on 28 August and remained in prison until late September 1875. — 85

Page Break me45.470
Page me45.470
†111 In line with the decision of the Gotha unity congress of 1875 (see Note 71), the leading bodies of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany were the Executive Committe (Vorstand), Control Commission (Controlkomission) and Committee (Ausschuss). The Executive Committee elected at the Gotha Congress had five members: Hasenclever and Hartmann, the chairmen; Auer and Derossi, the secretaries, and Geib, the treasurer. Thus the Executive came to comprise three Lassalleans (Hasenclever, Hartmann and Derossi) and two Eisenachers (Auer and Geib). The Executive Committee was to be based in Hamburg. — 85, 96, 98, 246
Page me45.470
†112 Marx's letters from Karlsbad to his daughter Eleanor (Tussy) have not been found. — 87
Page me45.470
†113 The reference is to the battle of 1 September 1870 during the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71, in which the French army was smashed. The crushing defeat at Sedan speeded up the collapse of the Second Empire and led to the proclamation of a republic in France on 4 September 1870. — 88, 155, 251, 297
Page me45.470
†114 On Marx's and Engels' attitude to the German socialist Gustav Adolph Köttgen, see their 'Letter from the Brussels Communist Correspondence Committee to G.A. Köttgen' (present edition. Vol. 6, pp. 54-56). — 88

Page me45.470
†115 The introduction to Grün's book was published under the heading 'Ueber Weltanschauungen. Präludium zur Philosophie in der Gegenwart' in Die Wage, Nos. 33-38, 20 August-17 September 1875. The book itself was completed in March 1876 and issued by Otto Wiegand's publishing house (K. Grün, Die Philosophie in der Gegenwart. Realismus und Idealismus, Leipzig, 1876). In May 1873, Engels had made a start on one of his principal works, Dialectics of Nature. — 88
Page me45.470
†116 A reference to the anonymous and undated pamphlet published in Brussels under the title Quelques mots d'un groupe socialiste révolutionnaire russe á propos de la brochure: Alliance de la Démocratie socialiste et l'Association Internationale des Travailleurs. The pamphlet was presumably written by Michal Kasper Turski. It was spearheaded against Marx's and Engels' work The Alliance of Socialist Democracy and the International Working Men's Association (see present edition, Vol. 23).
Page me45.470
Lavrov wrote to Engels on 20 September 1875: 'You have probably seen a small pamphlet that Nechayev's anonymous followers have published in Brussels as a response to the pamphlet about the “Alliance”. But, of course, neither the group nor its writings are of any value whatsoever.' In late September-early October 1875 Lavrov sent a copy of the pamphlet to Engels. — 91
Page me45.470
†117 In a letter to Marx of 25 September 1875, Peter Imandt enclosed an article, 'The International Working Men's Association. By an Internationalist', carried by The Dundee Advertiser on that day. 'The enclosure will show you that The Dundee Advertiser has a very good friend of yours among its correspondents. I was surprised to see the article this morning, and have no idea where it originates,' he wrote. — 92
Page me45.470
†118 Under the terms of the peace treaty signed after its defeat in the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71, France paid 5,000-million-franc reparations to Germany, which contributed to the rapid growth of German economy. The period of feverish business activity, which witnessed the mushrooming of railway, industrial, construction and commercial joint-stock companies, banks and credit and social security companies and was accompanied by large-scale speculation, stock-exchange swindles and machinations, has come to be known as Gründerjahre (or the period of Gründertum). By 1873 it had resulted in a crash followed by an economic crisis, which lasted well into 1877. — 92, 131, 218, 304, 335, 405, 447

Page Break me45.471
Page me45.471
†119 Marx wrote this letter on a postcard. On the side reserved for the address he wrote: 'Mons. P. Lawroff, 3, Evershot Road, Tollington Park, Holloway.' — 93, 113
Page me45.471
†120 Engels is referring to the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany formed at the unity congress in Gotha in May 1875 (see Note 71), whose Executive Committee consisted of three Lassalleans and two Eisenachers (see Note 111). — 94
Page me45.471

†121 The reference is to the programme of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany adopted by the unity congress in Gotha (see Note 71) in May 1875. Marx described it and gave a critical analysis of it in his Critique of the Gotha Programme (see present edition, Vol. 24), as well as in his letter to Wilhelm Bracke of 5 May 1875 (see this volume, pp. 69-73). Engels dealt with it in his letter to August Bebel of 18-28 March 1875 (ibid., pp. 60-66).
Page me45.471
The programme adopted at the congress ignored Marx's and Engels' comments on some of fundamental points. The point on proletarian internationalism was included at Liebknecht's suggestion. — 95, 97, 294
Page me45.471
†122 In 321 B.C., during the second Samnite war, the Samnites surrounded the Roman legions in the Caudine Forks near the Roman town of Caudium and drove them under a yoke, which signified the worst possible disgrace for a defeated army. Hence the phrase 'to pass under the Caudine yoke': to be submitted to extreme humiliation. — 95, 97
Page me45.471
†123 As is clear from Jose Mesa's letter to Engels of 4 July 1875, Engels had read the text of the Gotha Programme to him during Mesa's stay in London, which he left for Paris in late June. In his letter, Mesa asked Engels for the latest news of his friends in Germany, their merger with the Lassalleans and the Gotha Programme. Mesa intended to pass on the information to his friends in Madrid. — 95
Page me45.471
†124 In his letter to Engels of 28 June-7 July 1875, Wilhelm Bracke wrote that the Executive Committee of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany decided, by the Lassalleans' three votes to the Eisenachers' two, to delete from the list of Party literature printed in its central organs, Der Volksstaat and the Neuer Social-Demokrat, two anti-Lassallean works, namely Wilhelm Bracke's 'Der Lassalle'sche Vorschlag' (Brunswick, 1873) and Bernhard Becker's 'Geschichte der Arbeiter-Agitation Ferdinand Lassalle's' (Brunswick, 1874). Both books had been issued by Wilhelm Bracke's publishing house. On Bracke's resolute demand, this decision by the Executive Committee was revoked. — 95, 98
Page me45.471
†125 The national German co-operative printing office in Berlin was founded in August 1875. Its board comprised the Lassalleans Wilhelm Hasselmann, Friedrich Wilhelm Fritzsche and Heinrich Rackow. The Leipzig co-operative printing office had been set up by the Eisenachers in July 1872. After the introduction of the Anti-Socialist Law (see Note 462) the Social-Democratic co-operative printing offices were closed down. — 96

Page Break me45.472
Page me45.472
†126 The next Reichstag elections were held on 10 January 1877 (see Note 237). — 96, 97
Page me45.472

†127 An extract from this letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx and F. Engels, Selected Correspondence, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1955. — 99, 429
Page me45.472
†128 The opening part of the letter is missing. At the top of the first extant page there is a note in Bebel's hand: 'Zu Engels' Brief vom 12. Okt. 1875.' This note, as well as the fact that Engels' letter to Bebel of 12 October 1875 was published by the latter in his book Aus meinem Leben without the concluding part, suggests that what Engels wrote to Bebel on 12 and 15 October belongs to the same letter. Since, however, there is no direct proof of this, and the middle part of the letter is missing, the two parts bearing different dates are published as independent letters in the present edition. — 99
Page me45.472
†129 This is probably a reference to the Leipzig co-operative printing office set up by the Eisenachers in 1872. From June 1875, the Executive Committee of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany, in which the majority were the former members of the General Association of German Workers, acted as a supervisory council over the printing office. Cf. this volume, pp. 74 and 118-19. — 99
Page me45.472
†130 Der Volksstaat, Nos. 103, 104 and 106, of 8, 10 and 15 September 1875, reprinted the article 'Karl Marx über Strikes und Arbeiter-Koalitionen' from the Viennese Gleichheit, the central organ of the Austrian Social-Democrats. This unsigned article was a translation into German of § 5 ('Strikes and Combinations of Workers') from Chapter II of Marx's The Poverty of Philosophy, with the introduction and conclusion by the author of the article.
Page me45.472
In the 1885 edition of The Poverty of Philosophy, Engels supplied the passage from Marx's book mentioned in this letter with the following note: 'That is, the socialists of that time: the Fourierists in France, the Owenites in England' (see present edition, Vol. 6, p. 209). — 99
Page me45.472
†131 Der Volksstaat, Nos. 55, 68, 82, 91 and 92 (1875) carried articles signed 'K-Z' (see also this volume, p. 54). — 100
Page me45.472
†132 Engels draws a parallel between the period of reforms in Russia following the abolition of serfdom in 1861 and the 'New Era' in Prussia.
Page me45.472
The 'New Era' — the reference is to the 'liberal' course announced by Prince William of Prussia (King of Prussia from 1861) when he became regent in October 1858. He made the Manteuffel Ministry resign and called the moderate liberals to power. The bourgeois press dubbed this the policy of the 'New Era'. It was, in fact, solely intended to strengthen the position of the Prussian monarchy and the Junkers. This soon became clear to the representatives of the liberal opposition whose hopes had been deceived and who refused to approve the government project of a military reform. The constitutional conflict that ensued and Bismarck's advance to power in September 1862 (see Note 311) put an end to the 'New Era'. — 100
Page me45.472

†133 This letter of Marx's was written on the back of Eleanor Marx's letter to Bernhard Kraus of 20 October 1875. — 103
Page me45.472
†134 The letters mentioned by Marx and despatched from Karlsbad where he stayed taking a cure from 15 August to 11 September have not been found. — 103
Page me45.472
†135 In late October-early November 1875, Engels and his wife Lizzie Burns took Lizzie's niece Mary Ellen Burns to a boarding house in Heidelberg, where she stayed from November 1875 to March 1877. Engels and his wife returned to London on 6 November 1875. — 104, 106

Page Break me45.473
Page me45.473
†136 Engels' pamphlet On Social Relations in Russia (F. Engels, Soziales aus Russland, Leipzig, 1875) comprised an introduction and the fifth article from the Refugee Literature series (see present edition, Vol. 24). By 'the first article' Engels means the fourth article in the series, directed, like the fifth one, against Pyotr Tkachov's Offener Brief an Herrn Friedrich Engels. This fourth article was printed in Der Volksstaat, Nos. 36 and 37, 28 March and 2 April 1875. — 105
Page me45.473
†137 The Cologne Communist Trial was held in 1852. It was preceded by arrests of many Communist League leaders and activists in the summer of 1851 and their detention for a period of eighteen months. Marx's work Revelations Concerning the Communist Trial in Cologne was written between late October and early December 1852. In 1853, two separate editions of the work appeared, one in Basle and the other in Boston. They were not, however, distributed in Germany. In the first half of 1875, a new separate edition appeared in Leipzig, a copy of which Engels probably sent to Pauli. — 105
Page me45.473
†138 This letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx and F. Engels. Selected Correspondence, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1955. — 106
Page me45.473
†139 In places this letter coincides almost word for word with the item 'Struggle for Life' in Engels' Dialectics of Nature (see present edition, Vol. 25, pp. 583-85). — 106
Page me45.473
†140 In his note dated 24 November 1875, Paul Kersten asked Engels to arrange a meeting with Marx and Engels for himself and his friend. — 110
Page me45.473
†141 An extract from this letter pertaining to the liberation of Poland was read by Walery Wróblewski at a meeting held in London on 4 December 1875 to mark the anniversary of the Polish uprising of 1830 and published on 31 December 1875 by the newspaper Vperyod! (Forward!), No. 24, as part of the article 'Anniversary of the 1830 Polish Uprising'. — 111
Page me45.473
†142 Marx's and Engels' first public speeches on the Polish question were made at the international meeting held in London on 29 November 1847 to commemorate the 17th anniversary of the 1830 Polish uprising (see present edition, Vol. 6, pp. 545-52). — 111

Page me45.473
†143 Marx is referring to the so-called alliance of three emperors which came into being at the conference of the German, Austro-Hungarian and Russian emperors in Berlin in September 1872. It was an attempt to resurrect the reactionary Holy Alliance founded by Russia, Austria and Prussia in 1815. — 111, 297, 312, 340
Page me45.473
†144 This is Engels' reply to Lessner's letter of 15 December 1875. The latter wrote that he was told The Daily News of 13 December had carried a telegraph communication about Leo Frankel's arrest.
Page me45.473
Frankel was arrested in Vienna on 9 December 1875. As a member of the Paris Commune, he was charged with arson in the city and with shooting hostages, including the Archbishop of Paris, Georges Darboy. After two months' imprisonment in Vienna Frankel was transferred to Budapest. Since, for reasons of domestic policy, the French government did not dare to publicly demand Frankel's extradition, he was released on 27 March 1876. He informed Marx of this on 28 March. — 112

Page Break me45.474
Page me45.474
†145 An extract from this letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx, On America and the Civil War. Edited and translated by Saul K. Padover, New York, 1972. — 114, 250
Page me45.474
†146 Marx is expressing a familiar idea voiced in Nikolai Chernyshevsky's review of the Russian edition of Henry Charles Carey's Letters to the President on the Foreign and Domestic Policy of the Union and Its Effects, as exhibited in the condition of the People and the State: 'The course of history is not the pavement of Nevsky Prospekt... Those who are afraid of getting grimy and dirting their boots, should not take up public work' (Sovremennik, Vol. 85, Part II: 'Contemporary Review', January 1861, p. 51. In Russian). — 114
Page me45.474
†147 In his letter to Marx of 17 March 1876, Sorge asked whether Marx and Engels would be able to come to Philadelphia to take part in the centenary of the USA's foundation. — 114
Page me45.474
†148 The reference is to the publication of the English translation of the Manifesto of the Communist Party in the United States of America. As a delegate to the Hague Congress of the International in 1872 Sorge had brought with him the English translation of the Manifesto made by Hermann Meyer and asked Marx and Engels to look it through. They promised to make the necessary additions and corrections, but an excessive workload prevented them from doing so. — 115, 276, 283, 414
Page me45.474
†149 Marx is referring to mounting corruption and large-scale swindles in the USA under President Grant, especially in railway construction. — 115
Page me45.474

†150 There is no reliable information on whether Engels visited his wife's niece Mary Ellen Burns (Pumps) at Whitsuntide on 4 June 1876. — 116
Page me45.474
†151 Between 20 May and 2 June 1876, Engels and his wife Lizzie Burns were on holiday in Ramsgate. — 117, 124
Page me45.474
†152 Engels received Wilhelm Liebknecht's letter of 16 May 1876 and Johann Most's letter. Liebknecht wrote: 'A manuscript by Most enclosed, which will show you that the Dühring epidemic has hit even people who are otherwise quite sensible; it needs to be dealt with. Send the manuscript back.'
Page me45.474
In Most's manuscript, see Note 159. — 117
Page me45.474
†153 This is probably a reference to Dühring's Cursus der Philosophie als streng wissenschaftlicher Weltanschauung und Lebensgestaltung, Leipzig, 1875. Engels criticised the book in his Anti-Dühring (see present edition, Vol. 25, Part I, 'Philosophy'). — 118, 162, 180, 195
Page me45.474
†154 Johann Most's pamphlet Kapital und Arbeit. Ein populärer Auszug aus 'Das Kapital' von Karl Marx was originally published in Chemnitz in 1873. At Wilhelm Liebknecht's request, in early August 1875 Marx and Engels edited it for the second edition, which appeared in Chemnitz in April 1876. However, Marx and Engels did not consider it an adequate exposition of Capital and were able to correct only the major errors. For this reason, Marx demanded that his name should not figure on the title-page of the second edition. — 118, 125
Page me45.474
†155 The publication of Eugen Dühring's Cursus der Philosophie als streng wissenschaftlicher Weltanschauung und Lebensgestaltung and the second edition of his Kritische Geschichte der Nationalökonomie und des Sozialismus (1875) made his views very popular in Germany. Among the German Social-Democrats, he acquired such followers as Johann Most, Friedrich Wilhelm Fritzsche, and

Page Break me45.475
Eduard Bernstein. Even August Bebel came under his influence for a short time. In view of this, in his letters to Engels of 1 February and 21 April 1875, Liebknecht proposed that the latter use Der Volksstaat to criticise Dühring's views.
Page me45.475
Engels did so for the first time in the essay 'Prussian Schnapps in the German Reichstag' carried by Der Volksstaat in February 1876 (see present edition, Vol. 24).
Page me45.475
Marx agreed with Engels that Dühring's views had to be exposed to serious criticism. Engels interrupted the work on Dialectics of Nature which he had begun in May 1873 and made a start on Anti-Dühring (see present edition, Vol. 25). It took him over two years, from May 1876 to July 1878, to complete it. Part I of the book was mainly written between September 1876 and January 1877 and was printed in the Vorwärts as a series of articles under the heading Herrn Eugen Dühring's Umwälzung der Philosophie in January-May 1877.

Page me45.475

Part II was written in July-August 1877. Marx contributed Chapter X. This part was published under the heading Herrn Eugen Dühring's Umwälzung der politischen Oekonomie in the Wissenschaftliche Beilage and the supplement to the Vorwärts in July-December 1877.
Page me45.475

Part III was written mostly between August 1877 and April 1878 and appeared in the Vorwärts in May-July 1878 under the title Herrn Eugen Dühring's Umwälzung des Sozialismus.
Page me45.475

The book aroused strong resistance on the part of Dühring's followers. At a regular party congress held in Gotha from 27 to 29 May 1877, they tried to prevent the publication of Engels' work in the party's central organ. Anti-Dühring appeared in the newspaper with lengthy intervals.
Page me45.475

In July 1877, Part I of the book was published in Leipzig as a separate pamphlet. In July 1878, Parts II and III were also published there as a separate pamphlet. The first complete edition of Anti-Dühring, with Engels' preface, appeared at the same time.
Page me45.475

In late October 1878, following the introduction of the Anti-Socialist Law in Germany, Anti-Dühring was banned along with Engels' other works. — 118, 120, 122, 175, 201, 207, 218, 220, 227, 236, 249, 254, 258, 283, 289
Page me45.475
†156 On 22 (10) May 1876, Constantinople witnessed a mass demonstration of the softas, Moslem students of theology and constitutional law. One of their basic demands was the convocation of a representative body to approve the state budget. The Sultan was forced to meet some of the softas' demands. Specifically, he dismissed the Grand Vizier (Prime Minister) and the Sheikh ul Islam (head of the Moslem clergy). — 118, 123, 293
Page me45.475
†157 In July 1875, a national liberation uprising against Turkish rule flared up in Herzegovina. In August, it spread to Bosnia. It was the starting-point of the Eastern crisis of the 1870s which ultimately led to the war between Serbia and Montenegro on the one hand, and Turkey on the other (see Note 176) and eventually to the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78 (see Note 207). The war over, Austro-Hungarian troops entered Bosnia and Herzegovina under the Berlin Treaty (see Note 430); the uprising was suppressed. — 118
Page me45.475
†158 On 10 May 1876, Jenny, Marx's daughter, gave birth to a son, Jean Laurent Frédéric Longuet, who was called Johnny in the family. — 118
Page me45.475
†159 Johann Most's manuscript was a panegyric on Eugen Dühring's Cursus der Philosophie, which appeared in 1875. Most's article about Dühring was printed in September-October 1876 in the Berliner Freie Presse under the heading 'Ein Philosoph'. — 119, 122, 218

Page Break me45.476
Page me45.476
†160 Marx is probably referring to Dühring's opinion of Most's pamphlet Kapital und Arbeit (see Note 154) made in the second edition of his Kritische Geschichte der Nationalökonomie und des Socialismus, Berlin, 1875, p. 570. — 120
Page me45.476
†161 Marx is referring to Engels' work The Housing Question; its first and third parts contain criticism of Arthur Mülberger's articles which were reprinted under the general heading 'Die Wohnungsfrage' by Der Volksstaat in February-March 1872 from the Austrian workers' paper Volkswille (see present edition, Vol. 23). — 120
Page me45.476
†162 On 30 May 1876, a palace revolution overthrew Sultan Abdul Aziz and enthroned his nephew Prince Murad (Murad V) who had a reputation as reformer. On 4 June Abdul Aziz was assassinated. — 120
Page me45.476
†163 On 6 June 1876, the congress held in Copenhagen re-established the Danish Social-Democratic Workers' Party which had been originally founded in 1871 as a section of the International and dissolved by the government in 1872. Up to 1884, it was called the Social-Democratic League. The congress approved rules and a programme based on the principles of the Gotha Programme of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany (see Note 121). Louis Pio was elected chairman, and Paul Geleff the second chairman of the Executive. — 121
Page me45.476
†164 At the House of Commons sitting on 22 May 1876, one of the Irish M.P.s inquired of Prime Minister Disraeli whether the government intended to amnesty the Fenians who were still in prison. Disraeli stated that 15 Fenians remained imprisoned, and that the government had no intention of pardoning them since it regarded them as 'criminals and deserters'. The statement provoked a storm of indignation among the Irish M.P.s.
Page me45.476
The Fenians were Irish revolutionaries who had taken their name from the 'Féne', the ancient population of Ireland. Their first organisations appeared in the 1850s among the Irish immigrants in the USA, and later in Ireland itself. The secret Irish Revolutionary Brotherhood, as the organisation was known in the early 1860s, aimed at establishing an independent Irish republic by means of an armed uprising. The Fenians, who expressed the interests of the Irish peasantry, came chiefly from the urban petty bourgeoisie and intellectuals, and believed in conspiratorial tactics. The British government attempted to suppress the Fenian movement by severe police reprisals. In September 1865 it arrested a number of Fenian leaders, who were sentenced to long terms of imprisonment (O'Donovan Rossa received a life sentence). In 1867, following the abortive attempt at an uprising, hundreds of Irishmen were thrown into prison.
Page me45.476
Marx and Engels, who repeatedly pointed to the weak sides of the Fenian movement, their reliance on conspiracy and sectarian errors, nevertheless had a high regard for its revolutionary character and did their best to encourage it to embark on mass struggle and joint action with the English working class.

Page me45.476
In the 1870s, the Fenian movement declined. — 121
Page me45.476
†165 In his letter of 16 May 1876, Wilhelm Liebknecht warned Engels that he and his friends had reason to suspect Dmitry Richter of espionage. Later the suspicions were proved to be unfounded (see this volume, pp. 155-59). — 121, 126, 127
Page me45.476
†166 The German diplomat Count Harry von Arnim, who had been ambassador to France since 1872, was recalled from Paris in April 1874 for obstructing Bismarck's policies. On his departure, he took with him important documents from the embassy archives. This caused his arrest in Germany in October 1874 and in December he was sentenced to three months in prison by a Berlin court. On 24 June 1875, the Supreme Court (Kammergericht) prolonged his term to nine months, but in the meantime Arnim had departed for Switzerland for medical treatment. Since he refused to return to Prussia, a warrant for his arrest was issued on 16 May 1876, no matter what his whereabouts. On 21 May the warrant was carried by the Berlin press and reprinted by other German newspapers in the course of the next few days. — 121

Page Break me45.477
Page me45.477
†167 This is probably a reference to Eugen Dühring's Cursus der National- und Socialökonomie einschliesslich der Hauptpunkte der Finanzpolitik. Engels made a thorough critical analysis of this work in Anti-Dühring, notably in Part II entitled 'Political Economy' (see present edition, Vol. 25). — 122
Page me45.477
†168 A reference to the Berlin Memorandum of Russia, Austria-Hungary and Germany, to which France and Italy also acceded. It was drawn up on 13 May 1876 by the representatives of the three states: Gorchakov, Andrássy and Bismarck. The Berlin Memorandum, which was addressed to the Turkish government on the occasion of the uprising in Bosnia and Herzegovina (see Note 157), demanded that a two-month truce be concluded with the insurgents. The Memorandum was to be handed to the Turkish government on 30 May, but the plan was not carried through due to the palace revolution in Constantinople on that same day (see Note 162). — 123
Page me45.477
†169 Engels is referring to Dialectics of Nature, which he began in May 1873 and, having written the 'Introduction' and drafted about a hundred notes and fragments, had to interrupt work on it in May 1876 to write Anti-Dühring (see Note 155). After Anti-Dühring had been completed and published, Engels returned to Dialectics of Nature in mid-1878 but had to interrupt it again in order to prepare for the press the manuscripts of the second and third volumes of Capital following the death of Marx. Dialectics of Nature remained unfinished (see present edition, Vol. 25). — 124, 254, 420
Page me45.477
†170 Darwin's main work, On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection, or the Preservation of Favoured Races in the Struggle for Life, appeared in 1859. — 124

Page me45.477
†171 Marx wrote on the envelope of this letter: 'Mr. F.A. Sorge, Bez. 101, Hoboken, N.J., via New York (U. States), per next steamer.' The date has been established by the postmark. — 124
Page me45.477
†172 In a letter of 4 April 1876 (see this volume, p. 115), Marx requested Sorge to send him the articles published by the New-York Tribune of which he was the author. In his reply of 2 June 1876, Sorge wrote that Kugelmann had asked several months earlier for these articles to be included in Marx's complete works planned by the Hamburg publisher Otto Meissner. Sorge had received this information from Livingstone, who kept the articles from the Tribune after Hermann Meyer's death. Livingstone refused to send them to Kugelmann without Marx's knowledge. — 125
Page me45.477
†173 This letter was written on a postcard (the original is kept at the Karl-Marx-Haus in Trier). The date has been established by the postmark. — 125
Page me45.477
†174 Engels is probably referring to his trip to Heidelberg with his wife Lizzie on 24 June 1876 to fetch Mary Ellen Burns, his wife's niece, from her boarding house for a holiday (see also this volume, pp. 115-16). — 129
Page me45.477
†175 Engels was on holiday in Ramsgate between 24 July and 1 September 1876. In early August, he and his wife took Mary Ellen Burns back to her boarding house as her holidays were over. On 5 August, he returned to Ramsgate. — 130, 131, 133, 134, 135, 138, 140

Page Break me45.478
Page me45.478
†176 In late June 1876, Serbia and Montenegro declared war on Turkey in support of the popular uprising which had flared up in Bosnia and Herzegovina in the summer of 1875 (see Note 157). However, the ill-prepared offensive of the Serbian army was halted as soon as early July and, after its defeat had opened up the road to Belgrade for the Turkish troops, Russia categorically demanded the immediate cessation of hostilities against Serbia and Montenegro and an armistice. After a ceasefire lasting six weeks, in February 1877 Turkey and Serbia signed a peace treaty on the terms of status quo ante.
Page me45.478
In 31 March 1877, a conference of European powers in London issued a protocol that enjoined Turkey to conclude a peace treaty with Montenegro, cease its arms build-up, etc. Turkey having rejected the Russian ultimatum to comply with the London Protocol, Russia declared war on it on 24 (12) April 1877, and Montenegro became a Russian ally. — 130, 140, 177, 237, 255, 296
Page me45.478
†177 From 1874, Charles Longuet taught French at the King's College in London, and Jenny Longuet — German at Clement Dun's school. In 1880, after the Paris Commune members had been amnestied, Longuet returned to Paris. — 132, 378, 391, 447
Page me45.478

†178 Between 15 August and 15 September 1876, Marx, accompanied by his daughter Eleanor (Tussy), was in Karlsbad taking a cure for the third time. Having completed it, he spent a few days with Max Oppenheim in Prague, and then, after brief visits to Kreuznach and Liége, returned to London on 22 September 1876. — 132, 135, 139, 141, 142, 144, 145, 146, 148, 154, 440, 442
Page me45.478
†179 Marx gives an account of the resolution passed at the meeting held after Bakunin's funeral on 3 July 1876.
Page me45.478
The anarchist congress (the so-called sixth general congress of the International Working Men's Association) held in Geneva from 1 to 6 September 1873 approved new Rules for the Bakuninist International. Article 3 declared complete autonomy of the federations and sections of the Association. — 132
Page me45.478
†180 Marx and his daughter Eleanor spent a few days in Brighton in March 1873. — 132
Page me45.478
†181 Engels is referring to the poem 'Die hochdeutsche Nähdersmädle' included in a selection written in the Palatinate dialect: K.G. Nadler, Fröhlich Palz, Gott erhalts!, Frankfurt a.M., 1851, p. 144. Engels used this book in his work The Frankish Period (see present edition, Vol. 26, pp. 81-107). — 133
Page me45.478
†182 Engels probably means, above all, the poem 'Herr Christoph Hachstrumpf...” in Nadler's book (see Note 181). — 133
Page me45.478
†183 In his letter to Engels of 7 August 1876, Lavrov stated that a young man, a Russian socialist residing in Berlin and corresponding with German Social-Democrats and Russian socialists (Grigory Gurevich), had carelessly allowed some letters addressed to him, including letters from Liebknecht, to be opened at the post office, after which they had fallen into the hands of the police. On 6 August, Lavrov received a letter from one Dekhterev in Leipzig, who informed him, allegedly on behalf of the German Social-Democrats, that a certain Chernyshev had been despatched to Berlin to investigate this matter (see this volume, p. 147). — 134

Page Break me45.479
Page me45.479
†184 The Wagner Festival Opera House opened at Bayreuth with a performance of Wagner's tetralogy Der Ring des Nibelungen (see Note 190) on 13-17 August 1876. — 135
Page me45.479
†185 'The music of the future' — Richard Wagner's music, whose principles he expounded in his Zukunftmusik. Brief an einem französischen Freund (1861) addressed to Frédéric Villot, keeper of the French museums, and in his book Das Kunstwerk der Zukunft. — 137, 192, 443
Page me45.479

†186 This law also known as Prussian Law (Allgemeines Landrecht für die Preussischen Staaten) was promulgated in 1794. It included criminal, state, civil, administrative and ecclesiastical law and bore the distinct imprint of obsolete feudal legal standards.
Page me45.479
After the annexation of the Rhine Province to Prussia in 1815, the Prussian government tried to introduce Prussian Law into various legal spheres there to replace the French bourgeois codes in force in the province. This was done by introducing a series of laws, edicts and instructions aimed at restoring the feudal privileges of the nobility (primogeniture), Prussian criminal and marriage law, etc. These measures were resolutely opposed in the province and were repealed after the March revolution by special decrees issued on 15 April 1848. — 140
Page me45.479
†187 In April 1876, a national liberation uprising began in Bulgaria. It was brutely suppressed by Turkish troops in May. The press in many countries expressed its indignation at the 'Turkish atrocities'. — 140, 158, 168, 183, 447
Page me45.479
†188 On 12 August 1876, Disraeli was made Earl of Beaconsfield, and from that moment on became leader of the Tories in the House of Lords. — 140
Page me45.479
†189 Probably a slip of the pen: Jenny Marx arrived in Ramsgate on Wednesday, 23 August (see this volume, p. 139). — 141
Page me45.479
†190 Der Ring des Nibelungen — a cycle of four operas by Richard Wagner: Das Rheingold, Die Walküre, Siegfried and Die Götterdämmerung. — 143
Page me45.479
†191 Marx is referring to the report of the second congress of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany held in Gotha from 19 to 23 August 1876. It was printed in Der Volksstaat, Nos 98-102, from 23 August to 1 September in the section 'Kongress der Sozialisten Deutschlands'. This particular reference is to the part of the report featured by Der Volksstaat, No. 102 on 1 September. Reporting on the debate with Dühring, its author, Julius Motteler, mistakenly mentioned Marx instead of Engels. Wilhelm Liebknecht rectified the misunderstanding in his letter to Marx of 9 October 1876. — 154
Page me45.479
†192 The Berne anarchists sent an invitation to the Gotha Congress of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany held in August 1876 to take part in their congress to be convened that October. The anarchists expressed their hope for a 'reconciliation' and co-operation with the German Social-Democrats. However, as Liebknecht wrote to Marx on 9 October, the Gotha Congress turned down the proposal that official representatives be sent to Berne. Julius Vahlteich was present at the anarchist congress as a guest from Germany (see Note 200). — 154, 157, 184
Page me45.479
†193 From 1869 onwards, Bakunin and his followers, who had set up their own secret organisation, the Alliance of Socialist Democracy (see Note 201), within the International, sought to take over the leadership of the IWMA and to replace its programme with their own. Following the Hague Congress of 1872 (see Note 20), the anarchists openly advocated a split in the International. Beginning in 1873, they endeavoured to unite the socialist organisations of various countries under their supremacy with a view to 'restoring' the International. These attempts suffered a fiasco at the international socialist congress in Ghent in 1877 (see Note 324). — 155, 247

Page Break me45.480

Page me45.480
†194 Considering it very important to familiarise workers with the true history of the Paris Commune, Marx became actively involved in the commissioning of a German translation of a book written by one of its members, Prosper Olivier Lissagaray, Histoire de la Commune de 1871. He requested Wilhelm Bracke, and Engels asked Wilhelm Blos to find somebody to do the job. The sample translation done by Julius Grunzig failed to satisfy Marx, as did that by Isolde Kurz. Although Marx was already overburdened with work, he had to spend a great deal of time and effort editing the translation. In the autumn of 1877, on Marx's and Engels' proposal, Wilhelm Blos was recruited as another editor. Lissagaray's book appeared in German in Brunswick late in 1877. — 155, 172, 189, 196, 222, 230, 262, 266, 285
Page me45.480
†195 The general socialist congress held in Gotha from 19 to 23 August 1876 decided, at its meeting of 23 August, to publish a single organ of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany, Vorwärts, that was to replace Der Volksstaat and Der Neue Social-Demokrat. The congress elected Wilhelm Liebknecht and Wilhelm Hasenclever editors of the new paper, which was to appear from 1 October. — 155
Page me45.480
†196 Complying with Marx's request, Liebknecht wrote a long article, 'Die Schande Europas', which was carried by the Vorwärts, No. 6, 13 October 1876. — 155
Page me45.480
†197 The reference is to the mass electoral reform movement in England in 1865-67 The programme of the movement, led by the Reform League (its leading bodies included members of the General Council of the International), bore the direct influence of Marx's ideas. He favoured an independent position of the English working class in the reform campaign. Unlike the bourgeois parties, which confined their demands to voting rights for householders and tenants, the Reform League, on the insistence of the General Council, demanded manhood suffrage. However, the vacillations of bourgeois radicals and the conciliatory policies of trade union leaders allowed the English bourgeoisie to split the movement and prevent implementation of the measures proposed by the General Council. In the end, in 1867 a reform was introduced that granted suffrage only to the petty bourgeoisie and the top strata of workers. — 156, 158
Page me45.480
†198 The German original of the letter has not been found. — 157
Page me45.480
†199 Marx's apprehension had been aroused by the fact that Leo Frankel was not released from Budapest prison until 27 March 1876 (see Note 144), and the Hungarian authorities had a chance to keep him under secret surveillance and intercept his correspondence. — 157
Page me45.480

†200 On the proposal of the anarchist Jura Federation, which withdrew from the International since it refused to recognise the resolutions of the Hague Congress (see Note 20), a congress of representatives of some workers' and socialist organisations (mostly anarchist and Proudhonist) took place in Berne from 26 to 30 October 1876. Since the International Working Men's Association had officially ceased to exist by decision of the conference held in Philadelphia in the summer of 1876, one of the issues discussed in Berne was the so-called solidarity pact that, or so the congress organisers hoped, would resurrect the International on the basis of their programme. In this connection, the participants in the Berne congress made an attempt to involve representatives of the German Social-Democrats in its work (see Note 192). A decision on this question was postponed until the next congress. However, the international socialist congress convened in Ghent in 1877 (see Note 324) turned down the anarchists' proposals and confirmed the resolutions of the Hague Congress. — 157, 166, 173, 184

Page Break me45.481

Page me45.481

†201 The Alliance of Socialist Democracy was founded by Mikhail Bakunin in Geneva in October 1868 as an international anarchist organisation which incorporated the secret conspiratorial organisation he had set up earlier in Italy (see Note 266). The Alliance had sections in Italy, Spain, Switzerland and in the south of France. In 1869, it applied to the General Council of the International Working Men's Association for admission. The General Council agreed to admit the sections to the International on condition that the Alliance was disbanded as an independent organisation. Having joined the International, Bakunin to all intents and purposes ignored this decision and incorporated the Alliance into the International under the guise of a Geneva Section (called the 'Alliance of Socialist Democracy. Central Section'). Marx, Engels and the General Council resolutely opposed the Alliance, exposing it as a sect hostile to the working-class movement which sought to split it and obstruct its independent development. At the Hague Congress of the International (1872), the Bakuninists sustained a shattering blow. Bakunin and Guillaume, the leaders of the Alliance, were expelled from the International. — 157, 172, 200, 210, 257

Page me45.481

†202 In his letter to Marx of 9 October 1876, Leo Frankel wrote that he had heard rumours about the forthcoming unity congress in Switzerland (see Note 200) at which Marx's and Lassalle's followers were to be present, and asked what his attitude to the congress should be. — 157

Page me45.481

†203 This note was written by Engels on Dronke's letter of 13 October 1876, in which Dronke requested Engels to help him obtain a loan of £150 to ease his precarious financial position. — 159, 160, 161

Page me45.481

†204 Also extant are a few lines of the letter's rough draft: “... her warm glowing heart was always open for the wrongs and woes of humankind; she felt for the oppressed, the struggling, the lowly. How deep, how bitter must be your sorrow, your solitude and loneliness!...” — 159

Page me45.481
†205 In connection with the Vogt affair Marx had four statements printed in the Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung: 1) 'Letter to the Editor of the Allgemeine Zeitung' (No. 300, 27 October 1859); 2) 'Declaration' to the Editorial Board of the Allgemeine Zeitung' (supplement to No. 325, 21 November 1859); 3) 'To the Editors of the Volks-Zeitung' (supplement to No. 48, 17 February 1860); and 4) 'Declaration' to the Editorial Boards of the Allgemeine Zeitung and other German Newspapers (supplement to No. 336, 1 December 1860). See present edition, Vol. 17, pp. 3, 8-9, 12-13 and 19-20). — 162
Page me45.481
†206 Eugen Dühring's review of the first volume of Capital was printed in December 1867 by the Hildburghausen monthly Ergänzungsblätter zur Kenntniß der Gegenwart, Vol. III, 3rd issue, pp. 182-86. In early January 1868, Kugelmann sent Dühring's review to Marx. Engels used it when working on Anti-Dühring (see present edition, Vol. 25). — 162

Page Break me45.482
Page me45.482
†207 Engels' forecast based on an in-depth analysis of European policy in the Levant proved correct. The Russo-Turkish war began on 24 April 1877 and ended in defeat for Turkey. On 3 March 1878, the preliminary San Stefano Treaty (see Note 430) was signed, which granted complete sovereignty to Serbia, Montenegro and Romania. — 163, 182, 191, 192, 216, 222
Page me45.482
†208 Part of this letter was published by Lavrov in Vperyod! (Forward!), No. 44 on 1 November 1876. — 163
Page me45.482
†209 Engels drafted this letter on the back of Ernst Dronke's letter to him of 31 October 1876, in which Dronke requested him to be his guarantor for the receipt of a £200 loan (see also Note 203). — 164
Page me45.482
†210 Engels left the Ermen & Engels firm on 30 June 1869. — 165
Page me45.482
†211 Marx is referring to the talks with Wilhelm Blos. On 16 November 1876 Blos accepted Engels' proposal that he translate Lissagaray's Histoire de la Commune de 1871 (Engels' letter has not been found). However, on 14 November Wilhelm Bracke wrote to Engels that he had already found a translator (Isolde Kurz) (see Note 194). — 166
Page me45.482
†212 A reference to the Khiva military expedition undertaken by K.P. Kaufmann, Turkestan's Governor-General. In the course of the campaign against the Khiva Khanate launched in March 1873, it was conquered by the Russian army, which ruthlessly exterminated the nomadic Turkmen tribes that put up resistance. — 168
Page me45.482
†213 On 18 July 1873, K.P. Kaufmann, Governor-General of Turkestan, gave the order to General Golovachev to exterminate the Turkmen tribe of Jomuds who refused to submit to the conquerors of the Khiva Khanate. The English translation of the order was published by Eugene Schuyler, American Consul in Constantinople, in the book

Turkistan. Notes of a Journey in Russian Turkistan, Khokand, Bukhara, and Kuldja, London, 1876. — 168
Page me45.482
†214 Following the Daily News publication of letters that cast doubt on the authenticity of Kaufmann's order to Golovachev, Eugene Schuyler had a letter published in The Times on 16 November 1876. The author stated that he had seen the original document and reminded readers that the extracts quoted by the Russky mir magazine (2-14 February 1875) and by The Times (6 April 1875) in the report marked 'Hamburg, 25. März' had not been disputed at the time. — 169
Page me45.482
†215 The reference is to the national insurrection which began in January 1863 in the Polish lands belonging to Tsarist Russia. The insurrection of 1863-64 stemmed from the Poles' efforts to gain national independence and was provoked by oppression on the part of the Tsarist government. The National Committee which led the insurrection advanced a programme of action for Polish independence and put forward demands of an agrarian-democratic character. But the insurgent government showed insufficient resolve and a lack of consistency, not daring to infringe on the privileges of big landowners. This repelled the bulk of the peasantry and was one reason why the insurrection failed.
Page me45.482
Grave damage was also done by the hopes of the national movement's Right wing for assistance from the ruling circles of Bonapartist France and from bourgeois-aristocratic Britain, both of which were pursuing self-seeking ends that were entirely alien to Poland's national interests.
Page me45.482
The Polish insurrection had been suppressed by the Russian government by the autumn of 1863, but isolated insurgent units fought on until the end of 1864.

Page Break me45.483
Page me45.483
The Polish insurrection was vigorously supported by democrats in Russia and Western Europe. — 169
Page me45.483
†216 Engels wrote this draft letter on the back of Ernst Dronke's letter to him of 12 November 1876. Dronke proposed that he himself should make the payments on the policy he had given Engels as security for the money he had been advanced (see Engels' letter to Dronke of 1 November 1876, this volume, p. 165). Dronke also promised that the annual payments on the policy would be made on 22 November. — 171
Page me45.483
†217 Marx is referring to James Guillaume's letter which Bracke had forwarded to him enclosed in his own letter to Marx of 14 November 1876. — 172
Page me45.483
†218 Wilhelm Bracke, who believed that the working class can succeed only through an alliance with the peasantry, was actively engaged in agitation among the latter in the 1870s. At the German Reichstag elections of 10 January 1877 (see Note 237), he was nominated at the Brunswick 1st electoral district and was supported by a large number of rural voters. He lost the main elections but won the by-elections in the Glauchau-Meerane district on 22 February. — 172

Page me45.483
†219 The circular of the Central Committee of the German-language sections to the Zurich section, drawn up by Johann Philipp Becker, was published as pamphlets in German and French in Zurich in October 1876 (see Note 231). It criticised the proposal advanced by the Zurich section of the International to take part in the anarchist congress in Berne scheduled for October of that year (see Note 200). — 173, 200
Page me45.483
†220 The first congress of the Portuguese workers was held in Lisbon from 1 to 4 February 1877. It gave the final shape to the Portuguese Socialist Party founded in 1875, adopted party rules and a programme drawn up along the lines of the Gotha Programme of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany see Note 73), and elected a Central Committee. At the request of Azedo Gnecco, made in his letter to Engels of 21 January 1877, in late January Marx and Engels sent a letter of greetings to the congress also signed by Friedrich Lessner, Paul Lafargue and Maltman Barry. The congress received another such letter from the leadership of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany. Engels appraised the work of the congress in his essay 'The Workingmen of Europe in 1877' (present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 216-17).
Page me45.483
Johann Philipp Becker had a note on the forthcoming congress of the Portuguese socialists published in Die Tagwacht, No. 96, 2 December 1876.
Page me45.483
The letter of greetings to the congress signed by Marx, Engels, Lessner, Lafargue and Barry has not been found. — 174
Page me45.483
†221 The rough draft was written on the back of Rasch's letter to Engels of 13 November 1876. — 175
Page me45.483
†222 In 1876, a polemic between Gustav Rasch and Karl Heinrich Schaible began in the Vorwärts. It was triggered off by Rasch's article 'Deutsche Flüchtlinge in London', carried by Der Volksstaat, No. 88, 30 July 1876, and Schaible's 'Antwort eines Deutschen auf Gustav Rasch's “Deutsche Flüchtlinge in London”', which appeared in the Vorwärts, No. 19, 12 November of the same year. On 13 November Rasch wrote to Engels requesting information about relations between Schaible and Blind and the former's behaviour during Marx's campaign against Vogt. Rasch wrote that the notes he wanted from Engels would be used in his reply to Schaible's article.
Page me45.483
Rasch used Engels' reply in the article 'Antwort eines Deutschen auf Gustav

Page Break me45.484
Rasch's “Deutsche Flüchtlinge in London”' printed by the Vorwärts, No. 5, 12 January 1877. Without mentioning the source, Rasch quoted in full the part of Engels' letter dealing with Blind and Schaible. — 175
Page me45.484

†223 Engels is suggesting that in his article 'Deutsche Flüchtlinge in London', printed by Der Volksstaat on 30 July 1876, Gustav Rasch was prevaricating when he wrote that during his encounter with Marx and Engels in London they discussed 'human rights, the autonomy of nations, the social republic and those executed in Baden'. — 177
Page me45.484
†224 The address on the envelope is in Marx's hand: 'C.D. Collet, Esq., Sunny Bank Highgate'. — 178
Page me45.484
†225 On 8 December 1876, St James' Hall in London was the venue for the national conference on the Eastern Question. Its chief organisers came from the Liberal Party. — 178, 179
Page me45.484
†226 An extract from this letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx, On History and People. Arranged and edited, with an introduction and new translations, by Saul K. Padover, McGraw-Hill Book Company, New York, [1977]. — 179
Page me45.484
†227 Probably a reference to Georg Hanssen's work Die Gehöferschaften (Erbgenossenschaften) im Regierungsbezirk Trier published in Berlin in 1863 as a separate pamphlet. Engels used this work in Anti-Dühring (see present edition, Vol. 25, pp. 150 and 296). — 179
Page me45.484
†228 Engels then goes on to retell and quote a letter from one of the editors of the Frankfurter Zeitung, Eduard Sarny, of 5 September 1876, which was a reply to Engels' inquiry, most probably to Leopold Sonnemann, made on 2 September 1876. — 180
Page me45.484
†229 Devanagari — the character in which Sanskrit is usually written and printed. — 181
Page me45.484
†230 Engels is referring to the Constantinople Conference of Ambassadors of European States that took place between 11 and 23 December 1876. Its participants agreed to demand that Turkey grant autonomy to Bosnia, Herzegovina and Bulgaria. — 182
Page me45.484
†231 Johann Philipp Becker evidently sent Engels two copies of the circular 'Association Internationale des travailleurs. Réponse du Comité central des sections de langue allemande en Suisse á une lettre de la section de Zurich, concernant le congrés international de la secte des antiautoritaires, du 26 October 1876 á Berne'. Engels received the German edition of the pamphlet containing this circular in October or November 1876 (see Note 219). — 183
Page me45.484
†232 On 25 and 26 December 1872, Brussels was the venue for the congress of the International's Belgian Federation, at which the Bakuninists and Proudhonists had the majority. The congress rejected the resolutions of the Hague Congress (see Note 20) and declared its refusal to maintain relations with the General Council in New York. It further decided to accede to the resolutions passed by the international anarchist congress in St Imier (15 September 1872), which had openly declared a split in the International. In a resolution passed on 30 May 1873, the General Council stated that the Belgian Federation had thus placed itself outside the International Working Men's Association. — 184

Page me45.484
†233 The resolution to dissolve the General Council and the International Working Men's Association was adopted at the latter's conference held in Philadelphia on 15 July 1876. The documents of the conference were published as a pamphlet entitled Internationale Arbeiter-Association. Verhandlungen der Delegirten-Konferenz zu Philadelphia, 15. Juli 1876, New York, 1876. — 184

Page Break me45.485
Page me45.485
†234 This letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx, F. Engels, V.I. Lenin, The Communist View on Morality, Novosti Press Agency Publishing House, Moscow, 1974. — 185
Page me45.485
†235 This letter was written at Nikolai Utin's request and based on information received from him. Referring to the important services rendered to the party by Tomanovskaya, Marx meant her activities as a member of the Russian section of the International and her participation in the Paris Commune. — 185
Page me45.485
†236 The second page of the original letter is missing. The penultimate paragraph of this letter is published according to the text quoted by Wilhelm Liebknecht in an item printed by the Vorwärts, No. 8, 19 January 1877, in the section 'Sozialpolitische Uebersicht'. He introduced the quotation with the following note: 'A competent person writes to us in a private letter about the present state of the Eastern Question.' — 186
Page me45.485
†237 Regular elections to the German Reichstag were held on 10 January 1877. About half a million votes were cast for the socialist candidates of whom 12 were actually elected (see also Note 248). — 186, 188, 190, 192, 197, 294, 447
Page me45.485
†238 General conscription was introduced in Russia on 1 January 1874. — 186, 187
Page me45.485
†239 A 'sick man' — an expression used by Nicholas I with reference to Turkey in the talks of 9 January 1853 and in subsequent negotiations with George Hamilton Seymour, the British envoy. — 191, 272
Page me45.485
†240 In one of his toasts (Tischreden) Martin Luther likened the world to a drunken peasant unable to mount a horse (D. Martin Luthers Werke, kritische Gesamtausgabe, Tischreden, Weimar, 1912, Bd. I, S. 298). — 191
Page me45.485
†241 Nikolaus Delius' article 'Die epischen Elemente in Shakespeare's Dramen' appeared in 1877 in the Jahrbuch der Deutschen Shakespeare-Gesellschaft. Translated into English by Eleanor Marx, it was included in the transactions of the New Shakespeare Society. — 191, 273, 446
Page me45.485

†242 In his reply of 29 July 1877, Freund informed Marx of the book's title: G. Rümelin, Shakespearestudien, 2. Aufl., Stuttgart, 1874. — 192
Page me45.485
†243 Marx is referring to M. Traube's principal achievement, the creation of 'artificial cells' (see Note 97). — 192
Page me45.485
†244 The Inner Temple — one of the Inns of Court in London, four legal societies having exclusive right of admitting persons to practise at bar. — 192
Page me45.485
†245 Gabriel Deville intended to prepare for the press and publish in France an exposition of the first volume of Capital. But he was able to accomplish this only in 1883, after Marx's death. Deville's book Le Capital de Karl Marx. Résumé et accompagné d'un aperçu sur le socialisme scientifique appeared in several editions in Paris in 'La bibliothéque socialiste' series. — 193
Page me45.485
†246 In January 1877, Wilhelm Liebknecht was in Offenbach where he was nominated for the second ballot to the German Reichstag (see also Note 237). — 194
Page me45.485
†247 Engels' work Wilhelm Wolff was printed in June-November 1876 in Die Neue Welt of which Wilhelm Liebknecht was the editor (see present edition, Vol. 24). — 195

Page Break me45.486
Page me45.486
†248 After the elections to the German Reichstag held on 10 January 1877 (see Note 237), a second ballot took place in a number of constituencies. As a result, three more Social-Democratic deputies were elected (in addition to the nine who had been successful at the first ballot): August Bebel (later replaced by Wilhelm Bracke), August Kapell and Moritz Rittinghausen. — 195
Page me45.486
†249 From about 20 February to 17 March and in the second half of May 1877, Engels stayed in Brighton with his sick wife. — 197, 198, 204, 207, 215, 232
Page me45.486
†250 Engels' letter to Enrico Bignami of 13 February dealing with the results of the elections to the German Reichstag of 10 January 1877 (see Note 237), was read out at the congress of the Federation of Northern Italy (see Note 252) and then published in La Plebe, No. 7, 26 February 1877. See Engels' 'Letter to Enrico Bignami on the German Elections of 1877' (present edition, Vol. 24). — 198
Page me45.486
†251 On 20 February Engels received La Plebe of 7 and 21 January and 16 February 1877. — 198
Page me45.486
†252 The second congress of the International's Federation of Northern Italy was held in Milan on 17 and 18 February 1877. On the significance of the congress, see Engels' article 'From Italy' (present edition, Vol. 24). — 200
Page me45.486

†253 Neuchâtel (Switzerland) was the place of residence of James Guillaume who, after Mikhail Bakunin's death in 1876 headed the international anarchist alliance (see also Note 193). — 200
Page me45.486
†254 Marx means the editing of the German translation of Prosper Olivier Lissagaray's Histoire de la Commune de 1871, which occupied him between October 1876 and August 1877 (for details, see Note 194). — 201, 269, 270, 285
Page me45.486
†255 The International's Rules were adopted by the Central (General) Council on 1 November 1864 and finally approved by the Geneva Congress on 5 September 1866 (see present edition, Vol. 20). — 203
Page me45.486
†256 On 26 February 1877, La Plebe published three resolutions passed by the second congress of the Federation of Northern Italy under the heading of 'Congresso Socialista di Milano'. Marx is referring to Resolution III. — 203
Page me45.486
†257 Engels used the article 'Congresso Socialista di Milano' carried by La Plebe when working on his article 'From Italy' published by the Vorwärts, No. 32, 16 March 1877 (see present edition, Vol. 24). — 203, 207
Page me45.486
†258 Enclosed in Marx's letter to Engels of 5 March 1877 were Marx's 'Randnoten zu Dührings Kritische Geschichte der Nationalökonomie'. The manuscript, which contains a critical analysis of the first three sections of the second edition of Dühring's book, was used by Engels as the basis for Chapter X, 'From Kritische Geschichte', of Part II of his Anti-Dühring (see present edition, Vol. 25, pp. 211-43). — 203, 205, 206, 207, 264
Page me45.486
†259 In February and March 1877, Marx provided the English journalist Maltman Barry with advice and materials. Barry was working on essays dealing with Gladstone's foreign policy that were published by several conservative papers. The Vanity Fair of 3 March 1877, for example, carried Barry's article 'Mr. Gladstone', and of 10 March its sequel, 'The Great Agitator Unmasked'. — 206, 209
Page me45.486
†260 The Physiocrats — followers of a trend in the classical bourgeois political economy that arose in France in the mid-18th century. The Physiocrats held Nature to be the only source of wealth, and agriculture the only sphere of the economy where value was created. Although they underestimated the role of industry and commerce, the Physiocrats made an important contribution to economic science by shifting the search for the origins of surplus value from circulation to production, thereby laying the basis for the analysis of capitalist production. Advocates of large-scale capitalist farming, they exposed the moribund nature of the feudal economy, thus paving the way ideologically for the bourgeois revolution in France. Marx gave a critical analysis of the Physiocrats' views in the Theories of Surplus Value, the central section of the Economic Manuscript of 1861-63 (see present edition, Vol. 30, pp. 352-76). — 208, 452

Page Break me45.487

Page me45.487
†261 The Tableau économique — François Quesnay's chart of the reproduction and circulation of the total social product — was first published as a short pamphlet in Versailles in 1758. Marx used Quesnay's Analyse du Tableau économique (first printed in 1766) contained in Eugéne Daire's edition of Physiocrates. Premiére partie, Paris, 1846. Marx made an in-depth study of the Tableau économique in the Economic Manuscript of 1861-63 (see present edition, Vol. 31, pp. 204-40), in Chapter X of Part II of Anti-Dühring (ibid., Vol. 25, pp. 211-43), and in Capital, Volume Two, Chapter XIX (ibid., Vol. 36). — 208, 262
Page me45.487
†262 In his article 'Russian Policy and Deeds in Turkestan', published in The Contemporary Review (Vol. XXVIII) in November 1876, Gladstone described the political line pursued by the Russian government as one 'of marked moderation and prudence'. In his opinion, it presented no threat to British rule in India. Maltman Barry's article 'Mr. Gladstone and Russian Intrigue', written with Marx's assistance and printed by the Whitehall Review on 3 February 1877, subjected Gladstone's views to a critical analysis. — 209
Page me45.487
†263 On 4 September 1870, the people of Paris launched an uprising that overthrew the Second Empire and established a republic headed by the bourgeois Government of National Defence. On 12 September 1870, Thiers, its head, left for London whence he intended to travel to St Petersburg and Vienna. The purpose of the tour was to convince the governments of the three countries of the 'loyalty' of the French republican government (see K. Marx, The Civil War in France, present edition, Vol. 22, pp. 311-12). — 210
Page me45.487
†264 At Marx's request, Pyotr Lavrov compiled a résumé of judicial and police persecution in Russia, which Marx passed on to the Irish M.P. Keyes O'Clery. The latter used the information in his speeches delivered in the House of Commons on 3 and 14 May 1877 (see MEGA2, Erste Abteilung, Band 25, S. 462).
Page me45.487
Pyotr Lavrov also wrote an article in French entitled 'La justice en Russie', which Marx helped to get printed in the British weekly Vanity Fair on 14 April 1877. — 211, 213, 217, 221
Page me45.487
†265 As is seen from Danielson's letter of 7(19) March 1877, he sent Marx the following books: A. Vasilchikov, Landownership and Agriculture in Russia and Other European States, vols I-II, St. Petersburg, 1876; P.A. Sokolovsky, Essays in the History of the Village Commune in the North of Russia, St Petersburg, 1877; V. Ya. Bunyakovsky, Anthropobiological Researches as They Apply to Russia's Male Population, St Petersburg, 1874; Statistical Chronicle of the Russian Empire and A Collection of Materials Concerning the Artels in Russia, issues I-III (all in Russian). See also Note 68. — 213

Page Break me45.488
Page me45.488

†266 In 1864, Mikhail Bakunin set up the secret anarchist Alliance de la démocratie sociale in Florence. Later, Frenchmen, Poles and others also became its members. The International Brethren formed the kernel of the Alliance, its 'élite'. In 1868, this secret organisation founded the semi-legal Bakuninist Alliance de la démocratie socialiste (see Note 201). — 214
Page me45.488
†267 Marx wrote this on a postcard. The address on the back is also in his hand: 'M.P. Lawroff, 21, Alfred Place, Tottenham Court Road. W.'. — 216, 217, 225
Page me45.488
†268 In his letter to Marx of 9 April 1877 Wilhelm Bracke wrote the following concerning the publication of the German translation of Lissagaray's Histoire de la Commune de 1871 (see notes 194 and 211) that was being prepared at the time: 'I have, as you will see, thought up the title myself, but must admit that I don't like it. What I find particularly displeasing is the note that Lissagaray corrected the text beforehand.' — 217
Page me45.488
†269 A reference to the campaign that preceded the elections to the German Reichstag held on 10 January 1877 (see also notes 237, 246 and 248). — 218
Page me45.488
†270 Having squandered the money collected for party purposes, Louis Pio and Paul Geleff, leaders of the Danish Social-Democratic Party, secretly left Denmark on 23 March 1877 and settled in the USA (see present edition, Vol. 24, p. 219). — 221
Page me45.488
†271 A reference to the portrait of Marx in the French edition of the first volume of Capital (see this volume, p. 287). — 223, 227
Page me45.488
†272 In March 1877, the Romanian government agreed to let Russian troops pass through its territory. On 24 April Russia declared war on Turkey. — 223, 228, 237
Page me45.488
†273 Cordeliers — members of a political club founded at the time of the French Revolution in Paris in 1790. Officially known as the Society of the Friends of the Rights of Man and the Citizen, this club got its other name from the old convent of the Franciscan friars called Cordeliers (from the knotted cord worn as a girdle) in which it held its meetings. Among its members were such prominent revolutionaries as Georges Danton and Camille Desmoulins. Initially, the Cordeliers supported Robespierre and later the left-wing revolutionaries, the Hébertists. In 1794 the latter tried to instigate an uprising against Robespierre's followers. The attempt failed, and the club ceased to exist. — 224
Page me45.488
†274 The Lyceum Theatre — a drama theatre in London. — 226
Page me45.488
†275 In Mid-June 1877, Engels wrote a short biography of Marx which was published in the Volks-Kalender for 1878 (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 183-95). — 227
Page me45.488
†276 Bracke sent Engels the stenographic reports of the German Reichstag sessions of 16, 17 and 18 April 1877 (Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Deutschen Reichstags. 3. Legislaturperiode, I. Session 1877, Bd. I, Berlin, 1877, S. 489-594), at which the changes in the trade regulations were discussed. — 227

Page me45.488
†277 The Reichstag session of 18 April 1877 discussed Bracke's proposal to reconsider the election of the National Liberal Dr. Weigel from Kassel on the grounds that pressure had been put on the voters. He said, in part: 'The credentials commission stated first of all that rejection had been proposed without any evidence and without supplying the names of the individuals concerned... I should like to draw your attention to the fact that the persons involved are essentially dependent people, workers, for whom the mere mention of their names in the protest is often sufficient for them to lose their jobs or bring about other unpleasant experiences.' — 227

Page Break me45.489
Page me45.489
†278 In the discussion of the Bill on the trade regulations proposed by the Catholic Party of the Centre (see Note 423), Bebel spoke at the Reichstag session of 18 April 1877 in defence of the alternative Social-Democratic Bill which provided for a set of measures aimed to shorten working hours, introduce labour protection, etc. He embarked on a sharp polemic with representatives of the bourgeois parties. — 227
Page me45.489
†279 In 1877, the British Home Secretary Richard Assheton Cross introduced a Bill providing for measures to regulate working hours, specifically in the domestic industry and workshops. The Bill limited the working day of adolescents to 10 1/2 hours and supplemented the law of 1874 on restricting child labour. The Bill became law in 1878. — 228
Page me45.489
†280 The original of Engels' letter to B. Lindheimer has not been found. The rough draft was written on Lindheimer's letter to Engels of 25 April 1877. — 229
Page me45.489
†281 Russia declared war on Turkey on 24 April 1877 (see Notes 207 and 272) and conducted successful operations in the Caucasus. — 232, 234
Page me45.489
†282 At that time Engels obviously did not yet know about the softas' demonstration held in front of the premises of the Chamber of Deputies in Constantinople on 24 May 1877 (for the softas see Note 156). At the Chamber's session, the softas' delegates voiced their indignation at the surrender of Ardagan by Turkish troops and demanded the immediate resignation of the War Minister Redif-Pasha and a War Council member, Damad Mahmud-Pasha. The Chamber decided to invite all ministers to discuss the necessary military steps. A state of siege was proclaimed in the capital and its environs the next day and numerous arrests were made. There was no change in the nature of hostilities. — 232
Page me45.489
†283 The President of the Third Republic Mac-Mahon, who had the support of the Catholic reactionaries, tried to stage a coup d'état in May 1877. In violation of the Constitution, on 17 May he appointed a new administration headed by the monarchist

Broglie and disbanded the bourgeois-republican government. On 18 May, the sessions of both chambers of the National Assembly were postponed for a month, and on 25 June the Chamber of Deputies was dissolved. New elections were scheduled for 14 October 1877. — 233, 235, 246
Page me45.489
†284 A reference to the Adzhars' guerrilla warfare in the rear of the Russian army in the Caucasus, which held back its advance in that theatre of war. — 234
Page me45.489
†285 Engels was entitled to a fee for his article 'Karl Marx' written for Bracke's Volks-Kalender for 1878 (see Note 275). — 236
Page me45.489
†286 At the 29 May sitting of the Gotha Congress of the German Socialist Workers' Party (27-29 May 1877), Dühring's followers demanded that the publication of Engels' Anti-Dühring be stopped in the party's central organ. The proposal was made by Johann Most and Julius Vahlteich. August Bebel proposed that Engels' work appear as a separate edition rather than in the Vorwärts. Referring to the resolution of the 1876 congress concerning the publication of Engels' articles, Wilhelm Liebknecht suggested that they should be carried either by the scientific supplement to the Vorwärts or in the Zukunft magazine, or as separate pamphlets. Parts II and III of Anti-Dühring appeared in the supplement to the Vorwärts. — 236, 238, 243, 258, 288, 420

Page Break me45.490
Page me45.490
†287 From 1872, Dühring, a lecturer at the University of Berlin, fiercely attacked university professors including Prof. Helmholtz, and also some aspects of university life. For this, he suffered reprisals at the hands of the reactionary professors and, in July 1877, on the insistence of the faculty of philosophy was deprived of the right to lecture. His followers launched a vigorous protest campaign, and the democratic quarters at large denounced his expulsion. — 236, 249, 257
Page me45.490
†288 On 22 (10) June 1877, Russian troops crossed the Lower Danube. On the Russian army's crossing of the Middle Danube, see Note 294. — 237
Page me45.490
†289 Engels and his sick wife stayed in Ramsgate between 11 July and 28 August 1877. — 238, 240, 244, 271, 274, 280
Page me45.490
†290 In a letter of 14 June 1877, Liebknecht asked Engels for a photograph of Urquhart, who had just died, and requested him to write a short biography of the deceased. — 238
Page me45.490
†291 From 15 June to 15 August 1877 Liebknecht was serving a sentence of two months. In a letter to Engels despatched on 27 June from Leipzig prison, he wrote that as the editor of the Vorwärts and an organiser of the Social-Democrats' election campaign in the winter of 1876-77 he had had a multitude of charges brought against him, and this would entail several court trials. — 239, 243, 247, 275
Page me45.490

†292 From 10 June 1877 the Vorwärts carried a series of articles covering the conflict between the monarchists and the republican majority in the French Chamber of Deputies and Mac-Mahon's attempt to effect a coup d'état (see Note 283). The first of them was an editorial 'Zum jungsten Staatsstreich des Herrn Mac-Mahon'. The editorial board took a nihilist stand on these events, implying that it was immaterial to the proletariat whether it was campaigning under a bourgeois republic or a monarchy. These views were stated most directly in the editorial 'Nieder mit der Republik!' (Down with the Republic!) featured by the Vorwärts on 1 July 1877 and written, most probably, by Wilhelm Hasenclever. — 239, 246, 294
Page me45.490
†293 For the most part, this paragraph coincides with the note printed by the Vorwärts on 11 July 1877 in the 'Sozialpolitische Uebersicht' column, which opened with the words 'We have received a letter from Paris' and was supplied with editorial comments.
Page me45.490
The note may have been written by Carl Hirsch, who used a passage from Engels' letter to him (which has not been found). The comment on the note was probably written by Hasenclever. — 239
Page me45.490
†294 On 27(15) June 1877, Russian troops crossed the Middle Danube in the vicinity of Sistovo (Svištov in Bulgarian). — 239
Page me45.490
†295 When staying in London in 1876, the German Social-Democrat Gustav Rasch maintained friendly relations with Prince Nicholas of Montenegro. — 239
Page me45.490
†296 In his letters to Marx of 9 July and to Engels of 10 July 1877, Franz Wiede proposed that they contribute to the Neue Gesellschaft magazine he was planning to start (the first issue appeared in Zurich in October 1877). In a letter to Engels of 20 July 1877, Wiede asked for a speedy reply to his proposal. — 240, 241, 247, 413
Page me45.490
†297 Engels is referring to the proofs of Part II of Anti-Dühring (see Note 155), which appeared in the Vorwärts between 27 July and 30 December 1877 as a series of articles under the general heading 'Herrn Eugen Dühring's Umwälzung der politischen Oekonomie'. — 240

Page Break me45.491
Page me45.491
†298 In July 1877 the first part of Anti-Dühring was published in Leipzig as a separate pamphlet headed 'Herrn Eugen Dühring's Umwälzung der Wissenschaft. I. Philosophie'. — 240
Page me45.491
†299 A Turkish landing force disembarked in Sukhumi in May 1877 to launch guerrilla operations in the rear of the Russian Caucasian army, but was pushed back in early September 1877. — 240
Page me45.491
†300 A reference to the Russian army's siege of Silistria, a Turkish fortress (Bulgarian name: Silistra), in May-June 1854, during the Crimean War of 1853-56. — 241

Page me45.491
†301 An extract from this letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, Correspondence. 1846-1895, Martin Lawrence Ltd., London, 1934. The full English translation of the letter was published for the first time in The Letters of Karl Marx, selected and translated with explanatory notes and an introduction by Saul K. Padover, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979. — 241
Page me45.491
†302 Marx is most probably referring to Johann Most and Julius Vahlteich who tried to secure a ban on the continued publication of Anti-Dühring at the Gotha Congress of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany (see Note 286). — 242
Page me45.491
†303 After the leaders of the Eisenach party had read the Critique of the Gotha Programme, the manuscript was returned to Marx. Planning a pamphlet devoted to the Gotha Programme, Liebknecht asked Engels in a letter of 13 July 1877 for a copy of Marx's manuscript as he did not have one. — 243
Page me45.491
†304 'True socialism' — an ideological trend widespread in Germany in the mid-1840s. The 'true socialists' — Karl Grün, Moses Hess, Hermann Kriege and others — indulged in the sentimental preaching of love and brotherhood and of pseudo-socialist ideas, and denied the need for political action and a revolution. Marx and Engels criticised this trend of the reactionary German petty bourgeoisie particularly in The German Ideology (see present edition, Vol. 5), in the Circular Against Kriege, German Socialism in Verse and Prose, and also in the Manifesto of the Communist Party (Vol. 6). — 243
Page me45.491
†305 Engels is referring to the establishment of a quadrilateral of Russian fortresses to counterbalance the Turkish one on Bulgarian territory. Rustchuk, Shumla, Silistria and Varna were a stronghold where the main Turkish forces were concentrated at the outset of the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78. — 244, 250
Page me45.491
†306 On 15-16 (3-4) July 1877, after a fairly brief storming of the besieged Turkish fortress of Nikopol (southern bank of the Danube), its garrison headed by the commandant surrendered, and the Russian troops had no difficulty seizing the town. Varna had been captured by the Russian army on 11 October (29 September) 1828 during the Russo-Turkish war of 1828-29. — 244
Page me45.491
†307 Marx, accompanied by his wife and daughter Eleanor, took a course of treatment in Neuenahr (Germany) from 8 August 1877 and returned to London about 27 September. — 245, 248, 250, 262, 265, 267, 273, 274, 275, 281, 305
Page me45.491
†308 A reference to the scandal involving General Galliffet and Madame de Beaumont. In all probability, Marx first learned about it from the Vorwärts, which on 6 April 1877 carried an item beginning with the words 'The Nemesis has grabbed another one by the hair!' in the 'Sozialpolitische Uebersicht' column. The author went on to say that about two weeks previously, at a ball in Paris, in a fit of jealousy Galliffet had seriously wounded his mistress Mme de Beaumont, President Mac-Mahon's sister-in-law, and had consequently been imprisoned. The Paris papers hushed up the scandal. The Vorwärts viewed this unsavoury story, with a hangman of the Paris Commune as its protagonist, as striking proof of the degeneration of bourgeois society. Marx learned the details of the scandal from Carl Hirsch, who arrived in London from Paris about 20 July. — 246, 440

Page Break me45.492

Page me45.492
†309 Palais de l'Elysée — the residence of the President of the French Republic in Paris. — 246, 251
Page me45.492
†310 The words 'Here I am, here I remain' are ascribed to Mac-Mahon, who was supposed to have uttered them during the Crimean War, on 8 September 1855, in response to the suggestion that he retreat from the Malakhov Hill which he had seized and which was to be blown up by the Russians on 9 September. — 246
Page me45.492
†311 A reference to the constitutional conflict in Prussia that arose in February 1860 over the refusal of the bourgeois majority in the Lower Chamber of the Prussian Provincial Diet to endorse the army reorganisation project proposed by War Minister von Roon. However, the government soon managed to secure allocations from the Provincial Diet to 'maintain the army ready for action', which in fact meant the beginning of the planned reorganisation. When, in March 1862, the liberal majority of the Chamber refused to approve military spending and demanded a ministry accountable to the Provincial Diet, the government dissolved the Diet and announced new elections. The Bismarck Ministry was formed at the end of September 1862. In October, it again dissolved the Provincial Diet and began to carry out the military reform without the sanction of the Diet. The conflict was settled only in 1866 when, after Prussia's victory over Austria, the Prussian bourgeoisie gave in to Bismarck. — 247
Page me45.492
†312 A reference to the Party of Progress formed in June 1861 (its most eminent members were Waldeck, Virchow, Schulze-Delitsch, Forchenbeck and Hoverbeck). The party's programme included the unification of Germany under the aegis of Prussia, the convocation of an all-German Parliament, and the formation of a strong liberal ministry accountable to the Chamber of Deputies. Fearing a popular revolution, the Party of Progress gave no support to the basic democratic demands — universal suffrage and freedoms of the press, association and assembly. In 1866 the party split, and its Right wing founded the National Liberal Party, which capitulated to the Bismarck government. — 247, 309, 351
Page me45.492
†313 On 20 July 1877 the Zukunft editors wrote to Marx and Engels inviting them to contribute to the magazine and referring to the relevant decision of the Gotha Congress to start a scientific review (see Note 314). The letters were signed 'The Zukunft editorial board' and gave the forwarding office of the Berliner Freie Presse, edited by Johann Most, as its address. — 247, 249, 259, 362, 413
Page me45.492
†314 At its sitting on 29 May 1877 the Gotha Congress of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany (see Note 286) approved August Geib's proposal to have a scientific review published twice monthly in Berlin starting on 1 October. It was decided that a fortnightly theoretical supplement to the Vorwärts was to appear up to that date. The first issue of Die Zukunft. Socialistische Revue came out in Berlin in October; its editor was Karl Höchberg, who worked under the penname of R.-F. Seifert. He sought to give the magazine a reformist slant. — 249, 252, 254, 257

Page Break me45.493
Page me45.493
†315 Engels is referring, above all, to the series of articles by Wilhelm Liebknecht 'Die Rothen wider die Blauen.' I-II, in which he sought to play down the impact made by the article 'Nieder mit der Republik!' that Hasenclever had published in the Vorwärts on 1 July 1877 (see Note 292). — 249
Page me45.493
†316 In 1877, the United States witnessed large-scale workers' action against the industrialists. One of the major events was the railway workers' strike in July 1877 provoked by a 10 per cent wage cut on the three main west-bound railway lines. The strike was suppressed by force. — 251, 255
Page me45.493
†317 The decision to transfer the seat of the General Council of the International Working Men's Association from London to New York was taken at the Hague Congress of the International in September 1872. — 251
Page me45.493
†318 A reference to Broglie's first term of office as Chairman of the Council of Ministers from May 1873 to May 1874. Broglie's reactionary ministry declared the establishment of 'moral order' as its goal. — 251
Page me45.493
†319 The Crystal Palace — a structure of metal and glass in London's Hyde Park built for the 1851 Great Exhibition and later used for various displays and shows. — 252
Page me45.493
†320 An excerpt from this letter was published in English for the first time in: Marx and Engels, On the United States, Progress Publishers, Moscow, 1979. — 254, 343
Page me45.493
†321 On 28 July 1877, Wilhelm Liebknecht asked Engels and Marx to become contributors to the Zukunft (see Note 313). He wrote that the magazine was to be edited by 'bright young men', Höchberg and Wiede, and stressed that the editorial board would work under strict control from the party leadership. — 254, 257
Page me45.493
†322 At that time Wilhelm Liebknecht was serving a sentence in Leipzig prison (see Note 291). — 256
Page me45.493
†323 A reference to Vahlteich's speech at the anarchist congress in Berne on 27 October 1876. Present at the congress as a guest, he stated: 'We have neither Marxians nor Dühringians among us.' In an attempt to defend him, Liebknecht wrote to Engels on 21 July 1877: 'Vahlteich, certainly, made no such statement.' — 257
Page me45.493

†324 The reference is to the international socialist congress in Ghent convened by the Belgian Proudhonists and the Swiss anarchists. They made a fresh attempt to unite all the socialist organisations in Europe on their platform. Present at the congress, which took place between 9 and 16 September 1877, was a group of Marxist delegates, including Wilhelm Liebknecht, Johann Philipp Becker and Leo Frankel, who opposed the anarchists. The majority confirmed the resolutions of the Hague Congress of the International (1872) on the need to set up national political parties in their own right in line with the principles of the International Working Men's Association. — 258, 270, 274, 277

Page me45.493

†325 Neue Rheinische Zeitung, a newspaper of the German revolutionary proletariat, was published in Cologne during the 1848-49 revolution under the direct guidance of Marx and Engels. Its prospectus was drawn up by Heinrich Bürgers, but his participation in the work of the editorial board was limited: he contributed only one article, and even that was revised by Marx.

Page Break me45.494

Page me45.494

In late 1876, Bürgers had his 'Erinnerungen an Ferdinand Freiligrath' published in the Vossische Zeitung where he stated that a democratic newspaper in Cologne was initiated by him and Georg Weerth. In the final, fifth, chapter of his 'Erinnerungen' published in the Vossische Zeitung (No. 302) he wrote that Marx was the soul of the Communist League's Central Authority (Sunday Supplement, No. 52, 24 December 1876). — 259

Page me45.494

†326 The original mentions an anarchist weekly, Le Travail, published in 1873 under the editorship of James Guillaume, its contributors also being the persons named in the letter. — 259

Page me45.494

†327 By the 'Irish skirmishing' in the House of Commons Marx means the speeches of the Irish M.P.s who advocated Home Rule. The Irish national party — the Irish Home Rule League led by Isaac Butt — was founded in the early 1870s and, after the 1874 elections, was represented by 60 deputies in the House of Commons. The main point on its programme was Irish self-government to be secured strictly by parliamentary means. In their campaign, the League's deputies made a wide use of obstruction: introduction of numerous amendments, and highly protracted speeches on all kind of subjects. This hampered the settlement of the questions under discussion and delayed debate on the next items on the agenda. An expert in these tactics was Charles Parnell, who turned them into an effective weapon in the struggle for a law on Home Rule.

Page me45.494

At the General Council meeting of 4 January 1870 a letter was read from Isaac Butt who offered his assistance in establishing a union between the English and the Irish workers (see The General Council of the First International. 1868-1870. Minutes, Progress Publishers, Moscow, 1966, p. 197). — 261

Page me45.494

†328 In a somewhat revised form, Engels included Quesnay's Tableau économique and comments on it in Anti-Dühring (see present edition, Vol. 25, pp. 229-39). — 262
Page me45.494
†329 Engels used the above-mentioned works by W.L. Sargant, Robert Owen, Charles Fourier and N.G. Hubbard when working on Chapter I, Part III of Anti-Dühring (see present edition, Vol. 25, pp. 244-54). — 263
Page me45.494
†330 Sheikh-al-Islam — title of the head of the Moslem clergy in Turkey (the Ottoman Empire). — 263
Page me45.494
†331 In the original here follows Quesnay's Tableau économique. — 263
Page me45.494
†332 Bracke wrote to Marx on 5 August 1877: 'After Miss Kurz I shall now compare the translation of the sheets to follow with the French original and, in cases of doubt, consult Liebknecht, Engels or B. Becker.' See also Note 194. — 266
Page me45.494
†333 Engels was in Ramsgate at the time (see Note 289), and between 5 and 21 September 1877, he and his wife were on holiday in Scotland. — 266, 271, 274, 280, 282
Page me45.494
†334 In 'The War in the East' column, The Times, No. 29018 of 11 August 1877, carried an advertisement signed by Maltman Barry and dated 10 August. It related to the meeting scheduled for 13 August and a demonstration in support of Turkey and in protest against Russia's Eastern policies. — 267
Page me45.494
†335 The reference is to Engels' participation in the uprising in South-Western Germany in May-July 1849 during which he fought in the ranks of the Baden-Palatinate revolutionary army. — 271

Page Break me45.495
Page me45.495
†336 In late July 1877, an advance unit of the Russian army led by General Gurko moved through the Balkans towards Adrianople, but was later forced to retreat. — 272
Page me45.495
†337 On 21-26 (9-14) August 1877, bloody battles were fought for the Shipka Pass. The Turkish army's attempt to capture it failed completely. Having sustained enormous losses, Suleiman-Pasha's army was forced to retreat. — 272
Page me45.495
†338 On 30 (18) July 1877, Russian troops made a second unsuccessful attempt to capture Plevna. — 272
Page me45.495
†339 The Russo-Turkish war began on 24 (12) April 1877, and the Russians were preparing to cross the Danube in May. On 11 May (29 April) and the early morning of 26 (14) May, they sank the two largest Turkish vessels and crossed the Danube in late June. — 273
Page me45.495

†340 Wilhelm Liebknecht was unable to come to London after the Ghent Congress. — 274
Page me45.495
†341 A reference to the English translation of Johann Most's pamphlet Kapital und Arbeit (see Note 154) done by Otto Weydemeyer from the second German edition of the work. It was originally published in the form of eleven extracts from Marx's Capital in the American weekly, The Labor Standard, between 30 December 1877 and 10 March 1878. In August 1878, the work appeared anonymously as a separate pamphlet. — 276, 366
Page me45.495
†342 The planned US edition of the English translation of the first volume of Capital did not materialise. The first volume of Capital appeared in English in London only in 1887. The translation was done by Samuel Moore and Edward Aveling with Engels' assistance. — 276, 283
Page me45.495
†343 Uriele Cavagnari failed to complete an Italian edition of the first volume of Capital. A concise exposition of the work in Italian was published by Carlo Cafiero in Milan in 1879. The work appeared in full in Turin in 1886. — 277
Page me45.495
†344 The tenth annual British Trades' Union Congress took place in Leicester between 18 and 22 September 1877. — 277
Page me45.495
†345 On 11, 13, 17 and 18 September 1877, the Standard, under the general heading 'The International Working Men's Association', carried detailed accounts (From our own correspondent) of the Ghent Congress. Their author was most probably Maltman Barry. — 277
Page me45.495
†346 Marx is referring to the joint invasion of Mexico by France, Britain and Spain in December 1861 with the aim of overthrowing the progressive government of Benito Juárez. However, the heroic resistance put up by the Mexican people forced the invaders to leave the country. — 278
Page me45.495
†347 Marx is referring to the conflict between the monarchists and the republican majority in the Chamber of Deputies (see notes 30 and 283). — 278
Page me45.495
†348 On 18 March 1876, Ferdinand Lingenau, a German socialist who had emigrated to the United States, bequeathed about $7,000 to the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany, naming August Bebel, Johann Philipp Becker, Wilhelm Bracke, August Geib, Wilhelm Liebknecht and Karl Marx as executors. After his death on 4 August 1877, they tried to have his estate passed on to the party, but Bismarck managed to prevent this by applying diplomatic pressure. — 279, 393, 410

Page Break me45.496
Page me45.496
†349 In a letter to Engels of 8 October 1877, Ludwig Kugelmann wrote about Karl Ecker, 'the royal Prussian factory inspector' who wished to study the living conditions of British workers. Kugelmann advised Ecker to read the first volume of Marx's Capital and Engels' The Condition of the Working Class in England, and suggested he get in touch with Engels personally. — 281

Page me45.496
†350 Engels' information about the losses sustained by the Russian army at Plevna and its 'collapse' and 'disintegration' was grossly exaggerated. There was prolonged fighting for this strategically located fortress from July to November 1877. After three abortive attempts to take Plevna by storm, in which the Russian army lost about 25,000 men, it was decided to resort to a siege, which began in September. On 28 November (10 December) 1877, the totally isolated 50,000-strong garrison tried to break through but, having lost about 6,000 men, surrendered. The fall of Plevna allowed the Russian command to release over 100,000 men for an advance beyond the Balkans. — 282, 293, 297
Page me45.496
†351 Marx is referring to the article 'Die Folgen des großen Krachs' printed anonymously by the Vorwärts, Nos 117 and 118 on 5 and 7 October 1877. On 19 July 1878, Sorge informed Marx in writing that its author was Adolph Douai. — 284
Page me45.496
†352 On 15 and 17 June and 10, 12, 14 and 17 October 1877, the Vorwärts (Nos 69, 70 and 119-22) carried a series of anonymous articles under the general heading 'Aus Heuchelland. Stille Beobachtungen eines Berliners in London'. — 284
Page me45.496
†353 Blue Books — Parliament and Foreign Office documents and materials published in Britain since the 17th century.
Page me45.496
In the American edition to which Marx is referring, see Note 416. — 284
Page me45.496
†354 A reference to the Pennsylvanian miners' strike of 1874-75 which was shot down by troops. — 284
Page me45.496
†355 This letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx, On History and People. Arranged and edited, with an introduction and new translations, by Saul K. Padover, McGraw-Hill Book Company, New York, [1977]. — 286, 290
Page me45.496
†356 Marx received the first part of Moses Hess' work Dynamische Stofflehre. I. Kosmischer Theil, Paris, 1877. The work was to have two more parts: the organic (Organischer Teil) and the social (Sozialer Teil). Nothing is known about the publication of the last two parts. — 286, 290
Page me45.496
†357 Marx is referring to the Theories of Surplus Value which make up the bulk of his Economic Manuscript of 1861-63 (see Note 62). — 287
Page me45.496
†358 An extract from this letter was published in English for the first time in: Marx, Engels, Lenin, Communist Morality, Progress Publishers, Moscow, 1964. — 288
Page me45.496

†359 Referring to the Dühringians' speeches at the Gotha Congress of 1877 (see Note 286) in his letter to Marx of 30 October-6 November 1877, Blos inquired whether Marx and Engels were really angry with the party members in Germany. German workers, he wrote, were more interested in Marx's and Engels' articles in the press than ever. According to him, Marx and Engels were more popular than they could have imagined thanks to the activities of the Social-Democrats. — 288
Page me45.496
†360 By the 'secret communist society' Marx means the League of the Just, a secret organisation of German political refugees set up in Paris in 1836-37. In

Page Break me45.497
January-February 1847 its members had talks with Marx and Engels, as a result of which they consented to join the League on the condition that it would be reorganised and an end be put to any personality cult.
Page me45.497
At the congress held in London between 2 and 9 June 1847 the League of the Just was renamed the Communist League. New Rules were drafted at this congress with the active participation of Marx and Engels. After the discussion by the Communist League's communities the Rules were considered by the second congress and finally approved on 8 December 1847 (see present edition, Vol. 6, pp. 585-88). — 288
Page me45.497
†361 In his letter to Marx (see Note 359) Blos wrote that the Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung had discussed 'Dr Marx's mutual combinations with Father Beckx'. Blos meant the newspaper's leading article, which had likened the activities of the international association of socialists, i.e., the International, to that of the Order of Jesuits, and Marx to its leader Beckx. — 289
Page me45.497
†362 A reference to Ernst Dronke's infringement of the contract under which Engels rendered him financial assistance (see Engels' letters to Emil Blank of 16 October and to Ernst Dronke of 20 October and 1 and 13 November 1876 in this volume, pp. 160, 161, 164-65, 171). — 289
Page me45.497
†363 Engels wrote this letter when working on the article 'Natural Science in the Spirit World', which he most probably finished in early 1878. Here the reference is to the books: J.N. Maskelyne, Modern Spiritualism, London, 1876, and A.R. Wallace, On Miracles and Modern Spiritualism, London, 1875, Engels' principal sources of information on spiritualists and spiritualism attacked in his article.
Page me45.497
The article first appeared in the Social-Democratic yearbook Illustrierter Neue Welt-Kalender for 1898 published in Hamburg. Engels incorporated it into Dialectics of Nature (see present edition, Vol. 25, pp. 345-55). — 290
Page me45.497
†364 Presumably an error in Marx's letter: the meeting in Trafalgar Square took place not on Friday, but on Saturday, 29 December 1877. It was called by the supporters of Turkey in the Russo-Turkish War of 1877-78. — 292
Page me45.497

†365 In 1876-78, Marx received a considerable number of works on Russia's social, economic and political development from Nikolai Danielson in St Petersburg. The Russian section of Marx's library grew rapidly in this period (see Note 265). — 293, 307, 343
Page me45.497
†366 Zimnicea (Zimniza), a village in Romania near which the Russian army crossed the Danube in the early morning of 27 (15) June 1877. — 293
Page me45.497
†367 Following the republicans' overwhelming victory at the elections to the Chamber of Deputies on 14 October 1877 (see Note 283) the Broglie ministry was forced to resign on November 19. The attempt by Mac-Mahon and his followers to effect a coup d'état on 13 December fell through due to the resistance of the junior officer corps and especially the body of privates, who shared the republican leanings of the French peasantry. On 14 December, Jules Dufaure's government was formed. In January 1879, Mac-Mahon was obliged to resign before his term of office had expired. Jules Grévy, a moderate republican, was elected president of the Republic. The bourgeois-republican system was definitively established in France. — 293, 294
Page me45.497
†368 Engels is referring to the anarchists. Inability to agree about the final goals of the campaign, failures in practical work (the abortive anarchist putsches in Italy in 1874 and 1877) gave rise to substantial theoretical differences among them.

Page Break me45.498
At the congress of the so-called anarchist International in Verviers in 1877, the Bakuninists' statement that all political parties, including the socialists, were essentially reactionary, aroused vigorous protests from the Belgian, the French and some of the Italian delegates. — 294
Page me45.498
†369 In May 1877, a congress of the Swiss Workers' Union in Neuenburg accepted Johann Philipp Becker's proposal for a merger with the Grütli-Verein, a petty-bourgeois organisation, to form a single Social-Democratic party. A commission established for the purpose and including members of the two organisations drafted a joint contract and a programme for the Social-Democratic party in Switzerland, which in fact coincided with the Gotha Programme adopted by the German Social-Democrats in 1875. In June 1878, a meeting of the Grütli-Verein deputies in Lucerne rejected the contract and adopted the programme subject to further revision. The planned merger did not take place (see also present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 218-19). — 294
Page me45.498
†370 A reference to Hippolyte Buffenoir's articles printed under the heading 'Aus Frankreich' in the Vorwärts, Nos 124, 128, 129, 132, 133, 140 and 145, on 21 and 31 October, 2, 9, 11 and 30 November and 12 December 1877. In connection with the elections to the French Chamber of Deputies on 14 October 1877, Buffenoir acted as co-author of the manifesto issued by a group of the so-called autonomous socialists of Paris on 9 October 1877. — 295
Page me45.498

†371 Comparing the different stages of the French Revolution, Engels believed that a Russian revolution would end in the establishment of a revolutionary-democratic dictatorship, as had happened in France in 1793 when the Jacobins came to power. — 295
Page me45.498
†372 An extract from this letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx, On Colonialism and Modernization, Anchor Books, New York, 1969. — 296
Page me45.498
†373 The letters to Liebknecht of 4 and 11 February 1878 were despatched following a request contained in his letter to Marx of 22 January 1878. Liebknecht asked for one or several articles as preparatory material for a speech on the Eastern Question in the German Reichstag. Both of Marx's letters were published anonymously in the second edition of Liebknecht's pamphlet Zur orientalischen Frage oder Soll Europa kosakisch werden? Ein Mahnwort an das deutsche Volk. The afterword to this edition which appeared in Leipzig a month after the first edition, on 27 February 1878, ended as follows: 'By way of conclusion, I am supplying two letters from a friend who has made a more thorough study of the Eastern Question than anyone else. The clarity of judgment, sharp insight, all-embracing knowledge — all point to an expert. Ex ungue leonem' (Judge the lion from his claws). — 296, 299
Page me45.498
†374 On 25 (13) December 1877 the Russian army embarked on the decisive offensive on the Balkan theatre of war. Having crossed the Balkans, Russian troops entered Sofia on 4 January 1878 (23 December 1877), smashed the last Turkish army in the battle of Philippopol (Plovdiv) on 15-17 (3-5) January 1878, and entered Adrianople (Edirne) on 20 (8) January and continued their advance towards Constantinople (Istanbul). On 31 (19) January, Turkey was compelled to sign an armistice in Adrianople. — 296
Page me45.498
†375 The Grand Cophta — the name of an omnipotent and omniscient priest who headed the non-existent Masonic 'Egyptian Lodge' which the famous eighteenth-century impostor 'Count' Cagliostro (Giuseppe Balsamo) claimed to have founded. — 296

Page Break me45.499
Page me45.499
†376 In the summer of 1876, Russia and Austria-Hungary signed an agreement in Rheinstadt on Austro-Hungarian neutrality in the event of a Russo-Turkish war. They also concluded a secret convention in Budapest in March 1877, under which Russia agreed to Austria-Hungary's occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina in exchange for its neutrality. — 296
Page me45.499
†377 The terms of the peace with Turkey, which bolstered Russia's position in the Balkans, were agreed on when signing the San Stefano preliminary peace treaty in March 1878 (see Note 430). They were revised to the advantage of Austria-Hungary and Britain at the Berlin congress in June 1878. — 297
Page me45.499

†378 Under the Paris Peace Treaty concluded in 1856 at the end of the Crimean War (see Note 22), Russia lost the Danube delta and the part of Southern Bessarabia adjacent to it. — 298
Page me45.499
†379 Marx is playing on the well-known saying ascribed to Voltaire: 'If God did not exist, He ought to have been invented.' — 299
Page me45.499
†380 The economic crisis of the 1870s heavily afflicted the miners in South Wales, where many pits were closed down and unemployment assumed massive proportions. In January 1878, only 20 mines out of 500 were working in Monmouth and Glamorganshire. — 300

Page me45.499
†381 On 7 and 8 February 1878, the House of Commons debated additional allocations to the Conservative government in the event of Britain's involvement in the Russo-Turkish war. The Liberal leaders, especially Forster and Bright, who had previously opposed such allocations and any anti-Russian action, changed their tactics and did not take part in the final voting; as a result the Conservatives managed to get their demand approved, by a significant majority of 328 to 124. — 300
Page me45.499
†382 As from 1 January 1874, when universal conscription was introduced in Russia, Poles were also subject to the draft. — 300
Page me45.499
†383 At the time of the Russo-Turkish war of 1828-29, Prussia's stand towards Russia was one of benevolent neutrality. — 300
Page me45.499
†384 The first campaign of the Russo-Turkish war of 1828-29 took place in May-October 1828. It revealed that the Russian troops were confronted by a numerically superior Turkish army, its strategy being that of temporising and wearing out the enemy. The second campaign was waged between May and August 1829. — 301
Page me45.499
†385 This treaty confirmed the St Petersburg Russo-British protocol of 4 April 1826 recognising Greek autonomy. Like the protocol, it included an agreement on the diplomatic recognition of Greece and on armed mediation in the Greco-Turkish conflict. The contracting parties confirmed the commitment recorded in the protocol to seek no territorial or commercial benefits for themselves in pacifying Greece except such as were common to all European states. — 302
Page me45.499
†386 In September 1829 Turkey and Russia concluded a treaty in Adrianople which ended the war of 1828-29. Under the treaty Russia obtained the Danube delta, including the islands, and a considerable part of the eastern Black Sea coast south of the Kuban estuary. Turkey was to recognise the autonomy of Moldavia and Wallachia, granting them the right to elect their own hospodars (rulers). Their autonomy was guaranteed by Russia. The Turkish government also undertook to recognise the independence of Greece, whose only obligation to Turkey was to pay an annual tribute to the Sultan and abide by all the previous treaties relating to the autonomy of Serbia, which was to be formalised by a special firman. — 303

Page Break me45.500

Page me45.500

†387 Marx is drawing a parallel here with the persecution of the so-called Demagogues, participants in the intellectuals' opposition movement in Germany following the Napoleonic wars. The term became current after the Karlsbad conference of ministers of German states in August 1819, which agreed on measures for the suppression of the Demagogues. — 303

Page me45.500

†388 The original is kept at the Karl-Marx-Haus in Trier. The Editors are not in possession of Sigmund Schott's letter, to which Marx is replying. — 304

Page me45.500

†389 Marx wrote on the envelope of the letter: 'To the Publisher of “Forward”, Hornsey Road, Post Office, London, N.' — 305

Page me45.500

†390 Engels had requested Lopatin to write for the Volks-Kalender for 1879 an article on the trials of the Russian Narodniks (Populists) brought before the court for revolutionary agitation and propaganda in St Petersburg in 1877-early 1878 (see Note 391). However, the article was not needed, since, after the introduction of the Anti-Socialist Law (see Note 462), the Volks-Kalender was closed down. — 306

Page me45.500

†391 This letter has come down to us as an extract quoted by Lopatin in French in his letter to Lavrov of 17 April 1878. He also rendered in Russian the substance of the other two parts of Engels' letter:

Page me45.500

'He wrote to me to ask for a photograph of the women condemned in the trial of the 50 for Bracke's almanach for 1879. He also wants me to write an article about this trial or about the recent Russian movement, about 16 large-sized pages, for 160 marks = 200 francs;

Page me45.500

'Engels writes that England shows all signs of an approaching industrial and commercial crisis, which will be a worthy consummation of all separate European crashes: Austrian, Prussian, Russian, etc. So far, two main industries have been severely affected: the cotton industry and the production of iron. The general crash will possibly be delayed until August or September.' — 307

Page me45.500

†392 Vperyod! (Vol. V, 1877, pp. 1-120) featured the article 'The Outcome of the Reforms. Surveys of the Successes of Economic Exploitation in Russia over Recent Years'. As is clear from Lopatin's letter to Engels of 23 April 1878, its author was Nikolai Kulyabko-Koretsky (pen-name Dahl). The Vorwärts published its German translation under the heading 'Die Folgen der czaristischen Reformen' between 15 February and 15 March 1878. — 307

Page me45.500

†393 In 1871-73, a single gold coin was introduced in Germany to replace the different currencies of the kingdoms, principalities and duchies. — 308
Page me45.500
†394 In a letter to Engels of 26 April 1878, Bracke praised the railway project and the tobacco monopoly introduced by Bismarck. But he still regarded as wrong 'any participation by the party in implementing these measures'. — 308
Page me45.500
†395 A reference to the economic crisis of 1873, which in Germany lasted into the late 1870s (see also Note 118). — 308, 405
Page me45.500
†396 Eugen Richter, the leader of the Party of Progress, said in the Reichstag on 10 April 1878 with respect to the Bill introduced by Wilhelm Bracke on the repeal of the law exempting the military from communal taxes (passed on 22 December 1868): 'We consider it important enough to note a change at present in the tactics of the socialist gentlemen.... You, Sirs, obviously do not consider the modern state and its organisation so bad as to make them unworthy of the effort, made by the previous speaker [Bracke] in his speech, to partially improve them.... We will be far from displeased if you follow in our footsteps and bring up our old proposals.' — 309

Page Break me45.501
Page me45.501
†397 Lothar Bucher had a 'Declaration' printed in the Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung and the Frankfurter Zeitung on 21 June 1878 concerning Marx's and Engels' letter to the editor of The Daily News (see present edition, Vol. 24 pp. 230-31), which many German newspapers had reprinted with the mistake made in the translation. On 27 June, Marx sent his reply to Bucher's 'Declaration' to a number of German newspapers (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 232-33). — 310
Page me45.501
†398 In his 'Declaration' concerning Marx's and Engels' letter to the editor of The Daily News (see Note 397), Lothar Bucher stated that it would take 3,000 lines to refute Marx's 30. — 312
Page me45.501
†399 On 9 July 1878, the London correspondent of the Vossische Zeitung had a statement printed in which, referring to allegedly 'verified sources', he asserted that Marx had intended to answer Bucher's 'Declaration' in the Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung (see Note 397) with a whole book entitled Herr Bucher. — 312
Page me45.501
†400 An allusion to the novel by Nikolai Chernyshevsky (What Is to Be Done?), which appeared in French in Lodi, Italy, in 1875. — 312
Page me45.501
†401 The first complete edition of Engels' Herrn Eugen Dühring's Umwälzung der Wissenschaft. Philosophie. Politische Oekonomie. Sozialismus, with the author's preface, was published in Leipzig in early July 1878. — 312, 313, 316
Page me45.501

†402 On 18 July 1878, the London journal Nature (Vol. XVIII, No. 455, p. 316) printed the programme of the 51st congress of natural scientists and physicians scheduled for 18-24 September in Kassel. Among the reports to be read was Oscar Schmidt's 'On the Relation of Darwinism to Social Democracy'.
Page me45.501
In 23 July, Oscar Schmidt stated his willingness to send Engels a copy of his report, which was to appear in the November issue of the Deutsche Rundschau. It also came out as a pamphlet: O. Schmidt, Darwinismus und Socialdemocratie, Bonn, 1878. — 313, 317
Page me45.501
†403 Engels is referring to Rudolf Virchow's speech at the 50th congress of German natural scientists and physicians in Munich on 22 September 1877. Virchow associated Darwinism with the socialist movement and declared it dangerous to the existing social system (see R. Virchow, Die Freiheit der Wissenschaft im modernen Staat, Berlin, 1877, S. 12). Engels ironically wrote that Virchow had 'amiably tipped the wink'. — 313, 316
Page me45.501
†404 Engels intended to subject to criticism the Darwinians', including Oscar Schmidt's, writings against socialism in his Dialectics of Nature (see present edition, Vol. 25, p. 314), but did not carry out this plan. — 314, 317
Page me45.501
†405 On 24 May 1878, the majority in the German Reichstag (251 to 57) voted down the government bill directed against socialists, after which the Reichstag was dissolved on 11 June, and new elections were scheduled for 30 July. The Socialist Workers' Party of Germany polled 437,158 votes this time. — 314
Page me45.501
†406 On 11 May and 2 June 1878, assassination attempts were made on William I, the first by unemployed tinner Max Hödel and the second by anarchist Karl Eduard Nobiling, who had never belonged to the Socialist Workers' Party of

Page Break me45.502
Germany. These events provoked a vicious campaign against the socialists and provided a pretext for the promulgation of the Anti-Socialist Law in October 1878 (see Note 462).
Page me45.502
In his turn, Bismarck used the assassination attempts to break down the resistance of the National Liberals (see Note 540), who had a short while before voted down the government proposal to introduce protective tariffs on iron. As a result of Bismarck's policies, the National Liberal Party lost about a quarter of its seats in the 1878 Reichstag elections. — 314, 419, 424, 449
Page me45.502
†407 'We are but dogs!' ('Hunde sind wir ja doch!'). This is how, according to August Bebel, the German democratic political writer Luis Bamberger described the treatment which the National Liberals received from Bismarck. — 314, 322, 324
Page me45.502
†408 The reptile fund — the special fund at Bismarck's disposal for bribing the press and individual journalists. Reptiles was the name used by the left-wing press to designate periodicals which defended the interests of the government and had been bribed by it. — 315, 328, 334, 421

Page me45.502
†409 On 4 July 1878, Jenny Longuet, Marx's eldest daughter, gave birth to a baby boy, Henri Longuet, whom the family called Harry. — 316
Page me45.502
†410 Engels is referring to the birth of the eighth child in Philipp Pauli's family, of which the latter informed him on 17 July 1878. — 316
Page me45.502
†411 In 1877-78, Mary Ellen Burns (Pumps) lived with her relatives in Manchester. — 316
Page me45.502
†412 Nachalo (No. 2, April 1878) wrote: 'Arrested in St Petersburg the other day were: 1) Pyankov, detained by the police in Furshtadtskaya St. and beaten within an inch of his life without the slightest provocation; exiled (!!) to Archangel; 2) Goloushev, chief witness in the Zasulich case; 3) Pavlovsky and 4) Lopatin.'
Page me45.502
Lavrov wrote on 11 August in reply to Engels' letter: 'The news reported by Nachalo relates either to the brother of our Lopatin, a participant in the “trial of the 193”, or to his cousin, who has just been deported to Vologda Gubernia, having been involved in the Kiev students' case. Our Lopatin had come over from Switzerland but then left again for a while; I think he will be back in about a month, if not earlier. He has not left an address, but I had a letter from him about a fortnight ago.' — 316
Page me45.502
†413 Aprés moi (or nous) le deluge! — a phrase attributed to Mmle Pompadour or to Mme Du Barry, who addressed it to Louis XV. — 317
Page me45.502
†414 This letter was published in English for the first time in: Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Arbeiterbewegung, Berlin, 1959, No. 3. — 317
Page me45.502
†415 Between 4 and 14 September 1878 Marx stayed with his wife, his daughter Jenny and his grandson Jean in Malvern. — 318, 322, 324
Page me45.502
†416 After a long search, Sorge sent Marx an 'Annual Report of the Secretary of Internal Affairs of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, for 1876-1877', Part III. Industrial Statistics, Vol. V, Harrisburg, 1878, containing information he needed on the situation in the mining industry of Pennsylvania. — 318
Page me45.502
†417 Sorge sent Marx the English translation of Johann Most's pamphlet Kapital und Arbeit done by Weydemeyer (see Note 341), which appeared anonymously in August 1878 under the heading Extracts from the 'Capital' of Karl Marx.

Page Break me45.503
Page me45.503
Marx's intention to have a new edition of the pamphlet published with his preface was not carried through. — 318

Page me45.503
†418 This letter was published in English for the first time in part in: K. Marx, On Education, Women and Children. Arranged and edited, with an introduction and new translations by Saul K. Padover. Mc Graw-Hill Book Company, New York, 1975 and in full in The Letters of Karl Marx, selected and translated with explanatory notes and an introduction by Saul K. Padover. Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979. — 320
Page me45.503
†419 After Lizzy Burns' death on 12 September 1878, Engels left for Littlehampton (on 16 September). — 321, 325, 327, 330, 331
Page me45.503
†420 A reference to the Anti-Socialist Law. The discussion of the bill began in the Reichstag on 16 September 1878 (see Note 462). — 321, 322, 328, 332
Page me45.503
†421 On 17 September 1878, The Daily News and The Standard carried reports from Reuters and their own correspondents covering the 16 September session of the German Reichstag, at which Stolberg-Wernigerode, Reichensperger, Helldorf-Bedroe, Bebel, Eulenburg and Bamberger took the floor. — 322, 324
Page me45.503
†422 La légalité nous tue (legality is killing us): Marx repeats what Jean Pons Viennet, a right-wing representative in the French Chamber of Deputies, said in his speech on 23 March 1833. This was also quoted by the conservative politician Odillon Barrot in his speech to the Constituent Assembly of the French Republic early in 1849. — 322
Page me45.503
†423 The Party of the Centre, a political party of German Catholics, was formed in 1870-71 following the merger of the Catholic groups in the Prussian Landtag and the German Reichstag (the deputies of these parties sat in the centre of the assembly hall). The Party of the Centre normally took a non-committal approach, manoeuvring between the pro-government parties and the left opposition in the Reichstag. It united different social sections among the Catholic clergy, landowners, bourgeois and part of the peasantry (mostly in small and medium states in Western and South-Western Germany), and supported their separatist and anti-Prussian leanings. Although in opposition to the Bismarck government, the Party of the Centre nevertheless voted for its repressive measures against the working-class and socialist movement. Engels described it in detail in his essays 'The Role of Force in History' (see present edition, Vol. 26) and 'What Now?' (Vol. 27). — 322, 325, 328
Page me45.503
†424 In his speech to the Reichstag on 16 September 1878, August Bebel refuted the groundless accusations against the Social-Democrats which had given Bismarck a pretext to introduce the Anti-Socialist Bill. He noted that time would show its pointlessness, since the Social-Democrats would be able to disseminate their ideas even working underground. — 322, 324, 326, 328
Page me45.503
†425 Opening the Reichstag session on 16 September 1878, Count Stolberg-Wernigerode stated the allied governments' conviction that ideas repudiating all norms of law and morality and seriously threatening the state and society had become prevalent among the general public. This, he said, was sufficient grounds for introducing an anti-socialist law. — 323

Page me45.503
†426 On 18 September 1878, The Standard, No. 16897, carried an article covering the debate on the Anti-Socialist Bill that had begun in the Reichstag on 16 September.
Page me45.503
Further on, Engels is referring to the telegraphic communication in the same issue of the newspaper: 'The German Parliament. The Anti-Socialist Bill. Speech of Prince Bismarck' dealing with the Reichstag sitting of 17 September. — 326

Page Break me45.504
Page me45.504
†427 On 27 September 1878, the Vorwärts, No. 114 (the 'Aus England, London, 20. September' section) featured extracts from a number of British newspapers dealing with the Anti-Socialist Bill. The Standard was not mentioned in the review. — 326
Page me45.504

Page me45.504
†428 The second French workers' congress held in Lyons on 28 January-8 February 1878 decided that an international socialist congress would be held in Paris in September, during the world industrial exhibition. Its convocation was initiated first and foremost by Jules Guesde. The French government banned the congress, but on 4 September the delegates assembled in Paris met unofficially, since it was already too late to try and convene a congress in Lausanne. The police dispersed the participants and arrested 38 people, Guesde among them. They appeared in court on 24 October.
Page me45.504
Carl Hirsch, who was present at the meeting as a reporter, was arrested on 6 September, kept in custody until 9 October, and then deported. — 327, 331, 338
Page me45.504
†429 Marx quoted from Petty's book A Treatise of Taxes and Contributions (London, 1667, p. 47) in Capital (see present edition, Vol. 35, Part I, Ch. I, Section 2). In his book Die Reform des Geldwesens (Berlin, 1869, S. 7), Adolph Samter reproduced this passage from Capital. — 329
Page me45.504
†430 On 3 March (19 February) 1878, Russia and Turkey signed a preliminary peace treaty in San Stefano (near Constantinople). The treaty's provisions included the establishment of an autonomous Bulgarian principality which would be nominally dependent on Turkey, state sovereignty for Serbia, Montenegro and Romania and their territorial expansion. It consolidated Russia's position in the Balkans, which brought counteraction on the part of Britain and Austria-Hungary, who even resorted to a show of strength (a British squadron entered the Sea of Marmara, etc.). Russia was thus forced to agree to the convocation of an international congress to revise those sections of the treaty that involved 'common European interests'. The congress, in which Russia, Britain, Austria-Hungary, Turkey, Germany, France and Italy took part, was held in Berlin between 13 (1) June and 13 (1) July 1878. It resulted in the Treaty of Berlin which significantly amended the provisions of the San Stefano Treaty. The territory of self-governing Bulgaria was cut by more than half, and the Bulgarian territories south of the Balkan Ridge were to form Eastern Rumelia, an autonomous province that remained under the Sultan; the territory of Montenegro was also to be substantially curtailed. The Treaty of Berlin confirmed the provision of the San Stefano Treaty that Russia was to receive back the part of Bessarabia severed from it in 1856 and sanctioned the occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary. After the Berlin congress the Balkans remained a focus of conflict, which led to the First World War. — 331, 384

Page me45.504

†431 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx, On Revolution. Translated by Saul K. Padover, New York, 1971. — 331

Page me45.504

†432 In his letter to Engels of 22 September 1878, Liebknecht expressed his condolences on the death of Lizzie Burns. — 331.

Page me45.504

†433 Having analysed the stenographic report, sent by Wilhelm Bracke, of the first debate of the Anti-Socialist Bill in the Reichstag, Marx outlined an article on the subject (see 'The Parliamentary Debate on the Anti-Socialist Law', present edition, Vol. 24). He did not carry out his plan to use this material for the British press. — 332

Page Break me45.505

Page me45.505

†434 As a threat of an armed conflict with Britain emerged in the course of the Russo-Turkish War of 1877-78, the tsarist government agreed on an alliance with Afghanistan. The Russian envoy Stoletov, who arrived in Kabul on 22 June 1878, made arrangements with the country's rulers for a Russo-Afghan treaty. However, having settled the Anglo-Russian differences, the tsarist government decided against such an alliance. — 332

Page me45.505

†435 Marx's letters to the British clergyman Moritz Kaufmann of 3 and 10 October 1878 are replies to the latter's request that he look through Kaufmann's article about himself, which was to appear in the Leisure Hour magazine in December 1878 and to be included in a book on the history of socialism he was preparing for publication. Kaufmann's book Utopias; or, Schemes of Social Improvement. From Sir Thomas More to Karl Marx came out in London in 1879. Marx read through the last two chapters. — 332, 333, 334

Page me45.505

†436 Marx may have had in mind the professor of political economy at Kiev University Nikolai Sieber, one of the first to popularise Marx's economic theory in Russia. In 1876-78, Sieber published a series of articles entitled Marx's Economic Theory and some polemic articles against the Russian critics of Marx, Yuli Zhukovsky and Boris Chicherin. — 334

Page me45.505

†437 In May 1876, Franz Mehring publicly accused Leopold Sonnemann of using his public position as editor of the Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt to engage in speculation during the Gründerjahre (see Note 118) and extract considerable profits. Sonnemann having denounced this accusation as slander, Franz Mehring had legal proceedings instituted against him. The court of the first instance found Sonnemann not guilty. In June 1877, the court of appeal found that Mehring's accusations were justified but still left Sonnemann unpunished. — 334

Page me45.505
†438 In the late 1850s, the Mexican government of Zuloaga and Miramón issued state bonds that became an object of large-scale speculation in France (see present edition, Vol. 19, p. 197). — 335
Page me45.505
†439 Marx most probably sent Moritz Kaufmann his article 'Mr. George Howell's History of the International Working-Men's Association' (see present edition, Vol. 24), a reply to Howell's 'The History of the International Association' (The Nineteenth Century, July 1878) presenting the International's history in a distorted way. — 335
Page me45.505
†440 Hermann Arnoldt, a Königsberg Social-Democrat and member of the local Johann Jacoby Fund committee (a fund for assisting the Social-Democratic press), requested Engels to accept for safekeeping the Fund's securities to the amount of about 3,000 marks, fearing confiscation by the Prussian government after the promulgation of the Anti-Socialist Law (see Note 462). — 335
Page me45.505
†441 This letter was occasioned by Marx's and Engels' attempts to get Liebknecht a job on the London Whitehall Review, since the Vorwärts, where he had been a member of staff, had been banned with the introduction of the Anti-Socialist Law in Germany on 21 October 1878.
Page me45.505
In 4 November, Marx sent a letter through a third party to Natalie Liebknecht, which she received on 14 November. Its contents are not known, but Liebknecht must have read it, since on 18 November he thanked Engels and Marx for their efforts to find him a job (see also this volume, p. 352). — 336

Page Break me45.506
Page me45.506
†442 As can be seen from the rough draft of this letter Marx had intended to alter the original arrangement of the text. The alterations have been taken into account in the present edition. — 336
Page me45.506
†443 Alfred Talandier's letter to the editor of La Marseillaise of 2 October 1878, which calumniated Maltman Barry, was printed by that newspaper on 6 October (No. 202) in the section 'Congrés ouvrier'. — 336
Page me45.506
†444 The International Labour Union (or League) was founded in London early in 1878 by several former members of the General Council of the IWMA, who had refused to recognise the resolutions of the Hague Congress (see Note 20). Acting jointly with the bourgeois radicals, including Charles Bradlaugh and Pratt, they unsuccessfully tried to reinstitute the International on their own platform. — 339
Page me45.506

†445 Alfred Talandier was the permanent Paris correspondent of The National Reformer edited by Charles Bradlaugh. — 340
Page me45.506
†446 The name partisans of the 'opportunist' republic in France was applied to moderate republicans (Gembetta, Grévy et al.), who fought against MacMahon's attempts to restore the monarchy (see notes 283 and 367). — 340
Page me45.506
†447 On 22 September 1878, The National Reformer, Vol. XXXII, No. 12, carried a short note alleging close relationship between Mr Maltman Barry and the Paris police. — 341
Page me45.506
†448 A reference to Napoleon III's wife Eugénie de Montijo de Guzmán who lived in England after the fall of the Second Empire; following her husband's death in 1873, she assumed leadership of the Bonapartist party. — 341
Page me45.506
†449 On 23 December 1871, The Eastern Post printed Marx's letter to the editor concerning Charles Bradlaugh's slanderous attacks on him (see present edition, Vol. 23, pp. 62-63).
Page me45.506
The same issue featured a report of the meeting of the International's General Council held on 19 December 1871 at which Marx had exposed Bradlaugh's activities. — 341
Page me45.506
†450 The address on the envelope is in Eleanor Marx's hand: 'N. Danielson, Esq., Société du Crédit Mutuel, Pont de Kazan, Maison Lessnikoff, St Petersburg, Russia.' — 343, 346, 353
Page me45.506
†451 On 28 October (9 November) 1878, Danielson informed Marx that six or seven months before he had written to him that the first volume of Capital had sold out and that the prospects for a second Russian edition were discussed. He requested Marx to let him know whether he was planning any changes to the text and asked for the proof-sheets of the second volume to be sent on to him as soon as they go in print. — 343
Page me45.506
†452 The polemics in the Russian press on the first volume of Marx's Capital in 1877-79 involved scholars and political writers and were opened by Yuli Zhukovsky's article 'Karl Marx and His Book on Capital' (Vestnik Yevropy, September 1877). The article provoked a number of replies, two of which Danielson had sent to Marx: N. Sieber's essay 'A Few Notes Apropos Yu. Zhukovsky's Article “Karl Marx and His Book on Capital”' (Otechestvenniye Zapiski, No. 11, November 1877) and N. Mikhailovsky's article 'Karl Marx

Page Break me45.507
Before the Tribunal of Mr Zhukovsky' (Otechestvenniye Zapiski, No. 10, October 1877), which prompted Marx to write to Otechestvenniye Zapiski (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 196-201). In 1878, sharp criticism of Marx was levelled in B.N. Chicherin's article 'The German Socialists: 2. Karl Marx' (Sbornik Gosudarstvennikh Znanii, Vol. VI, St. Petersburg, 1878). Sieber's article 'B. Chicherin contra K. Marx' (Slovo, February 1879) was a reply to it. — 344

Page me45.507
†453 The Civil War in America broke out in April 1861. The Southern slaveholders rose against the Union and formed the Confederacy of the Southern States. The war was caused mainly by the conflict between the two social systems: the capitalist system of wage labour established in the North and the slave system dominant in the South. The Civil War, which had the nature of a bourgeois-democratic revolution, passed two stages in its development: the period of a constitutional war for the maintenance of the Union and that of a revolutionary war for the abolition of slavery. The decisive role in the defeat of the Southern slaveholders and the victory of the North in April 1865 was played by the workers and farmers. Marx analysed the causes and the nature of the war in his articles published in the Viennese newspaper Die Presse (see present edition, Vol. 19). — 344, 357
Page me45.507
†454 The next two passages were quoted by Nikolai Danielson, in a somewhat modified form, in the preface to the first Russian edition of Volume Two of Capital, St Petersburg, 1885, p. XII. — 344
Page me45.507
†455 A reference to the following passage in the second German edition of Volume One of Capital: 'And, as a matter of fact, the value also of each single yard is but the materialised form of the same definite and socially fixed quantity of homogeneous human labour' (see also K. Marx, Capital, Vol. I, Part I, Chapter III, Section 2, present edition, Vol. 35). — 346
Page me45.507
†456 Cf. the French edition of Volume One of Capital, Part V, Ch. XVI: 'I always assume the actual state of affairs, which, with a few exceptions, prevails everywhere, i.e., that the capitalist pays all preliminary expenses, including the worker's wages.' — 346
Page me45.507
†457 Cf. K. Marx, Capital, Vol. I, Part V, Ch. XVI (present edition, Vol. 35). — 346
Page me45.507
†458 From 1877 Johann Philipp Becker was editor and publisher of the Swiss socialist journal Le Précurseur. — 348
Page me45.507
†459 This extract was first published, in German, in the catalogue Sotheby Parke Bernet and C°, London, 1963, as item No. 247. The letter was said to take up half a page and was rendered in English, up to the passage published in this volume, as follows: Marx 'informing his correspondent that he sent off three copies of Das Kapital and received payment for them'. The letter was purchased by an agent of the Maggs Brothers auctioneers; its subsequent fate is unknown. — 350
Page me45.507
†460 Marx is replying to Hugo Heller's letter of 9 January 1879, which stated that in his work Graf Bismarck und seine Leute während des Krieges mit Frankreich (Bd. II, Leipzig, 1878, S. 159) 'court flatterer' Moritz Busch represented Marx as preserver of the late King's life (probably Frederick William IV). Hugo Heller added that 'Champagne was still the King's undoing'.

Page me45.507

In his next letter, that of 10 February 1879, Heller apologised to Marx for misinterpreting this passage in Busch's book; in actual fact, the reference was not to Marx but to Mr Wiehr. Later, Heller copied out the pertinent passage and sent it on to Marx. — 350

Page Break me45.508

Page me45.508

†461 On 26 January 1879, Johann Philipp Becker wrote to Engels about the financial predicament his family was in now that he had lost his job as a correspondent following the introduction of the Anti-Socialist Law banning the entire socialist press. — 350

Page me45.508

†462 The Anti-Socialist Law (The Exceptional Law Against the Socialists) was introduced by the Bismarck government on a majority vote in the Reichstag on 21 October 1878 to combat the socialist and working-class movement. It banned all party and mass workers' organisations and the socialist and workers' press, and sanctioned confiscation of socialist literature and persecution of Social-Democrats. But the Social-Democratic Party, in accordance with the Constitution, preserved its group in the Reichstag. By skilfully combining illegal and legal methods of work and suppressing reformist and anarchist tendencies within its ranks, the party managed substantially to strengthen and extend its influence among the masses. Marx and Engels actively assisted the party's leaders.

Page me45.508

Under pressure from the working-class movement, the law was repealed on 1 October 1890. Engels examined it in his essay 'Bismarck and the German Working Men's Party' (present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 407-09). — 350, 383, 386, 389, 399, 413, 418, 428, 433

Page me45.508

†463 The theological system of John Calvin, a Protestant reformer of the 16th century, emphasised the doctrine of predestination and salvation solely by God's grace. — 351

Page me45.508

†464 During the strike and lockout of Geneva building workers in March-April 1868, the General Council of the International arranged for financial assistance to the strikers. Money was received from France, Germany, the United States, Britain, Austria and Belgium. — 351

Page me45.508

†465 A reference to Guillaume's resignation from the Jura Federation (it fell apart in 1878) of the so-called anarchist International and his departure from Switzerland to Paris in May 1878. — 351

Page me45.508

†466 The first issue of the Freiheit appeared in London on 4 January 1879. — 351

Page me45.508

†467 On 31 December 1878, the government submitted for the Reichstag's consideration a bill on its deputies' disciplinary responsibility (the so-called muzzle bill). It was spearheaded against the Social-Democratic deputies and the democratic opposition in the Reichstag and came up for debate on 4-7 March 1879. The bill granted a specially appointed commission the right to punish a deputy if 'he failed to show restraint in his attacks on speakers from among the opposition', and even expel him from the Reichstag. On 7 March, the deputies turned down the bill by a majority vote as infringing their democratic rights. — 351, 352

Page me45.508
†468 On 5 February 1879, the western constituency of Breslau (Wroclaw) held by-election occasioned by the death of the deputy Heinrich Bürgers. The ballot, conducted against the background of the Anti-Socialist Law (see Note 462), demonstrated the strength and unity of the working class. The workers' deputy Julius Kräcker failed to win a majority, but did poll over 7,500 votes. — 352
Page me45.508
†469 In the original 'von Fall zu Fall' — a phrase that came to designate unpredictable and indefinite policies. In connection with the Berlin Conference (1876) of Russia, Germany and Austria-Hungary (see Note 430), the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister Gyula Andrássy stated that the three great powers had not reached a definite decision on the Eastern Question but had agreed to coordinate their positions 'von Fall zu Fall'. Applying the phrase to Bismarck's policies, Engels puns on the word 'Fall', 'failure', changing the meaning of the expression to 'one cropper after another'. — 352

Page Break me45.509
Page me45.509
†470 In February 1879, The Times printed a number of articles dealing with Bismarck's finance policies. Some of them, e.g., the leader of 13 February 1879 devoted to the opening of the German Reichstag, questioned the purposes of Bismarck's protectionist policy. — 352
Page me45.509
†471 An extract from this letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, Correspondence. 1846-1895. A Selection with Commentary and Notes, Martin Lawrence Ltd., London, 1934. In a fuller form, it appeared in: Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Letters on 'Capital', New Park Publications Ltd., London, 1983. — 353
Page me45.509
†472 Marx is referring to Danielson's letter of 5 (17) February 1879, which contained a review of Russia's finance policies 'over the past 15 years'; the same day he sent Marx a large number of books on which the review was based. — 353
Page me45.509
†473 The text below (including the paragraph beginning: 'Thirdly: My medical adviser...') was quoted almost in full by Danielson in the preface to the first Russian edition of Volume Two of Capital, St Petersburg, 1885, pp. XIII-XIV. — 354
Page me45.509
†474 A reference to the world economic crises of 1857 and 1866 which seriously affected the British economy. — 354
Page me45.509
†475 The Bank Act of 1844 (An Act to Regulate the Issue of Bank-Notes, and for Giving to the Governor and Company of the Bank of England Certain Privileges for a Limited Period) was introduced by Robert Peel on 19 July 1844. It provided for the division of the Bank of England into two separate departments, each with its own cash account — the Banking Department, dealing exclusively with credit operations, and the Issue Department, issuing banknotes. The Act limited the number of banknotes in circulation and guaranteed them with definite gold and silver reserves that could not be used for the credit operations of the Banking Department. Further issues of banknotes were allowed only in the event of a corresponding increase in precious metal reserves.

Page me45.509
detailed description of the Act was given by Marx in Capital, Vol. III, Chapter XXXIV (see present edition, Vol. 37). — 355
Page me45.509
†476 A reference to the world industrial exhibition which opened in Paris on 1 May 1878. — 355
Page me45.509
†477 The Russian economist Illarion Kaufman had an article devoted to Volume One of Capital and entitled 'A Point of View of Politico-Economic Criticism in Karl Marx's Work' published anonymously in Vestnik Yevropy, St Petersburg (May 1872). Marx quoted it in the 'Afterword to the Second German Edition of Capital' (see present edition, Vol. 35). — 358
Page me45.509
†478 Reichenbach, an aspiring writer living in Paris, sent a letter and several books to Marx's address to be passed on to Rudolph Meyer. In a letter to Marx of 27 May 1879 Meyer apologised for the inconvenience caused and expressed a wish to meet him. — 359
Page me45.509
†479 J. Gugenheim, the secretary of the German Workers' Educational Society in London (see Note 55), had asked Engels to deliver 'a scientific lecture' there. — 360

Page Break me45.510
Page me45.510
†480 On 24 May 1879, the 'Socialpolitische Rundschau' column of the Freiheit criticised the Social-Democratic deputies' stand in the Reichstag on protective tariffs (see Note 502). — 360, 362
Page me45.510
†481 On 16 May, 1879 Engels sent a letter to Wilhelm Bracke (not extant) with the request that he forward it to August Bebel. As follows from Bebel's reply to Bracke of 24 May, Engels criticised Wilhelm Liebknecht's Reichstag speech on the introduction of the state of siege in Berlin (see Note 486) as evidence of the Social-Democrats' submission to the Anti-Socialist Law. — 360, 364
Page me45.510
†482 An extract from this letter was published in English for the first time in The Labour Monthly, Vol. 15, No. 9, IX, London, 1933. In full it appeared in: Marx and Engels, Selected Correspondence, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1955.
Page me45.510
The letter is written on the back of Bernstein's letter to Engels. — 360
Page me45.510

†483 A reference to the author of the articles on the British labour movement for the Zurich Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik. When making this request, Eduard Bernstein believed the author could be Engels himself (see this volume, p. 361). — 360
Page me45.510
†484 The writing of Anti-Dühring, which Engels began in late May 1876, caused him to postpone a number of scientific works he was planning or had already started, notably the Dialectics of Nature (see also Note 169). — 361
Page me45.510
†485 An excerpt from this letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx, Selected Works, in two volumes, Vol. II, Moscow-Leningrad, [1936]. — 364, 416
Page me45.510
†486 A reference to Liebknecht's speech in the Reichstag on 17 March 1879 on the introduction of the so-called local siege in Berlin and its environs. Liebknecht stated that the Social-Democratic Party would abide by the Anti-Socialist Law, being 'a party of reform in the strictest sense of the word'. His speech showed that some Social-Democratic leaders were undecided about the tactics to be adopted in the initial months following the introduction of the Anti-Socialist Law. — 364
Page me45.510
†487 An excerpt from this letter was published in English for the first time in: Marx, Engels, Lenin, On Scientific Communism, Progress Publishers, Moscow, 1967. It appeared almost in full in: Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Letters on 'Capital', New Park Publications Ltd., London, 1983. — 365
Page me45.510
†488 Marx is referring to Carlo Cafiero's pamphlet Il Capitale di Carlo Marx, which was a popular exposition of the first volume of Capital. It appeared in Italian in Milan in 1879. — 365
Page me45.510
†489 Nothing is known about what has happened to the original letter. There is a copy and a rough draft which largely coincide. Engels may have made the copy for Carl Hirsch (see Note 497). — 366
Page me45.510
†490 This refers to the preparations for the publication of the illegal newspaper Der Sozialdemokrat in Zurich, the new central printed organ of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany. The need for such a newspaper emerged after a ban on the entire party press, above all the Vorwärts, following the introduction of the Anti-Socialist Law in October 1878 (see Note 462). In July-September 1879, extensive correspondence on the political line of the new paper and its editors was maintained between August Bebel, Wilhelm Liebknecht, Louis Viereck (in Leipzig), Carl Hirsch (in Paris), Eduard Bernstein, Karl Höchberg, Carl August Schramm (in Zurich), and Marx and Engels (in London).

Page Break me45.511
Page me45.511
The campaign Marx and Engels conducted for a sound political line of the party's future central printed organ is fully expounded in their Circular Letter to August

Bebel, Wilhelm Liebknecht, Wilhelm Bracke and Others of 17-18 September 1879 (see this volume, pp. 394-408). — 367, 373, 374, 378, 383, 388, 393, 415
Page me45.511
†491 A phrase from Wilhelm Liebknecht's letter to Carl Hirsch of 28 July 1879 (see also this volume, p. 396), which Hirsch sent on to Marx and Engels. — 367
Page me45.511
†492 Bernstein's letter to Hirsch of 24 July 1879 is also quoted and mentioned by Marx and Engels in the Circular Letter (see this volume, p. 395). — 367, 373
Page me45.511
†493 Mentioned here is Eduard Bernstein's letter to Carl Hirsch of 31 July 1879. Marx and Engels quote it in their Circular Letter (see this volume, p. 395). — 367, 412
Page me45.511
†494 Marx and his daughter Eleanor (Tussy) left for Jersey on 8 August and stayed there until 20 August 1879. — 368, 369, 372, 409
Page me45.511
†495 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: Marx, Engels, On Literature and Art, Progress Publishers, Moscow, 1976 and in full in The Letters of Karl Marx, selected and translated with explanatory notes and an introduction by Saul K. Padover, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979. — 369
Page me45.511
†496 Between 5 and 7 August 1879, Engels, accompanied by Carl Schorlemmer, left for a holiday in Eastbourne. He returned to London on 28 August. — 369, 372, 376, 378, 380
Page me45.511
†497 Enclosed in Carl Hirsch's letter to Marx of 7 August 1879 was a copy of Engels' letter to August Bebel of 4 August (see this volume, pp. 366-68). Hirsch quoted the letter he had received from Liebknecht that day concerning the planned illegal party printed organ (see Note 490). Marx and Engels used this information for their Circular Letter to August Bebel, Wilhelm Liebknecht, Wilhelm Bracke and Others (see this volume, p. 395). — 369, 372
Page me45.511
†498 This letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx, On Education, Women and Children. Arranged and edited, with an introduction and new translations by Saul K. Padover. McGraw-Hill Book Company, New York, 1975. — 371
Page me45.511
†499 On 18 August 1879, Marx's daughter Jenny Longuet gave birth to a son, Edgar, in Ramsgate. — 371, 373, 376, 378, 381, 382
Page me45.511
†500 On 21 August 1879, Marx interrupted his stay in Jersey (see Note 494) and arrived in Ramsgate to join his daughter Jenny and her newborn son Edgar. He returned to London on 17 September. — 372, 374, 378, 381, 385, 388, 390, 393, 394, 409, 415
Page me45.511
†501 Marx and Engels included a concise exposition of Liebknecht's letter to Engels of 14 August 1879 in the Circular Letter (see this volume, p. 396). Engels' reply is not extant. — 372, 378
Page me45.511

†502 A reference to the speech made by the socialist deputy Max Kayser with the consent of the Social-Democratic group in the Reichstag on 17 May 1879 in defence of the government plan to introduce protective tariffs. Marx and Engels sharply criticised Kayser, who supported a proposal made in the interests of big industrialists and landowners and prejudicial to the mass of the population. They also condemned the lenient attitude displayed towards it by some of the German Social-Democratic leaders (see this volume, pp. 396-401). — 373, 424

Page Break me45.512

Page me45.512

†503 The first volume of the Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik edited by Karl Höchberg under the assumed name of Dr Ludwig Richter, appeared in Zurich in August 1879; Engels received this issue on 28 August, immediately after his return from Eastbourne. — 374

Page me45.512

†504 Carl Hirsch described the circumstances of his arrest and deportation from France in August 1879 in a letter to Engels of 23 August 1879. — 374, 412

Page me45.512

†505 Engels' letter to Carl Hirsch, which contained excerpts from Wilhelm Liebknecht's letter to Engels of 14 August 1879 (see Note 501), has not been found. — 375

Page me45.512

†506 Engels answered Karl Höchberg's letter of 24 August 1879 on 26 August (see this volume, pp. 379-80).

Page me45.512

reply to Bebel's letter to Engels of 20 August 1879 was the Circular Letter to August Bebel, Wilhelm Liebknecht, Wilhelm Bracke and Others (see this volume, pp. 394-408). — 375, 386, 397

Page me45.512

†507 An excerpt from this letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx, On America and the Civil War. Edited and translated by Saul K. Padover, New York, 1972. In full, it appeared in The Letters of Karl Marx, selected and translated with explanatory notes and an introduction by Saul K. Padover, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979. — 376

Page me45.512

†508 The inaugural speech made by George James Allman, President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, in Sheffield on 20 August 1879 at the opening of the Association's 49th annual congress, was printed in the London journal Nature on 21 August. — 377

Page me45.512

†509 Engels' letter to Liebknecht of 20 August 1879 mentioned here has not been found (see this volume, p. 372).

Page me45.512

August Bebel, who wrote to Engels on the same day, could not possibly have known what it was about. — 378, 394

Page me45.512
†510 The address on the envelope in Engels' hand is: 'Den Heer Karl Höchberg, Dr. phil. Hôtel Ealeries, Scheveningen, Holland.' — 379
Page me45.512
†511 In his letter of 24 August Karl Höchberg wrote that, as far as he was informed, Engels had refused to contribute to Der Sozialdemokrat because of Carl Hirsch's unfavourable reports.
Page me45.512
On the real reasons why Marx and Engels refused to contribute to the paper, see this volume, pp. 412-13. — 379
Page me45.512
†512 On 24 August 1879, Johann Most wrote to Marx that the Chicagoer Arbeiter Zeitung had published Carl Lübeck's report alleging Marx and Engels had made an official statement against the Freiheit. Johann Most asked Marx to let him know whether or not this was true. — 381, 414
Page me45.512
†513 A reference to the programmatic article 'Rückblicke auf die sozialistische Bewegung in Deutschland' which appeared anonymously in the Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik, Jg. 1, 1. Hälfte, Zürich-Oberstrass, 1879, S. 75-96. Its authors were Karl Höchberg (pen-name Ludwig Richter), Eduard Bernstein and Carl August Schramm. Marx and Engels examined it in detail in the Circular Letter (this volume, pp. 401-08). — 383, 386, 389, 393, 394, 413, 420, 430, 432

Page Break me45.513
Page me45.513
†514 The Freiheit of 30 August 1879, and its sample issue called 'Was nun?' of 6 September carried two articles criticising the first volume of the Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Socialpolitik from an anarchist viewpoint. The first article, printed in the 'Socialpolitische Rundschau' column, reviewed the materials featured by the Jahrbuch and the second, 'Auch eine Denkschrift', analysed the article 'Rückblicke auf die sozialistische Bewegung in Deutschland'. — 383, 386
Page me45.513
†515 At the time of the Russo-Turkish War of 1877-78, Britain, which feared a partition of Turkey, decided to prevent the Russian troops from entering Constantinople by threatening to break off diplomatic relations. To avoid a conflict, the tsarist government agreed to the San Stefano Peace Treaty (see Note 430). — 384
Page me45.513
†516 A reference to the meeting between Alexander II and William I, which took place on 3 and 4 September 1879 in Alexandrovo, not far from the Russian-German border. — 384
Page me45.513
†517 See K. Marx, 'Second Address of the General Council of the International Working Men's Association on the Franco-Prussian War' (present edition, Vol. 22, pp. 263-70).
Page me45.513

The attempt by Bismarck's government to provoke a new war with France in 1873-74 failed due to the negative attitude taken by the governments of Austria, Britain and Russia. — 384
Page me45.513
†518 The Seven Years' War (1756-63) — a war by Britain and Prussia against Austria, France, Russia, Saxony and Sweden. It led to France ceding many of its colonies (including Canada and almost all its possessions in the East Indies) to Britain, while Prussia, Austria and Saxony were obliged to recognise, in the main, its pre-war frontiers. — 387
Page me45.513
†519 In his articles 'Die Zolldebatte' and 'Zur Kaiser'schen Rede und Abstimmung' in Die Laterne, a weekly he was publishing (Nos 21 and 23, 25 May and 8 June 1879), Carl Hirsch scathingly criticised the speech made in the Reichstag by Max Kayser, who supported the government plan to introduce protective customs tariffs (see Note 502). — 388, 397, 414, 418
Page me45.513
†520 An ironic allusion to what Napoleon III said on 26 August 1867 in Lille: 'For 14 years many of my hopes have been fulfilled and great success has been attained, but our horizon has also been darkened by black clouds.' — 389
Page me45.513
†521 The Treaty of Paris concluded the Crimean War (1853-56). It was signed by representatives of Austria, Britain, France, Prussia, Sardinia and Turkey, on the one hand, and of Russia, on the other, at the Congress of Paris on 30 March 1856. Under the treaty, Russia, which lost the war, ceded the Danube delta and part of southern Bessarabia, renounced its protectorate over the Danubian Principalities and agreed to the neutralisation of the Black Sea (involving the closure of the Straits to foreign warships and a ban on Russia and Turkey maintaining navies and naval arsenals on the Black Sea). By skilfully exploiting the differences betweeen Britain and France, the Russian diplomats at the congress succeeded in obtaining peace on mitigated terms. — 389
Page me45.513
†522 The 12th annual British Trades Union Congress took place in Edinburgh between 15 and 20 September 1879. — 391
Page me45.513
†523 This letter was probably written on 12 September, Friday, as a reply to Engels' letter of 11 September 1879 (14 September was a Sunday). — 392

Page Break me45.514
Page me45.514
†524 An extract from this letter was published in English for the first time in the magazine International Press Correspondence, No. 39, Berlin, 1931; minus the introduction (address to August Bebel), the letter was published in English in: Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, Correspondence. 1846-1895. A Selection with Commentary and Notes, Martin Lawrence Ltd., London, 1934. It appears in full in the present edition, Vol. 24. — 394
Page me45.514

†525 This letter, intended by Marx and Engels for 'private circulation among the German leaders' (see this volume, p. 414), is a major document of their struggle against reformism and for the revolutionary programme of the Social-Democratic party.
Page me45.514
The draft was written by Engels in mid-September 1879, discussed with Marx on 17 September, and despatched with their signatures.
Page me45.514
The italics in the letters of the third parties quoted by Engels are his own. — 394
Page me45.514
†526 Carl Hirsch received Wilhelm Liebknecht's letter of 28 July 1879, of which he informed Marx on 2 August. — 395
Page me45.514
†527 The Leipzig controlling committee comprised August Bebel, Wilhelm Liebknecht, Friedrich Wilhelm Fritzsche, Karl Grillenberger and Ignaz Auer. Misled by Carl Hirsch's information, Marx and Engels believed that one of the members was Louis Viereck, not Fritzsche. — 395
Page me45.514
†528 Hirsch and Höchberg met in Paris on 15 and 16 August 1879. — 397
Page me45.514
†529 An ironic reference to the German Workers' Educational Society in London (see Note 55). The Freiheit was the Society's printed organ (see also p. 360). — 398
Page me45.514
†530 Hirsch received the information from Höchberg when they met in Paris in August 1879, and passed it on to Engels in a letter of 23 August. — 398
Page me45.514
†531 Bismarck's plan to introduce Imperial administration over all German railways was discussed at the Gotha Congress of the Social-Democrats in August 1876. The congress approved the transfer of private railways to the state but noted that their takeover by the Imperial government would promote the interests of the bourgeoisie and militarist quarters (see Protokoll des Socialisten-Congresses zu Gotha vom 19. bis 23. August 1876, Berlin, 1876, S. 89). — 400
Page me45.514
†532 Barricade fighting in Berlin on 18 March 1848 marked the beginning of the 1848-49 revolution in Germany. — 404
Page me45.514
†533 An ironic allusion to the fact that Johann Miquel, a right-wing National Liberal leader (see Note 540), was founder and member of various joint-stock companies. As a young man, he was a member of the Communist League. — 405
Page me45.514
†534 This note is written on a postcard addressed to: 'Carl Hirsch, Esq., 12 Fitzroy Street, Fitzroy Square, W.' — 409
Page me45.514
†535 In his letter to Marx of 30 August (11 September) 1879, Danielson wrote about the publication of the first part of Maxim Kovalevsky's 'very interesting work' Communal Landownership and the Causes, Course and Consequences of Its Disintegration and offered to send a copy to Marx if he had not yet received one from the author. Marx began a study of the work in October, making detailed notes on the nature of the commune and its place and socio-economic role in different epochs and among different nations. — 409

Page Break me45.515
Page me45.515
†536 This letter was written on the back of Maltman Barry's letter to Engels of 8 October 1879. On Marx's advice, Barry requested Engels to give his comments on Carl Blind's article 'Prince Napoleon and European Democracy' printed by Fraser's Magazine, No. 118, October 1879. Nothing further is known about this matter. — 415
Page me45.515
†537 A rough draft of this letter is extant which essentially coincides with the letter published in this volume. The passages crossed out in the draft, as well as additions contained in it, are given in the footnotes. — 416
Page me45.515
†538 August Bebel's letter to Engels of 23 October 1879 (see notes 541, 543 and 544) and that of Friedrich Wilhelm Fritzsche and Wilhelm Liebknecht of 21 October enclosed with it, were a reply to Marx's and Engels' Circular Letter to the leaders of the German Social-Democratic Party (see this volume, pp. 394-408).
Page me45.515
Fritzsche and Liebknecht considered Marx's and Engels' criticism of their conciliatory attitude to the reformist policies advocated by Karl Höchberg, Carl August Schramm and Eduard Bernstein to be unwarranted. — 416
Page me45.515
†539 Engels is referring to the smuggling into Germany of the Social-Democratic newspapers Die Laterne and Der Sozialdemokrat printed abroad after the introduction of the Anti-Socialist Law (see Note 462). — 417
Page me45.515
†540 National Liberals — the party of German (mostly Prussian) bourgeoisie formed in the autumn of 1866 after the split in the Party of Progress (see Note 312). The policies it pursued showed that a significant part of the liberal bourgeoisie had given up the claim to expanding its sphere of influence and capitulated to the Bismarck government. After the unification of Germany in 1871 the National Liberal Party acquired its final shape as a party of the big bourgeoisie, above all industrial tycoons. — 417

Page me45.515
†541 August Bebel tried to justify the tactics of the Social-Democratic deputies in the debate of protective tariffs in the Reichstag (see Note 502) by referring to the resolution passed by the party congresses in 1876 and 1877. It stated that the issue had no major significance for the party and that, this being so, party members are allowed to act as they saw fit. — 418
Page me45.515
†542 A reference to the 'Rechenschaftsbericht der sozialdemokratischen Mitglieder des deutschen Reichstages' signed by Bebel, Bracke, Fritzsche, Kayser, Liebknecht, and other deputies and carried by Der Sozialdemokrat, Nos. 2-4, 12, 19 and 26 October 1879. — 419, 424

Page me45.515
†543 August Bebel wrote to Engels about Karl Höchberg's selfless financial assistance to the Social-Democratic Party of Germany. — 420
Page me45.515
†544 August Bebel, Wilhelm Liebknecht, Friedrich Wilhelm Fritzsche and other Social-Democratic leaders insisted that they had had nothing to do with the article by Karl Höchberg, Eduard Bernstein and Carl August Schramm, 'Rückblicke auf die sozialistische Bewegung in Deutschland' (see Note 513). — 422
Page me45.515
†545 After a fierce clash between the revolutionary delegates headed by Jules Guesde and the reformist wing, the third French workers' congress (Marseilles, October 1879) resolved to form an independent workers' party in France. — 422
Page me45.515
†546 On 18 November 1879, August Bebel wrote to Engels that the reference in Ignaz Auer's article, marked 'Von der Niederelbe, 23. Oktober' and printed anonymously by Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 5, 2 November 1879 (see also this volume, pp. 420-21), was to Most, not to Engels. The explanation was that, at the time, Auer had not yet familiarised himself with Marx's and Engels' Circular Letter to the German Social-Democratic leaders.

Page Break me45.516
Page me45.516
In 11 December, Bebel informed Engels that he had received a letter from Auer who assured him that he had meant Most and Erhardt, not Engels. — 423, 429
Page me45.516
†547 Engels probably did not read the review of Rudolph Meyer's Politische Gründer und die Corruption in Deutschland published by the Vorwärts, No. 27, 4 March 1877. — 424
Page me45.516
†548 The editorial 'Zur Eröffnung des sächsischen Landtages', printed in Der Sozialdemokrat on 16 November 1879, stated that the three Social-Democrats elected to the Saxon Landtag (Wilhelm Liebknecht, Otto Freytag and Ludwig Puttrich) had taken the oath of allegiance to King William I. This legal procedure enabled them to perform their duties as deputies.
Page me45.516
Reporting this on 22 November 1879 in the 'Socialpolitische Rundschau' column, the Freiheit edited by Most sharply criticised the behaviour of the Social-Democratic deputies. — 425, 430
Page me45.516
†549 The Thirty Years' War (1618-48) — a European war in which the Pope, the Spanish and the Austrian Habsburgs and the German Catholic princes rallied under the banner of Catholicism against the Protestant countries. The rulers of Catholic France — rivals of the Habsburgs — supported the Protestant camp. — 425
Page me45.516

†550 On 23 November, Der Sozialdemokrat carried August Bebel's review of Bernhard Becker's Geschichte und Theorie der Pariser revolutionären Kommune des Jahres 1871. The book, written by 'a drunkard and wastrel', as he put it, was 'libel against socialists and the Commune'. — 425
Page me45.516
†551 The addressee of this note is not quite certain. The note is to be found in the autograph album belonging to the French revolutionary Gustave Brocher who resided in London from 1876. A facsimile of the note is included in the book Letter to G.P. Brocher. The Last Communard of 1871. Les Anciennes. P. Kropotkin, P.L. Lavrov (published in Russian in Paris in 1924) and is supplied with a caption that reads: 'A genuine letter by Karl Marx addressed to Professor Brocher in 1879 in English. The author of the letter asks Brocher to dinner.' These facts give reasons to believe that Marx's unknown correspondent was Gustave Brocher.
Page me45.516
There is, however, another hypothesis. In April 1883, Brocher requested Engels to send him Marx's autograph and wrote again on 2 July to thank him for it. Marx's note to the unknown correspondent could have been this autograph. — 427
Page me45.516
†552 The original of this letter as well as Marx's letter to Charles Walstone of 26 January 1880 (see present edition, Vol. 46) are kept in Lord Walstone's family archive. In 1968 he passed on their photocopies to the Institute of Marxism-Leninism of the CC CPSU, Moscow. According to Lord Walstone, the addressee was his father, the British archaeologist Charles Walstone, who at that time had his father's family name, Waldstein.
Page me45.516
Marx must have met Lord Walstone's father during a lecture at the British Museum. — 427
Page me45.516
†553 Engels is answering Thomas Allsop's letter of 12 December 1879, in which the latter asked for Engels' opinion of the article from The Pall Mall Gazette enclosed in the letter. Allsop did not mention the title of the article or the date of the paper, so it can only be conjectured that this was one of the four articles dealing with the crisis of the autocracy in Russia printed on 4, 9, 10 and 12 December by The Pall Mall Gazette: 'The Czar and His People', 'Kill or Cure for Russian Despotism', 'What Next in Russia' and 'The Collapse of Authority in Russia'. — 428

Page Break me45.517
Page me45.517
†554 At the Reichstag elections of 30 July 1878, 437, 158 votes were cast for the Social-Democrats throughout the country, including 6,253 in Magdeburg. Wilhelm Bracke became a Social-Democratic deputy.
Page me45.517
In additional election to the Reichstag was held in Magdeburg not on Thursday, as Engels states, but on Wednesday, 10 December 1879. It was conducted against the background of the Anti-Socialist Law (see Note 462), but the Social-Democrats managed to get their deputy Louis Viereck, who had won over 4,000 votes out of the total of more than 14,000, take part in the second ballot. The Social-Democrats' influence was clearly growing. — 428, 431

Page me45.517
†555 Engels quotes from 'Preßgeschichtliche Rückblicke' published in Der Sozialdemokrat on 7 December 1879 with minor changes. — 429
Page me45.517
†556 August Bebel wrote to Engels on 11 December 1879: 'Specifically on the issue of the oath, I hold a different opinion. I, too, believed that the oath had to be taken; if one refused to take it, then one needn't have participated in the elections. But I should like it ... to be stated that we regard the oath only as a formality that has to be observed because without it no access to the chamber and no use of the mandate are possible. The oath does not shake our socialist republican convictions'. — 431
Page me45.517
†557 Wailers (Heuler) — the name which the republican democrats in Germany applied in 1848-49 to the moderate constitutionals, who, in turn, called their opponents 'agitators' (Wühler). — 431
Page me45.517
†558 In his letter of 16 December 1879, Johann Philipp Becker wrote to Engels that he had been invited by Karl Höchberg, Eduard Bernstein and Wilhelm Liebknecht to contribute to the Sozialdemokrat. — 433
Page me45.517
†559 In a letter to Engels of 16 December 1879, Johann Philipp Becker raved against the activities of the anarchists in Geneva. — 434
Page me45.517
†560 Constitutionals — representatives of the liberal opposition movement advocating moderate constitutional reform in Russia. — 434
Page me45.517
†561 The rough draft of this letter was written on the spare page of one Amelie Engel's letter to Engels, in which she asked for financial assistance. Nothing further is known about Engels' letter. — 434
Page me45.517
†562 These summaries of Marx's letters to Hirsch were made by the French police and kept in Hirsch's file in the Paris Police Prefecture's archive.
Page me45.517
Marx's original letters were confiscated during Hirsch's arrest on 6 September 1878. The Vorwärts, No. 111 of 20 September (Supplement), reported this in the correspondence from Paris of 9 September. — 439
Page me45.517
†563 In his letter of 13 April 1876, Henri Oriol wrote that his request for a review of the French edition of the first volume of Capital 'was purely personal' and connected with his wish to help with republican propaganda. — 439
Page me45.517
†564 Marx labels Alexander II a child murderer because of the harsh sentence given in St Petersburg in March 1877 to 47 young people aged between 18 and 23, members of one of the Narodnik (Populist) organisations ('the trial of 50').

Page Break me45.518

They were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, deportation to Siberia and hard labour. The trial attracted close public attention both in Russia and abroad. — 440

Page me45.518

†565 Jenny Marx's article was published anonymously in the morning issue of the Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt on 21 November 1875 under the heading 'Aus der Londoner Theaterwelt'. It was the first in the series of her articles dealing with English theatre and cultural life, and was devoted to Henry Irving, the best Shakespearian actor of the time. Until May 1877, Jenny Marx wrote four more articles for the Frankfurter Zeitung. — 441

Page me45.518

†566 Carl Hirsch was the Paris correspondent of the Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt. — 441

Page me45.518

†567 The phrase 'La garde meurt et ne se rend pas!' (The guard dies, it does not surrender) is ascribed to the French general Cambronne, Brigade Commander of the Old Guard in the Battle of Waterloo on 18 June 1815. It was a reply to the British envoy's demand to surrender. After Cambronne's death, these words were engraved on a monument to him in Nantes. — 443

Page me45.518

†568 A reference to the first French edition of Volume One of Capital which appeared in instalments between 1872 and 1875. The last instalments published, they were sewn and sold as a book.

Page me45.518

The exchange of separate instalments for the sewn copies was done for Marx by Henri Oriol. Having failed to obtain permission for the exchange from Adolphe Quêst (see Note 38), he purchased the missing instalments, sew them and sent over 40 copies of Capital to Marx after December 1876. — 445

Page me45.518

†569 Jenny Marx expresses her commiseration to Sorge upon the death of his daughter Clothilde in February 1873 and his 14-year-old son Max in October 1874. — 446

Page me45.518

†570 Prosper Lissagaray's Histoire de la Commune de 1871 was published in 1886 in Eleanor Marx's translation. — 447

Page me45.518

†571 Having taken permanent residence in France in 1868, Lafargue gave up his medical career and devoted himself to journalism and politics. — 448

Page me45.518

†572 This is Jules Guesde's reply to Marx's non-extant letter of early 1879.

Page me45.518

In extract from this letter was published in English for the first time in Science & Society. A Marxian Quarterly, Vol. IV, No. 1, New York, 1940.

Page me45.518

This is the first time the letter has been published at such length in English. — 450

Page me45.518

†573 Having emigrated to Switzerland in the summer of 1871, Jules Guesde sided with the anarchists and supported their campaign against the General Council of the International. — 450
Page me45.518
†574 In April 1877, a small group of anarchists led by Carlo Cafiero and Enrice Malatesta tried to stage a revolt in the Italian province of Benevento, which ended in a fiasco. In June 1877, Jules Guesde sharply denounced the adventurist actions of Cafiero and other Bakuninists. — 451
Page me45.518
†575 Jules Guesde arrived in London in May 1880 to discuss the programme of the French Workers' Party with Marx, Engels and Lafargue. They met at Engels' flat, where Marx dictated the preamble to the programme (see present edition, Vol. 24, p. 340).

Page Break me45.519
Page me45.519
The practical part of the programme was drafted by Guesde with Lafargue's assistance, and Marx and Engels introduced a number of more precise definitions. — 451
Page me45.519
†576 The present extract was written down by the Russian historian Nikolai Kareyev on the basis of Maxim Kovalevsky's oral translation from English into Russian and published by Kareyev in the Byloye (The Past) magazine, No. 20, 1922 in the article 'Karl Marx's Letter to M.M. Kovalevsky on the Physiocrats'.
Page me45.519
The letter was published in English for the first time in The Letters of Karl Marx, selected and translated with explanatory notes and an introduction by Saul K. Padover, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood, Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979. — 452
Page me45.519
†577 A reference to Nikolai Kareyev's book The Peasants and the Peasant Question in France in the Last Quarter of the 18th Century, a copy of which was sent to Marx by Maxim Kovalevsky with the author's permission. As follows from Kareyev's article (see Note 576), Marx thanked Kovalevsky for the book in the opening (non-extant) part of the letter. — 452
Page me45.519
†578 See K. Marx, The Economic Manuscript of 1861-63 [John Gray. Polemics against the Landed Aristocracy from the Physiocrats' Viewpoint] (present edition, Vol. 34). — 452

Page Break me45.520

NAME INDEX

Page me45.520
A

Page me45.520

Abdul Aziz (1830-1876) — Sultan of Turkey (1861-76); deposed on 30 May 1876 and assassinated on 4 June. — 120, 123
Page me45.520
Abdul Hamid II (1842-1918) — Sultan of Turkey (1876-1909). — 250, 280, 296
Page me45.520
Abdul Kader Bey — Turkish statesman, supreme judge of Constantinople and Anatolia; representative at the Russo-Turkish peace negotiations in Adrianople (1829). — 302
Page me45.520
Abdul Kerim Pasha (1807-1885) — Turkish military leader, Generalissimo (from 1876); commander-in-chief of the Turkish army at the beginning of the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78, was removed in 1877. — 228, 250, 255, 260
Page me45.520
Abeele, Henri van den (b. 1847) — Belgian merchant, anarchist; delegate to the Hague Congress of the International (1872); expelled from the International by the General Council's decision of 30 May 1873. — 156
Page me45.520
Aberdeen, George Hamilton Gordon, Earl of (1784-1860) — British Tory statesman; leader of the Peelites from 1850; Foreign Secretary (1828-30, 1841-46) and Prime Minister of the Coalition Ministry (1852-55). — 301, 303
Page me45.520
Acollas, Émile (1826-1891) — French lawyer and politician, socialist radical. — 259
Page me45.520
Acton — lawyer in Manchester. — 20
Page me45.520
Adcock — one of Marx's witnesses when he applied for British naturalisation in 1874. — 28
Page me45.520
Agoult, Marie Catherine Sophie de Flavigny, comtesse d' (pseudonym Daniel Stern) (1805-1876) — French writer. — 143
Page me45.520
Alexander II (1818-1881) — Emperor of Russia (1855-81). — 18, 22, 140, 156, 169-70, 191, 233, 234, 278, 299, 303, 384, 440
Page me45.520
Alexander Alexandrovich (1845-1894) — heir to the throne, later Emperor Alexander III of Russia (1881-94). — 278
Page me45.520
Allen, George — English physician, Marx's family doctor. — 294, 356
Page me45.520
Allman, George James (1812-1898) — English biologist. — 116, 377
Page me45.520
Allsop — Thomas Allsop's wife. — 159, 160
Page me45.520
Allsop, Thomas (1795-1880) — English democrat, former Chartist; collaborated with Marx in helping the refugees of the Paris Commune; friend of Marx's family and Engels. — 159, 160, 213, 221-22, 263, 292-93, 298-99, 307-08, 428-29

Page Break me45.521

Page me45.521
Anderson, Elisabeth (née Garrett) (1836-1917) — an English author, the first woman to qualify as a medical doctor in England. — 29, 31
Page me45.521
Andrássy, Julius (Gyula), Count (1823-1890) — Hungarian statesman, championed the interests of the nobility; Prime Minister of Hungary (from 1867), Minister of Foreign Affairs of Austria-Hungary (1871-79). — 155
Page me45.521
Arnim, Harry, Count von (1824-1881) — German diplomat, envoy (1871) and Ambassador (1872-74) to Paris; opposed Bismarck; condemned for appropriating diplomatic papers (1874); emigrated to Nice to evade punishment. — 16, 121
Page me45.521
Arnoldt, Hermann — German merchant in Königsberg, Social-Democrat. — 335
Page me45.521
Arnould, Arthur (1833-1895) — French novelist and journalist, follower of Proudhon; member of the Paris Commune; after the Commune was suppressed emigrated to Switzerland where contributed to anarchist newspapers. — 157, 440
Page me45.521
Auer, Ignaz (1846-1907) — German saddler, Social-Democrat, a leader of the German Social-Democratic Workers' Party; deputy to the Reichstag several times. — 69, 96, 98, 398, 420, 421, 423, 429
Page me45.521
Auerbach, Berthold (1812-1882) — German writer of stories idealising the small peasantry; later an apologist of Bismarck. — 137
Page me45.521
Augusti, Berta (née Schoeler) (1827-1886) — German authoress, Marx's acquaintance. — 416
Page me45.521
Avrial, Augustin Germain (1840-1904) — prominent figure in the French working-class movement; mechanical engineer; Left Proudhonist; member of the Federal Council of the Paris sections of the International (1870); member of the Paris Commune; after its suppression emigrated to England. — 42
Page me45.521
B

Page me45.521
Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814-1876) — Russian democrat, journalist; took part in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany; an ideologist of Narodism (Populism) and anarchism; opposed Marxism in the International; was expelled from the International at the Hague Congress (1872) for his splitting activities. — 41, 59, 64, 69, 85, 132, 207, 351
Page me45.521
Balzac, Honoré de (1799-1850) — French realist novelist. — 324
Page me45.521

Bamberger, Ludwig (1823-1899) — German journalist, democrat; took part in the Baden-Palatinate uprising of 1849; later emigrated to Switzerland, England, Holland, in the 1850s — to France; later National Liberal, deputy to the Reichstag (1871-93). — 322, 324, 335
Page me45.521
Bancroft, Hubert Howe (1832-1918) — American historian. — 261
Page me45.521
Barry, Maltman (1842-1909) — English journalist, member of the International, delegate to the Hague Congress (1872), member of the General Council (1871-72) and the British Federal Council (1872-74); supported Marx and Engels in their struggle against Bakuninists and reformist leaders; after the International continued to take part in the English socialist movement; contributed to The Standard as well as to other newspapers. — 10, 92, 206, 209, 261, 266-67, 270, 277, 327-28, 331, 336-42, 352, 415
Page me45.521
Bastelica, André Augustin (1845-1884) — prominent figure in the French and Spanish working-class movement; printer; member of the International, Bakuninist, member of the General Council of the International (1871), delegate to the London Conference of 1871. — 42, 156, 184
Page me45.521
Bastiat, Frédéric (1801-1850) — French economist and politician. — 153, 346

Page Break me45.522

Page me45.522
Baudeau, Nicolas (1730-1792) — French abbé, economist, Physiocrat. — 265
Page me45.522
Bayer, Karl Robert von (pseudonym Robert Byr) (1835-1902) — German novelist. — 107
Page me45.522
Bazaine, François Achille (1811-1888) — marshal of France, commanded a French corps in Mexico (1863-67); during the Franco-Prussian war commanded the Army of the Rhine; capitulated at Metz on 27 October 1870. — 35, 251
Page me45.522
Beaconsfield, Earl of — see Disraeli, Benjamin
Page me45.522
Beaumarchais, Pierre Augustin Caron de (1732-1799) — French dramatist. — 324
Page me45.522
Beaumont de — MacMahon's sister-in-law. — 246, 440
Page me45.522
Bebel, August (1840-1913) — prominent figure in the German and international working-class movement, turner; member of the International; deputy to the North German (1867-70) and the German Reichstag (1871-81 and from 1883); a founder and leader of German Social-Democracy, championed the Paris Commune; friend and associate of Marx and Engels; leader of the Second International. — 7, 60, 65, 66, 69, 85, 96, 97, 99-101, 157, 227, 322, 324, 326, 328, 366-68, 375, 378, 386-87, 393-94, 397, 408, 412-13, 416, 417, 419, 420-26, 429-32

Page me45.522
Becker, Bernhard (1826-1891) — German journalist and historian; follower of Lassalle; President of the General Association of German Workers (1864-65); member of the German Social-Democratic Workers' Party (from 1870); delegate to the Hague Congress of the International (1872). — 30, 70, 95, 98, 120, 151, 152, 166, 266, 269
Page me45.522
Becker, Johann Philipp (1809-1886) — prominent figure in the international working-class movement; brushmaker; took part in the German and Swiss revolutionary democratic movement in the 1830s and 1840s and in the 1848-49 revolution, commanded the Baden people's army during the 1849 Baden-Palatinate uprising; active member of the International, delegate to all its congresses and to the London Conference (1865); friend and associate of Marx and Engels. — 5, 173-75, 183, 200, 214, 215, 293, 348-49, 350, 364, 383-85, 392, 410, 415, 432-34, 442-44
Page me45.522
Beckx, Pierre Jean (1795-1887) — Belgian clergyman, General of the Society of Jesus (1853-84). — 289
Page me45.522
Beesly, Edward Spencer (1831-1915) — British historian and radical politician; positivist philosopher; chaired at the Inaugural Meeting of the International on 28 September 1864 in London; supported the International and the Paris Commune in 1870-71. — 213
Page me45.522
Behr, B. — German publisher. — 100
Page me45.522
Beifuß — treasurer of a US section of the International. — 29
Page me45.522
Berg, Fyodor Fyodorovich, Count (Berg, Friedrich Wilhelm Rembert) (1793-1874) — Russian field-marshal, Governor General of Finland (1855-63), Viceroy of the Kingdom of Poland (1863-73). — 169
Page me45.522
Bernstein, Aaron (pseudonym A. Rebenstein) (1812-1884) — German publicist, democrat, founder (1853) and editor of the Volks-Zeitung; Eduard Bernstein's uncle. — 411
Page me45.522
Bernstein, Eduard (1850-1932) — German Social-Democrat, publicist, editor of Der Sozialdemokrat (1881-90); came out with open revision of Marxism after Engels' death. — 360-63, 366, 367, 373-75, 381, 386, 393, 395, 397-99, 401, 402, 404, 406, 408, 411-13, 417, 422, 429
Page me45.522
Betham-Edwards, Matilda Barbara (1836-1919) — English novelist. — 79-81, 92
Page me45.522
Beust, Friedrich Ferdinand, Count von (1809-1886) — Saxon and Austrian statesman, champion of independence of lesser German states; Foreign Minister (1866-71) and Chancellor (1867-71) of Austria-Hungary; Ambassador to London (1871-78) and to Paris (1878-82). — 168

Page Break me45.523

Page me45.523

Page me45.523
Bignami — Italian police officer, chief of the police in Turin. — 198-99
Page me45.523
Bignami, Enrico (1844-1921) — prominent figure in the Italian democratic and working-class movement, journalist; republican; took part in the Italian national liberation struggle headed by Garibaldi; organised a section of the International in Lodi; editor of La Plebe (1868-75, 1875-83); from 1871 on, constantly corresponded with Engels; opposed anarchism. — 198, 200, 207, 214
Page me45.523
Biscamp (Biskamp), Elard — German democrat, journalist, took part in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany; emigrated after the defeat of the revolution; member of the editorial board of Das Volk. — 312, 317
Page me45.523
Bismarck (or Bismarck-Schönhausen), Otto, Prince von (1815-1898) — statesman of Prussia and Germany, Ambassador to St Petersburg (1859-62) and to Paris (1862); Prime Minister of Prussia (1862-71) and Chancellor of the German Empire (1871-90); unified Germany; introduced an Anti-Socialist Law (1878). — 3, 16, 30, 35, 65, 100, 121, 127, 129, 137, 155, 156, 223, 278, 297, 303, 308-09, 312, 314, 315, 317, 319, 321, 323, 326-28, 331-32, 334, 338, 340, 349, 351-53, 364, 387, 389, 399, 401, 405, 410, 413-14, 419, 434
Page me45.523
Blanc, Jean Joseph Charles Louis (1811-1882) — French socialist, historian; in 1848, member of the Provisional Government of the French Republic and Chairman of the Luxembourg Commission; a leader of the petty-bourgeois refugees in London from August 1848; deputy to the National Assembly of 1871; opposed the Paris Commune. — 25, 440
Page me45.523
Blandini — police officer in Turin (Italy). — 199
Page me45.523
Blank, Karl Emil (Emilius) (1817-1893) — German merchant in London; was close to socialists in the 1840s-50s; husband of Frederick Engels' sister, Marie. — 159, 161, 165, 181
Page me45.523
Blanqui, Louis Auguste (1805-1881) — French revolutionary; utopian communist, organised several secret societies and plots; active participant in the revolutions of 1830 and 1848; leader of the French revolutionary proletarian movement; was imprisoned several times. — 81
Page me45.523
Bleichröder, Gerson von (1822-1893) — German financier, head of a Berlin bank, Bismarck's personal banker. — 424
Page me45.523
Blind, Karl (1826-1907) — German journalist, democrat, took part in the revolutionary movement in Baden in 1848-49; a leader of the German petty-bourgeois refugees in London in the 1850s; National Liberal (from the 1860s); chauvinist during the Franco-Prussian war (1870-71). — 175-77

Page me45.523
Bloche — French police commissar. — 18
Page me45.523
Block, Maurice (1816-1901) — French statistician and vulgar economist. — 194, 204
Page me45.523
Blos, Wilhelm (1849-1927) — German publicist, member of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party (from 1872); an editor of Der Volksstaat (1872-74); deputy to the Reichstag from 1877 to 1918 (with intervals); Minister President of the Württemberg Government (1918-20). — 8, 123, 285, 288-89
Page me45.523
Bonaparte, Louis — see Napoleon III
Page me45.523
Bonaparte, Prince Napoléon Joseph Charles Paul (1822-1891) — Napoleon III's cousin, nicknamed Plon-Plon. — 341, 342

Page Break me45.524

Page me45.524
Borchardt, Louis (1820-1883) — German physician, Liberal, Engels' acquaintance in Manchester. — 165
Page me45.524
Borkheim, Sigismund Ludwig (1826-1885) — German publicist, democrat, took part in the 1848-49 revolution; after its defeat emigrated, merchant in London from 1851. — 34, 349, 443
Page me45.524
Börnstein (Bernstein) — American merchant. — 83, 84
Page me45.524
Boufflers, Stanislas, marquis de (1738-1815) — French writer. — 15
Page me45.524
Bowles, Jessica (d. 1887) — Thomas Gibson Bowles' wife. — 209
Page me45.524
Bowles, Thomas Gibson (1842-1922) — English publicist and politician, M.P. for King's Lynn; Conservative; founder and publisher of the weekly Vanity Fair (1868-88). — 209
Page me45.524
Bracke, Wilhelm (1842-1880) — German Social-Democrat, publisher of socialist literature in Brunswick; a founder (1869) and leader of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party (Eisenachers); member of the Social-Democratic group in the Reichstag (1877-79); opposed Lassalleanism and Bakuninism; supported Marx and Engels. — 9, 62, 66, 69-70, 73, 94-96, 97-98, 149-52, 155, 166, 172, 186, 188, 189, 196, 217, 222, 227, 228, 230-32, 236, 237, 247, 262, 265-66, 269-70, 285, 306, 308-10, 332, 394, 408, 422
Page me45.524
Bradlaugh, Charles (1833-1891) — English journalist and politician, Radical, republican; editor of The National Reformer (from 1860). — 292, 340-42
Page me45.524

Brassey, Thomas (1805-1870) — British railway contractor engaged in the building of railways in Europe, America, India and Australia. — 277
Page me45.524
Brassey, Thomas, 1st Earl (1836-1918) — British economist and politician, railway and shipbuilding contractor; Liberal M.P. (1868-85); son of the above. — 277
Page me45.524
Bravo. — 132
Page me45.524
Bright, John (1811-1889) — English manufacturer and politician, a leader of the Free Traders and founder of the Anti-Corn Law League; M.P. (from 1843); held several ministerial posts; leader of the Left wing of the Liberal Party in the 1860s. — 156, 158, 299-300, 340, 447
Page me45.524
Brismée, Désiré (1823-1888) — Belgian printer and publisher, Proudhonist; a founder of the Belgian section of the International (1865), member of the Belgian Federal Council (from 1869), delegate to the Brussels (1868), Basle (1869) and Hague (1872) congresses of the International and the London Conference (1871); sided with the Bakuninists; later abandoned the anarchists, member of the Executive Commitee of the Belgian Workers' Party. — 277
Page me45.524
Broglie, Jacques Victor Albert, duc de (1821-1901) — French politician, writer and historian; deputy to the National Assembly (1871-75); envoy to London (1871-72), Prime Minister (1873-74 and 1877), monarchist. — 193, 233, 235, 246, 251
Page me45.524
Brousse, Paul Louis Marie (1844-1912) — French petty-bourgeois socialist, physician; took part in the Paris Commune; after the defeat of the Commune lived in Spain until 1880, then in Switzerland where he sided with the anarchists; member of the French Workers' Party (from 1880), a Possibilist leader. — 132, 351
Page me45.524
Bucher, Lothar (1817-1892) — Prussian official and journalist; deputy to the Prussian National Assembly (Left Centre) in 1848; a refugee in London; later National Liberal; champion of Bismarck. — 310, 312, 389
Page me45.524
Buchez, Philippe Joseph Benjamin (1796-1865) — French politician and historian, Christian socialist. — 62-63
Page me45.524
Büchner, Ludwig (1824-1899) — German physiologist and vulgar materialist philosopher. — 107

Page Break me45.525

Page me45.525
Bucknam, W.H. — employee of a New York agency engaged in international postage. — 10
Page me45.525

Buffenoir, Hippolyte François Philibert (1847-1928) — French publicist and writer; contributed to the Vorwärts. — 295
Page me45.525
Buffet, Louis Joseph (1818-1898) — French politician and statesman, Liberal and later Conservative; deputy to the Constituent and Legislative assemblies (1848, 1849); Minister of Finances (January-April 1870); deputy to the National Assembly (from 1871); head of government and Home Minister (March 1875-February 1876); later senator. — 153
Page me45.525
Bülow, Hans Guido von (1830-1894) — German pianist and conductor. — 143
Page me45.525
Bürgers, Heinrich (1820-1878) — German journalist, contributor of the Rheinische Zeitung (1842-43); member of the Cologne community of the Communist League (1848); an editor of the Neue Rheinische Zeitung; member of the Central Authority of the Communist League (from 1850), later Liberal. — 259
Page me45.525
Burke, Edmund (1729-1797) — British politician and publicist, a Whig leader, M.P. — 156
Page me45.525
Burns, Lydia (Lizzy, Lizzie) (1827-1878) — Irish working woman, Frederick Engels' second wife. — 27, 52, 76, 86, 89, 104, 106, 116-18, 121, 124, 134, 137-41, 161, 180, 181, 197-98, 203-05, 207, 215, 216, 238, 240, 244, 248, 250, 263, 268, 271, 274, 275, 283, 315, 319, 320, 324
Page me45.525
Burns, Mary Ellen (Pumps) (born c. 1860) — niece of the above. — 24, 27, 38, 47, 104, 106, 115, 116, 121, 124, 141, 180, 197, 202, 205, 215, 316, 321, 324, 369, 374, 375, 377, 380, 387, 388, 415
Page me45.525
Burt, Thomas (1837-1922) — English miner, Secretary of the Miners' Union in Northumberland, M.P. (1874-1918), supported the Liberal Party. — 300
Page me45.525
Busch, Moritz (1821-1899) — German publicist, radical, owner of Die Grenzboten (1859-66); supported Bismarck's policy. — 350
Page me45.525
Butt, Isaac (1813-1879) — Irish lawyer and politician, Liberal M.P.; defended the Fenian prisoners in state trials in the 1860s; chairman of the Irish Home Rule League in the 1870s (until 1877). — 261
Page me45.525
Byr, Robert — see Bayer, Karl Robert von
Page me45.525
C

Page me45.525
Cabet, Étienne (1788-1856) — French lawyer and writer, utopian communist, author of the book Voyage en Icarie. — 99

Page me45.525
Cafiero, Carlo (1846-1892) — participant in the Italian working-class movement, lawyer; member of the International; a leader of Italian anarchist organisations (from 1872); abandoned the anarchists in the late 1870s. — 85, 132, 199, 365-66
Page me45.525
Calvin, John (Jean Chauvin) (1509-1564) — Reformer; founder of Calvinism, a Protestant teaching distinguished by its particular intolerance of Catholicism, as well as of other Protestant doctrines. — 351
Page me45.525
Cambridge, George William Frederick Charles, Duke of (1819-1904) — British general, commander-in-chief of the British army (1856-95). — 341
Page me45.525
Cambronne, Pierre Jacques Étienne, comte (1770-1842) — French general, took part in Napoleonic wars, commanded a guardsmen's brigade in the battle of Waterloo (1815). — 443
Page me45.525
Cappele — Catholic priest. — 84
Page me45.525
Carey, Henry Charles (1793-1879) — American economist, advocated harmony of class interests in capitalist society. — 153

Page Break me45.526

Page me45.526
Carleton, William (1794-1869) — Irish novelist. — 371
Page me45.526
Carnarvon, Henry Howard Molyneux Herbert, 4th Earl of (1831-1890) — British Conservative statesman, Secretary of State for the Colonies (1866-67 and 1874-78). — 296
Page me45.526
Caro, Jakob (1836-1904) — German historian, professor at Breslau University (from 1869). — 162
Page me45.526
Carol (Karl) I (1839-1914) — Prince (1866-81) and King (1881-1914) of Romania; nephew of King William I of Prussia. — 155, 298
Page me45.526
Castelnau, H. — French socialist, an editor of L'Intransigeant. — 203
Page me45.526
Cato, Marcus Porcius, the Elder (234-149 B.C.) — Roman statesman and writer. — 156
Page me45.526
Cavagnari, Uriele — Italian socialist, intended to publish the first volume of Marx' Capital in Italian in 1877. — 277
Page me45.526
Cecilia — see La Cécilia, Napoléon François Paul Thomas
Page me45.526

Challemel-Lacour, Paul Armand (1827-1896) — French publicist and politician; after the coup d'état of 1851 emigrated, returned after the amnesty of 1859; Republican deputy to the National Assembly (from 1872); senator (from 1876), Ambassador to Berne (1879) and to London (1880). — 251
Page me45.526
Charles I (1600-1649) — King of Great Britain and Ireland (1625-49), beheaded during the English Revolution. — 260
Page me45.526
Charles II (1630-1685) — King of Great Britain and Ireland (1660-85). — 260
Page me45.526
Charles X (1757-1836) — King of France (1824-30); deposed during the July revolution of 1830. — 303
Page me45.526
Chaucer, Geoffrey (1340-1400) — English poet. — 449
Page me45.526
Chernyayev, Mikhail Grigoryevich (1828-1898) — Russian military and public figure, lieutenant-general, took part in the Crimean war (1853-56), commander-in-chief of the Serbian army (1876). — 179
Page me45.526
Chernyshev, Ivan Yakovlevich — Russian socialist, refugee in Switzerland and Germany. — 147
Page me45.526
Chernyshevsky, Nikolai Gavrilovich (1828-1889) — Russian revolutionary democrat, philosopher, writer and literary critic; predecessor of Russian Social-Democrats. — 114, 312
Page me45.526
Chicherin (Tschitscherin), Boris Nikolayevich (1828-1904) — Russian philosopher, historian, writer and public figure; a leader of the liberal Westerners in the Russian social movement; author of works on the history of communal landownership in Russia. — 343, 346
Page me45.526
Cluseret, Gustave Paul (1823-1900) — French politician, general; took part in the US Civil War on the side of the North; member of the International, sided with the Bakuninists; participant in the revolutionary uprisings in Lyons and Marseilles (1870); member of the Paris Commune, military delegate (April 1871); after the defeat of the Commune emigrated to Belgium, later to the USA. — 5
Page me45.526
Cobden, Richard (1804-1865) — English manufacturer, bourgeois radical, a leader of the Free Traders and a founder of the Anti-Corn Law League, M.P. — 340
Page me45.526
Cohn, Gustav (1840-1919) — German economist, professor at Zurich (from 1875) and at Göttingen universities. — 386
Page me45.526
Coleman, Patrick John — Secretary of an Irish section of the International in London. — 76
Page me45.526

Collet — Collet Dobson Collet's son. — 206
Page me45.526
Collet, Clara Elizabeth (1860-1948) — English public figure, author of

Page Break me45.527

Page me45.527
works on the statistics of women's labour; labour correspondent of the Board of Trade (from 1893); Collet Dobson Collet's daughter. — 206
Page me45.527
Collet, Collet Dobson (1812-1898) — English radical journalist and public figure, musician, editor and publisher of The Free Press (1855-65), organ of Urquhart's followers, editor of The Diplomatic Review (1866-77). — 167-70, 178, 206, 210, 235, 245
Page me45.527
Collier, Lester. — 11, 13
Page me45.527
Costa, Andrea (1851-1910) — prominent figure in the Italian working-class and socialist movement, a leader of Italian anarchist organisations in the 1870s; criticised anarchism in 1879; one of the organisers and leaders of the Revolutionary Socialist Party of Romagne (1881-91), M.P. (from 1882), member of the Socialist Party of Italy (from 1892). — 305
Page me45.527
Cox. — 132
Page me45.527
Crémieux, Isaac Moïse (called Adolphe) (1796-1880) — French lawyer and politician, member of the Provisional Government (February-May 1848), deputy to the Constituent and Legislative assemblies (1848-51), deputy to the National Assembly (1871-75), supported Left Republicans, senator (from 1875). — 36
Page me45.527
Cross, Richard Assheton, Viscount (1823-1914) — British statesman, Conservative, Home Secretary (1874-80, 1885-86). — 228
Page me45.527
Cuno, Theodor Friedrich (1846-1934) — prominent figure in the German and international working-class movement, engineer, socialist, fought anarchism in Italy; organiser of the Milan section of the International; delegate to the Hague Congress of the International (1872); emigrated to the USA and took part in the International's activities there; a leader of The Knights of Labor, an American workers' organisation. — 200
Page me45.527
D

Page me45.527
Damad Mahmud — see Mahmud Dschelal ed-din Pasha Damad
Page me45.527

Dana, Charles Anderson (1819-1897) — American journalist, Abolitionist, editor-in-chief of the New-York Daily Tribune (1849-62), an editor of The New American Cyclopaedia (1857-63) and The New-York Sun (1868-97). — 377
Page me45.527
Danielson, Nikolai Frantsevich (pen-name Nikolai — on) (1844-1918) — Russian economist, publicist, a theoretician of Narodism in the 1880s-90s; correspondent of Marx and Engels for a number of years; translated the three volumes of Marx's Capital into Russian (the first volume jointly with Hermann Lopatin and Nikolai Lyubavin). — 343-44, 346, 353-55, 358, 409
Page me45.527
Darson, A. — publisher and bookseller in London. — 45
Page me45.527
Darwin, Charles Robert (1809-1882) — English naturalist, founder of the theory of evolution by natural selection. — 91, 106, 107, 124, 179, 313, 316-17
Page me45.527
Davydovsky, Ivan Mikhailovich — Russian nobleman, Yelizaveta Tomanovskaya's second husband. — 36, 185
Page me45.527
Dekhterev, Vladimir Gavrilovich (1853-1903) — Russian psychiatrist. — 147
Page me45.527
Delius, Nikolaus (1813-1888) — German philologist, expert in Shakespeare's legacy, professor at Bonn University. — 191, 273, 446
Page me45.527
Demuth, Frederick (1851-1929) — Helene Demuth's son, English worker. — 200
Page me45.527
Demuth, Helene (Lenchen) (1820-1890) — housemaid and devoted friend of the Marx family. — 75, 132, 138-40, 244, 245, 323, 392

Page Break me45.528

Page me45.528
De Paepe, César (1841-1890) — Belgian socialist, printer, later physician; a founder of the Belgian section of the International (1865), member of the Belgian Federal Council, delegate to the London Conference (1865), Lausanne (1867), Brussels (1868), Basle (1869) congresses, the London Conference (1871) of the International and Ghent International Socialist Congress (1877); a founder of the Belgian Workers' Party (1885). — 172, 184, 199, 277
Page me45.528
Derby, Edward Geoffrey Smith Stanley, Earl of (1799-1869) — British statesman, Tory leader; from the 1850s, a leader of the Conservative Party; Prime Minister (1852, 1858-59, 1866-68). — 296, 298, 299
Page me45.528
Derossi, Karl (1844-1910) — German journalist; member (from 1869) and Secretary (1871-75) of the General Association of German Workers, Secretary of the Executive Committee of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany (1875-78); emigrated to Switzerland in 1879, then to the USA where contributed to the German-language workers' newspapers. — 96, 98

Page me45.528
Descartes (Cartesius), Réné (1596-1650) — French dualist philosopher, mathematician and naturalist. — 50
Page me45.528
Deville, Gabriel Pierre (1854-1940) — French socialist, propagated Marxism, member of the French Workers' Party, publicist; author of a popular exposition of the first volume of Marx's Capital; delegate to the International Socialist Workers' Congress in Paris of 1889. — 193, 194
Page me45.528
Devonshire, Spencer Compton Cavendish, Duke of, Marquis of Hartington (1833-1908) — British statesman and politician, Liberal; M.P. (from 1857); the de facto leader of the Liberal Party (1875-80), Secretary of State for War (1882-85). — 300
Page me45.528
Dickes. — 11, 13
Page me45.528
Diderot, Denis (1713-1784) — French philosopher of the Enlightenment, atheist, leader of the Encyclopaedists. — 15
Page me45.528
Diebich-Zabalkansky, Ivan Ivanovich (Diebitsch, Hans Karl Friedrich Anton), Count (1785-1831) — Russian field marshal-general, commander-in-chief (1829) of the Russian army during the Russo-Turkish war of 1828-29 and of the troops (from December 1830) which crushed the Polish insurrection of 1830-31. — 300-02
Page me45.528
Disraeli, Benjamin, Earl of Beaconsfield (1804-1881) — British statesman and author, Tory leader, later leader of the Conservative Party; Prime Minister (1868, 1874-80). — 18, 23, 24, 67, 121, 140, 155, 178, 296, 298, 361
Page me45.528
Dizzy — see Disraeli, Benjamin, Earl of Beaconsfield
Page me45.528
Dolleschall, Laurenz (b. 1790) — police officer in Cologne (1819-47); censor of the Rheinische Zeitung. — 252
Page me45.528
Dörenberg, E. — German publicist, contributed to the Berliner Freie Presse. — 199
Page me45.528
Douai, Karl Daniel Adolph (1819-1888) — German journalist, petty-bourgeois democrat, later socialist; French by birth; took part in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany; emigrated to the USA (1852), took part in the American socialist movement; edited a number of socialist newspapers, contributed to the Vorwärts. — 276-77, 282-84, 318
Page me45.528
Dronke — Ernst Dronke's second wife. — 345, 347
Page me45.528
Dronke, Ernst (1822-1891) — German writer, 'true socialist'; later member of the Communist League and an editor of the Neue Rheinische Zeitung (1848-49); after the 1848-49 revolution emigrated to Switzerland, then to England; associate of Marx and Engels; subsequently withdrew from

Page Break me45.529

Page me45.529
politics. — 159, 161, 164-65, 171, 268, 289, 345, 347
Page me45.529
Dufaure, Jules Armand Stanislas (1798-1881) — French lawyer and statesman, Orleanist, Minister of the Interior (1848, 1849), Minister of Justice (1871-73, 1875-76, 1877-79), Chairman of the Council of Ministers (1876, 1877-79). — 293
Page me45.529
Dühring, Eugen Karl (1833-1921) — German philosopher, economist, lawyer, petty-bourgeois socialist, lecturer at Berlin University (1863-77). — 118-20, 122-24, 131, 139-40, 154, 162, 174, 186, 205, 206, 208, 218, 227, 236, 242, 245, 246, 247, 249, 251-56, 258, 260, 276, 283, 295, 306, 309, 312, 316, 361, 420
Page me45.529
Dupont, Eugéne (c. 1837 (1831?)-1881) — prominent figure in the French and international working-class movement; musical instrument-maker; took part in the June 1848 uprising in Paris; from 1862 on, lived in London; member of the General Council of the International (November 1864 to 1872), Corresponding Secretary for France (1865-71); took part in the London Conference (1865), Geneva (1866), Lausanne (1867) (Chairman), Brussels (1868), and the Hague (1872) congresses, and the London Conference (1871); organiser of sections of the International in Manchester (from 1870); member of the British Federal Council (1872-73); moved to the USA in 1874; associate of Marx and Engels. — 77
Page me45.529
Duval, Théodore — prominent figure in the Swiss working-class movement, joiner; a founder of the Alliance of Socialist Democracy; in early 1870 left the Bakuninists; member of the Romance Federal Council of the International; delegate to the Hague (1872) and Geneva (1873) congresses of the International. — 4
Page me45.529
E

Page me45.529
Eccarius, Johann Georg (1818-1889) — German tailor and journalist, prominent figure in the German and international working-class movement, member of the League of the Just and later of the Communist League, a leader of the German Workers' Educational Society in London; member of the General Council of the International (1864-72), General Secretary of the Council (1867-71), Corresponding Secretary for America (1870-72), delegate to all congresses and conferences of the International; supported Marx and Engles up to the Hague Congress (1872); participant in the British trade union movement in the 1870s and 1880s. — 49, 92, 183, 277, 340, 448
Page me45.529
Ecker, Karl — German engineer, factory inspector in Hanover. — 281

Page me45.529
Ehrhart, Franz Joseph (1853-1908) — German Social-Democrat, upholsterer; refugee in England; supporter of Johann Most; Secretary of the German Workers' Educational Society in London (1878-first half of 1879); deputy to the German Reichstag (1898-1908). — 315, 337
Page me45.529
Eichhoff, Karl Wilhelm (1833-1895) — German socialist and journalist, refugee in London (1861-66); member of the International (from 1868) and one of its first historians; member of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party of Germany (from 1869); edited a number of legal workers' papers in the 1880s. — 121
Page me45.529
Engel, Amélie. — 434-35
Page me45.529
Engels, Emma (née Croon) (1834-1916) — Hermann Engels' wife. — 280
Page me45.529
Engels, Hermann (1822-1905) — Frederick Engels' brother, manufacturer in Barmen, a partner in the Ermen & Engels firm in Engelskirchen. — 19, 106, 160, 181-83, 187-88, 279-80, 281-82

Page Break me45.530

Page me45.530
Engels, Hermann Friedrich Theodor (1858-1926) — Hermann Engels' son, student of Berlin University (1876-77), later manufacturer, a partner in the Ermen & Engels firm. — 187
Page me45.530
Engels, Mathilde (née Remkes) (1831-1905) — Rudolf Engels' wife. — 68, 106
Page me45.530
Engels, Paul (1857-1883) — Rudolf Engels' son, merchant, later army officer. — 105
Page me45.530
Engels, Rudolf (1831-1903) — Frederick Engels' brother, manufacturer in Barmen, a partner in the Ermen & Engels firm in Engelskirchen (from 1861). — 19, 66-68, 105-06, 320
Page me45.530
Engels, Rudolf Moritz (1858-1893) — Rudolf Engels' son, student of Leipzig University (1876-78), later manufacturer, a partner in the Ermen & Engels firm. — 187
Page me45.530
Epicurus (c. 341-c. 270 B.C.) — Greek materialist philosopher, atheist. — 50
Page me45.530
Ermen — Heinrich Ermen's wife. — 68
Page me45.530
Ermen, Franz — a partner in the Manchester firm of Ermen & Engels; Peter Ermen's son. — 67, 68
Page me45.530
Ermen, Franz jr. — a partner in the Manchester firm of Ermen & Engels, Franz Ermen's son. — 67

Page me45.530
Ermen, Gottfried (Godfrey) Jakob (1811-1899) — a partner in the Manchester firm of Ermen & Engels; Peter Ermen's brother. — 19-20, 67-68
Page me45.530
Ermen, Heinrich — a partner of Gottfried Ermen in Bridgewater Mill, Pendlebury; Peter Ermen's son. — 67-68
Page me45.530
Ermen, Peter (1802-1889) — a founder (1837) and partner of the Manchester firm of Ermen & Engels. — 67, 68
Page me45.530
Esselen, Christian (1823-1859) — German author, democrat, headed the Workers' Association in Frankfurt in 1848; emigrated to Switzerland, later to the USA. — 214
Page me45.530
Étienne, Charles Guillaume (1777-1845) — French journalist and dramatist. — 389
Page me45.530
Eugénie Marie Ignace Augustine de Montijo de Guzmán, comtesse de Teba (1826-1920) — Empress of France (1852-70), Napoleon III's wife. — 341
Page me45.530
Eulenburg, Botho Wend August, Count of (1831-1912) — Prussian statesman, Conservative, Minister of the Interior (1878-81), Prime Minister (1892-94); took part in drawing up the Anti-Socialist Law. — 322, 324
Page me45.530
Euripides (c. 480-c. 406 B.C.) — Greek dramatist. — 245
Page me45.530
F

Page me45.530
Failly, Pierre Louis Charles Achille de (1810-1892) — French general, commanded a corps during the Franco-Prussian war (1870-71). — 251
Page me45.530
Fanelli, Giuseppe (1826-1877) — prominent figure in the Italian democratic movement, took part in the Italian revolution of 1848-49 and in Garibaldi's campaign of 1860; follower of Mazzini, friend of Bakunin, a leader of the Alliance of Socialist Democracy; organiser of sections of the International and groups of the Alliance in Spain (1869); delegate to the Basle Congress (1869) of the International; M.P. (from 1865). — 210
Page me45.530
Farga Pellicer, Rafael (pseudonym Gomez) (1840-1903) — Spanish printer and journalist; a founder and leader of anarchist groups and first sections of the International in Spain; one of the leaders of the secret Alliance; editor of La Federación (1869-73); delegate to the Basle (1869) and Hague (1872) congresses of the International; expelled from the International by the General Council's decision of 30 May 1873. — 42, 49
Page me45.530
Fatouville, Nolant de (d. 1715) — French playwright. — 198
Page me45.530
Favre, Jules Claude Gabriél (1809-1880) — French lawyer and politician,

Page Break me45.531

Page me45.531
leader of the bourgeois republican opposition from the late 1850s: Foreign Minister (1870-71); together with Thiers, headed the struggle against the Paris Commune, inspired struggle against the International. — 223, 224, 440
Page me45.531
Fawcett, Henry (1833-1884) — English economist, M.P. (from 1865), Liberal. — 158
Page me45.531
Fleckles, Ferdinand (1836-1894) — German physician, practised in Karlsbad from 1864 to 1866; editor of Der Sprudel; Marx's acquaintance. — 37, 89, 136, 145, 147-49, 190-91, 212
Page me45.531
Fleury, Charles (real name Carl Friedrich August Krause) (b. 1824) — merchant in London; Prussian spy and police agent. — 54
Page me45.531
Forbes, Archibald (1838-1900) — Scottish journalist, contributed to The Morning Advertiser and The Daily News, war correspondent during the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71 and Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78. — 140
Page me45.531
Forster, William Edward (1818-1886) — English manufacturer and politician, Liberal M.P., Secretary of State for Ireland (1880-82). — 300
Page me45.531
Fourier, François Marie Charles (1772-1837) — French utopian socialist. — 262-63
Page me45.531
Francis Joseph I (1830-1916) — Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary (1848-1916). — 263
Page me45.531
Frankel, Léo (1844-1896) — prominent figure in the Hungarian and international working-class movement; jeweller; took part in the Paris Commune, member of the General Council of the International (1871-72), delegate to the London Conference (1871) and the Hague Congress (1872) of the International; a founder of the General Workers' Party of Hungary (1880); associate of Marx and Engels. — 36, 49, 93, 112, 157-58, 174
Page me45.531
Frederick III (1831-1888) — Crown Prince of the German Empire (from 1871), King of Prussia and German Emperor (March-June 1888). — 315
Page me45.531
Frederick William III (1770-1840) — King of Prussia (1797-1840). — 301
Page me45.531
Frederick William IV (1795-1861) — King of Prussia (1840-61). — 260, 350
Page me45.531
Freund — Wilhelm Alexander Freund's wife. — 192
Page me45.531

Freund, Wilhelm Alexander (1833-1918) — German physician, lecturer at Breslau University; friend of Marx's family. — 4, 191-92, 439
Page me45.531
Fribourg, Ernest Edourd — prominent figure in the French working-class movement; engraver, subsequently businessman; Right-wing Proudhonist; a leader of the Paris section of the International; author of L'Association internationale des travailleurs which was hostile to the International and the Paris Commune. — 80
Page me45.531
Friedberg, Hermann (1817-1884) — German physician, professor at Breslau University (from 1866). — 136
Page me45.531
Fritzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm (1825-1905) — German cigar-maker; took part in the 1848-49 revolution; a founder and leader of the General Association of German Workers (1863); member of the International, adhered to the Eisenachers in 1869; deputy to the North German (1868-71) and the German Reichstag (1877-81); emigrated to the USA in 1881. — 408, 416
Page me45.531
Frohme, Karl Franz Egon (1850-1933) — German publicist, Social-Democrat, follower of Lassalle in the 1870s, later a leader of the reformist wing of German Social-Democracy; deputy to the German Reichstag (from 1881); delegate to the International Socialist Workers' Congress in Paris (1889). — 49
Page me45.531
Frossard, Charles Auguste (1807-1875) — French general, commanded a corps Page Break me45.532

Page me45.532
during the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71, captured at Metz. — 251
Page me45.532
Furnivall, Frederick James (1825-1910) — English philologist, Christian socialist, founded several literary societies, the New Shakespeare Society among them. — 192
Page me45.532
G

Page me45.532
Galliffet, Gaston Alexandre Auguste, marquis de (1830-1909) — French general, captured at Sedan during the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71; released in March 1871 to take part in the struggle against the Commune; butcher of the Paris Commune; held several military posts from the 1870s. — 246, 440
Page me45.532
Gambetta, Léon Michel (1838-1882) — French statesman and politician, lawyer, moderate republican; member of the Government of National Defence (1870-71); Chairman of the Council of Ministers and Foreign Minister (1881-82). — 25, 239, 246, 251, 295
Page me45.532

Gambuzzi, Carlo (1837-1902) — Italian lawyer, follower of Mazzini in the early 1860s; later anarchist; a leader of the Alliance of Socialist Democracy and of anarchist organisations in Italy; founded a section of the International in Naples in January 1869. — 210
Page me45.532
Gandolfi, Mauro — Italian merchant, Bakuninist, member of the Milan section of the International. — 200
Page me45.532
Gans — physician in Karlsbad. — 82
Page me45.532
Gans — physician in Prague, son of the above. — 52, 87
Page me45.532
Geib, Wilhelm Leopold August (1842-1879) — German Social-Democrat, bookseller in Hamburg; member of the General Association of German Workers (1863); participant in the Eisenach Congress of 1869; one of the founders of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party, its treasurer (1872-78); deputy to the German Reichstag (1874-77). — 69, 96, 98, 186, 246, 251, 252, 259, 392
Page me45.532
Geiser, Bruno (1846-1898) — German Social-Democrat, publicist; member of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party and of the International (1872); editor of the Volksstaat (1875) and the Neue Welt (1877-86); deputy to the German Reichstag (1881-87); expelled from the party at the end of the 1880s. — 408
Page me45.532
Gigot, Albert (1835-1913) — French lawyer, liberal, later conservative; Prefect of Paris police (1877-79). — 328, 338
Page me45.532
Gillot, Firmin (1820-1872) — French lithographer, invented zincography. — 447
Page me45.532
Girardin, Émile de (1806-1881) — French publicist and politician; editor of La Presse, and La Liberté; moderate republican during the 1848-49 revolution; later Bonapartist. — 155, 235
Page me45.532
Gladstone, Catherine (née Catherine Glynne of Hawarden) (1807-1874) — William Ewart Gladstone's wife. — 168
Page me45.532
Gladstone, William Ewart (1809-1898) — British statesman, Tory and later Peelite, a leader of the Liberal Party in the latter half of the 19th century; Chancellor of the Exchequer (1852-55, 1859-66) and Prime Minister (1868-74, 1880-85, 1886, 1892-94). — 18, 23, 67, 155-56, 158, 167-70, 178, 179, 205, 206, 209, 277, 297, 299, 361
Page me45.532
Glagau, Otto — German writer and publicist; author of a work on stock-exchange speculation. — 304
Page me45.532
Glais-Bizoin, Alexandre Olivier (1800-1877) — French politician, lawyer, moderate republican; deputy to the Constituent Assembly (1848-49), member of the Corps législatif (the 1860s), member of the Government of National Defence (1870-71). — 36

Page Break me45.533

Page me45.533
Glaser de Willebrord, E. — participant in the Belgian working-class movement; member of a section of the International in Brussels. — 75
Page me45.533
Gnecco, Eudóxio Cesar d'Azedo — prominent figure in the Portuguese working-class movement, member of the Portuguese section of the International (1871); a founder of the Portuguese Socialist Party, member of its Central Committee (1875); editor of O Protesto. — 174
Page me45.533
Goegg, Amand (1820-1897) — German democratic journalist; member of the Baden Provisional Government (1849); emigrated after the revolution; member of the International; joined the German Social-Democrats in the 1870s. — 63
Page me45.533
Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von (1749-1832) — German poet. — 131, 379
Page me45.533
Golokhvastov, Pavel Dmitrievich (1839-1892) — Russian historian and publicist. — 164
Page me45.533
Golovachov (Golowatscheff), Nikolai Nikitich (b. 1825) — Russian lieutenant-general, military governor of Turkestan (from 1867). — 168, 169
Page me45.533
Gomez — see Farga Pellicer, Rafael
Page me45.533
Gorchakov, Alexander Mikhailovich, Prince (1798-1883) — Russian statesman and diplomat; Foreign Minister (1856-82) and State Chancellor (1867-82). — 123, 162, 389
Page me45.533
Gordon, Sir Robert (1791-1847) — British diplomat, Ambassador Extraordinary to Constantinople (1828-31) and to Vienna (1841-46). — 301-02
Page me45.533
Gore — English acquaintance of Eleanor Marx. — 139
Page me45.533
Gorlov (Gorloff), Alexander Pavlovich (1830-1905) — Russian lieutenant-general, military attaché in the United States of North America (from 1868) and in London (1873-82). — 168, 169
Page me45.533
Goschen, George Joachim Goschen, 1st Viscount (1831-1907) — British statesman and politician, financier; German by birth; Liberal; M.P. from 1863, member of government on more than one occasion, Chancellor of the Exchequer (1887-92); author of works on economics. — 300
Page me45.533
Götz, E. — Engels' acquaintance in Manchester. — 165
Page me45.533
Gouppy, A. — French refugee in Manchester. — 77
Page me45.533

Grant, Albert — German businessman from Mainz. — 335
Page me45.533
Greulich, Hermann (1842-1925) — German bookbinder; emigrated to Zurich in 1865; member of the Zurich section of the International (from 1867); founder and editor of the Tagwacht (1869-80); subsequently a founder of the Swiss Social-Democratic Party and leader of its reformist wing. — 349
Page me45.533
Grillenberger, Karl (1848-1897) — German worker, then journalist; publisher of several Social-Democratic newspapers; member of the German Social-Democratic Workers' Party (from 1869); sided with its reformist wing; deputy to the German Reichstag (from 1881). — 398
Page me45.533
Grimm, Friedrich Melchior, Baron von (1723-1807) — German diplomat, writer of the Enlightenment; lived in France from 1748, member of the Encyclopaedists' circle; from 1792 was in Russia's diplomatic service; Russian Consul in Gotha, later in Hamburg. — 14, 15
Page me45.533
Grimm, Jacob Ludwig Carl (1785-1863) — German philologist, author of a historical grammar of the German language and of folklore adaptations; professor at Göttingen and then at Berlin; liberal. — 74
Page me45.533
Griset. — 12
Page me45.533
Grün, Karl Theodor Ferdinand (pen-name Ernst von der Heide) (1817-1887) — German journalist, 'true socialist' in the mid-1840s; petty-bourgeois

Page Break me45.534

Page me45.534
democrat during the 1848-49 revolution; deputy to the Prussian National Assembly (Left wing); refugee in Brussels (1850-61), professor at Frankfurt am Main (1862-65) and at Vienna (from 1870). — 88
Page me45.534
Grunzig, Julius (b. 1855) — German Social-Democrat, journalist; deported from Berlin (1883) under the Anti-Socialist Law; emigrated to the USA, contributed to several US workers' papers. — 150, 152, 166
Page me45.534
Guesde, Jules (Mathieu Jules Bazile) (1845-1922) — prominent figure in the French and international socialist movement; founder and editor of L'Égalité; a founder of the French Workers' Party (1880) and author of its programme; propagated Marxism in France. — 327, 450, 451
Page me45.534
Gugenheim, J. — German Social-Democrat, Secretary of the German Workers' Educational Society in London (from April 1879). — 359-60, 363
Page me45.534

Guillaume, James (1844-1916) — Swiss teacher, Bakuninist; member of the International, delegate to the Geneva (1866), Lausanne (1867), Basle (1869) and Hague (1872) congresses; a leader of the Alliance of Socialist Democracy, edited anarchist papers (1868-78); was expelled from the International at the Hague Congress for his splitting activities. — 132, 154, 156, 172, 200, 207, 214, 259, 277, 306, 348, 351
Page me45.534
Guilleminot, Armand Charles, comte de (1774-1840) — French general and diplomat, took part in the wars of the French Republic and of Napoleonic France; Chief of Staff of the French interventionist army in Spain (1823), Ambassador to Constantinople (1824). — 301, 302
Page me45.534
Gumpert, Eduard (d. 1893) — German physician in Manchester, friend of Marx and Engels. — 4, 16, 17, 23, 26, 28, 31, 244, 245, 387
Page me45.534
Gurevich, Grigory Yevseyevich (1854-d. after 1920) — Russian publicist, socialist, sided with the Narodniks; refugee in Germany (1874-79). — 147
Page me45.534
Gurko (Romeiko-Gurko), Iosif Vladimirovich (1828-1901) — Russian general, took part in the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78. — 272
Page me45.534
Gutzkow, Karl Ferdinand (1811-1878) — German writer, public figure, liberal, member of the Young Germany literary group. — 429
Page me45.534
Guyot — Lavrov's agent in Paris in the 1870s. — 153, 440
Page me45.534
H

Page me45.534
Haeckel, Ernst Heinrich (1834-1919) — German materialist biologist; professor at Jena University (1862-1909). — 50, 317
Page me45.534
Hales, John (b. 1839) — British trade unionist, weaver; member of the Reform League and of the Land and Labour League; member of the General Council of the International (1866-72) and its Secretary (1871-72); delegate to the London Conference (1871) and the Hague Congress (1872); headed the reformist wing of the British Federal Council in 1872; expelled from the International by the General Council's decision of 30 May 1873. — 81, 92, 155, 277, 292, 300, 341, 448
Page me45.534
Hansemann, Adolph von (1826-1903) — German financier, head of the Disconto-Gesellschaft banking firm (from 1864); commercial adviser and Consul-General of Austria-Hungary in Berlin. — 424
Page me45.534
Hanssen, Georg (1809-1894) — German economist; author of works on the history of agriculture and agrarian relations. — 179
Page me45.534

Harcourt, William George Granville Venables Vernon, Sir (1827-1904) — British statesman and politician, M.P. (1868-80), Liberal leader (1894-98). — 300

Page Break me45.535

Page me45.535
Harney, George Julian (1817-1897) — prominent figure in the English working-class movement, a leader of the Chartist Left wing; edited several Chartist periodicals; refugee in the USA (1862-88), member of the International; friend of Marx and Engels. — 284, 370, 377
Page me45.535
Harney, Mary — George Julian Harney's wife (from 1856). — 370
Page me45.535
Harrison, Frederic (1831-1923) — English lawyer and historian, radical, positivist, took part in the democratic movement in the 1860s-70s; cooperated with Marx in helping Commune refugees. — 11, 12, 179, 193
Page me45.535
Hartington — see Devonshire, Spencer Compton Cavendish, Duke of, Marquis of Hartington
Page me45.535
Hartmann, Eduard von (1842-1906) — German idealist philosopher; ideologist of Prussian Junkers. — 50
Page me45.535
Hartmann, Georg Wilhelm — German Social-Democrat, member of the General Association of German Workers; one of the two presidents of the Executive Committee of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany (from 1875); deputy to the German Reichstag (1878-81). — 96, 98
Page me45.535
Hasenclever, Wilhelm (1837-1889) — German Social-Democrat, journalist, Lassallean; President of the General Association of German Workers (1871-75); one of the two presidents of the Executive Committee of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany (1875-76); together with Wilhelm Liebknecht edited the Vorwärts (1876-78); deputy to the North German and the German Reichstag (1869-71, 1874-78, 1879-88). — 6, 7, 43, 60, 65, 96, 98, 247, 249, 408
Page me45.535
Hassan Cheirullah, effendi — head of the Moslem clergy of the Ottoman Empire (until 1877). — 263
Page me45.535
Hasselmann, Wilhelm (1844-1916) — a leader of the Lassallean General Association of German Workers; editor of the Neuer Social-Demokrat (1871-75); member of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany (from 1875); deputy to the German Reichstag (1874-76, 1878-80); expelled from the party as an anarchist in 1880. — 6, 43, 60, 65, 75, 96
Page me45.535
Havas, August (1814-1889) — co-proprietor of the French news agency, Havas. — 158
Page me45.535

Hayes, Rutherford Birchard (1822-1893) — US President (March 1877-March 1881), Republican. — 251
Page me45.535
Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (1770-1831) — German philosopher. — 50
Page me45.535
Heine — the owner of a banking house founded in Hamburg in 1797 by Solomon Heine (1767-1844). — 136
Page me45.535
Heine, Heinrich (1797-1856) — German revolutionary poet. — 288
Page me45.535
Heinzen, Karl Peter (1809-1880) — German radical journalist; took part in the Baden-Palatinate uprising of 1849; emigrated to Switzerland, later to England and, in the autumn of 1850, to the USA. — 433
Page me45.535
Heller, Hugo — correspondent of Marx; carried Marx's instructions concerning transportation of material for the General Council of the International; lived in Oxford in 1879. — 350
Page me45.535
Hellwald, Friedrich Anton Heller von (1842-1892) — Austrian ethnographer, geographer and historian. — 107
Page me45.535
Helmholtz, Hermann von (1821-1894) — German physicist and physiologist, professor at Berlin University (from 1871). — 78, 124, 236
Page me45.535
Henry IV (1553-1610) — King of France (1589-1610). — 425
Page me45.535
Hepner, Adolf (1846-1923) — German Social-Democrat, an editor of Der Volksstaat; delegate to the Hague Congress of the International (1872), member of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party; subsequently emigrated to the USA. — 123

Page Break me45.536

Page me45.536
Herder, Johann Gottfried von (1744-1803) — German writer and literary theorist of the Enlightenment; a founder of the Sturm-und-Drang trend. — 272
Page me45.536
Hess, Moses (1812-1875) — German radical writer, 'true socialist' in the mid-1840s; member of the Communist League; after its split sided with the Willich-Schapper separatist group; member of the General Association of German Workers; member of the International, took part in the Brussels (1868) and Basle (1869) congresses. — 286, 290
Page me45.536
Hess, Sibylle (née Pesch) (1820-1903) — Moses Hess' wife. — 286, 290
Page me45.536
Hirsch, Carl (1841-1900) — German Social-Democrat, journalist; member of the General Association of German Workers; member of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party from 1869; after 1872 Paris correspondent of German Social-Democratic newspapers. — 92,

96, 149, 193, 203, 245-48, 251-53, 258, 262, 269, 305, 306, 310, 327, 328, 330, 337-40, 366-69, 372-73, 375, 377-81, 386, 387, 390, 392, 401, 409, 412, 414, 417-19, 423, 425, 439-41, 444-45, 449, 450
Page me45.536
Hobbes, Thomas (1588-1679) — English materialist philosopher. — 108, 293
Page me45.536
Höchberg, Karl (pseudonym Dr Ludwig Richter) (1853-1885) — German writer and publisher, social reformist; member of the German Social-Democratic Party (from 1876); published and financed Die Zukunft (1877-78) and Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik (1879-81). — 252, 253, 258-60, 283, 285, 362, 367-68, 372-73, 375, 378-80, 383, 386-87, 393-94, 396-99, 401-02, 411-13, 417, 420, 422, 429-33, 440
Page me45.536
Hoffmann. — 204
Page me45.536
Hoffmann, Wilhelm — German worker, refugee in London. — 229
Page me45.536
Hohenstaufens — emperors of the Holy Roman Empire (1138-1254). — 303
Page me45.536
Hohenzollerns — dynasty of Brandenburg electors (1415-1701), Prussian kings (1701-1918) and German emperors (1871-1918). — 278, 303
Page me45.536
Hollinger, Fidelio — German refugee in London, owner of a print-shop which published Das Volk. — 175-77
Page me45.536
Howell, George (1833-1910) — a leader of the British trade unions, mason; member of the General Council of the International (1864-69); Secretary of the Parliamentary Committee of the British Congress of Trade Unions (1871-75); Liberal M.P. (1885-95). — 179, 300, 335
Page me45.536
Hubbard, Nicolas Gustave (1828-1888) — French economist, historian and publicist. — 263
Page me45.536
Hume, David (1711-1776) — Scottish philosopher, historian and political economist. — 50, 207-08, 452
Page me45.536
Hutten, Ulrich von (1488-1523) — German poet, Reformer, ideologist and participant in the knights' uprising in 1522-23. — 74
Page me45.536
Huxley, Thomas Henry (1825-1895) — English naturalist, follower of Charles Darwin and populariser of his theory. — 50
Page me45.536
I

Page me45.536

Idelson, Rozalia Christophorovna (died c. 1915) — Valerian Nikolayevich Smirnov's wife. — 78, 91
Page me45.536
Ignatiyev, Nikolai Pavlovich, Count (1832-1908) — Russian statesman and diplomat, Ambassador to Turkey (1864-77), Russia's representative at the conclusion of the San Stefano Peace Treaty (1878); Minister of the Interior (1881-82), member of the State Council (from 1877). — 120, 210, 216, 280, 296
Page me45.536
Imandt, Peter (1823-1897) — German teacher, democrat, took part in the 1848-49 revolution; member of the Communist League; refugee in London

Page Break me45.537

Page me45.537
from 1852; supported Marx and Engels; member of the International. — 92
Page me45.537
Immhof. — 229
Page me45.537
Irving, Sir Henry (1838-1905) — English producer and actor, played in Shakespeare's tragedies. — 441
Page me45.537
Isouard, Nicolas (Nicolo), dit (1775-1818) — French composer. — 389
Page me45.537
J

Page me45.537
Jacoby, Johann (1805-1877) — German radical writer and politician; headed the Left wing in the Prussian National Assembly (1848); joined the Social-Democratic Workers' Party in 1872. — 7, 9
Page me45.537
James II Stuart (1633-1701) — King of England, Scotland and Ireland (1685-88). — 260
Page me45.537
Jennychen — see Longuet, Jenny
Page me45.537
Johnny — see Longuet, Jean Laurent Frédéric
Page me45.537
Jolly (Jollymeier, Jollymeyer) — see Schorlemmer, Carl
Page me45.537
Juch, Hermann — German journalist, petty-bourgeois democrat, refugee in London; editor of the newspaper Hermann (1859-69), founder of the Londoner Journal (1878). — 315
Page me45.537
Jung, Hermann (1830-1901) — prominent figure in the Swiss and international working-class movement; watchmaker; member of the General Council of the International and Corresponding Secretary for Switzerland (November 1864 to 1872); Treasurer of the General Council (1871-72); delegate to the London Conference (1865), Chairman at the Geneva (1866), Brussels (1868) and Basle (1869) congresses and at the London Conference (1871) of the International; member of the British Federal Council (1872); supported Marx before the Hague Congress (September 1872); later joined the reformist wing; at the end of the 1870s left the working-class movement. — 5, 6, 43, 92, 277, 341, 448

Page me45.537
Juta, Charles — son of Marx's sister Louise Juta. — 261
Page me45.537
Juta, Henry (1857-1930) — English lawyer and public figure; son of Marx's sister Louise Juta. — 192, 261, 390
Page me45.537
Juta, Johann Carl (1824-1886) — Dutch bookseller in Cape Town; husband of Marx's sister Louise. — 261
Page me45.537
Juta, Karoline — daughter of Marx's sister Louise Juta. — 138, 141
Page me45.537
Juta, Louise Amalia — daughter of Marx's sister Louise Juta. — 369
Page me45.537
K

Page me45.537
Kant, Immanuel (1724-1804) — German philosopher. — 50, 123
Page me45.537
Kara Chalil, effendi — head of the Moslem clergy in the Ottoman Empire (from 1877). — 263
Page me45.537
Karcher, Théodore (1821-1885) — French publicist, republican; after the coup d'état of 1851 emigrated to Belgium, later to England. — 341
Page me45.537
Kareyev, Nikolai Ivanovich (1850-1931) — Russian historian and publicist, liberal, professor at Warsaw and St Petersburg universities (1879-84). — 452
Page me45.537
Karl von Hohenzollern — see Carol (Karl) I
Page me45.537
Kaub (Kolb), Karl (Charles) — German worker; refugee in London and after 1865 in Paris; member of the German Workers' Educational Society in London; member of the General Council of the International (November 1864 to 1865, 1870-71); delegate to the London Conference (1865). — 92, 269, 306, 327, 330, 337, 339-40, 377, 439-41, 445, 450

Page Break me45.538

Page me45.538

Kaufman, Illarion Ignatievich (1848-1916) — Russian economist, professor at St Petersburg University; author of works on money circulation and credit. — 260, 304, 358
Page me45.538
Kaufmann, Konstantin Petrovich von (1818-1882) — Russian general, first Governor General of Turkestan (1867-82). — 168, 169, 170
Page me45.538
Kaufmann, Moritz (1839-d. after 1914) — English clergyman, author of works on socialist teachings. — 432-35
Page me45.538
Kaufmann, S.F. — member of the German Workers' Educational Society in London. — 365, 411
Page me45.538
Kautsky, Karl Johann (1854-1938) — German Social-Democrat, publicist, economist and historian; editor of Die Neue Zeit (1883-1917); author of theoretical works on Marxism; abandoned Marxism in the early 1900s. — 100
Page me45.538
Kayser, Max (1853-1888) — German Social-Democrat, deputy to the German Reichstag (1878-87); represented the reformist wing in German Social-Democracy. — 373, 388, 397-401, 414, 418, 419, 424
Page me45.538
Kersten, Paul — German sculptor, Social-Democrat. — 49, 110
Page me45.538
Kind, Johann Friedrich (1768-1843) — German writer. — 177
Page me45.538
King, Philip Stephen — bookseller in London. — 220
Page me45.538
Kinkel, Gottfried (1815-1882) — German poet and democratic publicist; took part in the 1849 Baden-Palatinate uprising, was sentenced to life imprisonment by Prussian court, in 1850 escaped for England; a leader of petty-bourgeois refugees in London; opposed Marx and Engels. — 137
Page me45.538
Kinkel, Marie — Gottfried Kinkel's daughter. — 137
Page me45.538
Kirchmann, Julius Hermann von (1802-1884) — German lawyer, writer and philosopher, radical; deputy to the Prussian National Assembly (Left Centre) in 1848, later member of the Party of Progress, deputy to the German Reichstag (1871-76). — 54
Page me45.538
Kistemaeckers, Henri — Belgian writer. — 149, 445
Page me45.538
Kitz, Frank (born c. 1848) — English socialist, member of the Socialist League (from 1885), Secretary of the English section of the Social-Democratic Workers' Club in London. — 338
Page me45.538
Knies, Karl (1821-1898) — German vulgar economist. — 252, 255
Page me45.538
Knille, Otto (1832-1898) — German artist. — 47

Page me45.538
Kock, Charles Paul de (1793-1871) — French novelist and dramatist. — 324
Page me45.538
Kokosky, Samuel (1838-1899) — German publicist, Social-Democrat from 1872, edited several Social-Democratic newspapers; translated into German the pamphlet The Alliance of Socialist Democracy and the International Working Men's Association by Marx and Engels. — 166
Page me45.538
Koshelev, Alexander Ivanovich (1806-1883) — Russian writer and public figure. — 100
Page me45.538
Köttgen, Gustav Adolph (1805-1882) — German artist, poet; took part in the working-class movement in the 1840s; was close to 'true socialists'; participant in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany. — 88
Page me45.538
Kovalevsky, Maxim Maximovich (1851-1916) — Russian sociologist, historian, ethnographer, lawyer; liberal; author of essays on the history of the primitive communal system. — 137, 153, 163, 179, 185, 322-23, 329, 344, 376, 381, 386, 388, 409, 452
Page me45.538
Kraus — Bernhard Kraus' wife. — 82
Page me45.538
Kraus, Bernhard (1828-1887) — Austrian physician; founded and edited the Allgemeine Wiener medizinische Zeitung (from 1856). — 47, 82, 103-04
Page Break me45.539

Page me45.539
Kropotkin, Pyotr Alexeyevich, Prince (1842-1921) — Russian revolutionary, theoretician of anarchism, sociologist, geographer and geologist; an émigré (1876-1917). — 305
Page me45.539
Kugelmann, Franziska (1858-c. 1930) — Ludwig Kugelmann's daughter. — 3, 17, 21, 31
Page me45.539
Kugelmann, Gertrud (née Oppenheim) (b. 1839) — Ludwig Kugelmann's wife. — 3, 17, 21, 31, 46-48, 56, 144
Page me45.539
Kugelmann, Ludwig (1828-1902) — German physician, participant in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany; member of the International; delegate to the Lausanne (1867) and Hague (1872) congresses of the International; correspondent of Marx and Engels (1862-74). — 3, 4, 17, 19, 21, 31, 32, 37, 38, 40, 46, 47, 82, 125, 162, 280-81
Page me45.539
Kulishova, Anna Moiseyevna (real name Rosenstein) (1854-1925) — Russian revolutionary, Narodnik; joined the Bakuninists (1872); refugee in Italy (from 1878); broke off with anarchism; participant in the Italian socialist movement, prominent figure in the Socialist Party of Italy (from 1892); Andrea Costa's wife. — 305
Page me45.539
Kurz, Isolde (1853-1944) — German authoress. — 172, 189, 196, 217, 218, 222, 224, 230-32, 266, 285, 288
Page me45.539

Küster — German army officer; attaché of the Prussian Embassy in Constantinople (1829). — 302
Page me45.539
Kyllmann. — 165
Page me45.539
L

Page me45.539
Laaf — German chaplain. Christian socialist, candidate at the by-elections to the German Reichstag in 1877. — 195
Page me45.539
La Cécilia, Napoléon François Paul Thomas (1835-1878) — Italian-born French revolutionary; professor of mathematics; participant in Garibaldi's expedition (1860); member of the Paris section of the International; an editor of Le Rappel; general of the Paris Commune, after its suppression emigrated to England; maintained friendly relations with Marx and Engels. — 36
Page me45.539
Lachâtre (Lachastre), Claude Maurice, baron de (1814-1900) — French progressive journalist; took part in the Paris Commune; publisher of the first volume of Marx's Capital in French. — 25-26, 56-57, 75, 113, 153, 193, 223, 227, 439
Page me45.539
Lacroix (Sigismond Julien Adolphe Krzyzanowski, dit Sigismond) (1845-1907) — Polish-born French journalist; contributor to and editor of a number of periodicals; member of the Chamber of Deputies (from 1883). — 259
Page me45.539
Lafargue, Laura (1845-1911) — Marx's second daughter, participant in the French working-class movement; Paul Lafargue's wife (from 1868). — 22, 51-52, 118, 121, 131-32, 139, 212, 244, 271, 274, 369, 373-75, 379, 382, 385, 387, 388, 390
Page me45.539
Lafargue, Paul (1842-1911) — prominent figure in the French and international working-class movement; journalist, author of several works on the theory of Marxism; member of the General Council of the International (from 1866); delegate to the Hague Congress (1872); a founder of the French Workers' Party (1880); disciple and associate of Marx and Engels. — 28, 52, 75, 118, 130, 132, 139, 244, 271, 274, 374, 375, 379, 382, 385, 387, 388, 390, 447, 448
Page me45.539
La Harpe (Laharpe), Jean François de (1739-1803) — French poet and critic. — 14
Page me45.539
Lahure, Louis Justin (c. 1850-1878) — Parisian printer; printed the French edition of the first volume of Marx's Capital. — 16, 57, 79
Page me45.539
Lasker, Eduard (1829-1884) — German politician, a founder and leader of Page Break me45.540

Page me45.540

the National Liberal Party which he left in 1880; deputy to the German Reichstag (from 1867). — 136-37
Page me45.540
Lassalle, Ferdinand (1825-1864) — German writer and lawyer; took part in the democratic movement in the Rhine Province (1848-49); founder and first President of the General Association of German Workers (1863-64); an initiator of the opportunist trend in the German working-class movement. — 62-63, 65, 97, 100, 118, 288, 334, 402-03
Page me45.540
Laube, Heinrich (1806-1884) — German writer and dramatist; member of the Young Germany literary group; later theatre director. — 429
Page me45.540
Laveleye, Émile Louis Victor, Baron de (1822-1892) — Belgian historian and economist. — 153, 194, 204
Page me45.540
Lavrov, Pyotr Lavrovich (1823-1900) — Russian sociologist, philosopher, revolutionary journalist, an ideologist of Narodism; member of the International, took part in the Paris Commune; editor of the magazine Vperyod! (1873-76) and the newspaper Vperyod! (1875-76). — 53, 58, 59, 73, 78, 91, 93-94, 106, 109, 111, 113, 117, 126-30, 132, 134, 137, 147, 153, 154, 163-64, 201, 203, 206, 210-11, 213, 216, 217, 220-21, 225, 226, 242, 307, 313, 316-17, 331, 440
Page me45.540
Layard, Sir Austen Henry (1817-1894) — English archaeologist and politician, Radical, M.P. (1852-69), Liberal (from the 1860s); Ambassador to Madrid (1869-77) and to Constantinople (1877-80). — 255
Page me45.540
Leblanc, Albert Marie Félix (b. 1844) — participant in the French working-class movement, sided with the Bakuninists; engineer; member of the Paris section of the International; took part in the Paris Commune, after its suppression emigrated to England. — 159, 222, 341
Page me45.540
Leblanc (Le Blanc), F.D. — refugee in London. — 113, 213
Page me45.540
Leeson, E. — acquaintance of Engels' family in London. — 119, 201
Page me45.540
Lefrançais, Gustav Adolphe (1826-1901) — French revolutionary, Left-wing Proudhonist, teacher; participant in the 1848 revolution; member of the International (from the late 1860s), member of the Paris Commune; after its suppression emigrated to Switzerland and joined anarchists. — 259
Page me45.540
Le Moussu, Benjamin (pseudonym Constant) (b. 1846) — participant in the French working-class movement; engraver; member of the Paris Commune; after its suppression emigrated to London; member of the General Council of the International and Corresponding Secretary for the French-speaking sections in the USA (1871-72); delegate to the London Conference (1871) and the Hague Congress (1872); supported Marx and Engels in their struggle against Bakuninists. — 11, 29, 44, 448
Page me45.540

Lenchen — see Demuth, Helene
Page me45.540
Lessner, Friedrich (1825-1910) — prominent figure in the German and international working-class movement; tailor; member of the Communist League from 1847; took part in the 1848-49 revolution; defendant at the Cologne Communist trial (1852); emigrated to London in 1856; member of the German Workers' Educational Society in London and of the General Council of the International (November 1864 to 1872); took part in the British socialist movement (the 1880s-90s); friend and associate of Marx and Engels. — 49, 112, 204-05, 274, 277, 319, 374, 377, 391, 434, 443
Page me45.540
Lever, Charles James (1806-1872) — Irish-born British novelist. — 371
Page me45.540
Levy, Joseph Moses (1812-1888) — English journalist, a founder and publisher of The Daily Telegraph (from 1855). — 328, 331
Page me45.540
Lewes, George Henry (1817-1878) —

Page Break me45.541

Page me45.541
English positivist philosopher, physiologist and writer. — 179
Page me45.541
Liebig, Justus, Baron von (1803-1873) — German scientist, agrochemist. — 107
Page me45.541
Liebknecht, Natalie (née Reh) (1835-1909) — Wilhelm Liebknecht's second wife (from 1868). — 55, 247, 256, 274-75, 336
Page me45.541
Liebknecht, Wilhelm (1826-1900) — prominent figure in the German and international working-class movement; took part in the 1848-49 revolution; member of the Communist League and the International; propagator of the International's ideas in the German working-class movement; deputy to the North German (1867-70) and the German (from 1874) Reichstag; a founder and leader of the German Social-Democratic Workers' Party; editor of Der Volksstaat (1869-76) and the Vorwärts (1876-78, 1890-1900); during the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71 took an internationalist stand; supported the Paris Commune; delegate to the international socialist congresses in 1877 (Ghent), 1889, 1891 and 1893; friend and associate of Marx and Engels. — 4, 6, 7, 9, 30, 43, 45, 50, 54, 55, 60, 65, 66, 69-70, 75, 85, 94, 96, 98, 103, 118-23, 125-30, 132, 134, 147, 151, 154-56, 166, 175-76, 184, 186-87, 194, 201, 203, 207, 218-20, 227, 228, 236, 238, 239, 243, 247, 249, 251, 254-60, 274-76, 295, 296, 299, 303, 321, 331, 334, 336, 352-53, 361, 364, 366-67, 372-75, 378, 381, 385, 388, 394-98, 408, 412, 413, 416, 420, 422, 433, 434, 449
Page me45.541
Lieven, Christofor Andreyevich, Count (1774-1839) — Russian diplomat, envoy to Berlin (1810-12), Ambassador to London (1812-34). — 303
Page me45.541
Lindheimer, B. — German Social-Democrat. — 225-26, 229-30
Page me45.541

Lingenau, Johann Karl Ferdinand (c. 1814-1877) — German-born American socialist, took part in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany, emigrated to the USA; he bequeathed his fortune to the German Social-Democratic Party. — 279, 392
Page me45.541
Lissagaray, Hippolyte Prosper Olivier (1838-1901) — French journalist and historian, Left Republican; participant in the Paris Commune, after its suppression emigrated to Belgium and then to England. — 36, 149-52, 155, 157, 166, 172, 189, 190, 196, 222, 230-31, 234, 262, 266, 288, 308, 333, 440, 445, 446, 450
Page me45.541
Liszt, Franz (1811-1886) — Hungarian composer and pianist. — 143
Page me45.541
Longuet, Charles (September 1873-July 1874) — son of Jenny and Charles Longuet, Marx's grandson. — 14, 15, 26, 28, 29, 31, 36, 38, 43
Page me45.541
Longuet, Charles Félix César (1839-1903) — prominent figure in the French working-class movement, journalist; Proudhonist; member of the General Council of the International (1866-68, 1871-72); Corresponding Secretary for Belgium (1866); delegate to the Lausanne (1867), Brussels (1868) and Hague (1872) congresses and the London Conference (1871); member of the Paris Commune, later joined the Possibilists; member of the Paris Municipal Council in the 1880s and 1890s. — 12, 15, 27, 32, 34, 35, 75, 118, 121, 123, 131, 143, 244, 262, 263, 268, 274, 332, 341, 372, 373, 390, 391, 447
Page me45.541
Longuet, Edgar (1879-1950) — active in the French working-class movement; son of Marx's daughter Jenny and Charles Longuet; physician; member of the Socialist Party. — 372, 375, 376, 378, 391, 392
Page me45.541
Longuet, Felicitas — Charles Longuet's mother. — 234
Page me45.541
Longuet, Henry (Harry) (1878-1883) — son of Jenny and Charles Longuet, Marx's grandson. — 316, 321

Page Break me45.542
Page me45.542
Longuet, Jean — Charles Longuet's father. — 121
Page me45.542
Longuet, Jean Laurent Frédéric (Johnny) (1876-1938) — active in the French and international working-class movement; son of Marx's daughter Jenny and Charles Longuet; lawyer; a leader in the French Socialist Party. — 121, 123, 143, 235, 271, 318, 320, 322, 324-26, 332, 372, 376, 382, 447
Page me45.542
Longuet, Jenny (1844-1883) — prominent figure in the international working-class movement; Marx's eldest daughter, Charles Longuet's wife from 1872. — 14-15, 26, 27, 29, 31, 32, 34-36, 38-39, 43, 50, 51, 75, 118, 120, 123, 131, 138, 139, 143, 212, 244, 262, 263, 268, 274, 316, 320-22, 324, 325, 332, 333, 371-73, 375-76, 378, 381, 382, 390-92, 447
Page me45.542

Lopatin, Hermann Alexandrovich (1845-1918) — Russian revolutionary, Narodnik, member of the General Council of the International (1870); a translator of the first volume of Marx's Capital into Russian; friend of Marx and Engels. — 53, 58, 76, 242, 248, 306, 313, 316, 439
Page me45.542
Loria, Achille (1857-1943) — Italian sociologist and economist, falsifier of Marxism. — 426
Page me45.542
Loris-Melikov, Mikhail Tarielovich, Count (1825-1888) — Russian general and statesman, commander of the Caucasian Corps during the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78; Minister of the Interior (1880-81). — 240
Page me45.542
Lormier, Marie — French acquaintance of Marx's family. — 75, 234
Page me45.542
Louis Philippe (1773-1850) — Duke of Orleans, King of the French (1830-48). — 356
Page me45.542
Louis XIV (1638-1715) — King of France (1643-1715). — 358
Page me45.542
Louis XV (1710-1774) — King of France (1715-74). — 358
Page me45.542
Louis XVI (1754-1793) — King of France (1774-92), guillotined during the French Revolution. — 260
Page me45.542
Lover, Samuel (1797-1868) — British writer, Irish by birth. — 371
Page me45.542
Lowe, Robert, 1st Viscount Sherbrooke (1811-1892) — British statesman and journalist; contributor to The Times; Whig and later Liberal; M.P., Chancellor of the Exchequer (1868-73); Home Secretary (1873-74). — 29, 156, 158, 300
Page me45.542
Loyola, St Ignatius of (Inigo Lopez de Loyola) (1491-1556) — Spanish nobleman, a founder of the Society of Jesus (1534). — 199
Page me45.542
Lübeck, Carl — German journalist, Social-Democrat, emigrated in 1873. — 381, 386, 411, 414
Page me45.542
Luther, Martin (1483-1546) — prominent figure of the Reformation, founder of Protestantism (Lutheranism) in Germany; ideologist of the German burghers. — 74, 191
Page me45.542
M

Page me45.542
Macdonald, Alexander (1821-1881) — one of the reformist leaders of the British trade unions, President of the National Miners' Union (from 1863), M.P. (from 1874); advocated the Liberal Party's policy. — 300
Page me45.542

M(a)cDonnel(l), Joseph Patrick (1847-1906) — prominent figure in the Irish working-class movement; member of the General Council of the International and Corresponding Secretary for Ireland (1871-72); delegate to the London Conference (1871) and the Hague Congress (1872); emigrated to the USA in 1872 and took part in the working-class movement there. — 76
Page me45.542
MacMahon (Mac-Mahon), Marie Edme Patrice Maurice, comte de, duc de Magenta (1808-1893) — French marshal, senator, Bonapartist; participant in a number of wars of the Second Empire; a butcher of the Paris Commune; President of the Third Republic (1873-79). — 23, 24, 35, 233, 235, 246, 251

Page Break me45.543
Page me45.543
Mackenzie, Wallace. — 170
Page me45.543
Magne, Pierre (1806-1879) — French statesman, Bonapartist, Minister of Finance (1855-60, 1867-69, 1870, 1873-74). — 25
Page me45.543
Mahmud II (1785-1839) — Sultan of Turkey (1808-39). — 301
Page me45.543
Mahmud Dschelal ed-din Pasha Damad (1840-1884) — Turkish statesman, member of the War Council, War Minister several times, demoted and deported (1878); returned in 1880; was exposed as an accomplice in the assassination (in 1876) of the Turkish Sultan Abdul Aziz and sentenced (in 1881) to exile for life. — 234, 260, 263, 280, 293, 296-97
Page me45.543
Mahomet — see Mohammed
Page me45.543
Malon, Benoît (1841-1893) — French socialist, member of the International; delegate to the Geneva Congress (1866); member of the Central Committee of the National Guard and the Paris Commune; after its suppression emigrated to Italy and then to Switzerland where he joined the Bakuninists; a leader of the reformist trend in the French Workers' Party and of the Possibilists (from 1882). — 157, 214, 259, 431
Page me45.543
Malthus, Thomas Robert (1766-1834) — English clergyman and economist, author of a theory of population. — 62, 108
Page me45.543
Manning, Charles — one of Marx's witnesses when he applied for British naturalisation in 1874. — 28
Page me45.543
Maret, Henri (1838-1917) — French radical journalist, writer and politician, editor of La Marseillaise; deputy to the National Assembly from 1881. — 339-40
Page me45.543
Maria Alexandrovna (1853-1920) — Grand Duchess, Alexander II's daughter, Duke of Edinburgh's wife from 1874. — 14, 18
Page me45.543

Maria Fyodorovna (1759-1828) — Princess of Württemberg, Empress of Russia, Paul I's wife (from 1776). — 14
Page me45.543
Martin, Constant (1839-1906) — French revolutionary, Blanquist, took part in the Paris Commune; after its suppression emigrated to London, member of the General Council of the International (1871-72), delegate to the London Conference (1871). — 36
Page me45.543
Marx — Austrian police official, chief of police in Vienna. — 82
Page me45.543
Marx, Eleanor (Tussy) (1855-1898) — Karl Marx's youngest daughter, took part in the British and international working-class movement; married Edward Aveling in 1884; active propagator of Marxism. — 26, 34, 37, 39-40, 46, 47, 51, 56, 75, 87, 89, 93, 121, 132, 135, 136, 138-42, 144-46, 148, 190, 191, 212, 222, 226, 244, 245, 268, 269, 289, 291, 321, 323, 324, 329, 333, 369-72, 374, 376-78, 380, 390, 392, 441-42, 444-46, 449, 450
Page me45.543
Marx, Jenny (née von Westphalen) (1814-1881) — Karl Marx's wife. — 13-14, 30, 33, 49, 52, 75, 76, 93, 121, 131-32, 138-41, 201, 211, 222, 225, 235, 244, 245, 263, 268, 269, 274, 279, 289, 294, 307, 312, 315, 318-19, 322, 329, 332, 333, 349, 353, 369, 371, 372, 375, 376, 380, 382, 388, 391, 414, 422, 432, 441-48
Page me45.543
Maskelyne, John Nevil (1839-1917) — English illusionist, organised anti-spiritualist seances. — 291
Page me45.543
Matheson — one of Marx's witnesses when he applied for British naturalisation in 1874. — 28
Page me45.543
Mayer, Karl (1819-1889) — German democrat, deputy to the Frankfurt National Assembly (1848-49); after the defeat of the revolution emigrated to Switzerland; editor of Der Beobachter in Stuttgart in the 1860s. — 9, 85, 190
Page me45.543
Mazzini, Giuseppe (1805-1872) — Italian revolutionary, democrat; leader of the national liberation movement in Italy, head of the Provisional Government Page Break me45.544 of the Roman Republic (1849); an organiser of the Central Committee of European Democracy in London; fought against the International and the Paris Commune. — 81

Page me45.544
Page me45.544
Mehemed Ali Pasha (real name Karl Detroit) (1827-1878) — Turkish general; German by birth; commanded a corps in Bosnia (1875-76), commander-in-chief in Bulgaria (1877), recalled in 1878; took part in the Berlin Congress (1878); later commander-in-chief in Albany. — 255, 272, 280
Page me45.544
Mehmed Sadek, effendi — Turkish statesman, Minister of Finance, plenipotentiary at the Russo-Turkish peace negotiations in Adrianople (1829). — 302

Page me45.544
Mehring, Franz (1846-1919) — prominent figure in the German working-class movement, philosopher, historian and journalist; author of several works on the history of Germany and German Social-Democracy and of a biography of Marx; member of the German Social-Democratic Party (from 1891); a regular contributor to Die Neue Zeit; one of the leaders and theoreticians of the Left wing of the German Social-Democratic Party. — 260, 334
Page me45.544
Meissner, Otto Karl (1819-1902) — Hamburg publisher, printed Marx's Capital and other works by Marx and Engels. — 45, 47, 51, 52, 57, 125
Page me45.544
Mercier de la Riviére, Paul Pierre (1720-1793) — French economist, Physiocrat. — 452
Page me45.544
Merriman — Marx's attorney. — 11, 13
Page me45.544
Mesa y Leompart, José (1840-1904). — participant in the Spanish working-class and socialist movement, printer; an organiser of the International's sections in Spain, member of the Spanish Federal Council (1871-72) and the New Madrid Federation (1872-73), fought anarchism; a founder of the Spanish Socialist Workers' Party (1879); translated into Spanish a number of works by Marx and Engels; their supporter. — 39, 42, 306, 330, 439
Page me45.544
Meshchersky, Vladimir Petrovich, Prince (1839-1914) — Russian writer and journalist, an ideologist of the reactionary nobility, monarchist. — 164
Page me45.544
Metz, Theodor — an innkeeper in Cologne. — 106
Page me45.544
Mevissen, Gustav von (1815-1899) — German banker and politician, leader of the Rhenish liberal bourgeoisie; founder of a number of big joint-stock and credit banks and industrial joint-stock companies. — 182
Page me45.544
Meyer, Hermann (1821-1875) — prominent figure in the German and American working-class movement, socialist; took part in the 1848-49 revolution; emigrated to the USA in 1852, an organiser of the International's sections in St Louis. — 115
Page me45.544
Meyer, Rudolph Hermann (1839-1899) — German economist and publicist, conservative. — 7, 17, 304, 359, 368, 382, 391, 424
Page me45.544
Midhat Ahmed Pasha (1822-1884) — Turkish statesman, Grand Vizir (1872, 1876-77), succeeded in proclaiming the first Turkish Constitution (23 December 1876); later was condemned and banished to Arabia. — 234, 260, 297, 331
Page me45.544
Mikhailovsky, Nikolai Konstantinovich (1842-1904) — Russian sociologist, journalist and literary critic, ideologist of liberal Narodism; an editor of the Otechestvenniye Zapiski (1868-84). — 343
Page me45.544

Milyutin, Dmitry Alexeyevich, Count (1816-1912) — Russian general, War Minister (1861-81). — 168, 170
Page me45.544
Mill, John Stuart (1806-1873) — English economist and philosopher. — 58, 346
Page me45.544
Miquel, Johannes von (1828-1901) — German lawyer, politician and financier; member of the Communist

Page Break me45.545
Page me45.545
League; chief burgomaster of Osnabrück (1865-70, 1876-80); a leader of the Right-wing National Liberals (from 1867); deputy to the North German and the German Reichstag. — 405
Page me45.545
Mohammed (Muhammad, Mahomet) (c. 570-632) — founder of Islam. — 447
Page me45.545
Moleschott, Jakob (1822-1893) — Dutch physiologist and philosopher; lectured in Germany, Switzerland and Italy. — 107
Page me45.545
Moltke, Helmuth Karl Bernhard, Count von (1800-1891) — Prussian military leader and writer; general, field-marshal (from 1871); chief of the Prussian (1857-71) and the Imperial (1871-88) General Staff. — 8, 163, 182, 297, 300
Page me45.545
Montefiore, Leonard (1853-1879) — English journalist. — 329
Page me45.545
Moore, George — English engraver. — 10-13
Page me45.545
Moore, Samuel (1838-1911) — English lawyer, member of the International, translated into English the first volume of Marx's Capital (in collaboration with Edward Aveling) and the Manifesto of the Communist Party; friend of Marx and Engels. — 387
Page me45.545
Morel — French refugee in London. — 110
Page me45.545
Morley, John, Viscount Morley of Blackburn (1838-1923) — British journalist and statesman, Liberal; editor-in-chief of The Fortnightly Review (1867-82). — 6, 213
Page me45.545
Morley, Samuel (1809-1886) — British industrialist and politician, Liberal M.P. (1865, 1868-85). — 6, 299
Page me45.545
Most, Johann Joseph (1846-1906) — participant in the German working-class movement, anarchist; bookbinder; deputy to the German Reichstag (1874-78); emigrated to London in 1878; published the newspaper Die Freiheit there; expelled from the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany as an anarchist (1880); emigrated to the USA (1882). — 118-20, 122, 123, 125, 130, 150, 152, 218, 247, 276, 283, 351, 353, 362, 363, 365, 368, 381, 383, 386, 389, 411, 413, 414, 423, 425, 429, 433
Page me45.545

Mottershead, Thomas G. (c. 1825-1884) — English weaver; member of the General Council of the International (1869-72), Corresponding Secretary for Denmark (1871-72), delegate to the London Conference (1871) and the Hague Congress (1872); later opposed Marx's and Engels' line in the General Council and the British Federal Council, one of the active members of the latter's reformist wing; expelled from the International by decision of the General Council (1873). — 92, 155, 158, 292, 300, 448
Page me45.545
Müffling, Friedrich Ferdinand Karl, Baron (1775-1851) — Prussian general, then field-marshal general, military writer, took part in the wars against Napoleonic France. — 301-02
Page me45.545
Muhtar Ahmed Pasha (1832-1919) — Turkish general, commander-in-chief of the Turkish troops in Asia Minor during the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78. — 232
Page me45.545
Mülberger, Arthur (1847-1907) — German physician, journalist; Social-Democrat. — 120
Page me45.545
Müllner, Amadeus Gottfried Adolf (1774-1829) — German poet, dramatist and literary critic. — 154
Page me45.545
Mundella, Anthony John (1825-1897) — British statesman and manufacturer; M.P. from 1868; Vice-President of the Committee of Council for Education (1880-85); held a number of ministerial posts. — 299
Page me45.545
Murad V (1840-1904) — Sultan of Turkey (May-August 1876); nephew of Sultan Abdul Aziz. — 120
Page me45.545
Muravyov (Muravieff), Mikhail Nikolayevich, Count (1796-1866) — Russian statesman, participant in the campaign against Napoleon in 1812, Governor General of the North-Western Page Break me45.546

Page me45.546
Territory (1863-64). — 169, 170
Page me45.546
Mutzelberger — German Catholic priest in Frankfurt am Main. — 84, 85
Page me45.546
N

Page me45.546
Nadler, Karl Christian Gottfried (1809-1849) — German poet. — 133
Page me45.546
Napoleon I Bonaparte (1769-1821) — Emperor of the French (1804-14 and 1815). — 14, 68
Page me45.546

Napoleon III (Charles Louis Napoléon Bonaparte) (1808-1873) — Napoleon I's nephew, President of the Second Republic (1848-51), Emperor of the French (1852-70). — 52, 175, 303, 314, 340, 357
Page me45.546
Nassauer. — 84
Page me45.546
Nesselrode, Karl Vasilyevich, Count (1780-1862) — Russian statesman and diplomat; Minister of Foreign Affairs (1816-56); State Chancellor (from 1845). — 303
Page me45.546
Neumann. — 84
Page me45.546
Neustadt an der Hardt — participant in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany; refugee in England, member of the German Workers' Educational Society in London. — 364
Page me45.546
Nicholas I (1796-1855) — Emperor of Russia (1825-55). — 164, 301, 302
Page me45.546
Nikolai Nikolayevich (1831-1891) — Grand Duke, Nicholas I's son; commander-in-chief of the Russian army in the Balkans during the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78. — 241
Page me45.546
Nobiling, Karl Eduard (1848-1878) — German anarchist; made an attempt on William I's life in 1878. — 419, 449, 450
Page me45.546
Noel — see Idelson, Rozalia Christophorovna
Page me45.546
Noel — see Smirnov, Valerian Nikolayevich
Page me45.546
Novikov (Nov(w)ikoff), Yevgeny Petrovich (1826-1903) — Russian writer and statesman, envoy to Athens (1865), Ambassador to Vienna (1870) and to Constantinople (1879-82). — 167
Page me45.546
Novikov (Nov(w)ikoff), Ivan Petrovich — Russian general, Olga Alexeyevna Novikova's husband. — 167
Page me45.546
Novikova (Nov(w)ikoff), Olga Alexeyevna (née Kireyeva) (1840-1925) — Russian journalist, for a long time lived in London. — 167-70, 178, 179, 205, 277
Page me45.546
O

Page me45.546
O'Clery, Keyes, Count (1849-1913) — Irish historian and politician, M.P. (1874-80). — 210, 221
Page me45.546
O'Connell, Daniel (1775-1847) — Irish lawyer and politician, leader of the liberal wing of the national liberation movement. — 84
Page me45.546

Offenbach, Jacques (1819-1880) — French composer. — 143
Page me45.546
Oppenheim, Max — Gertrud Kugelmann's brother, lived in Prague. — 47, 48, 52, 53, 55-56, 86, 87, 89, 142, 144-45, 146, 147
Page me45.546
Oriol, Henri — clerk in Lachâtre's publishing house in Paris; owner of the printshop which put out socialist literature (1883-86). — 153, 439
Page me45.546
Orlov, Alexei Fyodorovich, Count, Prince (from 1856) (1786-1861) — Russian military leader, statesman and diplomat; signed the treaties of Adrianople (1829) and Unkiar-Skelessi (1833) with Turkey; headed the Russian delegation to the Paris Congress (1856). — 302
Page me45.546
Orsini, Cesare — Italian refugee; member of the General Council of the International (1866-67); spread the International's ideas in the USA; Felice Orsini's brother. — 81
Page me45.546
Orsini, Felice (1819-1858) — Italian democrat, republican, prominent figure in the struggle for Italy's

Page Break me45.547
Page me45.547
national liberation and unification; executed for his attempt on the life of Napoleon III. — 81
Page me45.547
Osborne, John — English trade unionist; plasterer; participant in the Inaugural Meeting of the International held on 28 September 1864 at St Martin's Hall; member of the General Council of the International (1864-67), reformist. — 292, 300
Page me45.547
Osman Nuri Pasha (1832-1900) — Turkish military leader, marshal; participant in the Crimean (1853-56) and Russo-Turkish (1877-78) wars, War Minister (1878-85). — 255, 272
Page me45.547
Oswald, Eugen (1826-1912) — German journalist, democrat; took part in the revolutionary movement in Baden (1848-49); emigrated to London after the defeat of the revolution. — 74
Page me45.547
Otto-Walster, August (1834-1898) — German journalist and writer; member of the General Association of German Workers, Social-Democrat; emigrated to the USA in 1876. — 100
Page me45.547
Owen, Robert (1771-1858) — English utopian socialist. — 99, 262-63, 292, 335
Page me45.547
P

Page me45.547

Pahlen, Fyodor Petrovich, Count (1780-1863) — Russian diplomat, Russia's representative during the conclusion of the Adrianople Peace Treaty (1829); member of the State Council (from 1832). — 302
Page me45.547
Panayev — shareholder of Louis Blanc's newspaper L'Homme Libre. — 440
Page me45.547
Parnell, Charles Stewart (1846-1891) — Irish politician and statesman, Liberal, M.P. (from 1875), leader of the Home Rule League (1877-90); President of the Irish Land League (from 1880). — 261
Page me45.547
Paul I (1754-1801) — Emperor of Russia (1796-1801). — 14
Page me45.547
Pauli, Ida — Philipp Viktor Pauli's wife. — 104, 115-17, 133, 134, 141-42, 146, 180, 197-98, 215, 216, 316
Page me45.547
Pauli, Philipp Viktor (1836-d. after 1916) — German chemist, friend of Marx and Engels; headed a chemical plant in Rheinau (1871-80). — 104, 105, 115-17, 133, 134, 142, 146, 180, 181, 198, 215, 216, 288, 314, 316
Page me45.547
Perret, Henri — participant in the Swiss working-class movement, engraver; a leader of the International in Switzerland, Secretary of the Romance Federal Council (1868-73); member of the Égalité editorial board; delegate to the Geneva (1866) and Basle (1869) congresses and to the London Conference (1871) of the International; broke with the Bakuninists in 1869; after the Hague Congress (1872) adopted a conciliatory stand. — 4-6
Page me45.547
Perrot, Franz — 19th-century German economist and journalist. — 304
Page me45.547
Pertev, Reis, effendi (d. 1837) — Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs (from 1827). — 301
Page me45.547
Peter III (1728-1762) — Emperor of Russia (1761-62). — 14
Page me45.547
Petrarch (Francesco Petrarca) (1304-1374) — Italian poet of the Renaissance. — 25
Page me45.547
Petty, Sir William (1623-1687) — English economist, father of the classical bourgeois political economy. — 208, 329, 452
Page me45.547
Petzler, Johann (d. 1898) — German democrat, teacher of music; refugee in London from the 1850s. — 332, 333
Page me45.547
Phaedrus (c. 15 B.C.-A.D. c. 70) — Roman fabulist. — 219
Page me45.547
Pindar (c. 522-c. 443 B.C.) — Greek poet. — 358
Page me45.547

Pindy, Jean Louis (1840-1917) — French joiner, Proudhonist; member of the International, delegate to the Brussels (1868) and Basle (1869) congresses,

Page Break me45.548
Page me45.548
organiser of the International's section in Brest (1869); took part in the Paris Commune; after its suppression emigrated to Switzerland and joined the anarchists. — 157
Page me45.548
Pio, Louis Albert François (1841-1894) — a leader of the Danish working-class and socialist movement, propagated Marx's ideas, an organiser of the International's Danish sections (1871), a founder of the Danish Social-Democratic Party (1876); emigrated to the USA in 1877. — 117, 121, 126, 221
Page me45.548
Plater, Wladyslaw (1806-1889) — Polish politician; took part in the insurrection of 1830-31. — 37
Page me45.548
Plon-Plon — see Bonaparte, Prince Napoléon Joseph Charles Paul
Page me45.548
Polyakov, Nikolai Petrovich (c. 1843-1905) — Russian democratic publisher, was close to Narodniks; published the first Russian edition of the first volume of Marx's Capital (1872). — 57
Page me45.548
Potapov, Alexander Lvovich (1818-1886) — Russian adjutant general; took part in the Crimean war (1853-56); Chief of Staff of the gendarmes' corps and of the Third Department of the Imperial Chancellory (1861-64); Governor General of the North-Western Territory (from 1868); chief of gendarmes (1874-76). — 170
Page me45.548
Potter, George (1832-1893) — a British trade union leader, carpenter; member of the London Trades Council and a leader of the Amalgamated Union of Building Workers; founder and publisher of The Bee-Hive Newspaper. — 81
Page me45.548
Powell — Marx's lawyer. — 11, 13
Page me45.548
Premerlani — policeman in Turin (Italy). — 199
Page me45.548
Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809-1865) — French writer, economist and sociologist; founder of anarchism. — 64, 80, 92, 99, 433
Page me45.548
Pumps — see Burns, Mary Ellen
Page me45.548
Pyat, Félix (1810-1889) — French journalist, playwright and politician, democrat; took part in the 1848 revolution; opposed an independent working-class movement; conducted a slander campaign against Marx and the International; deputy to the National Assembly (1871); member of the Paris Commune (1871), after its suppression emigrated to England; returned to France after the amnesty of 1880; member of the Chamber of Deputies (from 1888). — 440

Page me45.548
Q

Page me45.548
Quesnay, François (1694-1774) — French economist, founder of the School of Physiocrats; physician by profession. — 262, 263, 265, 452
Page me45.548
Quêst, Adolphe — judicial administrator, manager of Lachâtre's publishing house in Paris. — 79, 153, 193-94, 204, 227
Page me45.548
Quételet, Lambert Adolphe Jacques (1796-1874) — Belgian statistician, mathematician, astronomer and sociologist. — 82
Page me45.548
Quinet, Edgar (1803-1875) — French politician and historian; participant in the 1848 revolution; refugee (1852-70); took part in the bourgeois-pacifist congress of the League of Peace and Freedom in Geneva (1867); deputy to the National Assembly (1871-75). — 25
Page me45.548
R

Page me45.548
Ragsky, Ferdinand — Austrian chemist, professor at Vienna. — 88
Page me45.548
Ralston, William Ralston Shedden (1828-1889) — English writer, author of works on literature and history of Russia. — 329
Page me45.548
Ramm, Hermann — German Social-Democrat, member of the editorial

Page Break me45.549
Page me45.549
board of Der Volksstaat and Vorwärts. — 59, 66, 194-95, 238, 326
Page me45.549
Rasch, Gustav (d. 1878) — German lawyer, democrat, journalist; took part in the 1848-49 revolution; after its defeat a refugee in Switzerland and France; member of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party from 1873. — 175, 177, 239
Page me45.549
Rawlinson, Sir Henry Creswicke (1810-1895) — English historian, orientalist, army officer in Persia; member of the Council of India (1858-59, 1868-95); M.P. (1858-59, 1865-68); President of the Royal Asiatic Society (1878-81); contributed to many English newspapers. — 163
Page me45.549

Razoua, Eugéne Angéle (1830-1878) — French journalist, Republican; deputy to the National Assembly; took part in the Paris Commune; after its suppression emigrated to Geneva; member of the International; contributed to a number of periodicals. — 259
Page me45.549
Reclus — Protestant priest, father of Élie and Élisée Reclus. — 259
Page me45.549
Reclus, Jean Jacques Élisée (1830-1905) — French geographer, sociologist and politician, theoretician of anarchism; member of the International; took part in the Paris Commune; after its suppression emigrated and lived in Italy, Switzerland and Belgium. — 132, 172, 257, 259, 440
Page me45.549
Reclus, Jean Pierre Michel Élie (1827-1904) — French ethnographer, journalist, utopian socialist; took part in the 1848 revolution; director of the National Library during the Paris Commune. — 132, 172, 257, 259
Page me45.549
Redif Pasha — Turkish statesman, War Minister (1877). — 260
Page me45.549
Reichenbach — young German writer. — 359
Page me45.549
Reichensperger, August (1808-1895) — German lawyer and politician; deputy to the Frankfurt National Assembly (Right wing) (1848-49) and to the German Reichstag (1871-84); a leader of the Catholic Party of the Centre. — 322, 325, 328
Page me45.549
Renshaw — an acquaintance of Engels' family in London. — 321, 324
Page me45.549
Reshid Mustafa Mehemed Pasha (1802-1858) — Turkish statesman; repeatedly held posts of Grand Vizir and Foreign Minister. — 301
Page me45.549
Reuß, Heinrich VII, Prince (1825-1906) — Prussian diplomat and general, Ambassador Extraordinary to Constantinople (1877), Ambassador to Vienna (1878-94). — 301
Page me45.549
Reuter, Paul Julius, Baron von (1816-1899) — founder of the Reuter telegraph agency in London (1851); German by birth. — 158, 325
Page me45.549
Ricardo, David (1772-1823) — English economist. — 62, 153, 205, 261, 452
Page me45.549
Richter, Dmitry Ivanovich (1848-1919) — Russian statistician, economist and geographer; lived in emigration in the 1870s. — 121, 126-28
Page me45.549
Richter, Eugen (1838-1906) — German politician, leader of the Party of Progress, deputy to the German Reichstag (1871-1906). — 309
Page me45.549
Rittinghausen, Moritz (1814-1890) — German journalist, democrat; contributed to the Neue Rheinische Zeitung (1848-49); member of the International; member of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party till 1884; deputy to the German Reichstag (1877-78 and 1881-84). — 195

Page me45.549
Rivers, George — bookseller in London. — 317-18
Page me45.549
Roby, Henry John (1830-1915) — British manufacturer, classical scholar; Liberal; member of the government schools commissions (1864-74); a partner in the Manchester firm of Ermen & Roby (1874-94); M.P. (1890-95). — 67
Page me45.549
Roby, Mary Ann Matilda (née Ermen) (d. 1889) — Peter Ermen's daughter, wife of the above from 1861. — 67

Page Break me45.550
Page me45.550
Rochat, Charles Michel (b. 1844) — a leader of the French working-class movement; member of the Paris Federal Council of the International; took part in the Paris Commune; member of the General Council of the International and Corresponding Secretary for Holland (October 1871 to 1872); delegate to the London Conference (1871). — 49
Page me45.550
Rochefort, Victor Henri, marquis de Rochefort-Luçay (1831-1913) — French journalist, writer and politician, Leftwing republican; member of the Government of National Defence; after the suppression of the Paris Commune was exiled to New Caledonia whence fled to England; organised the second edition of the Anglo-French magazine Lanterne in London and Brussels (1874-76). — 25, 29, 34
Page me45.550
Rocher, L. — 11
Page me45.550
Rörig — Wilhelm Liebknecht's acquaintance, forester. — 55
Page me45.550
Rothschild, Alphonse, baron de (1827-1905) — French banker, head of the banking house. — 136
Page me45.550
Roy, Joseph (1830-1916) — French teacher, translated the first volume of Marx's Capital and works by Feuerbach into French. — 16
Page me45.550
Royer, von — Prussian diplomat, envoy to Constantinople (1829). — 302
Page me45.550
Ruge, Arnold (1802-1880) — German radical journalist and philosopher, Young Hegelian; deputy to the Frankfurt National Assembly (Left wing) in 1848; a leader of the German petty-bourgeois refugees in England in the 1850s; became a National Liberal after 1866. — 374
Page me45.550
Rümelin, Gustav (1815-1888) — German writer and statistician, sociologist, author of works on statistics, history and literature. — 191
Page me45.550
Russell, John, 1st Earl Russell (1792-1878) — British statesman, Whig leader; Prime Minister (1846-52, 1865-66), Foreign Secretary (1852-53, 1859-65). — 140, 156

Page me45.550
S

Page me45.550
Sadek, effendi — see Mehmed Sadek, effendi
Page me45.550
Saint-Simon, Claude Henri de Rouvroy, comte de (1760-1825) — French utopian socialist. — 263
Page me45.550
Salisbury, Robert Arthur Talbot Gascoyne-Cecil, 3rd Marquis of (1830-1903) — British statesman, Conservative leader (from 1881), Secretary of State for India (1866-67, 1874-78), Foreign Secretary (1878-80), Prime Minister (1885-86, 1886-92, 1895-1902). — 296, 299
Page me45.550
Salzmann. — 83
Page me45.550
Samarin, Yuri Fyodorovich (1819-1876) — Russian writer and public figure. — 103
Page me45.550
Samter, Adolph (1824-1883) — German economist, follower of Rodbertus. — 328
Page me45.550
Sargant, William Lucas (1809-1889) — English teacher and economist, Owen's biographer. — 263
Page me45.550
Sarny, Eduard — German journalist, an editor of the Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt. — 180
Page me45.550
Schäffle, Albert Eberhard Friedrich (1831-1903) — German vulgar economist and sociologist, armchair socialist, rejected the class struggle. — 163, 190, 413
Page me45.550
Schaible, Karl Heinrich (1824-1899) — German physician and writer; took part in the 1849 Baden-Palatinate uprising, then emigrated to England. — 175-77
Page me45.550
Scheu, Andreas (1844-1927) — a leader in the Austrian (1868-74) and British socialist movement; member of the International; emigrated to England in 1874; a founder of the Social-Democratic Federation. — 49, 189

Page Break me45.551
Page me45.551
Scheu, Heinrich (1845-1926) — Austrian Social-Democrat, member of the International, delegate to the Hague Congress (1872); emigrated to England in 1873; brother of the above. — 49, 189
Page me45.551
Schiller, Johann Christoph Friedrich von (1759-1805) — German poet, dramatist, historian and philosopher. — 259
Page me45.551

Schily — Victor Schily's wife. — 92
Page me45.551
Schily, Victor (1810-1875) — German democrat, lawyer; took part in the 1849 Baden-Palatinate uprising; refugee in France; member of the International, delegate to the London Conference (1865); Marx's friend. — 92
Page me45.551
Schlesinger, Maximilian (1855-1902) — German journalist, Social-Democrat, Lassallean; contributor to a number of newspapers and magazines. — 386
Page me45.551
Schmidt, Eduard Oscar (1823-1886) — German zoologist, Darwinist, professor at Strasbourg (from 1872). — 313-14, 317
Page me45.551
Schmidt, Johann Joseph. — 180
Page me45.551
Schmitz, Richard (1834-1893) — German physician in Neuenahr (from 1863). — 267
Page me45.551
Schneckenburger, Max (1819-1849) — German poet. — 444
Page me45.551
Schöler, Caroline (Lina) (1819-1891) — German teacher in Cologne; friend of Marx's family. — 202, 203, 205
Page me45.551
Schollymeyer, Schorlemeyer — see Schorlemmer, Carl
Page me45.551
Schopenhauer, Arthur (1788-1860) — German idealist philosopher, irrationalist and pessimist, ideologist of Prussian Junkers. — 50
Page me45.551
Schorlemmer, Carl (1834-1892) — German organic chemist, professor at Manchester; member of the International and of the German Social-Democratic Workers' Party; friend of Marx and Engels. — 116, 133, 215, 268, 270, 271, 350, 371, 374, 375, 377-80, 382-83, 385, 387, 389, 390
Page me45.551
Schott, Sigmund (1818-1895) — Württemberg writer and politician; advocate of Germany's unification under Prussia's supremacy; a founder of the National Association. — 287, 304-05, 311-12
Page me45.551
Schramm, Carl August (1830-1905) — German Social-Democrat, reformist; left the Party in the 1880s. — 73, 75, 375, 378, 393, 395-98, 402-08, 411-13, 417, 422, 428, 431
Page me45.551
Schumacher, Balthasar Gerhard (1755-d. after 1801) — German lawyer, author of the song on which Prussian National Anthem was based. — 301
Page me45.551
Schumacher, Hermann (c. 1826-1904) — German economist. — 90
Page me45.551
Schumann, Fritz — delegate to the International Socialist Congress in Paris (September 1878) from the Danish Social-Democratic Workers' Party and from the International Labour Union. — 339, 340

Page me45.551
Schupps — family of Engels' acquaintances in Heidelberg, with whom Mary Ellen Burns stayed in 1875-77. — 116, 180, 197
Page me45.551
Schuyler, Eugene (1840-1890) — American historian and diplomat, secretary of the diplomatic mission in Russia (1869), General Consul in Constantinople (1876-78), later American minister in Athens and US representative in Romania and Serbia. — 168
Page me45.551
Schweitzer — owner of a printing-house in London, where the Londoner Journal was printed. — 315
Page me45.551
Schweitzer, Johann Baptist von (1833-1875) — German lawyer, a Lassallean leader; editor of Der Social-Demokrat (1864-67); President of the General Association of German Workers (1867-71); supported unification of Germany under Prussia's supremacy; fought against the Social-Democratic

Page Break me45.552
Page me45.552
Workers' Party; was expelled from the General Association for his contacts with the Prussian authorities (1872). — 6, 402
Page me45.552
Schwitzguébel, Adhémar (1844-1895) — prominent figure in the Swiss working-class movement, anarchist; engraver; member of the International; a leader of the Alliance of Socialist Democracy and of the Jura Federation; delegate to the Hague Congress (1872); expelled from the International by the General Council's decision (1873). — 49, 306
Page me45.552
Seidlitz, Georg von — German naturalist, follower of Darwin. — 107
Page me45.552
Serraillier, Auguste (b. 1840) — participant in the French and international working-class movement; shoemaker; member of the General Council of the International (1869-72), Corresponding Secretary for Belgium, Holland, Spain (1870) and France (1871-72); in September 1870 was sent to Paris as the General Council's agent, member of the Paris Commune; delegate to the London Conference (1871) and the Hague Congress (1872) of the International, member of the British Federal Council (1873); associate of Marx and Engels. — 44, 341, 448
Page me45.552
Seton — one of Marx's witnesses when he applied for British naturalisation in 1874. — 28
Page me45.552
Shaen — English lawyer. — 11, 12
Page me45.552
Shakespeare, William (1564-1616) — English poet and playwright. — 65, 122, 191, 226, 446
Page me45.552

Shipton, George (1839-1911) — prominent figure in the British trade union movement, reformist, Secretary of the House-Painters' Union and of the London Trades Council (1871-96). — 300
Page me45.552
Shuvalov (Schuwaloff), Pyotr Andreyevich, Count (1827-1889) — Russian statesman and diplomat, general, member of the State Council (1874); chief of gendarmes (1866-74); Ambassador to London (1874-79). — 168, 170, 389
Page me45.552
Sieber, Nikolai Ivanovich (1844-1888) — economist; one of the first popularisers of Marx's economic works in Russia; held radical bourgeois reformist views. — 343
Page me45.552
Simon, Jules François Simon Suisse (1814-1896) — French statesman and idealist philosopher; moderate republican, deputy to the Constituent Assembly (1848-49); member of the Government of National Defence, Minister of Public Instruction in that government and in Thiers' government (1870-73); deputy to the National Assembly of 1871, an instigator of struggle against the Paris Commune; Chairman of the Council of Ministers (1876-77). — 440
Page me45.552
Singer, Paul (1844-1911) — prominent figure in the German working-class movement, a leader of the German Social-Democrats; member of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party (from 1878); deputy to the German Reichstag (1884-1911); member (from 1887) and Chairman (from 1890) of the Executive Committee of the Social-Democratic Party of Germany. — 396, 412
Page me45.552
Smirnov, Valerian Nikolayevich (pseudonym Doctor Noel) (1848-1900) — Russian revolutionary, Narodnik, physician; emigrated to Zurich in the early 1870s, then to London, Paris, and Berne; member of the International; an editor of the newspaper and magazine Vperyod! — 78, 91, 129, 134, 147, 154, 305, 312-13, 316
Page me45.552
Smith, Adam (1723-1790) — Scottish economist. — 153, 260, 452
Page me45.552
Sonnemann, Leopold (1831-1909) — German politician, journalist, banker, democrat; founder and publisher of the Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt; deputy to the German

Page Break me45.553
Page me45.553
Reichstag (1871-77, 1878-84). — 7, 9, 85, 95, 98, 156, 180, 305, 334, 412
Page me45.553
Sorge, Friedrich Adolph (1828-1906) — prominent figure in the international and American working-class and socialist movement, took part in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany; emigrated to Switzerland, then to Belgium, from 1852 lived in the USA; organised the International's American sections, Secretary of the Federal Council for North America, delegate to the Hague Congress (1872), General Secretary of the General Council of the International in New York (1872-74), propagated Marxism; friend and associate of Marx and Engels. — 7-10, 28, 30, 40, 41, 43, 44, 51, 114-15, 124-25, 275-77, 279, 282-84, 318-19, 385, 392, 410, 414, 422, 445-48

Page me45.553
Spinoza, Baruch (Benedictus) de (1632-1677) — Dutch philosopher. — 452
Page me45.553
Spurgeon, Charles Haddon (1834-1892) — English Baptist priest. — 22
Page me45.553
Staël, Madame de (Anne Louise Germaine Necker, baronne de Staël-Holstein) (1766-1817) — French authoress. — 252
Page me45.553
Staël, Madame de (d. 1877) — a relative of the above. — 252
Page me45.553
Stahl, Heinrich — German socialist in Chicago. — 42
Page me45.553
Stern — Joseph Stern's wife. — 85
Page me45.553
Stern, Joseph (1839-1902) — German journalist, petty-bourgeois democrat; an editor of the Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt (from 1873). — 85
Page me45.553
Steward, Ira (1831-1883) — prominent figure in the American labour movement, leader of the Eight-Hour League in Boston and of the National Ten-Hour League; an organiser of the Massachusetts Bureau of Labor Statistics (1869) and of the International Labor Union (1878). — 411
Page me45.553
Stieber, Wilhelm (1818-1882) — chief of Prussian political police (1850-60); an organiser of and main witness for the prosecution at the Cologne Communist trial (1852); chief of military police during the Austro-Prussian (1866) and Franco-Prussian (1870-71) wars. — 29, 96, 100, 103, 121, 147, 327
Page me45.553
Stoffel, Eugéne, baron (1823-1907) — French army officer; during the Franco-Prussian war (1870-71) served in MacMahon's General Headquarters; discharged from the army (1872). — 251
Page me45.553
Stolberg-Wernigerode, Otto, Prince (1837-1896) — German statesman and politician, conservative, deputy to the German Reichstag (1871-78), Vice-Chancellor of the German Empire (from 1878). — 322-24
Page me45.553
Strousberg, Bethel Henry (1823-1884) — German-born railway contractor who lived in England; went bankrupt in 1873. — 228, 405
Page me45.553
Suleiman Pasha (1840-1892) — Turkish general; commander-in-chief in Bosnia and Herzegovina during the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-78, then commander of the Danubian army; commander-in-chief of Turkish troops (December 1877-February 1878). — 272
Page me45.553
T

Page me45.553

Talandier, Pierre Théodore Alfred (1822-1890) — French democratic journalist, took part in the 1848 revolution; emigrated to London after the coup d'état of 1851; member of the General Council of the International (1864); senator (1876-80, 1881-85). — 336-42
Page me45.553
Taneyev, Vladimir Ivanovich (1840-1921) — Russian public figure, lawyer, materialist philosopher; from 1866, counsel for the defence at a number of political processes. — 185
Page me45.553
Tenge, Therese (née Bolongaro-Crevenna) (born c. 1833) — wife of the Westphalian landowner Tenge-Ritberg;

Page Break me45.554
Page me45.554
acquaintance of Ludwig Kugelmann's family in Hanover. — 17, 19
Page me45.554
Tennyson, Alfred (1809-1892) — English poet. — 14
Page me45.554
Terzaghi, Carlo (b. 1845) — Italian lawyer and journalist; editor of Proletario italiano, Secretary of the Federazione operaia and the Emancipazione del proletario societies in Turin; became police agent in 1872. — 184, 199
Page me45.554
Tessendorf(f), Hermann Ernst Christian (1831-1895) — Prussian Public Prosecutor, member of the Berlin City Court (1873-79); organised persecution of Social-Democrats. — 96, 100
Page me45.554
Theisz, Albert Frédéric Félix (1839-1881) — prominent figure in the French working-class movement, engraver; Proudhonist; delegate to the Brussels Congress (1868) and the London Conference (1871) of the International, member of the Paris Commune; after its suppression emigrated to England, member of the General Council of the International (1872) and its treasurer. — 110
Page me45.554
Thiers, Louis Adolphe (1797-1877) — French historian and statesman, Orleanist, Prime Minister (1836 and 1840), President of the Republic (1871-73); hangman of the Paris Commune. — 16, 30, 210, 233, 235, 440
Page me45.554
Thünen, Johann Heinrich von (1783-1850) — German economist. — 90
Page me45.554
Tkachov, Pyotr Nikitich (1844-1885) — Russian revolutionary, journalist, an ideologist of Narodism. — 59, 363
Page me45.554
Tölcke, Karl Wilhelm (1817-1893) — German Social-Democrat, Lassallean; took part in the 1848-49 revolution; President of the General Association of German Workers (1865-66) and member of its Executive Committee till 1874. — 6, 60, 65
Page me45.554
Tomanovskaya, Yelizaveta Lukinichna (pseudonym Yelizaveta Dmitrieva) (née Kusheleva) (1851-d. after 1910) — Russian revolutionary, lived in emigration from 1868 to 1873, member of the Russian section of the International in Geneva, supported Marx in the struggle against Bakuninists; friend of Marx and his family; took an active part in the Paris Commune (1871); after its suppression emigrated; withdrew from revolutionary activities after her return to Russia. — 36, 185

Page me45.554
Traube, Moritz (1826-1894) — German chemist and physiologist. — 78, 192
Page me45.554
Treitschke, Heinrich Gotthard von (1834-1896) — German historian and journalist; historiographer of the Prussian state (from 1886); deputy to the German Reichstag (1871-88). — 260
Page me45.554
Trochu, Louis Jules (1815-1896) — French general and politician, Orleanist; head of the Government of National Defence; commander-in-chief of the armed forces of Paris (September 1870-January 1871); deputy to the National Assembly (1871). — 223, 224
Page me45.554
Turgot, Anne Robert Jacques, baron de l'Aulne (1727-1781) — French economist and statesman; Physiocrat; Controller General of Finance (1774-76). — 209
Page me45.554
Turner. — 11
Page me45.554
Tussy, Tussychen — see Marx, Eleanor
Page me45.554
Tyndall, John (1820-1893) — English physicist, professor at the King's College in London. — 50
Page me45.554
U

Page me45.554
Urquhart, David (1805-1877) — British diplomat, writer and politician, Turcophile; exposed the foreign policy of Palmerston and the Whigs, M.P. (1847-52); founder and editor of The Free Press (1855-77) renamed Diplomatic Review (1866). — 158, 167, 178, 206, 209, 235, 238

Page Break me45.555
Page me45.555
Utin (Outine), Nikolai Isaakovich (1841-1883) — Russian revolutionary, took part in the student movement, member of the Land and Freedom society; emigrated to England in 1863, then to Switzerland; an organiser of the Russian section of the International in Geneva and an editor of L'Égalité (1870-71); Marx's supporter in the struggle against Bakuninism; delegate to the London Conference of the International (1871); retired from political activity in the mid-1870s; returned to Russia in 1878. — 36, 148, 163, 328, 351
Page me45.555
Utina, Natalia Jeronimovna (née Corsini) — Nikolai Utin's wife; contributed to Vestnik Yevropy and other periodicals. — 211
Page me45.555

V

Page me45.555
Vahlteich, Karl Julius (1839-1915) — German Social-Democrat, shoemaker; first secretary of the General Association of German Workers (1863-February 1864); delegate to the Eisenach Congress (1869) and a leader in the Social-Democratic Workers' Party, deputy to the German Reichstag (1874-76 and 1878-81); emigrated to the USA and took part in the working-class movement there. — 85, 95, 98, 257, 276
Page me45.555
Vasilchikov, Alexander Illarionovich (1818-1881) — Russian economist and public figure. — 103
Page me45.555
Vasiliyev, Nikolai Vasiliyevich (1857-1920) — Russian revolutionary, Narodnik; physiologist, Doctor of Medicine; carried on propaganda among St Petersburg students; emigrated to Switzerland in the latter half of the 1870s and continued his revolutionary activity there; lived in London for some time. — 427
Page me45.555
Vernouillet, Juste — director of Lachâtre's publishing house in Paris. — 57, 79, 439
Page me45.555
Viennet, Jeyn Pons Guillaume (1777-1868) — French writer and politician. — 322
Page me45.555
Viereck — German actress, Louis Viereck's mother. — 428
Page me45.555
Viereck, Louis (1851-1921) — German Social-Democrat, a leader of the reformist wing of the party in the latter half of the 1870s; deputy to the German Reichstag (1884-87); left Social-Democratic movement after 1888; emigrated to the USA in 1890. — 375, 395-96, 399, 401, 412, 428
Page me45.555
Virchow, Rudolf (1821-1902) — German naturalist and politician; founder of modern pathological anatomy and the theory of cellular pathology; a founder and leader of the Party of Progress (1861-84). — 236, 313, 316
Page me45.555
Virgil (Publius Vergilius Maro) (70-19 B.C.) — Roman poet. — 143
Page me45.555
Vögele, August — German refugee in London, compositor in Hollinger's print-shop (1859). — 176
Page me45.555
Vogler, Carl Georg (born c. 1820) — German publisher and bookseller in Brussels, member of the Communist League. — 439
Page me45.555
Vogt, Karl (1817-1895) — German naturalist, petty-bourgeois democrat; deputy to the Frankfurt National Assembly (Left wing) in 1848-49; one of the five Imperial Regents (June 1849); emigrated in 1849; Louis Bonaparte's paid agent in the 1850s and 1860s; slandered Marx and his associates; exposed by Marx in the pamphlet Herr Vogt (1860). — 107, 162, 175-76

Page me45.555
Vollmar, Georg Heinrich von (1850-1922) — German army officer, Social-Democrat, a leader of the reformist wing of German Social-Democracy; an editor of Der Sozialdemokrat (1879-80); deputy to the German Reichstag (1881-87 and 1890-1918). — 375, 413, 417, 422

Page Break me45.556
Page me45.556
W

Page me45.556
Wagner, Cosima (1837-1930) — Franz Liszt's daughter, Richard Wagner's second wife. — 143
Page me45.556
Wagner, Richard (1813-1883) — German composer, conductor and musical writer. — 135, 137, 143, 192, 268, 443
Page me45.556
Wallace, Alfred Russel (1823-1913) — English biologist, a founder of zoogeography; simultaneously with Darwin came to the theory of natural selection. — 291
Page me45.556
Walster — see Otto-Walster, August
Page me45.556
Walstone (Waldstein), Charles (1856-1927) — English archaeologist, acquaintance of Marx's family. — 427
Page me45.556
Walther von der Vogelweide (c. 1170-c. 1230) — German minnesinger. — 74
Page me45.556
Weber, Carl Maria von (1786-1826) — German composer. — 177
Page me45.556
Weber, Joseph Valentin (1814-1895) — German watchmaker; took part in the Baden revolutionary movement in 1848; after its suppression, refugee in London; member of the German Workers' Educational Society there; expelled from the Society for his splitting activities and the slander of the General Council of the International (December 1871). — 364
Page me45.556
Weber, Louis — German watchmaker; refugee in London after the 1848-49 revolution, Lassallean, member of the German Workers' Educational Society in London; expelled from the Society for the intrigues against Marx and his supporters (April 1865); son of the above. — 364, 411
Page me45.556
Wedde, Friedrich Christoph Johannes (1843-1890) — German journalist and writer, democrat. — 240, 259
Page me45.556
Weiler, Adam (1841-1894) — German joiner; refugee in London, member of the British Federal Council of the International (1872-73), supporter of Marx and Engels, member of the London Trades' Council; member of the Social-Democratic Federation (from 1883). — 277

Page me45.556
Weiß, Guido (1822-1899) — German democratic journalist, took part in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany; belonged to the Party of Progress (Left wing) in the 1860s; editor of Die Zukunft, organ of the People's Party (1867-71), publisher of a weekly Die Wage (1873-79). — 85, 88
Page me45.556
Weitling, Wilhelm (1808-1871) — one of the early leaders of the working-class movement in Germany, tailor by profession; theorist of utopian egalitarian communism; emigrated to the USA in 1849. — 284, 410
Page me45.556
Wellington, Arthur Wellesley, Duke of (1769-1852) — British general and statesman, Tory; commanded troops in the wars against Napoleon I (1808-14, 1815); commander-in-chief of the British army (1827-28, 1842-52), Prime Minister (1828-30) and Foreign Secretary (1834-35). — 301, 303
Page me45.556
Wenzel — see Kugelmann, Ludwig
Page me45.556
Wessel, Jean Marc Albert (1829-1885) — Swiss lawyer and politician, notary in Geneva. — 279
Page me45.556
Westlake — English public figure, elected to the school board from Marylebone on 30 November 1876. — 444
Page me45.556
Weydemeyer, Joseph (1818-1866) — prominent figure in the German and American working-class movement; member of the Communist League; took part in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany; a responsible editor of the Neue Deutsche Zeitung (1849-50); emigrated to the USA in 1851, participated in the US Civil War on the side of the Northerners; disseminated Marxism in the USA; friend and associate of Marx and Engels. — 115, 448
Page me45.556
Weydemeyer, Otto — participant in the American working-class movement; son of the above. — 276, 318-19

Page Break me45.557
Page me45.557
Wiede, Franz (born c. 1857) — German journalist, founder and editor of Die Neue Gesellschaft, reformist. — 240-43, 247, 253, 255, 257, 259, 261, 362, 413
Page me45.557
Wiehe, Johann Friedrich — German refugee in London, compositor in Hollinger's print-shop (1859). — 176, 177
Page me45.557
Willebrord — see Glaser de Willebrord, E.
Page me45.557

William I (1797-1888) — Prince of Prussia, King of Prussia (1861-88) and Emperor of Germany (1871-88). — 16, 263, 301, 352, 384, 389, 412, 428
Page me45.557
Willis, Edwin. — 311
Page me45.557
Wingfield, Lewis Strange (1842-1891) — English traveller, writer and actor; correspondent of The Times during the Franco-Prussian war (1870-71) and at the Hague Congress of the International (1872). — 49
Page me45.557
Withers, John — London baker, acquaintance of Marx's family. — 103, 245
Page me45.557
Wohlauer, Ferdinand — bookseller in London, Engels' acquaintance. — 214
Page me45.557
Wolff, Bernhard (Benda) (1811-1879) — German journalist, owner of the Berlin National-Zeitung (from 1848); founder of the first telegraph agency in Germany (1849). — 158
Page me45.557
Wolff, Luigi (Louis) — Italian major, follower of Mazzini; member of the Associazione di Mutuo Progresso (organisation of Italian workers in London); member of the Central Council of the International (1864-65), participant in the London Conference (1865); exposed as an agent of the Bonapartist police in 1871. — 81
Page me45.557
Wolff, Wilhelm (Lupus) (1809-1864) — German proletarian revolutionary, teacher, prominent figure in the Communist League; editor of the Neue Rheinische Zeitung (1848-49); deputy to the Frankfurt National Assembly; friend and associate of Marx and Engels. — 195, 391
Page me45.557
Wollmann — factory owner in Paris. — 136, 212
Page me45.557
Wollmann — Ferdinand Fleckles' cousin, wife of the above. — 136, 190, 211-12
Page me45.557
Wright, Carroll Davidson (1840-1909) — American economist and statistician, head of the Massachusetts Bureau of Labor Statistics (1873-88). — 377, 411
Page me45.557
Wróblewski, Walery (1836-1908) — Polish revolutionary democrat, a leader of the 1863-64 Polish uprising; general of the Paris Commune; member of the General Council of the International and Corresponding Secretary for Poland (1871-72); delegate to the London Conference (1871) and the Hague Congress (1872); actively supported Marx and Engels in the struggle against Bakuninists. — 18, 51, 111-12, 221-22, 234, 332, 448
Page me45.557
Z

Page me45.557
Zanardelli, Tito (b. 1848) — Italian journalist, socialist, editor of a number of democratic newspapers; a refugee in Paris. — 450

Page me45.557
Zhukovsky (Joukowski), Juli Galaktionovich (1833-1907) — Russian economist, journalist, sociologist, manager of the State Bank, senator. — 344
Page me45.557
Zhukovsky, Nikolai Ivanovich (1833-1895) — Russian revolutionary, anarchist; refugee (from 1862), Secretary of the Geneva Section of the Alliance of Socialist Democracy; member of the International (from 1869), withdrew from it in 1872 in protest to Bakunin's expulsion by the Hague Congress. — 259
Page me45.557
Zilinski (Zichlinsky) — German refugee in London, Lassallean, member of the German Workers' Educational Society in London; expelled from the Society in 1871. — 49

Page Break me45.558

INDEX OF LITERARY AND MYTHOLOGICAL NAMES

Page me45.558
Achilles (Gr. Myth.) — the bravest Greek warrior in the Trojan War, hero of Homer's Iliad. — 351
Page me45.558
Aesculapius (Rom. Myth.) — God of medicine and of healing. — 447
Page me45.558
Ali Baba — hero of the Arabian fairy-tale Ali Baba and Forty Thieves. — 18
Page me45.558
Castor (Rom. Myth.) — one of the twin sons of Zeus and Leda. — 259
Page me45.558
Cid Campeador — national hero of Spain, the main character of the 12th-century Spanish poem El cantar de mio Cid, hero of Herder's poem Cid. — 272
Page me45.558
Don Quixote — the title character in Cervantes' novel. — 443
Page me45.558
Egeria (Rom. Myth.) — the nymph who advised the Roman King Numa Pompilius. — 169
Page me45.558
Faust — the title character in Goethe's tragedy. — 46
Page me45.558
Figaro — the title character in Beaumarchais' comedy La folle journée, ou le mariage de Figaro. — 324
Page me45.558
Hans Heiling — an earth and mountain spirit, according to a saga. He married a mortal woman but out of jealousy he turned her into a rock. — 47
Page me45.558
Harlequin — a character in Italian commedia dell' arte, an enamoured quick-witted servant who finds a way out of various predicaments. — 440
Page me45.558
John Bull — the title character in John Arbuthnot's The History of John Bull (1712); the name is often used to personify England. — 18, 188, 190, 292
Page me45.558

Mammon — the idol of wealth among some ancient peoples. — 283
Page me45.558
Numa Pompilius — second King of Ancient Rome (715-673 or 672 B.C.). — 169
Page me45.558
Oerindur — a character in Adolf Müllner's drama Die Schuld. — 154
Page me45.558
Pollux (Rom. Myth.) — one of the twin sons of Zeus and Leda. — 259
Page me45.558
Shylock — a character in Shakespeare's comedy The Merchant of Venice. — 65
Page me45.558
Siegfried — one of the main characters in an ancient Germanic epic and the title character of Richard Wagner's opera. — 443
Page me45.558
Valkyrie — a character in an old Scandinavian epic and the title character of Richard Wagner's opera. — 443

Page Break me45.559

INDEX OF QUOTED AND MENTIONED LITERATURE

WORKS BY KARL MARX AND FREDERICK ENGELS

Marx, Karl
Page me45.559
Capital. A Critique of Political Economy. Volume I (present edition, Vol. 35)
— Das Kapital. Kritik der politischen Oekonomie. Erster Band. Buch I: Der Produktionsprocess des Kapitals. Hamburg, 1867. — 62, 73, 80, 92, 162, 204, 208, 277, 287, 328, 329
— Das Kapital. Kritik der politischen Oekonomie. Erster Band. Buch I: Der Produktionsprocess des Kapitals. Zweite verbesserte Auflage. Hamburg, 1872. — 52, 58, 90, 118, 209, 277, 282, 318, 343, 346, 366
— Le Capital. Traduction de M.J. Roy, entiérement revisée par l'auteur [Vol. 1]. Paris, éditeurs, Maurice Lachâtre et Cie [1872-1875]. — 15-17, 25, 28, 56, 58, 70, 75, 80, 92, 93, 110, 113, 114, 124, 153, 166, 190, 193, 208, 209, 212, 227, 276-77, 282, 287, 343, 344, 346, 359, 440, 445
— Kapital. Krititka politicheskoj ekonomii. Sochinenie Karla Marksa. Perevod s nyemetskago. Tom pervyj. Kniga I. Protsess proizvodstva kapitala. S.-Peterburg, 1872. — 334, 343, 346
Page me45.559
Capital. A Critique of Political Economy. Volume II (present edition, Vol. 36) — Das Kapital. Kritik der politischen Oekonomie. Zweiter Band. Buch II: Der Circulationsprocess des Kapitals. Hrsg. von Friedrich Engels. Hamburg, 1885. — 57, 162, 287, 289, 343, 354, 415, 432
Page me45.559
Capital. A Critique of Political Economy. Volume III (present edition, Vol. 37)

— Das Kapital. Kritik der politischen Oekonomie. Dritter Band. Buch III: Der Gesammtprocess der kapitalistischen Produktion. Hrsg. von Friedrich Engels. Hamburg, 1894. — 57, 58, 115, 162, 287, 289, 343, 354, 415, 432
Page me45.559
The Civil War in France. Address of the General Council of the International Working Men's Association. [London,] 1871 (present edition, Vol. 22). — 288, 333
— La Guerre civile en France. Adresse du Conseil général de l'Association Internationale des Travailleurs. Troisiéme édition revue. [Bruxelles, 1872]. — 183
Page me45.559
Critique of the Gotha Programme (present edition, Vol. 24) — Randglossen zum Programm der deutschen Arbeiterpartei. In: Die Neue Zeit, Jg. 9, Bd. 1, Nr. 18, 1891. — 69, 75, 97, 243

Page Break me45.560
Page me45.560
Declaration (present edition, Vol. 17)
— Erklärung. In: Allgemeine Zeitung, Nr. 325, 21. November 1859, Beilage. — 162
Page me45.560
Declaration (present edition, Vol. 17)
— Erklärung. In: Allgemeine Zeitung, Nr. 336, 1. Dezember 1860, Beilage. — 162
Page me45.560
Economic Manuscript of 1861-63 (present edition, Vols 30-34). — 287
Page me45.560
The Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte (present edition, Vol. 11)
— Der Achtzehnte Brumaire des Louis Bonaparte. Zweite Ausgabe. Hamburg, 1869. — 52
Page me45.560
Epilogue to 'Revelations Concerning the Communist Trial in Cologne' (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Enthüllungen über den Kölner Kommunistenprozeß, Nachwort. In: Der Volksstaat, Nr. 10, 27. Januar 1875. — 54, 55
Page me45.560
General Rules and Administrative Regulations of the International Working Men's Association (present edition, Vol. 23)
— General Rules and Administrative Regulations of the International Working Men's Association. Official edition, revised by the General Council. London, 1871. — 8, 10, 44, 97, 132
— Allgemeine Statuten und Verwaltungs-Verordnungen der Internationalen Arbeiterassoziation. Amtliche deutsche Ausgabe, revidirt durch den Generalrath. Leipzig, [1871]. — 40, 44
Page me45.560
Herr Vogt (present edition, Vol. 17)
— Herr Vogt. London, 1860. — 176-77
Page me45.560

Inaugural Address of the Working Men's International Association, Established September 28, 1864, at a Public Meeting Held at St. Martin's Hall, Long Acre, London (present edition, Vol. 20).
— Address. In: Address and Provisional Rules of the Working Men's International Association, Established September 28, 1864, at a Public Meeting, Held at St. Martin's Hall, Long Acre, London. [London,] 1864. — 80, 81
Page me45.560
[Letter to the Editor of the 'Allgemeine Zeitung'] (present edition, Vol. 17)
— Brief an der Redacteur der 'Allgemeinen Zeitung'. In: Allgemeine Zeitung, Nr. 300, 27. Oktober 1859. — 162
Page me45.560
Mr. George Hawell's History of the International Working-Men's Association (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Secular Chronicle, and Record of Freethought Progress. Vol. X, No. 5, August 4, 1878. — 312, 335
Page me45.560
Notes on Bakunin's Book 'Statehood and Anarchy' (present edition, Vol. 24). — 64
Page me45.560
Notes on Dühring's 'Kritische Geschichte der Nationalökonomie' — Randnoten zu Dührings 'Kritische Geschichte der Nationalökonomie'. In: F. Engels, Herrn Eugen Dührings Umwälzung der Wissenschaft. Dialektik der Natur. 1873 bis 1882. Sonderausgabe zum vierzigsten Todestage von Friedrich Engels. Moskau-Leningrad, 1935, S. 341-371. — 203, 205-08
Page me45.560
On Barry's Mandate [Record of Marx's speech at a sitting of the Hague Congress of the International on 3 September 1872]. In: The Hague Congress of the First International. Minutes and Documents. Moscow, 1976, p. 37. — 18

Page Break me45.561
Page me45.561
[Parliamentary Debate on the Anti-Socialist Law (Outline of an Article)] (present edition, Vol. 24). — 332
Page me45.561
The Poverty of Philosophy. Answer to the 'Philosophy of Poverty' by M. Proudhon (present edition, Vol. 6)
— Misére de la philosophie. Réponse á la philosophie de la misére de M. Proudhon. Paris-Bruxelles, 1847. — 64, 80, 92, 99, 433, 439
Page me45.561
Prosecution of the Augsburg Gazette. To the Editor of 'The Free Press'. London, 4th February, 1860 (present edition, Vol. 17). — 176
Page me45.561
Provisional Rules of the Association (present edition, Vol. 20). In: Address and Provisional Rules of the Working Men's International Association, Established September 28, 1864, at a Public Meeting Held at St. Martin's Hall, Long Acre, London. [London,] 1864. — 41, 80, 81, 132, 203, 408
Page me45.561
[Reply to Bucher's 'Declaration'] (present edition, Vol. 24)

— Marx und Bucher. In: Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt, Abendblatt, Nr. 180, 29. Juni 1878; Königlich privilegirte Berlinische Zeitung von Staats- und gelehrten Sachen, Nr. 152, 2. Juli 1878; Vorwärts, Nr. 78, 5. Juli 1878. — 312
Page me45.561
Revelations. Concerning the Communist Trial in Cologne (present edition, Vol. 11)
— Enthüllungen über den Kommunisten-Prozeß zu Köln. In: Der Volksstaat, Nrn. 126, 127, 129, 130, 132, 133, 135, 137, 138, 140, 141, 144, 147; 28., 30. Oktober, 4., 6., 11., 13., 18., 25., 27. November, 2., 4., 11., 18. Dezember 1874. — 54, 55
— Enthüllungen über den Kommunisten-Prozeß zu Köln. Neuer Abdruck. Leipzig, 1875. — 54, 55, 73, 105
Page me45.561
Second Address of the General Council of the International Working Men's Association on the Franco-Prussian War (present edition, Vol. 22)
— Second Address of the General Council of the International Working Men's Association on the War. To the Members of the International Working Men's Association in Europe and the United States. London, September 9th, 1870. — 384
Page me45.561
Theories of Surplus Value — see Economic Manuscript of 1861-63
Page me45.561
To the Editor of 'The Eastern Post' (present edition, Vol. 23). In: The Eastern Post, No. 169, December 23, 1871. — 341
Page me45.561
To the Editors of the 'Volks-Zeitung'. Declaration (present edition, Vol. 17)
— Offener Brief in Sachen Vogt und Berliner 'National-Zeitung'. Erklärung. In: Allgemeine Zeitung, Nr. 48, 17. Februar 1860, Beilage (distorted). — 162

Engels, Frederick
Page me45.561
Anti-Dühring. Herr Eugen Dühring's Revolution in Science (present edition, Vol. 25)
— Herrn Eugen Dühring's Umwälzung der Philosophie. I-XIII. In: Vorwärts, Leipzig, 1877, Nrn. 1-7, 3., 5., 7., 10., 12., 14., 17. Januar; Nrn. 10, 11, 17, 24, 25, 36, 37, 44, 45, 49, 50, 55, 56, 24., 26. Januar, 9., 25., 28. Februar, 25., 28. März, 15., 18., 27., 29. April, 11., 13. Mai. — 118, 119, 122-24, 139, 140, 154, 162, 174, 180, 186, 195, 201, 206-08, 218, 220, 236, 238, 249, 254, 258, 283, 295, 306, 309, 361, 420
— Herrn Eugen Dühring's Umwälzung der politischen Oekonomie. I-IX. In: Vorwärts, 1877, Beilage, Nr. 87, 27. Juli; Nrn. 93, 96, 10., 17. August;

Page Break me45.562
Nrn. 105, 108, 7., 14. September; Nr. 127, 28. Oktober; Nrn. 130, 139, 4., 28. November; Nr. 152, 30. Dezember. — 118, 119, 122-24, 139, 140, 154, 162, 174, 180, 186, 195, 206-07, 218, 220, 227, 236, 238, 254, 258, 264, 265, 283, 289, 295, 306, 309, 361, 420
— Herrn Eugen Dühring's Umwälzung des Sozialismus. I-V. In: Vorwärts, 1878, Nrn. 52, 61, 5., 26. Mai; Nrn. 64, 75, 2., 28. Juni; Nr. 79, 7. Juli. — 118, 122-24, 139, 140, 154, 162, 174, 180, 186, 218, 220, 227, 236, 238, 249, 254, 258, 283, 289, 295, 306, 309, 361, 420

— Herrn Eugen Dühring's Umwälzung der Wissenschaft. I. Philosophie. Leipzig, 1877. — 180, 241
— Herrn Eugen Dühring's Umwälzung der Wissenschaft. II. Politische Oekonomie. Sozialismus. Leipzig, 1878. — 312, 313, 316, 333-35, 349
Page me45.562
The Bakuninists at Work. An Account of the Spanish Revolt in the Summer of 1873 (present edition, Vol. 23)
— Die Bakunisten an der Arbeit. Denkschrift über den letzten Aufstand in Spanien (Separat-Abdruck aus dem Volksstaat). [Leipzig, 1873]. — 105
Page me45.562
Dialectics of Nature (present edition, Vol. 25)
— Dialektik der Natur. — 88, 106, 124, 154, 192, 254, 290, 361, 362, 420
Page me45.562
The English Elections (present edition, Vol. 23)
— Die englischen Wahlen. In: Der Volksstaat, Nr. 26, 4. März 1874. — 8
Page me45.562
From Italy (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Aus Italien. In: Vorwärts, Nr. 32, 16. März 1877. — 203, 207, 214
Page me45.562
The Housing Question (present edition, Vol. 23)
— [Zur Wohnungsfrage]. I. Wie Proudhon die Wohnungsfrage löst. In: Der Volksstaat, Nrn. 51, 52, 53, 26., 29. Juni, 3. Juli 1872; II. Wie die Bourgeoisie die Wohnungsfrage löst. In: Der Volksstaat, Nrn. 103, 104, 2., 3., 25., 28. Dezember 1872, 4., 8. Januar 1873; III. Nachtrag über Proudhon und die Wohnungsfrage. In: Der Volksstaat, Nrn. 12, 13, 15, 16, 8., 12., 19., 22. Februar 1873.—120, 420
Zur Wohnungsfrage. 1. Heft: Wie Proudhon die Wohnungsfrage löst. Separatabdruck aus dem Volksstaat. Leipzig, 1872; 2. Heft: Wie die Bourgeoisie die Wohnungsfrage löst. Sonderabdruck aus dem Volksstaat. Leipzig, 1872; 3. Heft: Nachtrag über Proudhon und die Wohnungsfrage. Sonderabdruck aus dem Volksstaat. [Leipzig, 1873]. — 105
Page me45.562
The Imperial Military Law. I-II (present edition, Vol. 23)
— Das Reichs-Militärgesetz. I-II. In: Der Volksstaat, Nrn. 28, 29, 8., 11. März 1874. — 8
Page me45.562
[Introduction to the Pamphlet 'On Social Relations in Russia'] (present edition, Vol. 24)
— In: Soziales aus Rußland. Leipzig. 1875. — 105
Page me45.562
Karl Marx (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Karl Marx. In: Volks-Kalender. Braunschweig, 1878. — 227
Page me45.562
[Letter to Enrico Bignami on the German Elections of 1877] (present edition, Vol. 24). In: La Plebe, Num. 7, 26 febbraio 1877. — 198-200
Page me45.562
On Social Relations in Russia (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Soziales aus Rußland. Leipzig, 1875. — 105

Page Break me45.563

Page me45.563
The Peasant War in Germany (present edition, Vol. 10)
— Der deutsche Bauernkrieg. Zweiter, mit einer Einleitung versehener Abdruck. Leipzig, 1870. — 32, 34
— Der deutsche Bauernkrieg. Dritter Abdruck. Leipzig, 1875. — 52, 105
Page me45.563
Prussian Schnapps in the German Reichstag (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Preussischer Schnaps im Deutschen Reichstag. In: Der Volksstaat, Nrn. 23, 24 u. 25, 25., 27. Februar, 1. März 1876. — 195
Page me45.563
Refugee Literature (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Flüchtlings-Literatur. In: Der Volksstaat, Nrn. 69, 73, 117, 118, 17., 26. Juni, 6., 8. Oktober 1874; Nrn. 36, 37, 43, 44, 45, 28. März, 2., 16., 18., 21. April 1875. — 51, 53, 59, 105
Page me45.563
Savoy, Nice and the Rhine (present edition, Vol. 16)
— Savoyen, Nizza und der Rhein. Berlin, 1860. — 105
Page me45.563
[Supplement to the Preface of 1870 for The Peasant War in Germany] (present edition, Vol. 23)
— Vorbemerkung. In: Der deutsche Bauernkrieg. Dritter Abdruck. Leipzig, 1875. — 52
Page me45.563
Varia on Germany (present edition, Vol. 23)
— Varia über Deutschland. — 7
Page me45.563
Wilhelm Wolff (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Wilhelm Wolff. In: Die Neue Welt, Nrn. 27, 28, 30, 31, 40-45, 47; 1., 8., 22., 29. Juli, 30. September, 7., 14., 21., 28. Oktober, 4., 25. November 1876. — 195
Page me45.563
The Workingmen of Europe in 1877. I-V (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Labor Standard, Nos. 43-47, March 3, 10, 17, 24, 31, 1878. — 306

Marx, Karl and Engels, Frederick
Page me45.563
The Alliance of Socialist Democracy and the International Working Men's Association. Report and Documents Published by Decision of the Hague Congress of the International (present edition, Vol. 23)
— L'Alliance de la démocratie socialiste et l'Association Internationale des Travailleurs. Rapport et documents publiés par ordre du Congrés International de la Haye. Londres-Hambourg, 1873. — 6, 7, 10, 41, 44, 184, 198, 210
Page me45.563
[Circular Letter to August Bebel, Wilhelm Liebknecht, Wilhelm Bracke and Others] (this volume and present edition, Vol. 24). — 375, 378, 386, 389, 390, 394-408, 411-14, 417, 420
Page me45.563

Herr Bucher. To the Editor of 'The Daily News' (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Daily News, No. 10030, June 13, 1878. — 311
Page me45.563
Manifesto of the Communist Party (present edition, Vol. 6)
— Manifest der Kommunistischen Partei. London, 1848. — 64, 407, 433
— Das Kommunistische Manifest. Neue Ausgabe mit einem Vorwort der Verfasser. Leipzig, 1872. — 95, 97, 105, 115, 276, 283, 414, 450

Page Break me45.564

WORKS BY DIFFERENT AUTHORS

Page me45.564
Allman, G.J. Inaugural Address at the British Association Meeting at Sheffield. In: Nature, Vol. XX, No. 512, August 21, 1879. — 377
Page me45.564
Annolied. — 74
Page me45.564
Arnim, A. von und Brentano, K. Kurzweil. In: Des Knaben Wunderhorn. Alte deutsche Lieder. Dritter Band. — 249
Page me45.564
[Auer, I.] Von der Niederelbe, 23. Oktober. In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 5, 2. November 1879. — 420, 423, 429
Page me45.564
Augusti, B. Ein verhängnisvolles Jahr. In: Kölnische Zeitung, Nrn. 247-302, 6. September-31. Oktober 1879. — 416
Page me45.564
[Bakunin, M.A.] Gosudarstvennost i anarhiya. Vvedenie. CHast' I. [Zurich-Geneva,] 1873. — 64, 69
Page me45.564
Bancroft, H.H. The Native Races of the Pacific States of North America. Vols 1-5. London, 1875. — 261
Page me45.564
Barry, M. The Internationalists and the Government. In: The Spectator, July 13, 1878. — 341
— Les socialistes et le gouvernement. In: La Marseillaise, No. 198, 2 octobre 1878. — 338-40
— The War in the East. In: The Times, No. 29018, August 11, 1877, p. 8. — 267
Page me45.564
[Barry, M.] Mr. Gladstone. In: Vanity Fair, Vol. XVII, No. 435, March 3, 1877. — 206, 209, 277
— Mr. Gladstone and Russian Intrigue. In: The Whitehall Review, February 3, 1877. — 209, 277
— The Great Agitator Unmasked. In: Vanity Fair, Vol. XVII, No. 436, March 10, 1877. — 206, 209, 277
— [Announcement about the Ghent Congress of Socialists.] In: The Standard, September 11, 13, 17, 18, 1877. — 277

Page me45.564
Bastelica, A. Appel aux Français. Lettre d'un proscrit sur la situation. Genéve, 1 juillet 1876. — 156, 184
Page me45.564
Baudeau, [N]. Explication du Tableau économique á madame de  par l'auteur des Éphémerides. In: Physiocrates. Quesnay, Dupont de Nemours, Mercier de la Riviére, L'Abbé Baudeau, Le Trosne, avec une introduction sur la doctrine des physiocrates, des commentaires et des notices historiques, par Eugéne Daire. Deuxiéme partie, Paris, 1846. — 265
Page me45.564
Beaumarchais, [P.A.C.] de. La folle journée, ou le mariage de Figaro. — 324
Page me45.564
Bebel, A. [Speech at the Reichstag's sitting of 18 April 1877.] In: Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Nr. 91, 20. April 1877, Zweites Blatt and Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Deutschen Reichstags. 3. Legislaturperiode, I. Session 1877, Band I. Berlin, 1877. — 227
Page me45.564
[Bebel,] A. [Review of B. Becker's book Geschichte und Theorie der Pariser revolutionären Kommune des Jahres 1871.] In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 8, 23. November 1879. — 425
Page me45.564
Becker, B. Geschichte der Arbeiter-Agitation Ferdinand Lassalle's. Nach authentischen Aktenstücken. Braunschweig, 1874. — 30, 95, 98

Page Break me45.565
— Geschichte der Revolutionären Pariser Kommune in den Jahren 1789 bis 1794. Braunschweig, 1875. — 120
— Geschichte und Theorie der Pariser revolutionären Kommune des Jahres 1871. Leipzig, 1879. — 151, 152, 166, 425
Page me45.565
Becker, J. Ph. Abgerissene Bilder aus meinem Leben. In: Die Neue Welt, Nrn. 17-20, 23, 24, 26, 28, 29; 22., 29. April, 6., 13. Mai, 3., 10., 24. Juni, 8., 15. Juli 1876, 1. Jg. — 215 — Neue Stunden der Andacht. Psalmen in Reimform. Die Zeitgebrechen, bloßgelegt durch strikte Schlußfolgerungen aus den überlieferten Anschauungen und Einrichtungen in religiöser, politischer, ethischer und sozialer Beziehung. Kriterien und Satire. Genf, 1875. — 174, 183
Page me45.565
Becker, J. Ph. und Essellen, Chr. Geschichte der süddeutschen Mai-Revolution des Jahres 1849. Genf, 1849. — 214
Page me45.565
[Betham-Edwards, M.B.] The International Working Men's Association. In: Fraser's Magazine. New series. Vol. XII. Nos. LXVII-LXIX, July to September 1875. London. — 79-81, 92
Page me45.565
Bible
The Old Testament

The Wisdom of Solomon. — 247
The New Testament
Luke. — 40, 246, 275, 442
Page me45.565
[Biscamp, E.] London, 5. Juli (Orig.-Corr. der 'Voss. Ztg.'). In: Königlich privilegirte Berlinische Zeitung von Staats- und gelehrten Sachen, Nr. 159, 9. Juli 1878. — 312, 317
Page me45.565
Blind, K. Erklärung. In: Allgemeine Zeitung, Nr. 313, 9. November 1859 ('Neueste Posten'). — 176
— Erklärungen. In: Allgemeine Zeitung, Nr. 345, Beilage, 11. Dezember 1859. — 176
— Prince Napoleon and European Democracy. In: Fraser's Magazine. New series. Vol. XX, No. 118, October 1879. — 415
Page me45.565
[Blind, K.] Warnung zur gefälligen Verbreitung. In: Das Volk, Nr. 7, 18. Juni 1859 ('Die Reichsverraetherei'). — 175, 176
— Zur Warnung (pamphlet). — 175, 176
— Zur Warnung. In: Allgemeine Zeitung, Nr. 173, Beilage, 22. Juni 1859. In the article: 'K. Vogt und die deutsche Emigration in London'. — 175
Page me45.565
Block, M. Les théoriciens du socialisme en Allemagne. Extrait du 'Journal des Économistes' (numéros de juillet et d'août 1872). Paris, 1872. — 194, 204
Page me45.565
Bracke, W. Der Lassalle'sche Vorschlag. Ein Wort an den 4. Congreß der social-demokratischen Arbeiterpartei. Braunschweig, 1873. — 62, 95, 98
— [Speech at the Reichstag's sitting of 18 April 1877.] In: Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Deutschen Reichstags. 3. Legislaturperiode, I. Session 1877, Band I. Berlin, 1877. — 227
Page me45.565
Bracke, [W.] [Speech in the Reichstag on 10 April 1878.] In: Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Deutschen Reichstags. 3. Legislaturperiode. II. Session 1878, Zweiter Band, 33. Sitzung am 10. April 1878, Berlin, 1878. — 309
Page me45.565
[Bradlaugh, Ch.] [Note on M. Barry.] In: The National Reformer, Vol. XXXII, No. 12, New Series, September 22, 1878. — 342

Page Break me45.566
Page me45.566
Bucher, [L.] [Reply to Marx's letter to the Editor of The Daily News.] In: Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt, Nr. 172, 21. Juni 1878, Abendblatt. — 310
— In: Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Nr. 145, 21. Juni 1878. — 310, 312
Page me45.566
Buffenoir, H. Aus Frankreich. In: Vorwärts, Nrn. 124, 128, 129, 132, 133, 140, 145; 21., 31. Oktober, 2., 9., 11., 30. November, 12. Dezember 1877. — 295
Page me45.566

[Bunyakovsky] Bunyakovskij, V. YA. Antropobiologicheskiya uzslyedovaniya i ih' prilozhenie k' muzhskomu naseleniyu Rossii. Prilozhenie k XXIIImu tomu zapisok imp. akademii nauk. No 5, Sanktpeteburg, 1874. — 213
Page me45.566
Bürgers, H. Erinnerungen an Ferdinand Freiligrath. In: Königlich privilegirte Berlinische Zeitung von Staats- und gelehrten Sachen, Nrn. 278, 284, 290, 296, 302; 26. November, 3., 10., 17., 24. Dezember 1876. — 259
Page me45.566
Busch, M. Graf Bismarck und seine Leute während des Kriegs mit Frankreich. Nach Tagebuchsblättern. 2 Bde, 1878. — 350
Page me45.566
Byr, R. Dreimal. In: Über Land und Meer. 35. Band, 18. Jahrgang, Erster Band, Stuttgart, 1875. — 107
Page me45.566
Cafiero, C. Il Capitale di Carlo Marx. Milano, 1879. — 365
Page me45.566
Carleton, W. Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry. Volumes I-II. London, 1853. — 371
Page me45.566
[Challemel-Lacour, P.A.] Paris, 11 juillet [leading article]. In: La République Française, 12 juillet 1877. — 251
Page me45.566
[Chernyshevsky, N.G.] Politiko-ekonomicheskiya pis'ma k prezidentu Amerikanskih Soedinennyh Wtatov, G. K. Kere. Perevod s anglijskago. In: Sovremennik, T. LXXXV, 1861. — 114
Page me45.566
[Chicherin] CHicherin, B. N. Nyemetskie sotsialisty: I. Lassal; Nyemetskie sotsialisty: I. Karl Marks. In: Sbornik gosudarstvennyh znanij. Tt. V, VI. S.-Peterburg, 1878. — 344, 346
Page me45.566
[Chuprov] CHuprov, A. ZHelyeznodorozhnoe hozyajstvo. T. II. Moskva, 1878. — 346
Page me45.566
Darwin, Ch. On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection, or the Preservation of Favoured Races in the Struggle for Life. London, 1859. — 91, 106-08, 124
Page me45.566
Delius, N. Die epischen Elemente in Shakespeare's Dramen. Einleitender Vortrag zur Jahresversammlung der Deutschen Shakespeare-Gesellschaft. In: Jahrbuch der deutschen Shakespeare-Gesellschaft. Zwoelfter Jahrgang. Weimar, 1877. — 191, 273, 446, 449
Page me45.566
D[e] P[aepe], C. Da Bruxelles, 11 Febbraio. In: La Plebe, Num. 6, 16 febbraio 1877. — 200
Page me45.566
Deville, G. Le Capital de Karl Marx. Résumé et accompagné d'un aperçu sur le socialisme scientifique. Paris, [1883]. — 193
Page me45.566

Disraeli, B. [Reply to an Inquiry on the Amnesty of Fenians Made in the House of Commons on 22 May 1876.] In: The Times, No. 28636, May 23, 1876. — 121
Page me45.566
D[örenberg], E. Da Berlino. In: La Plebe, Num. 3, 21 gennaio 1877. — 199
Page me45.566
[Douai, A.] Die Folgen des großen Krachs. In: Vorwärts, Nrn. 117, 118; 5., 7. Oktober 1877. — 284, 285

Page Break me45.567
Page me45.567
Dühring, E. Cursus der National- und Socialökonomie einschliesslich der Hauptpunkte der Finanzpolitik. Zweite, theilweise umgearbeitete Auflage. Leipzig, 1876. — 122, 206, 255
— Cursus der Philosophie als streng wissenschaftlicher Weltanschauung und Lebensgestaltung. Leipzig, 1875. — 118, 122, 131, 140
— Kritische Geschichte der Nationalökonomie und des Socialismus. Zweite, theilweise umgearbeitete Auflage. Berlin, 1875. — 119, 206, 208
— Marx, Das Kapital, Kritik der politischen Oekonomie, 1. Band, Hamburg 1867. In: Ergänzungsblätter zur Kenntniß der Gegenwart. 3. Band, 3. Heft. Hildburghausen, 1867, S. 182-186. — 162
Page me45.567
Euripides. Orestes. — 245
Page me45.567
Fatouville, N. de. Arlequin, empereur dans la lune. — 198
Page me45.567
Fourier, Ch. La Fausse industrie morcelée, répugnante, mensongére, et l'antidote, l'industrie naturelle, combinée, attrayante, véridique, donnant quadruple produit. Paris, 1835-1836. — 262
— Le Nouveau Monde industriel et sociétaire, ou Invention du procédé d'industrie attrayante et naturelle distribuée en séries passionnées. Paris, 1829. — 263
— Théorie des quatre mouvements et des destinées générales. In: Oeuvres complétes de Ch. Fourier. T. 1, Paris, 1841. — 263
Page me45.567
Fribourg, E.E. L'Association Internationale des Travailleurs. Paris, 1871. — 80
Page me45.567
Gambuzzi, C. Sulla tomba di Guiseppe Fanelli. [1877]. — 210
Page me45.567
Gehlsen, H.J. Das Buch vom 'großen' Lasker oder Leiden und Freuden einer schönen Mannes-Seele. Berlin und Leipzig, 1874/1875. — 137
Page me45.567
Girardin, É. de. La honte de l'Europe. Paris, 1876. — 155
Page me45.567
Gladstone, W.E. Russian Policy and Deeds in Turkistan. In: The Contemporary Review, Vol. XXVIII, June-November 1876, London. — 168-70, 209
Page me45.567

Glagau, O. Der Börsen- und Gründungs-Schwindel in Deutschland (2. Theil von Der Börsen und Gründungs-Schwindel in Berlin). Leipzig, 1877. — 304, 335
Page me45.567
Goethe, J.W. von. Faust. Der Tragödie. — 131, 379
Page me45.567
Greulich, H. Der Staat vom sozialdemokratischen Standpunkte aus. Eine Auseinandersetzung mit den 'Anarchisten'. Zürich, 1877. — 349
Page me45.567
Grimm, F.M. Correspondance littéraire, philosophique et critique de Grimm et de Diderot, depuis 1753 jusqu'en 1790. Nouvelle édition. T. 7, 1770-1772. Paris, 1829. — 15
— Correspondance littéraire, philosophique et critique de Grimm et de Diderot, depuis 1753 jusqu'en 1790. Nouvelle édition. T. 11, 1782-1783. Paris, 1830. — 14
Page me45.567
Grün, K. Die Philosophie in der Gegenwart. Realismus und Idealismus. Leipzig, 1876. — 88
— Ueber Weltanschauungen. Präludium zur 'Philosophie in der Gegenwart'. In: Die Wage, Nrn. 33-38, 20., 27. August, 3., 10., 17. September 1875. — 88
Page me45.567
Haeckel, E. Freie Wissenschaft und freie Lehre. Eine Entgegnung auf Rudolf Virchow's Münchener Rede über 'Die Freiheit der Wissenschaft im modernen Staat'. Stuttgart, 1878. — 317
Page me45.567
Hanssen, G. Die Gehöferschaften (Erbgenossenschaften) im Regierungsbezirk Trier. Aus

Page Break me45.568
den Abhandlungen der Königl. Akademie der Wissenschaften zu Berlin 1863. Berlin, 1863. — 179
Page me45.568
Harrison, F. Cross and Crescent. In: The Fortnightly Review, Vol. XX, New series, July 1 to December 1, 1876, London. — 179
Page me45.568
[Hasenclever, W.] Nieder mit der Republik! In: Vorwärts, Nr. 76, 1. Juli 1877. — 239, 246, 249, 294
Page me45.568
Hegel, G.W.F. Encyclopädie der philosophischen Wissenschaften im Grundrisse. Heidelberg, 1817. — 50
— Wissenschaft der Logik. — 50
Page me45.568
Heine, H. Ich grolle nicht.... In: Lyrisches Intermezzo. — 288
— Zur Beruhigung. In: Zeitgedichte. — 212
Page me45.568
Herder, J.G. Cid. 28. Gesange. — 272
Page me45.568

Hess, M. Dynamische Stofflehre. I. Kosmischer Theil. Allgemeine Bewegungserscheinungen und ewiger Kreislauf des kosmischen Lebens. Paris, 1877. — 286, 290
Page me45.568
[Hirsch, C.] Die Zolldebatte. In: Die Laterne, Nr. 21, 25. Mai 1879. — 388, 399-401, 414, 418
— Zur Kaiser'schen Rede und Abstimmung. In: Die Laterne, Nr. 23, 8. Juni 1879. — 388, 414, 418
Page me45.568
Hobbes, Th. Elementa philosophica. De cive. Basileae, 1782. — 108
— Leviathan, or the Matter, Form and Power of the Commonwealth Ecclesiastical and Civil. In: The English Works of Thomas Hobbes of Malmesbury; Now First Collected and Edited by Sir William Molesworth. Vol. III. London, 1839. — 108, 293
Page me45.568
[Höchberg, K.] Der Socialismus und die Wissenschaft. In: Die Zukunft. Socialistische Revue, Erster Jahrgang, Heft 1, Oktober 1877. — 283, 285, 362
Page me45.568
[Höchberg, K., Bernstein, E., Schramm, C.A.] Rückblicke auf die sozialistische Bewegung in Deutschland. Kritische Aphorismen von In: Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik. Erster Jahrgang. Erste Hälfte. Zürich-Oberstrass, 1879. — 383, 387, 393, 401-08, 413, 420, 430, 432
Page me45.568
Howell, G. The History of the International Association. In: The Nineteenth Century, Vol. IV, No. XVII. July 1878. — 335
Page me45.568
Hubbard, M.G. Saint-Simon, sa vie et ses travaux. Suivi de fragments des plus célébres écrits de Saint-Simon. Paris, 1857. — 263
Page me45.568
Hume, D. Essays and Treatises on Several Subjects. In two volumes. Vol. I, containing Essays, Moral, Political, and Literary. Dublin, 1779. — 208
Page me45.568
Huxley, [Th. H.] On the Hypothesis that animals are automata, and its history. Address at the British Association. In: Nature, Vol. X, No. 253, September 3, 1874. — 50
Page me45.568
Isouard, N. Joconde. Opera. Libretto by Ch. G. Étienne. — 389
Page me45.568
Karcher, T. Les écrivains militaires de la France. Londres, 1866. — 341
Page me45.568
[Kareyev] Karyeev, N. [I.] Krest'yane i krest'yanskij vopros vo Frantsii v poslyednej chetverti XVIII vyeka. Istoricheskaya dissertatsiya. Moskva, 1879. — 452
Page me45.568
[Kaufman, G.] Kaufman, G. Teoriya kolebaniya tsyen. Kar'kov, 1867. — 260

Page Break me45.569
Page me45.569

[Kaufman, I.I.] Kaufman, [I. I.] Teoriya i praktika bankovago dyela. T. 1. Kredit, banki i denezhnoe obrashchenie. S.-Peterburg, 1873; T. 2. Vypusk I. Istoriya bankov. S.-Peterburg, 1877; T. 2. Vypusk II. Istoriya bankovago dyela v Velikobritanii i Irlandii. S.-Peterburg, 1877. — 304, 358.
Page me45.569
[Kaufman, I.I.] K[aufma]n, I. I. Tochka zreniya politiko-ekonomicheskoj kritiki u Karla Marksa. In: Vyestnik Evropy, sed'toj god, t. III, kniga 5ya, maj. In: Sanktpeterburg, 1872. — 358
Page me45.569
Kaufmann, M. Utopias; or, Schemes of Social Improvement. From Sir Thomas More to Karl Marx. London, 1879. — 332-34
Page me45.569
[Kautsky, K.] Die soziale Frage vom Standpunkte eines Kopfarbeiters aus betrachtet. In: Der Volksstaat, Nrn. 107, 109, 110, 112, 113, 115, 116; 17., 22., 24., 29. September, 1., 6., 8. Oktober 1875. — 100
Page me45.569
Kayser, M. [Speech in the Reichstag on 17 May 1879.] In: Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Deutschen Reichstags. 4. Legislaturperiode, II. Session 1879. Band II. 47. Sitzung am 17. Mai 1879. Berlin, 1879. — 373, 388, 414, 418, 424
Page me45.569
Kirchmann, J.H. Ueber Parlamentarische Debatten. Ein Vortrag. Berlin, 1874. — 54
Page me45.569
Knies, C. Geld und Credit. Erste Abtheilung. Das Geld. Darlegung der Grundlehren von dem Gelde, mit einer Vorerörterung über das Kapital und die Uebertragung der Nutzungen. Berlin, 1873. — 252, 255
Page me45.569
Koran. — 120
Page me45.569
[Koshelev] Kowelev, A. Nawe polozhenie. Berlin, 1875. — 100
— Ob obshchinnom zemlevladyenii v Rossii. Berlin, 1875. — 100
— Obshchaya zemskaya duma v Rossii. Dopolnenie k knizhkye: 'Nawe polozhenie'. Berlin, 1875. — 100-01
Page me45.569
[Kovalevsky] Kovalevskij, M. M. Obshchinnoe zemlevladyenie, prichiny, hod i poslyedstviya ego razlozheniya. CHast' pervaya. Obshchinnoe zemlevladyenie v koloniyah i vliyanie pozemelnoj politiki na ego razlozhenie. Moskva, 1879. — 409
Page me45.569
Kraus, B. Compendium der neueren medicinischen Wissenschaften. Wien, 1875. — 93
Page me45.569
[Kulabko-Koretsky] [Kulyabko-Koretskij, N. G.] Plody reform. Ocherki uspyehov ekonomicheskoj ekspluatatsii v Rossii za poslyednie gody. In: Vpered!, T. V, London, 1877. — 307
— Die Folgen der czaristischen Reformen. Skizzen über die Ausbeutungsfortschritte in Rußland in den letzten Jahren. (Aus der neulich erschienenen russischen sozialistischen Revue 'Vorwärts!', Bd. V. London). In: Vorwärts, Nrn. 19-31; 15., 17., 20., 22., 24., 27. Februar, 1., 3., 6., 8., 10., 13., 15. März 1878. — 307

Page me45.569
[Lasker, E.] Erlebnisse einer Mannes-Seele. Herausgegeben von Berthold Auerbach. Stuttgart, 1873. — 136, 137
Page me45.569
[Lassalle, F.] Arbeiterlesebuch. Rede Lassalle's zu Frankfurt am Main am 17. und 19. Mai 1863, nach dem stenographischen Bericht. Frankfurt am Main, 1863. — 62 —
Offnes Antwortschreiben an das Central-Comité zur Berufung eines Allgemeinen Deutschen Arbeitercongresses zu Leipzig. Zürich, 1863. — 62
Page me45.569
Laveleye, É. de. Le socialisme contemporain en Allemagne. I. Les théoriciens. In: Revue des deux mondes, XLVIe année. Troisiéme période, T. 17. Paris, 1876. — 153, 194, 204

Page Break me45.570
Page me45.570
[Lavrov, P.L.] Gosudarstvennyj element v budushchet obshchestvye. In: Vpered! Neperiodicheskoe obozryenie. Tom IV. London, 1876. — 137
— Russkie pered yuzhno-slavyanskim voprosom. In: Vpered! Dvuhnedyel'noe obozrenie, No 42, 1 oktyabrya (19 sentyabrya) 1876. — 154, 163.
— Russkoj sotsial'no-revolyutsionnoj molodezhi. Po povodu browyury: Zadachi revolyutsionnoj propagandy v Rossii. London, 1874. — 53
— Sotsializm i bor'ba za sushchestvovanie. London, 13go (1) sentyabrya. In: Vpered! Dvuhnedyel'noe ovozryenie, No 17, 15 (3) sentyabrya 1875. — 91, 106-09
Page me45.570
[Lavrov, P.L.] La justice en Russie. In: Vanity Fair, Vol. XVII, April 14, 1877. — 211, 213, 217, 221
— A Russian Socialist's View of the Eastern Question. In: The Pall Mall Gazette, No. 3641, Vol. XXIV, October 19, 1876. — 163
Page me45.570
[Liebknecht, W.] Das Ketzergericht in Berlin. In: Vorwärts, Nr. 80, 11. Juli 1871. — 243
— Die Rothen wider die Blauen. I-II. In: Vorwärts, Nrn. 80, 81, 11., 13. Juli 1877. — 243, 329
— Die Schande Europas. In: Vorwärts, Nr. 6, 13. Oktober 1876. — 155 — [Speech in the German Reichstag on 17 March 1879.] In: Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Deutschen Reichstags. 4. Legislaturperiode, II. Session 1879. Band I. 21. Sitzung am 17. März 1879. Berlin, 1879. — 364 — [Speech at a session of the Congress of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany at Gotha on 23 August 1876.] In: Der Volksstaat, Nr. 102, 1. September 1876. — 154
Page me45.570
Lissagaray, [P.O.] Geschichte der Commune von 1871. Autorisirte deutsche Ausgabe nach dem vom Verfasser vervollständigten französischen Original. Braunschweig, 1877. — 149-52, 155, 166, 172, 189-90, 196, 201, 217, 218, 222-24, 230-32, 262, 266, 269, 270, 285, 288, 446, 447
— Histoire de la Commune de 1871. Bruxelles, 1876. — 149-52, 155, 157, 166, 172, 189-90, 196, 201, 217, 218, 222-24, 230-32, 262, 266, 269, 270, 285, 288, 333, 445, 446, 447
Page me45.570

[Lopatin, H.A.] Iz Irkutska. In: Vpered! T. III, 1874. — 58
Page me45.570
Loria, A. La rendita fondiaria e la sua elisione naturale. Milano, Napoli, Pisa, 1880. — 426
Page me45.570
L[übeck], C. [Reviews of] G.F.W. Walther, Kommunismus und Sozialismus, St. Louis, 1878; G. Cohn, Was ist Sozialismus?, Berlin, 1878; J.B. Meyer, Fichte, Lassalle und der Sozialismus, Berlin, 1878; C. Frantz, Der Föderalismus als leitendes Prinzip für die soziale, staatliche und internationale Organisation, Mainz, 1879. In: Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik. Erster Jahrgang. Erste Hälfte. Zürich-Oberstrass, 1879. — 386
Page me45.570
Luther, M. D. Martin Luthers Werke. Kritische Gesamtausgabe. Tischreden 1531-1546. 1. Band. — 191
Page me45.570
[Malthus, Th. R.] An Essay on the Principle of Population. London, 1798. — 62, 108
Page me45.570
[Marx, J.] Aus der Londoner Theaterwelt. In: Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt, 21. November 1875, Morgenblatt. — 441
— Vom Londoner Theater. In: Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt, 25. Mai 1877. — 329

Page Break me45.571
Page me45.571
Maskelyne, J.N. Modern Spiritualism. A Short Account of Its Rise and Progress, with Some Exposures of So-called Spirit-Media. London, [1876]. — 291
Page me45.571
[Mehring, F.] Herr von Treitschke der Sozialistentödter und die Endziele des Liberalismus. Eine sozialistische Replik. Leipzig, 1875. — 260
Page me45.571
Mehring, F. Zur Geschichte der deutschen Socialdemokratie. Ein historischer Versuch. Magdeburg, 1877. — 260
Page me45.571
Mercier de la Riviére, P.P. L'ordre naturel et essentiel des sociétés politiques. T. 1, 2. Londres, 1767. In: Collection des principaux économistes. T. 2: Physiocrates. Quesnay, Dupont de Nemours, Mercier de la Riviére, l'Abbé Baudeau, Le Trosne, avec une introduction sur la doctrine des physiocrates, des commentaires et des notices historiques. Par Eugéne Daire. Deuxiéme partie. Paris, 1846. — 452
Page me45.571
Meyer, R.H. Der Emancipationskampf des vierten Standes. 1. Bd. Berlin, 1874. — 7, 17
Page me45.571
Meyer, R. [H.] Politische Gründer und die Corruption in Deutschland. Leipzig, 1877. — 304, 359, 368, 424
Page me45.571

[Mikhailovsky] M[ihajlovskij,] N. [K.] Karl Marks pered sudom g. YU. ZHukovskago. In: Otechestvennyya Zapiski, No 10, oktyabr' 1877, Sovremennoe obozryenie, pp. 351-356. — 343
Page me45.571
Moltke [H.K.B.] von. Der russisch-türkische Feldzug in der europäischen Türkei 1828 und 1829. Berlin, 1845. — 163, 182, 300
Page me45.571
Most, J. Kapital und Arbeit. Ein populärer Auszug aus 'Das Kapital' von Karl Marx. Chemnitz, [1873]. — 118, 119, 276
— Kapital und Arbeit. Ein populärer Auszug aus 'Das Kapital' von Karl Marx. Zweite verbesserte Auflage. Chemnitz, [1876]. — 125, 276
— Extracts from the Capital of Karl Marx. Translated by Otto Weydemeyer. Hoboken, [1878]. — 276, 318, 366
Page me45.571
M[ost], J. Ein Philosoph. In: Berliner Freie Presse, 10.-16., 20.-23., 26.-30. September; 3., 5., 7., 12.-14., 17., 19., 21. Oktober 1876. — 120, 122, 123, 218
— [Review of] Schäffle, A.E.F. Bau und Leben des sozialen Körpers. Bände III-IV, Tübingen, 1878. In: Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik. Erster Jahrgang. Erste Hälfte. Zürich-Oberstrass, 1879. — 413
Page me45.571
[Motteler, J.] Congreß der Sozialisten Deutschlands. In: Der Volksstaat, Nrn. 98-102; 23., 25., 27., 30. August, 1. September 1876. — 154
Page me45.571
Müffling, F.C.F. Aus meinem Leben. Berlin, 1851. — 301
Page me45.571
Müllner, A. Die Schuld. — 154
Page me45.571
Nadler, K.G. Die hochdeutsche Nähdersmädle. In: Fröhlich Palz, Gott erhalts! Frankfurt a.M., 1851. — 133
— Herr Christoph Hackstrumpf, weiland Schuhmacher und Volksredner, Particulier und Bürgergrenadierhauptmann, Rathsherr und Inhaber einer goldenen Schnupftabaksdose etc. In: Fröhlich Palz, Gott erhalts! Frankfurt a.M., 1851. — 133
Page me45.571
Owen, R. The Marriage System of the New Moral World; with a Faint Outline of the Present Very Irrational System; as Developed in a Course of Ten Lectures. Leeds, 1838. — 263
— The Revolution in the Mind and Practice of the Human Race; or, the Coming Change from Irrationality to Rationality. London, 1849. — 263

Page Break me45.572
Page me45.572
[Owen, R.] The Life of Robert Owen. Written by himself. With Selections from his Writings and Correspondence. Volume I. London, 1857. — 263
— A Supplementary Appendix to the First Volume of The Life of Robert Owen. Containing a Series of Reports, Addresses, Memorials, and other Documents, referred to in that Volume. 1803-1820. Volume I.-A. London, 1858. — 263

Page me45.572
Perrot, F. Der Bank-, Börsen- und Actienschwindel. Eine Hauptursache der drohenden socialen Gefahr. Beiträge zur Kritik der politischen Oeconomie. I-III Abt. Rostock, 1873-1876. — 304
Page me45.572
[Petty, W.] A Treatise of Taxes and Contributions. London, 1667. — 329
Page me45.572
Phaedrus. Fables (The Bald Man and the Fly). — 219
Page me45.572
Präger Führer. — 89
Page me45.572
Proudhon, P.J. Systéme des contradictions économiques, ou Philosophie de la misére. Tomes I-II. Paris, 1846. — 80
Page me45.572
Quelques mots d'un groupe socialiste révolutionnaire russe á propos de la brochure: Alliance de la Démocratie Socialiste et l'Association Internationale des Travailleurs. Bruxelles [1873]. — 91, 93
Page me45.572
Quesnay, F. Analyse du Tableau économique. In: Physiocrates. Quesnay, Dupont de Nemours, Mercier de la Riviére, L'Abbé Baudeau, Le Trosne, avec une introduction sur la doctrine des physiocrates, des commentaires et des notices historiques, par Eugéne Daire. Premiére partie. Paris, 1846. — 208, 209, 262-65
Page me45.572
Quetelet, [L.A.J.] A Treatise on Man and the Development of His Faculties. Edinburgh, 1842. — 82
Page me45.572
Ralston, W.R.S. Russian Revolutionary Literature. In: The Nineteenth Century. Vol. I, No. 3, May 1877. — 329
Page me45.572
Rasch, G. Deutsche Flüchtlinge in London. In: Der Volksstaat, Nr. 88, 30. Juli 1876. — 177
Page me45.572
Ricardo, D. On the Principles of Political Economy, and Taxation. London, 1817. — 62, 261, 452
Page me45.572
Richter, [E.]. [Speech in the Reichstag on 10 April 1878.] In: Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Deutschen Reichstags. 3. Legislaturperiode. II. Session 1878, Zweiter Band, 33. Sitzung am 10. April 1878. Berlin, 1878. — 309
Page me45.572
Rümelin, G. Shakespearestudien. Zweite Auflage. Stuttgart, 1874. — 192

Page me45.572
[Samarin and Dmitriyev] Samarin, YU. [F.] i Dmitriev, F. [M.] Revolyutsionnyj konservatizm. Kniga R. Fadyeeva 'Russkoe obshchestvo v nastoyashchem i budushchem' i predpoloezheniya peterburgskih dvoryan ob organizatsii vsesoslovnoj volosti. Berlin, 1875. — 100

Page me45.572
Samter, A. Die Reform des Geldwesens. Berlin, 1869. — 328, 329
Page me45.572
Sargant, W.L. Robert Owen, and His Social Philosophy. London, 1860. — 263
Page me45.572
[Schäffle, A.E.F.] Die Quintessenz des Socialismus. Von einem Volkswirth. Separatabdruck aus den 'Deutschen Blättern'. Gotha, 1875. — 190
Page me45.572
Schaible, Ch. The Vogt Pamphlet. To the Editor of the 'Daily Telegraph', London, Febr. 14. In: The Daily Telegraph, February 15, 1860. — 176
Page me45.572
Schiller, F. von. Wilhelm Tell. — 259

Page Break me45.573
Page me45.573
Sch[lesinger], M. Bericht über den Fortgang der sozialistischen Bewegung: Deutsches Reich, I. In: Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik. Erster Jahrgang. Erste Hälfte, Zürich-Oberstrass, 1879. — 386
Page me45.573
Schmidt, O. Darwinismus und Socialdemokratie. Bonn, 1878. — 313, 317
Page me45.573
Schneckenburger, M. Wacht am Rhein. — 444
Page me45.573
Schumacher, B.G. Heil dir im Siegerkranz (Prussian Anthem). — 301, 302
Page me45.573
[Schumacher, H.] Johann Heinrich von Thünen. Ein Forscherleben. Rostock, 1868. — 90
Page me45.573
Schuylar, E. Turkistan. Notes of a Jorney in Russian Turkistan. Khokand, Bukhara, and Kuldja. Vols 1, 2. London, 1876. — 168
Page me45.573
Shakespeare, W. King Richard III. — 226 — The Merchant of Venice. — 65, 122
Page me45.573
[Sieber] Ziber, N. [I.] Nyeskol'ko zamyechanij po povodu stat'i g. YU. ZHukovskago: Karl Marks i ego kniga o kapitalye. In: Otechestvennyya Zapiski, No 11, noyabr' 1877, Sovremennoe obozryenie, pp. 1-32. — 344
Page me45.573
Smith, A. An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations. In two volumes. London, 1776. — 260, 261, 452
Page me45.573
[Sokolovsky] Sokolovskij, P. A. Ocherk istorii sel'skoj obshchiny na syever Rossii. S.-Peterburg, 1877. — 213
Page me45.573
Steffen, N. Brief eines Luxemburgers an einen Landsmann. Dritter Brief. In: Die Grenzboten, 32. Jahrgang. II. Semester. II. Band, Leipzig, 1873. — 85

Page me45.573
Talandier, A. [Letter to H. Maret.] In: La Marseillaise, No. 202, 6 octobre 1878. — 340 — [Letter to the editor of La Marseillaise.] In: La Marseillaise, No. 202, 6 octobre 1878. — 336-42
Page me45.573
Tcatschoff, P. Offener Brief an Herrn Friedrich Engels, Verfasser der Artikel 'Flüchtlings-Literatur' in Nr. 117 and 118 des 'Volksstaat'. Jahrgang 1874. Zürich, 1874. — 59
Page me45.573
Tennyson, A. A Welcome to Her Royal Highness Maria Alexandrovna, Duchesse of Edinburg, March 7, 1874. — 14
Page me45.573
Thomson, W. und Tait, P.G. Handbuch der Theoretischen Physik. Autorisirte deutsche Übersetzung von Dr. H. Helmholtz und G. Wertheim. Erster Band. Zweiter Theil. Braunschweig, 1874. — 78
Page me45.573
Thünen, J.H. von. Der isolirte Staat in Beziehung auf Landwirthschaft und Nationalökonomie. Dritte Auflage, herausgegeben von H. Schumacher-Zarchlin. Theil I. Untersuchungen über den Einfluß, den die Getreidepreise, der Reichtum des Bodens und die Abgaben auf den Ackerbau ausüben. Berlin, 1875. — 90
Page me45.573
Turgot, [A.R.J.] Réflexions sur la formation et la distribution des richesses. In: Collection des principaux économistes. T. 3; Turgot: Œuvres. Nouv. éd., ... par Eugéne Daire. Partie 1. Paris, 1844. — 209
Page me45.573
Tyndall, J. Inaugural Address. In: Nature, Vol. X, No. 251, August 20, 1874. — 50
Page me45.573
Vahlteich, [J.] [Speech at the Berne Congress of Anarchists on 27 October 1876.] In: Bulletin de la Fédération jurassienne de l'Association internationale des travailleurs, No. 45, 5 novembre 1876. — 257

Page Break me45.574
Page me45.574
[Vasilchikov] Vasil'chikov, A. Zemlevladyenie i zemledyelie v Rossii i drugih evropejskih gosudarstvah. T. I-II. S.-Peterburg, 1876. — 213
— Pis'mo ministru narodnago prosvyeshcheniya grafu Tolstomu. Berlin, 1875. — 100
Page me45.574
Viennet, J.P. [Speech in the Chamber of Deputies on 23 March 1833.] In: Journal des débats politiques et litteraires, 24 mars 1833. — 322
Page me45.574
Virchow, R. Die Freiheit der Wissenschaft im modernen Staat. Rede gehalten in der dritten allgemeinen Sitzung der fünfzigsten Versammlung deutscher Naturforscher und Aerzte zu München am 22. September 1877. Berlin, 1877. — 313, 316
Page me45.574
Virgil (Publius Vergilius Maro). Aeneid. — 143
Page me45.574

Vögele, A. Vögele's Affidavit. In: K. Marx. Herr Vogt. London, 1860 (present edition, Vol. 17, p. 319). — 176
— [Statement of September 17, 1859.] In: Allgemeine Zeitung, Nr. 300, 27. Oktober 1859. — 176
Page me45.574
Wagner, R. Das Kunstwerk der Zukunft. Leipzig, 1850. — 137, 192, 443
— Der Ring des Nibelungen. Opera tetralogy. — 143
— Götterdämmerung. Concluding part of Der Ring des Nibelungen. — 443
Page me45.574
Wallace, A.R. On Miracles and Modern Spiritualism. Three Essays. London, 1875. — 291
Page me45.574
Weber, C.M. von. Der Freischütz. Romantische Oper in drei Aufzügen. Libretto F. Kind. — 177
Page me45.574
[Weitling, W.] Des seligen Schneider's Weitling Lehre vom Sozialismus und Communismus. Neu herausgegeben mit Einleitung von Silvius Landsberg. New York, 1879. — 410
Page me45.574
Wiehe, J.F. Wiehe's Affidavit. In: K. Marx. Herr Vogt. London, 1860 (present edition, Vol. 17, pp. 319-320). — 176
Page me45.574
[Zhukovsky] ZHukovskij, YU. [G.] Karl Marks i ego kniga o kapitalye. In: Vyestnik Evropy, kniga 9, Sanktpeterburg, sentyabr' 1877. — 343

DOCUMENTS OF THE INTERNATIONAL WORKING MEN'S ASSOCIATION

Page me45.574
Association Internationale des travailleurs. Réponse du Comité central des sections de langue allemande en Suisse á une lettre de la section de Zurich, concernant le congrés international de la secte des antiautoritaires, du 26 Octobre 1876 á Berne. [Signed: Joh. Ph. Becker, G. Wilhelm, W. Wärzner.] Zurich, 1876. — 183
Page me45.574
Association Internationale des Travailleurs. Statuts et réglements. Londres, 1866. — 203
Page me45.574
Fraternal Bond between the Italian Workmen's Association. — 81
Page me45.574
[General Rules of the International Working-Men's Association] [anti-authoritarian]. In: Bulletin de la Fédération jurassienne de l'Association Internationale des Travailleurs, No. 23, 14 septembre 1873. — 132
Page me45.574
Internationale Arbeiterassociation. Das Zentralkomite der Sektionsgruppe deutscher Sprache an die Sektion Zürich. Genf, den 11. October 1876. [Signed: Joh. Ph. Becker, G. Wilhelm, W. Wärzner.] Zürich (1876). — 173, 174, 200
Page me45.574
Internationale Arbeiter-Association. Verhandlungen der Delegirten-Konferenz zu Philadelphia, 15. Juli 1876. New York, 1876. — 184

Page Break me45.575

DOCUMENTS

Page me45.575
Annual Report of the Secretary of Internal Affairs of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, for 1876-1877. Part III. Industrial Statistics. Vol. V. Harrisburg, 1878. — 284, 318
Page me45.575
Code Napoléon. Paris und Leipzig, 1808. — 68
Page me45.575
Compagnons, Notre Association traverse und époque critique... Genéve, 1873. [Signed: H. Perret, C. Bernard, T. Duval, M. Josseron, P. Detallancourt, H. Renauld, Laplace.] — 4-5
Page me45.575
Koklad vysochajwe uchrezhdennoj kommissii dlya izslyedovaniya nynyeshchnyago polozheniya sel'skago hozyajstva i sel'skoj proizvoditel'nosti v Rossii. Doklad. ZHurnaly Kommissii. S.-Peterburg, 1873. — 58
Page me45.575
Factories and Workshops Law Consolidation Bill. — 228
Page me45.575
Gesetz gegen die gemeingefährlichen Bestrebungen der Sozialdemokratie. Berlin, 1878. — 322, 328, 350, 386, 389, 399-401, 404, 405, 413
Page me45.575
Gewerbeordnung für den Norddeutschen Bund. 1869. — 228
Page me45.575
The Greek United Church in Russia. — 220
Page me45.575
Programm der deutschen Arbeiterpartei. In: Der Volksstaat, Nr. 27, 7. März 1875; Neuer Social-Demokrat, Nr. 29, 7. März 1875. — 60-65, 69, 70, 75
Page me45.575
Programm der sozialistischen Arbeiterpartei Deutschlands. In: Der Volksstaat, Nr. 59, 28. Mai 1875, and in: Protokoll des Vereinigungs-Congresses der Sozialdemokraten Deutschlands abgehalten zu Gotha, vom 22. bis 27. Mai 1875. Leipzig, 1875. — 95, 97, 98, 294, 399, 405, 418
Page me45.575
Programm und Statuten der sozial-demokratischen Arbeiter-Partei. In: Demokratisches Wochenblatt, Nr. 33, 14. August 1869. Signed by the members of the Provisional Committee: W. Bracke, H. Ehlers, F. Neidel, S. Spier. — 60, 61, 65, 72, 97
Page me45.575
Rechenschaftsbericht der sozialdemokratischen Mitglieder des deutschen Reichstages. Signed: A. Bebel, W. Bracke, F.W. Fritzsche, M. Kayser, W. Liebknecht, J. Vahlteich, Ph. Wiemer and W. Hasenclever. In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nrn. 2-4, 12., 19., 26. Oktober 1879. — 419, 424
Page me45.575

Rules of the Communist League (December 1847) (present edition, Vol. 6). — Statuten des Bundes der Kommunisten. — 288
Page me45.575
Sbornik gosudarstvennyh znanij. Toma V, VI. S.-Peterburg, 1878. — 346
Page me45.575
Sbornik materialov ob artelyah v Rossii, Vypusk I-III. S.-Peterburg, 1873-1875. — 213
Page me45.575
Statisticheskij Vremennik Rossijskoj Imperii. Seriya II. Vypusk 9. Statistika russkih bankov. Po porucheniyu TSentral'nogo Statisticheskogo komiteta obrabotal I. I. Kaufman. CHast' pervaya. Sankpeterburg, 1872. — 213
Page me45.575
Statisticheskij Vremennik Rossijskoj Imperii. Seriya II. Vypusk 10. I. Nalichnoe naselenie Rassijskoj Imperii za 1870 g. II. Svyedyeniya o posyevye i sborye hlyebov i kartofelya v 1870-1872 gg. i o chislennonsti skota v 1870 godu v Evropejskoj Rossii. III. Statistika gorodskih sberegatel'nyh kass. Sanktpeterburg, 1875. — 213

Page Break me45.576
Page me45.576
Statisticheskij Vremennik Rossijskoj Itperii. Seriya II. Vypusk 11. Statistika russkih bankov. Obrabotal I. I. Kaufman. CHast' vtoraya. Sanktpeterburg, 1875. — 213
Page me45.576
Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Deutschen Reichstags. 3. Legislatur-Periode. II. Session 1877, Erster Band, 22. Sitzung am 16. April 1877; 23. Sitzung am 17. April 1877; 24. Sitzung am 18. April 1877. Berlin, 1877. — 227
Page me45.576
Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Deutschen Reichstags. 3. Legislatur-Periode. II. Session 1878, Zweiter Band, 33. Sitzung am 10. April 1878. Berlin, 1878. — 309
Page me45.576
Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Deutschen Reichstags. 4. Legislature-Periode. I. Session 1878, Erster Band, 4., 5. Sitzung am 16., 17. September 1878. Berlin, 1878. — 332
Page me45.576
Trudy kommissii, vysochajwe uchrezhdennoj dlya peresmotra sistemy podatej i sborov. Tom XXII. Svod otzyvov gubernskih zemskih sobranij, zemskih uprav i osobyh zemskih kommissij, po proektu preobrazovaniya poduwnoj sistemy sborov, sostavlennomu v ministerstvye finansov. CHasti I-III. S.-Peterburg, 1872-1873. — 58

ANONYMOUS ARTICLES AND REPORTS PUBLISHED IN PERIODIC EDITIONS

Page me45.576
The Daily News, No. 8831, August 14, 1874: International Bands in the Romagna. (From our own correspondent.) Rome, August 10. — 35
— No. 9247, December 13, 1875: Arrest of a Communist in Vienna. — 112
— No. 9386, May 23, 1876: The Revolution in Constantinople. (From our own correspondent.) Constantinople. May 16. — 118

— No. 9429, July 12, 1876: [Article on Turkish atrocities during the suppression of the insurrection in Bulgaria]. — 140
— No. 9521, October 27, 1876: The Russians in Turkestan. (Signed: A Russian). — 169
— No. 9523, October 30, 1876: The Russians in Turkestan. (Signed: Another Russian). — 169
— No. 16112, September 17, 1878: News from Berlin. The Socialist Bill. — 322, 323, 324, 328
Page me45.576
The Daily Telegraph, September 18, 1878: [leader]. — 328, 331
Page me45.576
The Diplomatic Review, Vol. XXIV, No. 4, October 1876: The Bulgarian Insurrection. — 158
Page me45.576
The Dundee Advertiser, No. 4510 (daily), 5407 (weekly), 25 September 1875: The International Working Men's Association. By an Internationalist. — 92
Page me45.576
The Evening Standard, August 13, 1874: The Internationalist snake has been scotched, not killed.... — 35
— August 13, 1874: The Arrest of Communists at Marseilles. — 35
Page me45.576
Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt, Nr. 229, 17. August 1875: Frankfurter Angelegenheiten. Frankfurt, 17. August. — 85
Page me45.576
Freiheit, Nr. 21, 24. Mai 1879: [On the position of the deputies of the Reichstag

Page Break me45.577
Page me45.577
Social-Democratic group concerning protective tariffs]. In the section Social-politische Rundschau. — 360, 362
— Nr. 35, 30. August 1879: [Review of articles from the first volume of the Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik]. In the section Socialpolitische Rundschau. — 383, 386
— Nr. 36, 6. September 1879, Probenummer Was nun?: Auch eine Denkschrift. — 383, 386
— Nr. 47, 22. November 1879: [Information about Liebknecht's oath]. In the section Socialpolitische Rundschau. — 425
Page me45.577
Gleichheit, Nrn. 29, 30, 33; 18., 24. Juli, 14. August 1875: Karl Marx über Streiks und Arbeiter-Koalizionen. — 99
Page me45.577
Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik. Erster Jahrgang. Erste Hälfte. Zürich-Oberstrass, 1879. — 374, 383, 386, 389, 393, 394, 401, 413, 422, 430, 432
Page me45.577
Kölnische Zeitung, Nr. 249, 7. September 1878. — 326
Page me45.577
Il Martello, 13 gennaio 1877. — 199

Page me45.577
Nature. A Weekly Illustrated Journal of Science. Vol. XVIII, No. 455, London, New York, July 18, 1878: [Agenda of the 51st Congress of German Naturalists and Physicians]. — 313, 317
Page me45.577
The Pall Mall Gazette, No. 3529. Vol. XXIII, June 10, 1876: Russian Credit. — 128
— No. 4613, December 4, 1879: The Czar and His People. — 428
— No. 4617, December 9, 1879: Kill or Cure for Russian Despotism. — 428
— No. 4618, December 10, 1879: What Next in Russia. — 428
— No. 4620, December 12, 1879: The Collapse of Authority in Russia. — 428
Page me45.577
La Plebe, Num. 1, 7 gennaio 1877: Tribunali. — 199
— Num. 3, 21 gennaio 1877: [Reply to an article in Il Martello of 13 January 1877]. — 199, 200
— Num. 6, 16 febbraio 1877: [Concerning the reply of the Central Committee of the German-language sections to a letter from the Zurich Section]. In the section Estero. Germania. — 200
— Num. 7, 26 febbraio 1877: Congresso socialista di Milano. — 203, 207
— Num. 7, 26 febbraio 1877: [Concerning the first issue of the newspaper Lavoratore]. In the section Estero. — 207
Page me45.577
La Republique Française, Nr. 2088, 8 août 1877: Constantinople, 27 Juinet. — 263
Page me45.577
Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 7, 16. November 1879: Zur Eröffnung des sächsischen Landtages. — 425 — Nr. 10, 7. Dezember 1879: Preßgeschichtliche Rückblicke. II. — 430
Page me45.577
Der Sprudel, Nr. 18, 30. August 1874: (Telegramm des 'Sprudel'). — 37
Page me45.577
The Standard, No. 16896, September 17, 1878: The German Parliament. Debate on the Anti-Socialist Bill. — 322, 323, 324
— No. 16897, September 18, 1878: London, Wednesday, September 18 and The German Parliament. The Anti-Socialists Bill. Speech of Prince Bismarck. — 326
Page me45.577
Die Tagwacht, Nr. 96, 2. Dezember 1876: [Notice about the forthcoming Congress of Portuguese Socialists on 5 January 1877]. In the section Sozialpolitische Rundschau. Portugal. — 174

Page Break me45.578
Page me45.578
The Times, Nos. 28104, 28105, 28107, 28108, 28109, September 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 1874: The Seventh International Working Men's Congress. — 42, 49
— No. 28956, May 31, 1877: Peace Rumours and The New French Ministry. — 234
— No. 29436, December 12, 1878: (From Our Own Correspondent.) The Socialist Movement. Berne, Dec. 11. — 348
Page me45.578

Der Volksstaat, Nrn. 140, 141, 2., 4. Dezember 1874: Der Bankgesetz-Entwurf. (Marked: K-Z.) — 54, 100
— Nr. 146, 16. Dezember 1874: Die Reichsbank oder die Association des Reiches mit dem Kapital. (Marked: K-Z.) — 54
— Nr. 149, 23. Dezember 1874: Kulturkampf und Parlamentarismus. In the section Politische Übersicht. — 54
— Nrn. 103, 104, 106; 8., 10., 15. September 1875: Karl Marx über Strikes und Arbeiter-Koalitionen. Der 'Gleichheit' entnommen. — 99
— Nr. 82, 16. Juli 1876: Das Begräbniß Bakunin's.... In the section Politische Übersicht. — 132
— Nr. 55, 14. Mai 1875: Ueber den Programmentwurf. Stimmen aus der Partei. (Marked: K-Z.) — 100
— Nrn. 68, 82, 18. Juni, 21. Juli 1875: Ueber die gewerkschaftliche, politische und lokale Agitation. (Marked: K-Z.) — 100
— Nrn. 91, 92, 11., 13. August 1875: Strikes sind ein Zeichen mangelhafter Organisation der Gewerkschaften. (Marked: K-Z.) — 100
Page me45.578
Vorwärts, Nr. 27, 4. März 1877: [Review of R. Meyer's book Politische Gründer und die Corruption in Deutschland]. — 424
— Nr. 40, 6. April 1877: Wieder Einen hat die Nemesis beim Schopfe gepackt! — 246, 440
— Nr. 67, 10. Juni 1877: Zum jüngsten Staatsreich des Herrn Mac-Mahon. — 239, 294
— Nrn. 69, 70, 119-122, 15., 17. Juni, 10., 12., 14., 17. Oktober 1877: Aus Heuchelland. Stille Beobachtungen eines Berliners in London. — 284, 285
— Nr. 109, 15. September 1878: Die Verhaftungen in Paris. In the section Sozialpolitische Uebersicht. — 338
Page me45.578
Die Zukunft. Socialistische Revue. Prospect. — 283, 285, 362
Page me45.578
Vpered! Dvuhnedyel'noe obozryenie, No 37, 15 iyulya 1876: Bern, 4 iyulya. Pohorony M. A. Bakunina. — 132
Page me45.578
Nachalo, No 2, aprel' 1878: [Note on the arrests in St Petersburg]. — 316

Page Break me45.579

INDEX OF PERIODICALS

Page me45.579
Allgemeine Wiener medizinische Zeitung — a weekly published in Vienna from 1856 to 1915. — 47
Page me45.579
Allgemeine Zeitung — a conservative daily founded in 1798; published in Augsburg from 1810 to 1882. — 162, 175-76
Page me45.579
Arbeiter-Wochen-Chronik. Sozialökonomisches Volksblatt — a Hungarian socialist weekly, published under this title in Budapest from 1873 to 1890, organ of the Hungarian

Social-Democrats; appeared under the title Arbeiterpresse from January 1891 to 1894. — 157
Page me45.579
L'avant-garde. Organe collectiviste et anarchiste — a French-language anarchist newspaper, published twice a month in La-Chaux-de-Fonds (Switzerland) in 1877-78. — 348
Page me45.579
Der Beobachter. Ein Volksblatt aus Schwaben — a daily published in Stuttgart from 1833; newspaper of the petty-bourgeois democrats in the 1860s. — 9, 85
Page me45.579
Berliner Freie Presse — a German Social-Democratic daily published under this title in Berlin from 1876 to 1878; from the middle of 1876 it appeared under the editorship of Johann Most. — 199
Page me45.579
Braunschweiger Volksfreund — a daily, organ of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party of Germany (Eisenachers) published in Brunswick from 1871 to 1878. — 245
Page me45.579
Bulletin de la Fédération jurassienne de l'Association internationale des travailleurs — a French-language newspaper of the Swiss anarchists published under the editorship of James Guillaume from 1872 to 1878, at first twice a month, and from July 1873, weekly. — 6, 199, 200, 214, 294, 306
Page me45.579
Chicagoer Arbeiter-Zeitung — a German-language socialist newspaper published in Chicago from 1876 to 1924, three times a week until 1879, then daily. — 414
Page me45.579
La Commune — a democratic daily published in Paris in September-November 1880 under the editorship of Félix Pyat. — 440
Page me45.579
The Contemporary Review — a liberal monthly published in London since 1866. — 168-70, 209

Page Break me45.580
Page me45.580
The Daily News — a liberal newspaper of the British industrial bourgeoisie; it appeared under this title in London from 1846 to 1930. — 35, 118, 140, 168-70, 311, 322, 324, 332
Page me45.580
The Daily Telegraph — a liberal and, from the 1880s, conservative newspaper, published under this title in London from 1855 to 1937. — 176, 328, 331, 340
Page me45.580
Demokratisches Wochenblatt. Organ der sozial-demokratischen Arbeiterpartei — a German workers' newspaper, published under this title in Leipzig from January 1868 to September 1869 under the editorship of Wilhelm Liebknecht; at the Eisenach Congress (1869) it was declared a central organ of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party of Germany and renamed Der Volksstaat. — 65
Page me45.580

The Diplomatic Review — an English foreign policy journal, published under this title from 1866 to 1877, up to July 1870 as a monthly, then as a quarterly; its publisher was David Urquhart. — 158, 167
Page me45.580
Dziennik Polski — a Polish liberal newspaper, published in Lvov from 1869 to 1914. — 103
Page me45.580
The Eastern Post — an English workers' weekly published in London from 1868 to 1873, organ of the General Council of the International from February 1871 to June 1872. — 341
Page me45.580
L'Égalité — a socialist weekly founded in 1877 by Jules Guesde, organ of the French Workers' Party from 1880 to 1883. It appeared in six series with different sub-titles. The first three series were published weekly (113 issues), the fourth and the fifth series — daily (56 issues). Of the sixth series only one issue appeared (1886). — 306, 449
Page me45.580
L'Égalité. Journal de l'Association internationale des Travailleurs de la Suisse romande — a French-language weekly, organ of the Romance Federation of the International, published in Geneva from December 1868 to December 1872. — 351
Page me45.580
The Engineer — an English scientific and technical weekly published from 1856. — 12
Page me45.580
Ergänzungsblätter zur Kenntniß der Gegenwart — a German popular scientific monthly, published in Hildburghausen from 1865 to 1871. — 162
Page me45.580
The Evening Standard — a conservative daily founded in London in 1827; from 1857, it came out as a morning newspaper under the title The Standard and from 1860 to 1905 under the titles The Evening Standard and The Standard. — 35
Page me45.580
The Farmer — an English monthly and later weekly newspaper published under this title from 1865 to 1889; has been appearing under the title Farmer and Stockbreeder since 1889. — 12
Page me45.580
La Federación. Organo de la Federación de la Associacion Internacional de los Trabajadores — a Spanish workers' weekly organ of the Barcelona Federation of the International, published in Barcelona from 1869 to 1873; was under the Bakuninists' influence. — 6
Page me45.580
Le Figaro — a French conservative daily published in Paris since 1854. From 1826 to 1833 it appeared under the title Figaro, journal nonpolitiqué. — 36, 268
Page me45.580
The Fortnightly Review — a historical, philosophical and literary magazine, founded in 1865 by a group of radicals; subsequently liberal in character; published under this title in London till 1934. — 179, 213

Page Break me45.581

Page me45.581
Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt — a democratic daily published in Frankfurt am Main from 1856 (under this title from 1866) to 1943. — 3, 17, 61, 85, 95, 98, 120, 121, 156, 180, 310, 329, 334, 441
Page me45.581
Fraser's Magazine. For Town and Country — a literary, popular scientific and political liberal monthly published in London from 1830 to 1882. — 80, 92, 415
Page me45.581
Freiheit — a German-language weekly of the anarchist group of Johann Most and Wilhelm Hasselmann; published in London from 1879 to 1882, in Belgium in 1882 and in the USA from 1882 to 1910. — 351, 353, 360-63, 365, 383, 398, 411, 417, 433
Page me45.581
Galignani's Messenger — an English-language newspaper published in Paris from 1814; at first three times a week and then daily; it reprinted excerpts from major English, American and French papers. — 268
Page me45.581
Gardener's Chronicle — see Gardener's Chronicle and Agricultural Gazette
Page me45.581
Gardener's Chronicle and Agricultural Gazette — an agricultural weekly published in London since 1841. — 11, 13
Page me45.581
Gazeta Narodowa — a Polish liberal paper published in Lvov from 1862 to 1914. — 103
Page me45.581
La Gazette de Bruxelles — a French liberal daily published in Brussels. — 49
Page me45.581
Hermann. Deutsches Wochenblatt aus London — a German-language weekly of the German petty-bourgeois democratic refugees published in London from 1859. — 315
Page me45.581
L'Homme Libre — a petty-bourgeois democratic daily, published in Paris in 1876-77; Louis Blanc was its editor-in-chief. — 341, 342
Page me45.581
L'Indépendance belge — a liberal daily founded in Brussels in 1831. — 75, 268
Page me45.581
L'Internationale. Organe des sections belges de l'Association Internationale des Travailleurs — a weekly organ of the Belgian sections of the International published in Brussels from 1869 to 1873; printed documents of the International; took the anarchist stand in 1873. — 6
Page me45.581
The International Gazette — an English-language weekly published in Berlin in 1874. — 56
Page me45.581
Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik — a social-reformist magazine published in Zurich in 1879-81 by Karl Höchberg (pseudonym Dr Ludwig Richter); three issues came out. — 374, 383, 386-87, 393, 401-02, 413, 422, 430, 432
Page me45.581

Journal des Débats politiques et littéraires — a daily published in Paris from 1789 to 1944, was conservative in the 1870s-80s. — 244, 441
Page me45.581
Journal des Économistes. Revue mensuelle d'économie politique et des questions agricoles, manufacturiéres et commerciales — a liberal monthly published in Paris from 1841 to 1943. — 194
Page me45.581
Kalender — see Volks-Kalender
Page me45.581
Kölnische Zeitung — a daily published in Cologne from 1802 to 1945; expressed the interests of the National-Liberal Party in the 1870s. — 155, 240, 241, 326, 416

Page Break me45.582
Page me45.582
Königlich privilegirte Berlinische Zeitung von Staats- und gelehrten Sachen — a daily published under this title from 1785 to 1911; also called Vossische Zeitung after its owner Christian Friedrich Voss. — 252, 312, 317
Page me45.582
The Labor Standard — a socialist weekly published in New York from 1876 to 1900; Engels contributed to it in the 1870s. — 306
Page me45.582
La Lanterne — a radical republican weekly published by Henri Rochefort from 30 May 1868 in Paris and, after it was banned by the Bonapartist authorities, in Brussels (from August 1868 to November 1869), opposed the Second Empire; Rochefort published the second edition of the paper in London in 1874-76. — 25, 34
Page me45.582
Die Laterne — a Social-Democratic weekly, published by Carl Hirsch in Brussels from 15 December 1878 to 29 June 1879. — 388, 395, 398, 399, 401, 412, 414, 417
Page me45.582
The Leisure Hour — a magazine published under this title in London from 1852 to 1905. — 332
Page me45.582
La Liberté. Organe socialiste hebdomadaire — a democratic paper published in Brussels from 1865 to 1873 (in 1872-73 daily); from 1867, an organ of the International in Belgium. — 6, 259
Page me45.582
Londoner Journal — a German-language petty-bourgeois paper published in London from 1878 to 1891. — 315
Page me45.582
La Marseillaise — a radical republican weekly published in Paris from 1877 to 1914. — 235, 336-40, 342
Page me45.582
Il Martello. Organo del Circolo Operaio di Milano, Giornale democratico socialista degli operai — an Italian Bakuninist weekly published in Bologna under the editorship of Andrea Costa in January-March 1877. — 199
Page me45.582

Messager de l'Europe — see Vstnik Evropy
Page me45.582
Le Mirabeau — a weekly published in Verviers from 1868 to 1874, organ of the Belgian sections of the International. — 6
Page me45.582
Morning News — a Scottish conservative paper. — 209
Page me45.582
The Morning Post — a London conservative daily published from 1772 to 1937; in the mid-nineteenth century it was the organ of the Right-wing Whigs grouped around Palmerston. — 178
Page me45.582
The National Reformer — a radical weekly published in London from 1860 to 1893. — 341, 342
Page me45.582
Nature. A Weekly Illustrated Journal of Science — a journal published in London since 1869. — 50
Page me45.582
Die Neue Gesellschaft. Monatsschrift für Socialwissenschaft — a reformist magazine published in Zurich from October 1877 to March 1880; its editor-in-chief was Franz Wiede. — 242, 243, 253, 258, 362, 407, 413
Page me45.582
Neue Rheinische Zeitung. Organ der Demokratie — a daily newspaper of the revolutionary-proletarian wing of the democrats during the 1848-49 revolution in Germany; it was published in Cologne under the editorship of Marx from 1 June 1848 to 19 May 1849 (with an interval between 27 September and 12 October 1848); Engels was among its editors. — 259, 334

Page Break me45.583
Page me45.583
Neue Rheinische Zeitung. Politisch-ökonomische Revue — a theoretical journal of the Communist League, founded by Marx and Engels and published by them from December 1849 to November 1850. — 49
Page me45.583
Die Neue Welt. Illustriertes Unterhaltungsblatt für das Volk — a socialist fortnightly published in Leipzig from 1876 to 1883, then in Stuttgart and Hamburg till 1919; its editor was Wilhelm Liebknecht (1876-80); Engels contributed to it in the 1870s. — 123, 195, 215, 242
Page me45.583
New-York Daily Tribune — a newspaper founded by Horace Greeley in 1841 and published until 1924; organ of the Left-wing American Whigs until the mid-1850s and later of the Republican Party; opposed slavery in the 1840s and 1850s. Marx and Engels contributed to it from August 1851 to March 1862. — 115, 448
Page me45.583
The Nineteenth Century. A Monthly Review — a liberal journal published under this title in London from 1877 to 1900. — 328, 335
Page me45.583

Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung — a daily published in Berlin from 1861 to 1918; semi-official paper of Bismarck's government in the 1860s-80s. — 310
Page me45.583
O operaio — a Portuguese socialist paper published in Oporto in the late 1870s and the 1880s. — 363
Page me45.583
Österreichische Monatsschrift für Gesellschaftswissenschaften und Volkswirtschaft — a conservative Catholic monthly published in Vienna in 1879 and 1880. — 369
Page me45.583
The Pall Mall Gazette. An Evening Newspaper and Review — a daily published in London from 1865 to 1920; conservative in the 1860s and 1870s; Marx and Engels maintained contacts with the paper from July 1870 to June 1871; it published a series of Engels' articles Notes on the War. — 128, 163, 428
Page me45.583
Paterson Labor Standard — an American weekly published in Paterson from 1878; from 1899 to 1906 appeared under the title The National Labor Standard. — 410
Page me45.583
La Plebe. Giornale republicano-razionalista-socialista — an Italian paper published under the editorship of Enrico Bignami in Lodi (1868-75) and in Milan (1875-83); till the early 1870s — democratic, then socialist paper; in 1872-73 was organ of the Italian sections of the International and supported the General Council. — 198-200, 203, 214
Page me45.583
Le Précurseur — a French-language socialist weekly, organ of the Social-Democrats of Romance Switzerland; published in Geneva from 1877 to 1887 under the editorship of Johann Philipp Becker. — 183, 214, 294, 348-49, 351
Page me45.583
Il Proletario Italiano — a newspaper published in Turin twice a week from 1871; appeared under the title Il Proletario from 1872 to 1874. — 184
Page me45.583
O Protesto — a socialist weekly published in Lisbon from August 1875 to January 1878. — 91, 99, 174
Page me45.583
Quiddities and Oddities Journal. — 14

Page Break me45.584
Page me45.584
Le Radical — a democratic paper published in Paris in 1877. — 451
Page me45.584
Le Rappel — a Left-republican daily founded by Victor Hugo and Henri Rochefort; it was published in Paris from 1869 to 1928. — 439
Page me45.584
La République Française — a bourgeois-radical daily founded by Léon Gambetta and published in Paris from 1871 to 1924. — 235, 251, 263, 341
Page me45.584
La Révolution française — a newspaper published in Paris in 1876. — 445
Page me45.584

Revue des deux Mondes — a literary and political fortnightly published in Paris from 1829 to 1944. — 153, 194
Page me45.584
La Revue socialiste — a monthly founded by Benoît Malon, at first a socialist republican, then syndicalist and co-operative organ; published in Lyons and Paris from 1880, in Paris from 1885 to 1914; Marx and Engels contributed to it in the 1880s. — 431
Page me45.584
Schwäbischer Beobachter — see Der Beobachter
Page me45.584
Le Siécle — a daily published in Paris from 1836 to 1939; in the 1870s it was moderate republican — 235, 441
Page me45.584
Der Sozialdemokrat. Organ der Sozialdemokratie deutscher Zunge — central organ of the Social-Democratic Party of Germany; published weekly in Zurich from September 1879 to September 1888 and in London from October 1888 to 27 September 1890; edited by Georg von Vollmar (1879-80) and by Eduard Bernstein (1881-90); Marx and Engels contributed to it. — 367, 372, 374, 378, 379, 383, 386, 392-99, 401, 402, 412-13, 417, 420, 421, 422, 425, 430, 431, 433
Page me45.584
The Spectator — a weekly published in London since 1828; at first liberal, then conservative. — 341
Page me45.584
Der Sprudel — a weekly published in Vienna from 1869 to 1876. — 37
Page me45.584
The Standard — a conservative daily published in London from 1857 to 1916 (see The Evening Standard). — 255, 277, 322, 324, 326, 327, 339, 340
Page me45.584
Die Tagwacht — a German-language Social-Democratic paper published in Zurich from 1869 to 1880; organ of the German sections of the International in Switzerland in 1869-73, later of the Swiss Workers' Union and the Social-Democratic Party of Switzerland. — 174
Page me45.584
Le Temps — a conservative daily organ of the big bourgeoisie published in Paris from 1861 to 1943; opposed the Second Empire and war with Prussia. — 441
Page me45.584
The Times — a conservative daily published in London since 1785. — 42, 49, 67, 234, 266, 268, 277, 329, 340, 352
Page me45.584
Le Travailleur — a French-language anarchist monthly published in Geneva from May 1877 to May 1878 under the editorship of Nikolai Zhukovsky, Élisée and Éli Reclus and others. — 259
Page me45.584
Tribune — see New-York Daily Tribune
Page me45.584
Über Land und Meer — an illustrated weekly published in Stuttgart from 1858 to 1923. — 107

Page me45.584
L'Union des Travailleurs — a workers' monthly published in Geneva in 1873-74, held a reformist stand. — 5

Page Break me45.585
Page me45.585
Vanity Fair. A Weekly Show of Political, Social and Literary Wares — a conservative weekly published in London from 1868 to 1929. — 205, 209, 220, 227
Page me45.585
Das Volk — a German-language weekly published in London from 7 May to 20 August 1859; it was founded as the official organ of the German Workers' Educational Society in London; Marx took part in its publication beginning with issue No. 2 and in early July he became its de facto editor. — 175, 176
Page me45.585
Volksfreund — see Braunschweiger Volksfreund
Page me45.585
Volks-Kalender — a Social-Democratic almanac published in Brunswick from 1875 to 1878; its editor-in-chief and publisher was Wilhelm Bracke. — 227, 236, 306
Page me45.585
Der Volksstaat. Organ der sozialdemokratischen Arbeiterpartei und Gewerksgenossenschaften — central organ of the German Social-Democratic Workers' Party published in Leipzig from 2 October 1869 to 29 September 1876 (twice a week, from July 1873 three times a week) under the general guidance of Wilhelm Liebknecht; August Bebel greatly influenced the paper; it regularly printed articles by Marx and Engels. — 7, 30, 41, 54, 55, 58, 61, 94, 103, 118, 123, 127, 132, 154, 155
Page me45.585
Volks-Zeitung. Organ für jedermann aus dem Volke — a liberal daily published in Berlin from 1853 to 1897. — 411
Page me45.585
Vorwärts. Central-Organ der Socialdemokratie Deutschlands — central organ of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany after the 1876 Gotha Congress; published in Leipzig three times a week from October 1876 to October 1878; Marx and Engels helped its editorial board. — 155, 162, 174, 186, 195, 203, 214, 218, 238, 239, 242, 243, 246, 247, 254, 265, 283, 284, 285, 289, 295, 306, 307, 326, 338, 400
Page me45.585
Vossische Zeitung — see Königlich privilegirte Berlinische Zeitung von Staats- und gelehrten Sachen
Page me45.585
Die Wage. Wochenblatt für Politik und Literatur — a democratic journal published in Berlin under the editorship of Guido Weiß from 1873 to 1879. — 88
Page me45.585
Westphälische Volkszeitung — a daily, organ of the Party of Progress, published in Hagen in the 1860s; its editor-in-chief was Wilhelm Hasenclever (1862-63). — 247
Page me45.585
Whitehall Review — a conservative weekly published in London from 1876 to 1929. — 205, 209, 277, 327, 352

Page me45.585
Wiener medizinische Zeitung — see Allgemeine Wiener medizinische Zeitung
Page me45.585
Die Zukunft. Socialistische Revue — a social-reformist review published twice a month from October 1877 to November 1878 in Berlin. — 238, 247, 249, 252, 253, 254, 257, 259, 261, 283, 285, 362, 367, 407, 412, 413
Page me45.585
Vyestnik Evropy. ZHurnal istoriko-politicheskih nauk — a Russian historical, political and literary journal of liberal trend, published in St Petersburg from 1866 to 1918; from 1868, monthly. — 358
Page me45.585
Vpered! Dvuhnedyel'noe obozryenie — a Russian paper published by Pyotr Lavrov in London in 1875-76; printed material on the struggle of the proletariat of different countries. — 91, 106, 107, 132, 154, 163
Page me45.585
Vpered! Neperiodicheskoe obozryenie — a Russian journal published from 1873 to

Page Break me45.586
1877 at first in Zurich and then in London; five issues appeared; Pyotr Lavrov was its publisher from 1873 to 1876; it printed many articles on the working-class movement in the West and on the activity of the International. — 129, 305, 307
Page me45.586
Grazhdanin — a Russian literary and political weekly published in St Petersburg from 1872 to 1914; organ of the nobility. — 164
Page me45.586
Nachalo. Organ russkih sotsialistov — the first Narodnik paper in Russia published illegally in St Petersburg from March to May 1878; four issues appeared; the paper strove to unite revolutionaries of different trends. — 316
Page me45.586
Otechestvennyya Zapiski — a Russian literary and political monthly published in St Petersburg from 1839 to 1884. — 343

Page Break me45.587

SUBJECT INDEX

Page me45.587
A

Alliance of Socialist Democracy — see International Alliance of Socialist Democracy Anarchism — 63, 351, 434
— in Italy — 207
— in Russia — 434
— anarchists' congresses — 157, 166, 173, 184, 214
See also Bakuninism
Apology — 304
Armchair socialists — 252, 367

Army — 271, 428
— French — 246
— Romanian — 188
— Russian — 182, 183, 186-88, 232-33
— Turkish — 182, 188, 249, 271
Austria — 296-98, 353, 356
See also Working-class movement in Austria Authority
— elimination of superstitious belief in — 288
Page me45.587
B

Bakuninism — 9, 41, 132, 214, 259, 306
— and the International — 5, 155
— in Belgium — 42, 214
— in Italy — 35, 155, 184, 214
— in Spain — 155, 214
— in Switzerland — 183, 200, 214
— Bakuninists' congresses — 42-43, 48, 157, 166, 173, 184
See also Anarchism; International Alliance of Socialist Democracy; Socialist Congress in Ghent, 1877
Belgium — 356
See also Working-class movement in Belgium
Biology — 78
Bonapartism
— Bismarck's — 314-15
— in France — 23, 30, 57, 235, 246, 294
Bourgeoisie — 60, 61, 242-44, 246, 404, 405, 423
— bourgeois liberalism — 63
Bourgeoisie, English — 183, 298
Bourgeoisie, French — 234
Bourgeoisie, German — 24, 190, 332, 351, 384
Bourgeoisie, Russian — 384
Bourgeois political economy — 58, 90, 108, 153, 208, 328, 452
Bulgaria — 182
Page me45.587
C

Capital — 452
'Capital' by Karl Marx — 287, 366
— second German edition of Volume One — 58, 276, 282
— second Russian edition of Volume One — 343, 346

Page Break me45.588
— French edition of Volume One — 16, 26, 28, 56, 57, 58, 92, 114, 276, 282, 343, 346 — preparation of the second volume — 17-18, 115, 162, 354, 432

— popularisation of its ideas — 124, 125, 193, 276, 366
Capitalist mode of production — 346, 355-57, 366
Class(es) — 109, 346
— abolition of class distinctions — 64 See also Bourgeoisie; Class struggle; Peasantry; Petty bourgeoisie; Working class Classical political economy — 209, 260-61, 452
Class struggle — 108, 366, 384, 402-04, 406-08
Coalitions — 99
Communism, Icarian (Cabet's) — 99
Communism (social formation) — 62-64, 109, 197, 450
Conservative Party (England) — 299
Crimean war, 1853-56 (Paris Treaty, 1856) — 18, 298, 389
Criticism — 242, 314, 421
— methods of — 107, 109
Page me45.588
D

Darwinism — 106-08, 313, 316
See also Struggle for existence Democracy
— bourgeois — 402, 406
— petty-bourgeois — 61, 63, 65
Dialectics — 122
Dühring, teaching of — 119, 122-23, 130-31, 139, 186, 256
Page me45.588
E

Eastern (Oriental) question, the — 118, 122-23, 161, 163, 182, 186, 192, 216, 223, 278
See also Crimean war, 1853-56; Russo-Turkish war, 1877-78
Economic crisis — 78, 109, 212, 354
— in the 1870s — 78, 212, 218, 277, 344, 346, 354-55
Education
— the role of tradition — 215
Eisenachers — see German Social-Democracy
Engels, Frederick — 175, 288
— in the 1870s — 50, 122-24, 139-40, 154, 162, 173, 175, 186, 189, 192, 227, 254, 257-59, 295, 306, 313, 361, 362, 378, 383-84, 386, 388, 394, 408, 411-13, 420, 429-32
See also Party, proletarian, socialist; Socialism, scientific; Working-class movement England (Great Britain) — economic development — 309, 358
— industry — 355
— railways — 355-56
— banks — 354-55
— economic crisis — 344, 354
— domestic situation — 24, 140, 155, 297, 340
— aristocracy — 298

— radicals — 157, 339, 360
— democratic movement — 155-57, 184, 292
— foreign policy, diplomacy — 18, 182, 296-97
See also Bourgeoisie, English; Conservative Party (England); Eastern (Oriental) question, the; Liberal Party (England); Trades unions in Britain; Working class in England; Working-class movement in England Europe
— state system after 1815 — 297, 299
— danger of war in the 1870s — 18, 30, 100-03, 297, 384, 428, 431
Page me45.588
F

Fleet
— Turkish — 186
France — 234, 239, 278, 297
— joint-stock companies — 245
— banks — 354
— railways — 355-56
— before 19th cent. — 357-58
— in early 19th cent. — 302
— Second Empire — 22-23, 233, 239, 278, 293, 294 — domestic situation, attempt at a monarchist coup — 22-24, 30, 233-35, 245, 246, 278, 294
— peasantry — 294

Page Break me45.589
— monarchists (Orleanists) — 57
— Bonapartists — 22, 30, 57, 235, 246, 294
— bourgeois republicans — 239 See also Army — French; Bourgeoisie, French; Franco-Prussian war, 1870-71; Working class in France; Working-class movement in France
Franco-Prussian war, 1870-71 — 61, 62, 297, 302, 384
Freedom — 63, 294, 423
Page me45.589
G

General Association of German Workers — 6-7
See also German Social-Democracy; Lassalleanism; Working-class movement in Germany
German People's Party — 61, 69, 95, 97
German Social-Democracy — 60, 64, 100, 118, 283, 352, 401, 421, 430
— Social-Democratic Workers' Party (Eisenachers) — 60, 69, 97
— critique by Marx and Engels of the draft programme and programme adopted in Gotha (May 1875) — 60-66, 69-70, 94-95, 97-98
— Socialist Workers' Party before the introduction of the exceptional law against socialists — 117-18, 246, 249, 257, 259, 283-84, 288, 295

— during the operation of the exceptional law against socialists, struggle against reformist and petty-bourgeois socialism — 362, 364-65, 367, 373-74, 383-84, 386, 393, 401-08, 412, 413, 418-19, 422, 429-30, 432
— anarchist group of Johann Most — 360-63, 365, 383, 411, 433
— party congresses, their functions and resolutions — 248, 417-18
— participation in elections to Reichstag — 3, 6, 189, 190, 192, 195, 294, 352, 428, 431 — Social-Democratic group in Reichstag, its policy and tactics — 309, 325, 360, 399-404, 413-14, 417-18, 423
— internationalism of — 61
— press — 285, 367, 373, 379, 383-84, 386, 388, 393, 395-96, 400-01, 408, 411-12, 420, 429
— and bourgeois democracy — 402, 407
— and petty bourgeoisie — 61, 65, 384, 408, 425, 430
— and representatives of other classes — 283, 294, 384, 406-08, 412, 419, 425
— and students — 283, 294, 384
— and peasantry — 195, 425
— anti-war position — 61, 62, 387, 389, 431
See also Lassalleanism, Lassalleans; Working-class movement in Germany
German Workers' Educational Society in London (1840-1918) — 251, 360, 362, 365, 433
Germany — 212, 308-09, 408
— industrial revolution, industry — 308, 424
— state monopolies — 308, 309
— ruin of small-scale production — 309, 352
— protectionism — 423-24
— economic crisis — 353
— domestic policy, domestic situation — 24-25, 99, 228, 314-15, 352
— Kulturkampf — 25
— militarism — 389
— exceptional law against socialists (Anti-Socialist Law) — 322, 323, 332, 349, 364, 389, 401, 428
— peasantry — 195
— foreign policy — 25, 155, 223, 278, 296, 326, 387
— and Russia — 22, 100, 155, 223, 278, 384, 387
See also Bonapartism — Bismarck's; Bourgeoisie, German; German Social-Democracy; Petty bourgeoisie, German; Prussia; Working class in Germany; Working-class movement in Germany
Page me45.589
H

History — 109, 366, 431
— historical development — 7
— historical conflicts — 406
Holy Alliance — 298

Page Break me45.590

Page me45.590
I

Industry — 308, 355, 423
International Alliance of Socialist Democracy — 172, 199, 200, 214, 257
Internationalism of the working-class movement — 61, 173, 259, 405
International Working Men's Association (First International) — 40, 41, 114, 154, 184, 408
— first programme documents — 42, 80-81
— and Paris Commune — 41
— Hague Congress (1872) — 18, 41
— Geneva Congress (1873) — 4-6
— General Council — 43-44, 50, 80, 184
— dissolution of (1876) — 184
— in Austria — 30
— in Belgium — 41
— in England — 10, 29, 41
— in Switzerland — 4-5, 173
— in the USA — 8, 18, 43 See also Bakuninism — and the International Italy — 357

Page me45.590
J

Joint-stock companies — 246, 356
Jurassians — see Bakuninism
Page me45.590
L

Labour
— productive — 209
Languages, linguistics — 74
Lassalleanism, Lassalleans — 43, 49, 60, 62, 65, 70, 95, 96, 97, 100, 118, 297, 402, 403, 413
See also General Association of German Workers; German Social-Democracy; Working-class movement in Germany
Liberal Party (England) — 140, 155, 190, 299 Literature
— German — 136
— Irish — 371
— Russian — 137
Loanable capital — 356
Logic — 122
London — 211, 354-55
Page me45.590
M

Malthusianism — 62, 108
Man — 109, 365
Marx, Karl — 95, 174, 288
— in the 1870s — 64, 122, 189, 205, 258, 275, 276, 383-84, 386, 388, 394, 408, 411-13, 416, 430-31, 447
— application for British naturalisation — 27, 29, 35
See also 'Capital' by Karl Marx; Party, proletarian, socialist; Socialism, scientific; Working-class movement
Materialism — 109, 283, 284, 366
Means of communication — 356
Means of production — 356
Metaphysics — 140 Monarchy — absolute — 260 Monopolies
— state — 308-09
Page me45.590
N

Narodism (Populism) in Russia — see Nihilists National question — and working class — 111, 112
Nature — 106-07
Nihilists — 100, 387
Page me45.590
O

Officials — 63
Owenism — 99, 262
Page me45.590
P

Paris Commune of 1871 — 41, 60
Party, proletarian, socialist — 257, 294, 373, 418, 424, 450
— programme of — 60-65, 72, 294
— theoretical discussions — 406, 430
— theory and practice — 421
— criticism of — 421
— congresses, their functions — 248, 257, 417-18
— internationalism of — 61-62
— and trade unions — 63
— press — 285, 367, 383, 389, 393, 408, 419, 429

Page Break me45.591
— tactics — 60, 69, 154, 373-74, 399

— and representatives of other classes — 407-08, 425
See also German Social-Democracy; Socialism, scientific; Working-class movement
Peasantry — 357-58, 425
People's Party — see German People's Party
Periodical, scientific — 241, 248, 257
Personality cult — 100, 288
Petty bourgeoisie — 61, 393, 405-08
Petty bourgeoisie, German — 61, 223, 351
Petty-bourgeois socialism — see Socialism — petty-bourgeois Philosophy — 452
— German — 407
Physiocrats — 208-09, 452
Poland (Polish lands) — 111, 278, 300
Polish question — 111, 112, 186, 278
Political economy — 265, 328, 452
See also Bourgeois political economy; Classical political economy; Physiocrats; Quesnay's Tableau économique; Vulgar political economy Production
— capitalist — 108, 357
— under communism — 63, 109
Proudhonism — 41, 99
— in Belgium — 42
Prussia — 297, 300, 302 See also Germany
Page me45.591
Q

Quesnay's Tableau économique — 208, 263-65
Page me45.591
R

Railways — 355-57
Reform — 405, 406, 423
Reformism (in socialist movement) — 68, 242-44, 248-51, 259-60, 283, 373, 383, 404-06, 412-13
See also Socialism — petty-bourgeois
Rent — 209
Reproduction — 208
Republic, bourgeois — 239
Revolution — 64, 366, 408
— prospects of, in Europe — see Russia — imminence of revolution, its international significance Revolution of 1848-49 — 406, 430, 431
Revolution, proletarian, socialist — 109, 366, 404, 407, 450
Russia — 100, 167-68, 277, 278, 293, 357
— tsarism as a mainstay of European reaction — 428, 431
— domestic situation — 163, 164, 167, 190, 210, 234, 277, 293, 357, 386-87

— economic crisis — 216
— nobility — 384
— schools, universities — 33, 100, 278
— students — 100, 278
— revolutionary movement, persecution by the authorities — 35, 53, 210, 384
— imminence of revolution, its international significance — 100, 190, 192, 242, 277, 280, 295, 296, 351, 428, 431, 434
— foreign policy, diplomacy — 22, 210, 260, 300-01, 326, 387, 389
— and Germany — 23, 100, 155, 223, 278, 296, 384, 387
See also Army — Russian; Bourgeoisie, Russian; Crimean war, 1853-56; Eastern (Oriental) question, the; Russo-Turkish war, 1877-78
Russo-Turkish war, 1828-29 — 163, 182, 243, 300-03
Russo-Turkish war, 1877-78 — 186, 187, 190, 221, 228, 232, 233, 234, 236-37, 239-42, 245, 247, 249-50, 255, 271-72, 278, 280, 282, 293-97, 300, 302, 323, 326, 384
— Berlin treaty of 1878 — 331
See also Eastern (Oriental) question, the; Serbo-Montenegrin-Turkish war, 1876-77
Page me45.591
S

Science — freedom of — 63
— scientific criticism — 313
See also Periodical, scientific; Philosophy; Political economy; Socialism, scientific; Socialism (theory)
Serbo-Montenegrin-Turkish war, 1876-77 — 130, 140, 296

Page Break me45.592
Slavs — 112, 177
Social crisis — 297, 298
Socialism, scientific — 284, 313, 362, 366, 402, 421, 431
Socialism (theory)
— pre-Marxian — 64, 99
— utopian — 99, 284
— feudal — 99
— bourgeois — 99
— petty-bourgeois — 99, 403-07, 412, 413, 419, 430, 433
— vulgar — 243
See also Communism, Icarian (Cabet's); Owenism; Socialism, scientific; 'True socialism'
Socialist Congress in Ghent, 1877 — 258, 277
Society — 108
— bourgeois — 108-109, 308
— primitive — 109
— eastern — 236
— socialist — 64, 109, 197, 362, 366
State, the — 63-64, 239, 308-09
Strikes — 62, 99, 355, 360

Struggle for existence — 91, 107-09
Surplus value — 209
Switzerland — 64, 401
See also Working-class movement in Switzerland System
— philosophical — 452
Page me45.592
T

Theory and practice
— in the working-class movement — 421
Trade (commerce) — 357
Trade unions — 63
See also Trades unions in Britain
Trades unions in Britain — 6, 299, 360
— and the International — 41
'True socialism' — 243, 407
Turkey — 120, 123, 182, 188, 214, 216, 232, 234, 236, 240-41, 255, 260, 263, 280, 293, 296-300, 331
See also Army — Turkish; Eastern (Oriental) question, the; Fleet — Turkish; Russo-Turkish war, 1828-29; Russo-Turkish war, 1877-78; Serbo-Montenegrin-Turkish war, 1876-77
Page me45.592
U

United States of America, the — 18, 212, 251, 344, 356-58
See also Working-class movement in the USA
US Civil War, 1861-65 — 344, 357
Page me45.592
V

Value — theory of — 260-61
Vienna Congress of 1814-15 — 297, 298
Vulgar political economy — 260-61, 328
Page me45.592
W

Wages — 62, 90
— Lassallean 'iron law of wages' — 62, 65, 97
War(s)
— danger of war in Europe — 18, 30, 100-03, 297, 384, 428, 431
See also Russo-Turkish war, 1877-78;
Serbo-Montenegrin-Turkish war, 1876-77
Women's question, women's movement — 198, 256
Working class — 64, 408, 423

— significance of trade amalgamations — 63
— and national question — 111, 112
See also Internationalism of the working-class movement; Party, proletarian, socialist; Revolution, proletarian, socialist; Working-class movement
Working class in England — 299, 339-42
See also Working-class movement in England
Working class in France — 234, 239, 294
See also Working-class movement in France
Working class in Germany — 6, 61-63
See also Working-class movement in Germany
Working-class movement
— internationalism of — 61, 173, 259, 405
— struggle for democratic rights — see Working-class movement in Belgium;

Page Break me45.593
Working-class movement in France; Working-class movement in Germany — struggle against militarism, annexations and wars — 61, 62, 387, 389, 451
— and representatives of other classes — 407, 408
— in 1849-64 — 41-42
See also International Working Men's Association; Party, proletarian, socialist; Reformism (in socialist movement); Socialist Congress in Ghent, 1877
Working-class movement in Austria — 6, 17, 30
See also International Working Men's Association — in Austria
Working-class movement in Belgium — 30, 156, 184, 199, 214
See also Bakuninism — in Belgium; International Working Men's Association — in Belgium Working-class movement in Bohemia — 30
Working-class movement in Denmark — 41, 121
Working-class movement in England — 6, 17, 29, 41, 156, 157, 184, 360
See also International Working Men's Association — in England; Trades unions in Britain
Working-class movement in France — 18, 26, 29-30, 239, 258, 294, 363, 422
Working-class movement in Germany — 17, 40, 43, 61, 63, 100, 223
See also German Social-Democracy; Lassalleanism, Lassalleans
Working-class movement in Hungary — 157
Working-class movement in Italy — 30, 41, 155, 184, 200, 203, 214
See also Bakuninism — in Italy
Working-class movement in Portugal — 91, 99, 173-74
Working-class movement in Spain — 30, 41, 154, 184, 214
See also Bakuninism — in Spain
Working-class movement in Switzerland — 183, 214, 294-95, 306
See also Bakuninism — in Switzerland; International Working Men's Association — in Switzerland
Working-class movement in the USA — 8, 18, 251, 255

Footnotes

Page me45.3
†a Gertrud and Franziska Kugelmann
Page me45.4
†a Polish name: Wroclaw.
Page me45.4
†b after all, that this is a dry fruit.
Page me45.5
†a See present edition, Vol. 44, pp. 523-25.
Page me45.5
†b Johann Philipp Becker
Page me45.5
†c mountebanks
Page me45.6
†a K. Marx and F. Engels, The Alliance of Socialist Democracy and the International Working Men's Association.
Page me45.6
†b In the original: John.
Page me45.7
†a R.H. Meyer, Der Emancipationskampf des vierten Standes, Vol. 1, Berlin, 1874, p. 120.
Page me45.7
†b K. Marx and F. Engels, The Alliance of Socialist Democracy and the International Working Men's Association.
Page me45.8
†a K. Marx, General Rules and Administrative Regulations of the International Working Men's Association.
Page me45.8
†b F. Engels, 'The English Elections'.
Page me45.8
†c F. Engels, 'The Imperial Military Law. I'.
Page me45.8
†d F. Engels, 'The Imperial Military Law. II'.
Page me45.10
†a K. Marx, General Rules and Administrative Regulations of the International Working Men's Association.
Page me45.10
†b K. Marx and F. Engels, The Alliance of Socialist Democracy and the International Working Men's Association.
Page me45.10
†c See this volume, p. 7.
Page me45.12
†a Further the words 'creditors of the concern' are crossed out in the original.
Page me45.13
†a The sentence remained unfinished.
Page me45.13
†b i.e. 26 March

Page me45.13
†c Marx took treatment at Ramsgate from mid-April to 5 May 1874.
Page me45.14
†a Charles Longuet
Page me45.14
†b Imperial Highness
Page me45.14
†c 'The repetition of this name is even more ridiculous in Russian ears than it is strange in ours. Unless preceded by some distinguishing epithet, the word is as common in Russian as Toinette or Pierrot would be in French.' See F.M. Grimm, Correspondance littéraire, philosophique et critique de Grimm et de Diderot, depuis 1753 jusqu'en 1790, Vol. 11, Paris, 1830, pp. 154-55.
Page me45.14
†d degenerate age
Page me45.15
†a proofs (of the French edition of the first volume of Capital)
Page me45.15
†b nickname of Charles, first-born of Jenny Longuet
Page me45.15
†c As a final titbit
Page me45.15
†d 'Princes would rather be distracted than worshipped; only God has a sense of humour great enough to prevent him from being bored by all the homage he receives.' See F.M. Grimm, Correspondance littéraire, philosophique et critique de Grimm et de Diderot, depuis 1753 jusqu'en 1790, Vol. 7, Paris, 1829, p. 449.
Page me45.15
†e jocular name for Marx
Page me45.16
†a of the French edition of the first volume of Capital
Page me45.16
†b Eduard Gumpert
Page me45.16
†c Marx took treatment at Ramsgate from mid-April to 5 May 1874.
Page me45.16
†d William I
Page me45.16
†e Louis Justin Lahure
Page me45.17
†a Gertrud and Franziska Kugelmann
Page me45.17
†b mountebank
Page me45.17
†c See this volume, pp. 13-14.
Page me45.17
†d Czech name: Karlovy Vary.
Page me45.17

†e of Capital
Page me45.18
†a in a speech on 3 September 1872 (see The Hague Congress of the First International. Minutes and Documents, Progress Publishers, Moscow, 1976, p. 37)
Page me45.18
†b sooner or later
Page me45.18
†c Alexander II
Page me45.18
†d spies
Page me45.18
†e Maria Alexandrovna
Page me45.19
†a Hermann and Rudolf Engels
Page me45.21
†a Gertrud and Franziska Kugelmann
Page me45.22
†a 11 July
Page me45.22
†b Alexander II
Page me45.22
†c See this volume, p. 18.
Page me45.23
†a William I
Page me45.23
†b 17 July
Page me45.24
†a William I
Page me45.24
†b Benjamin Disraeli
Page me45.24
†c See this volume, p. 23.
Page me45.25
†a of the French edition of the first volume of Capital
Page me45.26
†a See present edition, Vol. 35.
Page me45.26
†b Charles Longuet
Page me45.26
†c Eleanor Marx
Page me45.26
†d Eduard Gumpert
Page me45.27
†a Lizzie Burns
Page me45.28
†a Charles Longuet

Page me45.28
†b however, there are extenuating circumstances
Page me45.28
†c of the first volume of Capital
Page me45.28
†d Eduard Gumpert's
Page me45.29
†a Robert Lowe
Page me45.29
†b Eleanor
Page me45.29
†c Elisabeth Anderson-Garrett (see next letter)
Page me45.29
†d Charles
Page me45.29
†e sudden and terrible
Page me45.29
†f See this volume, pp. 11, 12.
Page me45.30
†a B. Becker, Geschichte der Arbeiter-Agitation Ferdinand Lassalle's.
Page me45.30
†b police spies
Page me45.31
†a Charles Longuet
Page me45.31
†b Eleanor Marx
Page me45.31
†c Longuet
Page me45.31
†d Gertrud and Franziska Kugelmann
Page me45.32
†a Eleanor Marx
Page me45.32
†b F. Engels, The Peasant War in Germany.
Page me45.32
†c Longuet
Page me45.33
†a 11 August
Page me45.34
†a F. Engels, The Peasant War in Germany.
Page me45.34
†b 11 August
Page me45.35
†a 'International Bands in the Romagna (From Our Own Correspondent), Rome, August 10', The Daily News, No. 8831, 14 August 1874.
Page me45.35

†b The Evening Standard, 13 August 1874 ('The Internationalist snake has been scotched, not killed...'
Page me45.35
†c The Evening Standard of 13 August 1874 also reported on the arrests in Marseilles, in an item entitled 'The Arrest of Communists at Marseilles'.
Page me45.35
†d Bazaine has escaped. Whereupon — as a MacMahonist retaliation — 80 Communards were arrested in Marseilles.
Page me45.36
†a Ivan Davydovsky
Page me45.36
†b that is to say
Page me45.36
†c instruction in hygiene
Page me45.36
†d Charles, Jenny Longuet's son
Page me45.36
†e Marx's affectionate name for his daughter Jenny, alluding to her dusky appearance — 'schwarz' means black.
Page me45.36
†f jocular name for Marx
Page me45.37
†a 2 September
Page me45.37
†b i.e. water
Page me45.37
†c probably Ferdinand Fleckles
Page me45.37
†d private gentleman
Page me45.37
†e Marx is mistaken. It should be 'the day before yesterday', i.e. 30 August (see Der Sprudel, No. 18, 30 August 1874).
Page me45.38
†a vomiting
Page me45.38
†b Charles Longuet
Page me45.38
†c 30 August
Page me45.39
†a See this volume, pp. 33-34.
Page me45.40
†a But now, O Lord, dismiss me (cf. Luke 2:29).
Page me45.40
†b Ludwig Kugelmann
Page me45.40
†c jocular name for Engels

Page me45.40
†d See this volume, pp. 44-45.
Page me45.40
†e K. Marx, Allgemeine Statuten und Verwaltungs-Verordnungen der Internationalen Arbeiterassoziation (K. Marx, General Rules and Administrative Regulations of the International Working Men's Association).
Page me45.41
†a K. Marx and F. Engels, The Alliance of Socialist Democracy and the International Working Men's Association.
Page me45.41
†b Preamble
Page me45.41
†c K. Marx, Provisional Rules of the Association.
Page me45.42
†a The Times, Nos. 28104, 28105, 28107, 28108, 28109; 10, 11, 14, 15, 16 September 1874 ('The Seventh International Working Men's Congress').
Page me45.43
†a Eleanor
Page me45.43
†b Charles, first-born of Jenny Longuet
Page me45.44
†a See this volume, pp. 11-13.
Page me45.44
†b The account is written on a separate sheet of paper and enclosed with this letter.
Page me45.44
†c K. Marx and F. Engels, The Alliance of Socialist Democracy and the International Working Men's Association.
Page me45.44
†d K. Marx, General Rules and Administrative Regulations of the International Working Men's Association.
Page me45.45
†a 21 September
Page me45.45
†b Liebknecht
Page me45.46
†a then
Page me45.46
†b Gertrud Kugelmann
Page me45.46
†c 13 September
Page me45.47
†a Eleanor
Page me45.47
†b Allgemeine Wiener medizinische Zeitung
Page me45.48

†a Gertrud Kugelmann
Page me45.49
†a Paul Kersten
Page me45.49
†b La Gazette de Bruxelles
Page me45.49
†c Heinrich and Andreas
Page me45.50
†a for my part
Page me45.50
†b Jenny Longuet
Page me45.50
†c Wilhelm Liebknecht
Page me45.50
†d G.W.F. Hegel, Wissenschaft der Logik.
Page me45.50
†e G.W.F. Hegel, Encyclopädie der philosophischen Wissenschaften im Grundrisse, Part I: Die Logik.
Page me45.51
†a See this volume, p. 41.
Page me45.51
†b As for high politics
Page me45.51
†c F. Engels, Refugee Literature.
Page me45.52
†a Peasant War
Page me45.52
†b F. Engels, 'Supplement to the Preface of 1870 for The Peasant War in Germany'.
Page me45.52
†c Lizzie Burns
Page me45.52
†d Otto Meissner
Page me45.53
†a Eleanor
Page me45.53
†b But man proposes and the railway disposes.
Page me45.53
†c [P.L. Lavrov,] Russkoj sotsial'no-revolyutsionnoj molodezhi. Po povodu browyury: Zadachi revolyutsionnoj propagandy v Rossii.'
Page me45.53
†d Pyotr Lavrov
Page me45.53
†e we are quits
Page me45.54

†a 'Der Bankgesetz-Entwurf', Der Volksstaat, Nos. 140 and 141, 2 and 4 December 1874; 'Die Reichsbank oder die Association des Reiches mit dem Kapital', Der Volksstaat, No. 146, 16 December 1874 (both essays were published under the correspondent's sign K-Z).
Page me45.54
†b See the article 'Kulturkampf und Parlamentarismus' (Der Volksstaat, No. 149, 23 December 1874), where J.H. Kirchmann's pamphlet, Ueber Parlamentarische Debatten, was discussed.
Page me45.55
†a Wilhelm Liebknecht's jocular name given to him by Marx's daughters.
Page me45.55
†b See previous letter.
Page me45.56
†a instalments
Page me45.56
†b The International Gazette
Page me45.56
†c Eleanor Marx
Page me45.56
†d of the French translation of the first volume of Capital
Page me45.57
†a Otto Meissner
Page me45.57
†b N.P. Polyakov
Page me45.58
†a the second German edition of the first volume of Capital
Page me45.58
†b instalments
Page me45.58
†c See Capital, Vol. I, Part V, Ch. XVI (present edition, Vol. 35).
Page me45.58
†d Not Ours
Page me45.58
†e Doklad vysochajwe uchrezhdennoj kommissii dlya izsldovaniya nynyewnyago polozheniya sel'skago hozyajstva i sel'skoj proizvoditel'nosti v Rossii; Trudy kommissii, vysochajwe uchrezhdennoj dlya peresmotra sistemy podatej i sborov, Vol. XXII: 'Svod otzyvov gubernskih zemskih sobranij, zemskih uprav i osobyh zemskih kommissij, po proektu preobrazovaniya poduwnoj sistemy sborov, sostavlennomu v ministerstvye finansov', Parts I-III.
Page me45.59
†a The text crossed out before this note reads: 'Answered 16/3/75. Have offered, as soon as I can make them available, 1,000 talers on the same terms as the other contributors but definite decision postponed until after the Congress,†71 so that I shall be entirely uncommitted should it produce a predominantly Lassallean programme and authorities.'
Page me45.61

†a 'Honest men' — members of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party (Eisenachers); 'dishonest' — members of the General Association of German Workers (Lassalleans).
Page me45.61
†b the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71
Page me45.62
†a by Lassalle
Page me45.62
†b [F. Lassalle,] Offnes Antwortschreiben an das Central-Comité zur Berufung eines Allgemeinen Deutschen Arbeitercongresses zu Leipzig.
Page me45.62
†c K. Marx, Capital, Vol. I, Part VII (see present edition, Vol. 35).
Page me45.64
†a K. Marx, The Poverty of Philosophy. Answer to the 'Philosophy of Poverty' by M. Proudhon.
Page me45.64
†b K. Marx and F. Engels, Manifesto of the Communist Party.
Page me45.64
†c commonalty
Page me45.64
†d [M.A. Bakunin,] Gosudarstvennost' i anarhiya (for Marx's notes on this book see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 485-526).
Page me45.65
†a Shakespeare, The Merchant of Venice, Act I, Scene 3.
Page me45.67
†a partner
Page me45.68
†a Mathilde Engels
Page me45.69
†a 'Programm der deutschen Arbeiterpartei', Der Volksstaat, No. 27, 7 March 1875.
Page me45.69
†b [M.A. Bakunin,] Gosudarstvennost' i anarhiya.
Page me45.70
†a after the event
Page me45.73
†a Carl August Schramm
Page me45.74
†a General rule
Page me45.75
†a last instalments
Page me45.75
†b See this volume, p. 73.
Page me45.75
†c L'Indépendance belge
Page me45.76

†a 7 May
Page me45.77
†a See present edition, Vol. 44, pp. 189 and 200.
Page me45.78
†a See present edition, Vol. 25, p. 574.
Page me45.78
†b Rozalia Idelson and her husband Valerian Smirnov
Page me45.79
†a Adolphe Quêst
Page me45.79
†b There follows an undecipherable postscript.
Page me45.79
†c When Marx wrote this letter, he probably did not know that the author of the article, 'The International Working Men's Association', was a woman.
Page me45.79
†d The article was published anonymously in Fraser's Magazine, Nos. LXVII-LXIX, July to September 1875.
Page me45.80
†a translator
Page me45.80
†b traitor
Page me45.80
†c instalments
Page me45.80
†d See present edition, Vol. 6.
Page me45.80
†e E.E. Fribourg, L'Association Internationale des Travailleurs.
Page me45.80
†f K. Marx, 'Inaugural Address of the Working Men's International Association' and 'Provisional Rules of the Association'.
Page me45.80
†g Fraser's Magazine
Page me45.81
†a Cesare Orsini
Page me45.82
†a See this volume, pp. 46-47.
Page me45.82
†b Hop Pole — a hotel in Karlsbad.
Page me45.83
†a Schönbrunn — royal palace and park in Vienna.
Page me45.83
†b in miniature
Page me45.84
†a Mutzelberger
Page me45.86
†a good-bye and farewell

Page me45.86
†b 11 September
Page me45.88
†a 'Heil' in the original, meaning 'salvation' and 'treatment'.
Page me45.88
†b Here: that doctors were in attendance.
Page me45.89
†a 11 September
Page me45.89
†b See next letter.
Page me45.89
†c Marx is referring to his daughter Eleanor.
Page me45.90
†a J.H. Thünen, Der isolirte Staat in Beziehung auf Landwirthschaft und Nationalökonomie, 3rd ed., Part I, Berlin, 1875 (with Preface by the publisher H. Schumacher).
Page me45.90
†b [H. Schumacher,] Johann Heinrich von Thünen. Ein Forscherleben.
Page me45.90
†c the first volume of Capital in German
Page me45.91
†a [P.L. Lavrov,] 'Sotsializm i bor'ba za suwestvovanie', Vpered!, No. 17, 15 (3) September 1875.
Page me45.91
†b See this volume, pp. 106-09.
Page me45.91
†c Valerian Smirnov and his wife Rozalia Idelson
Page me45.92
†a See this volume, pp. 79-81.
Page me45.92
†b K. Marx, The Poverty of Philosophy.
Page me45.92
†c i.e. of the Franco-Prussian War that began in 1870
Page me45.93
†a B. Kraus, Compendium der neueren medicinischen Wissenschaften.
Page me45.93
†b See this volume, p. 91.
Page me45.94
†a This line is written by an unknown person.
Page me45.95
†a K. Marx and F. Engels, Manifesto of the Communist Party.
Page me45.95
†b See this volume, p. 85.
Page me45.96
†a above all Wilhelm Liebknecht and August Bebel
Page me45.97

†a See A. Bebel, Aus meinem Leben, Part II, Stuttgart, 1911, pp. 334-36.
Page me45.97
†b K. Marx and F. Engels, Manifesto of the Communist Party; K. Marx, General Rules and Administrative Regulations of the International Working Men's Association.
Page me45.97
†c K. Marx, Critique of the Cotha Programme.
Page me45.98
†a the Executive Committee of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany
Page me45.98
†b See this volume, p. 85.
Page me45.99
†a See this volume, p. 59.
Page me45.100
†a Karl Kautsky's pen-name
Page me45.100
†b Engels is presumably referring to the following pamphlets that appeared in Berlin in 1875: [Koshelev] A. Kowelev, Nawe polozhenie; Ob obshchinnom zemlevladyenii v Rossii; Obshchaya zemskaya duma v Rossii; [Vasilchikov] A. Basil'chikov, Pis'mo ministru narodnago prosvyeshcheniya grafu Tolstomu; [Samarin and Dmitriev] YU. Samarin i M. Dmitriev, Revolyutsionnyj konservatizm.
Page me45.103
†a old name of Lvov
Page me45.103
†b Eleanor Marx
Page me45.105
†a Paul Engels
Page me45.106
†a Hermann Engels
Page me45.106
†b Mathilde Engels
Page me45.106
†c See this volume, p. 91.
Page me45.106
†d [P.L. Lavrov,] 'Sotsializm i bor'ba za suwestvovanie', Vpered!, No. 17, 15 (3) September 1875.
Page me45.106
†e At last, on my return from a trip to Germany, I have got round to your article which I have just read with great interest. Here are my observations relating to it, written in German and thus enabling me to be more concise.
Page me45.107
†a with a grain of salt
Page me45.107
†b convinced Darwinians (hereinafter Engels quotes Lavrov's article in Latin transcription)
Page me45.108

†a war of all against all (an expression from Th. Hobbes' Elementa philosophica de cive and Leviathan, or the Matter, Form and Power of the Commonwealth Ecclesiastical and Civil. Preface).
Page me45.108
†b man was not simply engaged in a struggle for existence but also for enjoyment and for the intensification of his enjoyment ... was prepared to forego less high for the sake of higher enjoyment (italics by Engels)
Page me45.109
†a that the idea of solidarity as a means of alleviating the struggle might ... finally gain the whole of mankind and pit it, as a fraternal society imbued with solidarity, against the rest of the world of minerals, plants and animals
Page me45.109
†b war of all against all
Page me45.109
†c 17 November. Having again been interrupted, I have today resumed this letter so that it may go off to you. You will have seen that my observations apply rather to the form, to the method, of your attack than to its substance. I hope you will find them sufficiently clear; I wrote them in haste and, upon rereading them, find many words I should like to alter, but I fear to make the manuscript unduly illegible.
Page me45.109
With cordial regards.
Page me45.110
†a the French edition of the first volume of Capital
Page me45.114
†a instalments of
Page me45.114
†b the French edition of the first volume of Capital
Page me45.115
†a New-York Daily Tribune
Page me45.115
†b Hermann Meyer
Page me45.115
†c All yours
Page me45.115
†d See this volume, p. 104.
Page me45.116
†a Plan for plan!
Page me45.118
†a Wilhelm Liebknecht
Page me45.118
†b In short
Page me45.118
†c 'The Revolution in Constantinople', The Daily News, No. 9386, 23 May 1876.
Page me45.119
†a 2 June
Page me45.119

†b Wilhelm Liebknecht
Page me45.120
†a in particular
Page me45.120
†b B. Becker, Geschichte der Revolutionären Pariser Kommune in den Jahren 1789 bis 1794.
Page me45.121
†a 22 May
Page me45.121
†b Benjamin Disraeli
Page me45.121
†c Dmitry Richter
Page me45.122
†a friend
Page me45.122
†b Paraphrased words from Shakespeare's comedy The Merchant of Venice, Act. IV, Scene 1.
Page me45.123
†a Wilhelm Liebknecht
Page me45.123
†b works
Page me45.123
†c Abdul Aziz
Page me45.123
†d See this volume, pp. 120-21.
Page me45.124
†a F. Engels, Anti-Dühring.
Page me45.124
†b 2 June
Page me45.124
†c See this volume, p. 121.
Page me45.124
†d instalments
Page me45.124
†e the French edition of the first volume of Capital
Page me45.125
†a See this volume, p. 115.
Page me45.125
†b jocular name for Wilhelm Liebknecht
Page me45.127
†a Dmitry Richter
Page me45.127
†b See next letter.
Page me45.127
†c Truth comes out in wine.
Page me45.128

†a See next letter.
Page me45.128
†b 'Russian Credit', The Pall Mall Gazette, No. 3529, Vol. XXIII, 10 June 1876.
Page me45.128
†c Dmitry Richter
Page me45.129
†a Truth comes out in wine.
Page me45.129
†b Engels quotes Liebknecht's letter in German.
Page me45.129
†c Thus in the original.
Page me45.130
†a Wilhelm Liebknecht's
Page me45.130
†b See this volume, p. 184.
Page me45.131
†a E. Dühring, Cursus der Philosophie...
Page me45.131
†b expression from Goethe's Faust, Part I, Scene 6 ('Hexenküche')
Page me45.131
†c June in the original
Page me45.131
†d 24 July
Page me45.131
†e i.e. in Engels' house in Regent's Park Road
Page me45.132
†a more or less
Page me45.132
†b 'Bern, 4 iyulya. Pohorony M. A. Bakunina', Vpered!, No. 37, 15 July 1876.
Page me45.132
†c the illustrious
Page me45.132
†d 'Das Begräbniß Bakunin's...', Der Volksstaat, No. 82, 16 July 1876.
Page me45.132
†e Vpered!
Page me45.133
†a See this volume, p. 116.
Page me45.133
†b 4 August
Page me45.133
†c Engels has 'e wohres Laubsal' (dialect).
Page me45.135
†a The correct name is Irrenlohe.
Page me45.136
†a [E. Lasker,] Erlebnisse einer Mannes-Seele
Page me45.137

†a H.J. Gehlsen, Das Buch vom 'großen' Lasker oder Leiden und Freuden einer schönen Mannes-Seele.
Page me45.137
†b Otto Bismarck
Page me45.137
†c Eduard Lasker
Page me45.137
†d [P.L. Lavrov,] 'Gosudarstvennyj element v buduwem obshchestvye, Vpered!, Vol. IV, 1876.
Page me45.138
†a Jenny Longuet
Page me45.138
†b Helene Demuth
Page me45.138
†c Lizzie Burns
Page me45.138
†d Karoline Juta
Page me45.139
†a Jenny Longuet and Laura Lafargue
Page me45.139
†b See this volume, pp. 135-36.
Page me45.139
†c Helene Demuth
Page me45.139
†d market women
Page me45.140
†a E. Dühring, Cursus der Philosophie...
Page me45.140
†b Disraeli
Page me45.140
†c White Tsar (Alexander II)
Page me45.141
†a 22 August
Page me45.141
†b Karoline Juta
Page me45.141
†c See this volume, pp. 135-37.
Page me45.143
†a Jean Longuet
Page me45.143
†b Cf. 'Good speed to thy valour, O youth!', Virgil, Aeneid, IX, 641.
Page me45.144
†a But business is business.
Page me45.144
†b the adventures in Norderney
Page me45.144

†c Eleanor Marx
Page me45.145
†a 10 September
Page me45.145
†b presumably Ferdinand Fleckles
Page me45.145
†c Eleanor Marx
Page me45.145
†d 13 September
Page me45.146
†a Eleanor Marx
Page me45.146
†b but she had a narrow squeak
Page me45.147
†a 15 September
Page me45.147
†b See this volume, p. 134.
Page me45.147
†c Vladimir Dekhterev
Page me45.147
†d Ivan Chernyshev
Page me45.147
†e Grigory Gurevich
Page me45.147
†f Lavrov
Page me45.148
†a Engels quotes Liebknecht's letter in German.
Page me45.148
†b Eleanor Marx
Page me45.149
†a First
Page me45.151
†a [P.O.] Lissagaray, Histoire de la Commune de 1871.
Page me45.151
†b B. Becker, Geschichte und Theorie der Pariser revolutionären Kommune des Jahres 1871.
Page me45.152
†a absolute authority
Page me45.152
†b all rights reserved
Page me45.153
†a presumably from Henri Oriol
Page me45.153
†b the French edition of the first volume of Capital
Page me45.153
†c See this volume, p. 440.

Page me45.153
†d Ibid., p. 92.
Page me45.153
†e E. de Laveleye, 'Le socialisme contemporain en Allemagne. I. Les théoriciens', Revue des deux Mondes, Vol. 17, Paris, 1876.
Page me45.153
†f dreadful to relate
Page me45.154
†a [P.L. Lavrov,] 'Russkie pered yuzhno-slavyanskim voprosom', Vpered!, No. 42, 1 October 1876.
Page me45.154
†b jocular name for Wilhelm Liebknecht
Page me45.154
†c from Adolf Müllner's drama Die Schuld, Act II, Scene 5
Page me45.154
†d Anti-Dühring
Page me45.154
†e Dialectics of Nature
Page me45.155
†a See this volume, pp. 149-52.
Page me45.155
†b There is no longer a Europe!
Page me45.155
†c Carol I
Page me45.155
†d and which is truly 'the shame of Europe' (an allusion to É. de Girardin's pamphlet La Honte de l'Europe)
Page me45.155
†e and whoever else there may be
Page me45.156
†a For the rest, I consider. These are the initial words of Cato the Elder's famous expression: 'Caeterum censeo Carthaginem esse delendam' (For the rest, I consider that Carthage must be destroyed).
Page me45.156
†b See this volume, p. 184.
Page me45.156
†c Presumably Leopold Sonnemann.
Page me45.157
†a Arbeiter-Wochen-Chronik
Page me45.157
†b Histoire de la Commune de 1871
Page me45.158
†a See this volume, p. 156.
Page me45.158
†b 'The Bulgarian Insurrection', The Diplomatic Review, Vol. XXIV, No. 4, October 1876.

Page me45.160
†a Hermann Engels
Page me45.162
†a Polish name: Wroclaw.
Page me45.162
†b of Capital
Page me45.162
†c that the Russian commune would make its way round the world
Page me45.163
†a [H.K.B.] von Moltke, Der russisch-türkische Feldzug in der europäischen Türkei 1828 und 1829.
Page me45.163
†b See this volume, p. 154.
Page me45.164
†a Grazhdanin (Citizen)
Page me45.164
†b 27 October
Page me45.165
†a Emil Blank
Page me45.165
†b See this volume, p. 161.
Page me45.166
†a [P.O.] Lissagaray, Histoire de la Commune de 1871 (sec this volume, pp. 149-50 and 152).
Page me45.166
†b See this volume, pp. 151-52.
Page me45.166
†c Ibid., pp. 173-74.
Page me45.167
†a explanations
Page me45.167
†b Ivan Novikov
Page me45.167
†c Yevgeny Novikov
Page me45.167
†d are characteristic of the Russian intrigantes
Page me45.169
†a 'The Russians in Turkestan', The Daily News, No. 9521, 27 October 1876.
Page me45.169
†b 'The Russians in Turkestan', The Daily News, No. 9523, 30 October 1876.
Page me45.169
†c W.E. Gladstone, 'Russian Policy and Deeds in Turkistan', The Contemporary Review, Vol. XXVIII, London, June-November 1876.
Page me45.169
†d now Vilnius
Page me45.169

†e Alexander II
Page me45.172
†a what the French-speaking socialists think
Page me45.174
†a [Notice about the forthcoming congress of Portuguese socialists on 5 January 1877.] Die Tagwacht, No. 96, 2 December 1876.
Page me45.174
†b J. Ph. Becker, Neue Stunden der Andacht.
Page me45.174
†c F. Engels, Anti-Dühring.
Page me45.175
†a A Warning
Page me45.175
†b Deleted in the original: 'thus winning his law-suit'.
Page me45.176
†a For the details see K. Marx, Herr Vogt (present edition, Vol. 17, pp. 125-27).
Page me45.176
†b K. Marx, 'Prosecution of the Augsburg Gazette' (ibid., pp. 10-11).
Page me45.176
†c Cf. present edition, Vol. 17, pp. 319-20.
Page me45.177
†a Cf. the corresponding passage in Weber's opera Der Freischütz (libretto by Friedrich Kind), Act II, Scene 6.
Page me45.177
†b See present edition, Vol. 17, p. 111 ff.
Page me45.179
†a to show
Page me45.179
†b that the alliance between England and Russia already exists
Page me45.179
†c How gauche these English are!
Page me45.179
†d The Fortnightly Review, Vol. XX, London, 1 July-1 December 1876.
Page me45.180
†a Ida Pauli
Page me45.180
†b Lizzie Burns
Page me45.180
†c 20 December
Page me45.182
†a Schaaffhausen Bank Association
Page me45.182
†b Bulgarian names: Ruse, Silistra, Varna, Shumen (now Kolarovgrad).
Page me45.182
†c [H.K.B.] von Moltke, Der russisch-türkische Feldzug in der europäischen Türkei 1828 und 1829.

Page me45.182
†d 1836 in the original
Page me45.183
†a Emma Engels
Page me45.183
†b See this volume, p. 174.
Page me45.184
†a K. Marx and F. Engels, The Alliance of Socialist Democracy and the International Working Men's Association (see present edition, Vol. 23, pp. 499-501).
Page me45.184
†b informer
Page me45.185
†a Yelizaveta Tomanovskaya
Page me45.185
†b Ivan Davydovsky
Page me45.186
†a First
Page me45.186
†b F. Engels, Anti-Dühring, Part I.
Page me45.186
†c The word in parentheses was probably inserted by Liebknecht.
Page me45.187
†a 6 January 1877
Page me45.187
†b Hermann Friedrich and Rudolf Moritz Engels
Page me45.189
†a Isolde Kurz
Page me45.189
†b See this volume, p. 172.
Page me45.189
†c yes or no
Page me45.189
†d Andreas and Heinrich Scheu
Page me45.190
†a Eleanor Marx
Page me45.190
†b some John Bull or other
Page me45.191
†a Alexander II
Page me45.191
†b A play on words by Marx: 'Freund' = friend.
Page me45.191
†c Eleanor Marx
Page me45.192
†a F. Engels, Dialectics of Nature.
Page me45.194

†a M. Block, Les théoriciens du socialisme en Allemagne. Extrait du 'Journal des Économistes'.
Page me45.194
†b É. de Laveleye, 'Le socialisme contemporain en Allemagne. I. Les théoriciens', Revue des deux Mondes, Vol. 17, Paris, 1876.
Page me45.195
†a See Engels' article 'Prussian Schnapps in the Reichstag'.
Page me45.197
†a Lizzie Burns
Page me45.198
†a K. Marx and F. Engels, The Alliance of Socialist Democracy and the International Working Men's Association.
Page me45.198
†b just like at home (a modified phrase from Nolant de Fatouville's comedy Arlequin, empereur dans la lune; 'tout comme ici' (just as here) is the stock response made by the people listening to Harlequin's inventions about life on the moon)
Page me45.199
†a formal
Page me45.199
†b was a secret agent of Bignami's who gave him three lire a day.
Page me45.199
†c class governments' secret funds
Page me45.199
†d See La Plebe, 21 January 1877.
Page me45.199
†e non-class governments
Page me45.199
†f secret funds
Page me45.199
†g we are familiar with
Page me45.199
†h edified
Page me45.199
†i ingenuous
Page me45.199
†j from the name of St. Ignatius of Loyola, i.e. Jesuitical
Page me45.199
†k Honest folk won't take very long to size it up.
Page me45.199
†l We likewise believe that we shall, by this means, achieve the emancipation of the proletariat more promptly and more thoroughly than if we were to stand for years and generations baying at the moon and waiting until Mother Revolution should deign to come and break the workers' chains.
Page me45.200
†a Federation of Northern Italy
Page me45.200

†b intends to fight on the terrain of universal suffrage
Page me45.200
†c James Guillaume
Page me45.202
†a Caroline Schöler
Page me45.202
†b 13 March
Page me45.203
†a See previous letter.
Page me45.203
†b Northern Italy
Page me45.203
†c See this volume, pp. 198-200.
Page me45.203
†d Caroline Schöler
Page me45.203
†e 5 March
Page me45.204
†a summary (of the first volume of Capital).
Page me45.204
†b See this volume, p. 194.
Page me45.205
†a 13 March
Page me45.206
†a Clara Collet
Page me45.206
†b Collet Dobson Collet's
Page me45.206
†c See this volume, p. 203.
Page me45.206
†d E. Dühring, Cursus der National- und Socialökonomie...
Page me45.206
†e twaddle
Page me45.206
†f homilies
Page me45.206
†g See previous letter.
Page me45.207
†a Wilhelm Liebknecht
Page me45.207
†b minds that are narrow and anarchic and at the same time — monstrous contradiction this — dictatorial
Page me45.208
†a D. Hume, Essays and Treatises on Several Subjects, Vol. I, Dublin, 1779, pp. 303-04.
Page me45.208

†b E. Dühring, Cursus der National- und Socialökonomie....
Page me45.208
†c 'Annual reproduction is a process very easy to comprehend provided one considers only the funds of annual production. But all elements of the latter have to pass through the market. It is there that the movements of capital and revenue meet, intermingle and lose themselves in a general interchange — the circulation of social wealth — which confuses the eye of the beholder and presents problems of great complexity to the analyst. It is greatly to the credit of the Physiocrats that they should have been the first to attempt to give, in their tobleau économique, a picture of annual reproduction as it is when it emerges from circulation. In many respects their exposé is closer to the truth than that of their successors.'
Page me45.209
†a productive labour
Page me45.209
†b 'Indeed, classical political economy has always, whether instinctively or consciously, maintained that it was in the nature of productive labour to provide surplus value. The further it carries its analysis of surplus value, the more its definitions of productive labour change. The Physiocrats, for example, declare agricultural labour alone to be productive. And why? Because it alone provides surplus value which, for them, exists only in the form of rent.'
Page me45.209
†c 'independent and disposable wealth which he ... has not bought and which he sells'
Page me45.209
†d Very well.
Page me45.210
†a C. Gambuzzi, Sulla tomba di Giuseppe Fanelli.
Page me45.210
†b the same
Page me45.210
†c See K. Marx and F. Engels, The Alliance of Socialist Democracy and the International Working Men's Association (see present edition, Vol. 23, p. 497).
Page me45.210
†d Keyes O'Clery
Page me45.211
†a Frederick Engels
Page me45.211
†a By nursery (Kinderstube) Heine called Germany in his poem 'Zur Beruhigung' (in Zeitgedichte).
Page me45.212
†b the eighth section — 'Le procés d'accumulation du capital' — of the French edition of the first volume of Capital
Page me45.213
†a [P.L. Lavrov,] 'La justice en Russie', Vanity Fair, Vol. XVII, 14 April 1877.
Page me45.214

†a J. Ph. Becker und Ch. Essellen, Geschichte der süddeutschen Mai-Revolution des Jahres 1849.
Page me45.214
†b See present edition, Vol. 24.
Page me45.215
†a J. Ph. Becker, 'Abgerissene Bilder aus meinem Leben'.
Page me45.215
†b Lizzie Burns
Page me45.215
†c Ida Pauli
Page me45.217
†a Isolde Kurz
Page me45.218
†a See next letter.
Page me45.218
†b expropriation of all the prime necessities
Page me45.219
†a Phaedrus, Fables ('The Bald Man and the Fly').
Page me45.221
†a Should be: 27.
Page me45.222
†a Short for 'Anmerkung des Verfassers' — author's note.
Page me45.223
†a See this volume, p. 227.
Page me45.223
†b break out
Page me45.226
†a by Shakespeare
Page me45.227
†a Adolphe Quêst
Page me45.227
†b See this volume, pp. 217-20.
Page me45.228
†a Calafat, Giurgevo and Calarashi — the Romanian names of the towns on the left bank of the Danube; Vidin, Rustchuk (Ruse) and Silistria (Silistra) — the Bulgarian names of the towns on the right bank of the Danube.
Page me45.229
†a Hoffmann and Immhof
Page me45.232
†a 1 June
Page me45.233
†a Alexander II
Page me45.233
†b rash act
Page me45.233
†c In short

Page me45.234
†a marvellous to say
Page me45.234
†b 'Peace Rumours' and 'The New French Ministry', The Times, No. 28956, 31 May 1877.
Page me45.234
†c Alexander II
Page me45.235
†a fighting men
Page me45.235
†b here 'last remnants'
Page me45.235
†c that this time it's the bourgeoisie's affair
Page me45.235
†d shopkeepers'
Page me45.235
†e state of siege
Page me45.235
†f legal responsibility
Page me45.235
†g constitutional irresponsibility
Page me45.235
†h Jean Longuet
Page me45.236
†a Volks-Kalender
Page me45.237
†a See this volume, p. 228.
Page me45.237
†b Romanian name: Constanta.
Page me45.238
†a Die Zukunft
Page me45.239
†a Now it's up to you, Messrs bourgeois, put up your stake!
Page me45.240
†a Johannes Wedde
Page me45.240
†b Modern Turkish name: Dogubayazid
Page me45.241
†a Bulgarian name: Plovdiv
Page me45.242
†a Die Neue Gesellschaft
Page me45.242
†b This refers to the siege of Paris by the Prussians during the Franco-Prussian war of 1870-71.
Page me45.243
†a See this volume, p. 241.

Page me45.243
†b Wilhelm Liebknecht
Page me45.243
†c cell
Page me45.243
†d W. Liebknecht, 'Das Ketzergericht in Berlin', Vorwärts, No. 80, 11 July 1877; 'Die Rothen wider die Blauen. I-II', Vorwärts, Nos. 80 and 81, 11 and 13 July 1877.
Page me45.245
†a Braunschweiger Volksfreund
Page me45.245
†b One man proposes, the other disposes.
Page me45.245
†c first of all
Page me45.245
†d Helene Demuth
Page me45.245
†e variety becomes the body (an expression traced back to Euripides' tragedy Orestes, 234).
Page me45.246
†a up to the mark
Page me45.246
†b researches
Page me45.246
†c Cf. Luke 23:31
Page me45.246
†d brawlers
Page me45.246
†e Here I am, here I remain.
Page me45.246
†f That's enough
Page me45.246
†g Shit!
Page me45.247
†a Presumably Westphälische Volkszeitung.
Page me45.247
†b is reaping what he has sown (Bible, The Wisdom of Solomon 11:7).
Page me45.247
†c See this volume, pp. 252-53.
Page me45.247
†d What impudence!
Page me45.247
†e brain-waves
Page me45.248
†a See previous letter.
Page me45.248
†b We must hope for the best.

Page me45.249
†a See this volume, pp. 256-58.
Page me45.249
†b From 'Kurzweil', a poem included in the collection Des Knaben Wunderhorn compiled by A. von Arnim and C. Brentano.
Page me45.249
†c Bulgarian names: Shumen (now Kolarovgrad) and Ruse.
Page me45.249
†d Bulgarian name: Yambol.
Page me45.249
†e Turkish name: Edirne.
Page me45.249
†f Bulgarian name: Svishtov.
Page me45.250
†a Abdul Hamid II
Page me45.250
†b 22 July
Page me45.250
†c love letter (see previous letter)
Page me45.251
†a Rutherford Birchard Hayes
Page me45.251
†b after the event
Page me45.251
†c Paul Armand Challemel-Lacour
Page me45.251
†d timely wound
Page me45.251
†e honours list
Page me45.251
†f As to
Page me45.252
†a Anne Louise Germaine de Staël
Page me45.252
†b i.e. to the Zukunft editorial board (see previous letter)
Page me45.252
†c to Engels in Ramsgate (see previous letter)
Page me45.252
†d Vossische Zeitung
Page me45.252
†e saith
Page me45.252
†f C. Knies, Geld und Credit, Part I: 'Das Geld', Berlin, 1873, p. 119.
Page me45.252
†g Die Zukunft
Page me45.253

†a Die Neue Gesellschaft
Page me45.255
†a See this volume, pp. 257-580.
Page me45.255
†b C. Knies, Geld und Credit. Part I: 'Das Geld'.
Page me45.255
†c E. Dühring, Cursus der National- und Socialökonomie..., Leipzig, 1876, p. 27.
Page me45.256
†a See next letter.
Page me45.257
†a Michel Élie Reclus
Page me45.258
†a A mistake: Wiede wrote to Engels on 10 July 1877.
Page me45.258
†b Die Neue Gesellschaft (see this volume, pp. 253-54).
Page me45.258
†c 28 July
Page me45.259
†a humbug
Page me45.259
†b in earnest
Page me45.259
†c Belgian Liberté
Page me45.259
†d Michel Élie Reclus (an ironical comparison of Élisée and Élie Reclus with the twin brothers Castor and Pollux.
Page me45.259
†e all the rest
Page me45.259
†f Cf. F. von Schiller's drama Wilhelm Tell, Act II, Scene 1.
Page me45.260
†a F. Mehring, Zur Geschichte der deutschen Sozialdemokratie.
Page me45.260
†b [F. Mehring,] Herr von Treitschke der Sozialistentödter und die Endziele des Liberalismus.
Page me45.260
†c A slip of the pen; should read: 'second'.
Page me45.260
†d Theory of Price Fluctuation
Page me45.260
†e Marx gives a free rendering of Kaufman's text; italics by Marx.
Page me45.260
†f [Kaufman] I. I. Kaufman, Teoriya kolebaniya tsyen, Kharkov, 1867, p. 123.
Page me45.261
†a Henry and Charles Juta
Page me45.261

†b Johann Carl Juta
Page me45.261
†c See this volume, p. 241.
Page me45.263
†a As for
Page me45.263
†b W.L. Sargant, Robert Owen, and His Social Philosophy.
Page me45.263
†c Presumably R. Owen. The Marriage System of the New Moral World.
Page me45.263
†d Probably [R. Owen,] The Life of Robert Owen, Vol. I and A Supplementary Appendix to the First Volume of The Life of Robert Owen, Vol. I.A.
Page me45.263
†e G. Hubbard, Saint-Simon, sa vie et ses travaux.
Page me45.263
†f William I
Page me45.263
†g Hassan Cheirullah was replaced by Kara Chalil
Page me45.263
†h farmers' annual advances
Page me45.264
†a productive class (farmers and their labourers)
Page me45.264
†b original advances
Page me45.264
†c means of subsistence
Page me45.264
†d raw materials
Page me45.264
†e advances of the sterile class
Page me45.264
†f wage
Page me45.265
†a stock of money
Page me45.266
†a Isolde Kurz
Page me45.267
†a spa rooms
Page me45.267
†b commencement of operation
Page me45.268
†a See this volume, p. 245.
Page me45.268
†b We shall see.
Page me45.269
†a Eleanor Marx

Page me45.271
†a Jean Longuet
Page me45.271
†b 28 August
Page me45.272
†a J.G. von Herder, Cid, Canto 28.
Page me45.274
†a A slip of the pen: 16 September was a Sunday.
Page me45.275
†a Father, I have sinned (Luke 15:18).
Page me45.276
†a Re
Page me45.277
†a Adam Weiler
Page me45.278
†a Alexander II
Page me45.278
†b Prince Alexander Alexandrovich (future Emperor Alexander III)
Page me45.278
†c by the rules of the game
Page me45.278
†d and then there'll be a fine how-do-you-do.
Page me45.280
†a See this volume, pp. 187-88.
Page me45.280
†b Abdul Hamid II's
Page me45.280
†c Emma Engels
Page me45.280
†d Probably Philipp Pauli
Page me45.281
†a See this volume, p. 279.
Page me45.282
†a See this volume, pp. 276-77.
Page me45.284
†a Enough is as good as a feast!
Page me45.285
†a Isolde Kurz
Page me45.285
†b Karl Höchberg
Page me45.285
†c See also previous letter.
Page me45.286
†a by Moses Hess
Page me45.288
†a The familiar form of address in German: 'Dir' — 'Thee'.

Page me45.288
†b you (as opposed to 'Du')
Page me45.288
†c Isolde Kurz
Page me45.288
†d suppression of the state
Page me45.288
†e [P.O.] Lissagaray, Histoire de la Commune de 1871.
Page me45.288
†f K. Marx, The Civil War in France.
Page me45.288
†g H. Heine, Lyrisches Intermezzo, 'Ich grolle nicht...'.
Page me45.289
†a Capital
Page me45.289
†b Ever yours
Page me45.292
†a See this volume, pp. 262-63.
Page me45.292
†b former
Page me45.293
†a Marx is rendering a passage from Th. Hobbes, Leviathan, or the Matter, Form and Power of the Commonwealth Ecclesiastical and Civil.
Page me45.293
†b First of all
Page me45.294
†a See this volume, p. 214.
Page me45.294
†b George Allen
Page me45.295
†a F. Engels, Anti-Dühring.
Page me45.296
†a Abdul Hamid II
Page me45.298
†a Dans le royaume des aveugles les borgnes sont rois — In the kingdom of the blind the one-eyed is King.
Page me45.298
†b The Earl of Derby (see also this volume, p. 296).
Page me45.299
†a See this volume, p. 296.
Page me45.299
†b to the greater glory
Page me45.299
†c Alexander II
Page me45.300
†a horrible to say

Page me45.300
†b [H.K.B.] von Moltke. Der russisch-türkische Feldzug in der europäischen Türkei 1828 und 1829.
Page me45.301
†a In the original 'im Siegerkranz'. 'Heil dir im Siegerkranz' — the initial words of the Prussian National Anthem written by Balthasar Gerhard Schumacher on the basis of Heinrich Harries' poem Lied für den dänischen Unterihan.
Page me45.301
†b Bulgarian names: Silistra and Shumen (now Kolarovgrad).
Page me45.301
†c Mahmud II
Page me45.301
†d F.C.F. Müffling, Aus meinem Leben, Berlin, 1851, p. 303.
Page me45.301
†e Pertev Reis Effendi
Page me45.301
†f Heinrich VII of Reuss
Page me45.302
†a Mehmed Sadek
Page me45.302
†b Turkish name: Edirne.
Page me45.302
†c Romanian name: Giurgiu.
Page me45.302
†d Moldavia and Wallachia
Page me45.302
†e Nicholas I
Page me45.303
†a See present edition, Vol. 17, p. 146.
Page me45.303
†b In Liebknecht's pamphlet, there follows a passage of which it has not been established whether it is part of Marx's letter or is by Liebknecht himself. It reads: 'Inside Russia the situation is confused. The gentle Alexander intends to build a penal establishment in Novaya Zemlya to which political offenders will be banished, and that means la mort sans phrase — death, pure and simple. It would be a good thing if peace were to reign for the next year or two. In particular this would be conducive to internal decay in Russia. The government's first move there (following the example of Prussia after 1815) would be to persecute pan-Slav agitators.†387 In so far as it was necessary, they have been exploited; the day of reckoning will come when the turmoil of war has ceased.'
Page me45.304
†a O. Glagau, Der Börsen- und Gründungs-Schwindel in Deutschland.
Page me45.304
†b R. Meyer, Politische Gründer und die Corruption in Deutschland.
Page me45.304
†c F. Perrot, Der Bank-, Börsen- und Actienschwindel.

Page me45.304
†d [Kaufman] I. I. Kaufman, Teoriya i praktika bankovago dla
Page me45.304
†e I. I. Kaufman, Istoriya bankovago dyela v Velikobritanii i Irlandii.
Page me45.305
†a Presumably Carl Hirsch.
Page me45.305
†b Vperyod! (Forward!)
Page me45.306
†a See next letter.
Page me45.306
†b From February 1878 Lopatin stayed in Montreux.
Page me45.306
†c Bulletin de la Fédération jurassienne de l'Association Internationale des Travailleurs
Page me45.306
†d F. Engels, The Workingmen of Europe in 1877.
Page me45.306
†e F. Engels, Anti-Dühring, Part III.
Page me45.306
†f in the federal army
Page me45.307
†a Vperyod! (Forward!)
Page me45.308
†a Cf. F. Engels, Anti-Dühring, Part III, Ch. II (present edition, Vol. 25, p. 265).
Page me45.309
†a F. Engels, Anti-Dühring, Part III.
Page me45.310
†a Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung
Page me45.310
†b Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt
Page me45.311
†a See previous letter.
Page me45.311
†b K. Marx, F. Engels, Herr Bucher.
Page me45.312
†a K. Marx, 'Reply to Bucher's “Declaration”'.
Page me45.312
†b what is to be done?
Page me45.312
†c K. Marx, 'Mr. George Howell's History of the International Working Men's Association'.
Page me45.314
†a It's not so bad
Page me45.315
†a Cacking isn't painting.

Page me45.315
†b Frederick III
Page me45.315
†c not to pay twice for the same thing
Page me45.315
†d See this volume, pp. 364-65.
Page me45.316
†a Ida Pauli
Page me45.316
†b See this volume, pp. 312-13.
Page me45.316
†c Ibid., p. 307.
Page me45.316
†d Nachalo (The Beginning)
Page me45.317
†a E. Haeckel, Freie Wissenschaft und freie Lehre, Stuttgart, 1878, pp. 3-4. Engels quotes from Haeckel in German.
Page me45.317
†b lovingly
Page me45.317
†c In the original: 'Naturforscherver-sammlung'.
Page me45.317
†d Elard Biscamp
Page me45.317
†e See this volume, p. 312.
Page me45.318
†a Jean Longuet
Page me45.318
†b See this volume, pp. 276-77.
Page me45.319
†a Lizzie Burns
Page me45.320
†a Lizzie Burns
Page me45.320
†b Jean Longuet
Page me45.321
†a 20 September (see this volume, p. 332).
Page me45.321
†b reigning princess
Page me45.321
†c Probably Henry Longuet.
Page me45.322
†a Jean Longuet's
Page me45.322
†b A punning reference to the name Eulenburg, 'Eulen' = owls, and 'to take owls to Athens', the equivalent of carrying coals to Newcastle.

Page me45.322
†c It has been proved.
Page me45.322
†d To put outside the law
Page me45.322
†e 15 September
Page me45.324
†a thought that up (an allusion to Figaro's words from Beaumarchais' La folle journée, ou le mariage de Figaro, Act V, Scene 8: 'Ah, Figaro, pends-toi; tu n'as pas deviné celui-lá!')
Page me45.325
†a together
Page me45.325
†b Jean Longuet
Page me45.326
†a No. 249 of 7 September 1878
Page me45.326
†b the address of the Vorwärts editorial board
Page me45.326
†c Jean Longuet
Page me45.328
†a Foreigners who visit our country, etc., must submit to the laws of the Frrrench Re-pu-blic.
Page me45.328
†b The Daily Telegraph
Page me45.329
†a K. Marx, Capital, Vol. I, Part I, Ch. II (present edition, Vol. 35).
Page me45.329
†b A. Samter, Die Reform des Geldwesens, Berlin, 1869, p. 62.
Page me45.329
†c [J. Marx,] 'Vom Londoner Theater', Frankfurter Zeitung und Handelsblatt, 25 May 1877.
Page me45.329
†d W.R.S. Ralston, 'Russian Revolutionary Literature', The Nineteenth Century, Vol. I. No. 3, May 1877.
Page me45.330
†a Engels' London address
Page me45.331
†a See this volume, pp. 327-28.
Page me45.331
†b Ibid., p. 328.
Page me45.331
†c The Daily Telegraph
Page me45.332
†a man of action
Page me45.332

†b more or less
Page me45.332
†c Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Deutschen Reichstags. 4. Legislaturperiode. I. Session 1878, Vol. I, Berlin, 1878, pp. 29-91.
Page me45.332
†d Bismarck's
Page me45.332
†e argument based on facts
Page me45.332
†f 20 September
Page me45.332
†g the street in London where the Longuets lived
Page me45.332
†h Moritz Kaufmann
Page me45.332
†i on the agenda
Page me45.332
†j high politics
Page me45.333
†a See this volume, p. 332.
Page me45.333
†b In the meantime
Page me45.333
†c K. Marx, The Civil War in France.
Page me45.335
†a 'stock-exchange speculation during the Gründerjahre' (a play on the title of Glagau's work Der Börsen- und Gründungs-Schwindel in Deutschland).
Page me45.335
†b F. Engels, Anti-Dühring.
Page me45.337
†a See this volume, p. 327.
Page me45.337
†b Karl Kaub
Page me45.338
†a M. Barry, 'Les socialistes et le gouvernement', La Marseillaise, No. 198, 2 October 1878.
Page me45.338
†b 'Die Verhaftungen in Paris', Vorwärts, No. 109, 15 September 1878.
Page me45.339
†a The following sentence is crossed out in the manuscript: 'And you find it strange that MR Barry did not reply publicly to the accusations secretly directed against him?
Page me45.339
†b The following passage is crossed out in the manuscript: 'As for me, I know very well whence all this tittle-tattle about MR Barry comes. It is spread by some intriguers from the so-called INTERNATIONAL LABOUR LEAGUE†444 which is actually neither “international” nor a “LABOUR LEAGUE”. They have a grudge against Barry because at the International Congress at The Hague (1872)†20 he shared the opinion of the vast majority of the General Council against these gentlemen, etc.'

Page me45.340
†a La Marseillaise, No. 202, 6 October 1878.
Page me45.341
†a T. Karcher, Les écrivains militaires de la France.
Page me45.341
†b There is no point 6 in Marx's draft.
Page me45.341
†c The following passage is crossed out in the manuscript: 'First of all, rightly or wrongly, The National Reformer exercises no influence on English public opinion. Again, MR Barry was a member of the General Council of the International when the latter publicly denounced MR Bradlaugh as a “Bonapartist”: his connections (in London) with Plon-Plon earned him widespread notoriety; as to his intimacy with the “PETTY COAT” diplomacy of the Bonapartist party (in London),†448 Citizen Leblanc can enlighten you; finally his interviews with Bonapartists in Paris were described by me at the time in a London paper,†449 a time when Longuet, Serraillier, etc., and other French refugees were publicly condemning the man who dared to reprint the infamous comments in the Bonapartist and gutter press upon the expatriate Communards; when he was publicly dressed down even by men such as Hales, Jung, etc., who now keep company with him in the so-called “INTERNATIONAL LABOUR LEAGUE”, for his attacks on the International. Remembering all this, MR Barry could well afford to ignore Bradlaugh's scurrilous articles in The National Reformer.'
Page me45.343
†a Presumably a reference to Danielson's letter of 7 March 1877.
Page me45.343
†b simplify
Page me45.343
†c See this volume, p. 346.
Page me45.343
†d Nikolai Mikhailovsky
Page me45.343
†e Otechestvennyya Zapiski.
Page me45.344
†a The passage from here to the words 'Only this improvement' was written in French in the English original.
Page me45.344
†b A. Williams (Marx' pseudonym).
Page me45.345
†a See this volume, pp. 165, 171.
Page me45.346
†a Sbornik gosudarstvennyh znanij, vols V and VI, 1878, containing B.N. Chicherin's articles 'Nmetskie sotsialisty: I. Lassal'' and 'Nyemetskie sotsialisty: II. Karl Marks', and A. Chuprov's book ZHelyeznodorozhnoe hozyajstvo, Vol. II.
Page me45.346

†b Here and below Marx quotes from the French edition of Capital in French.
Page me45.347
†a Marx's pseudonym
Page me45.347
†b See this volume, p. 345.
Page me45.348
†a '(From Our Own Correspondent. The Socialist Movement. Berne, Dec. 11)', The Times, No. 29436, 12 December 1878.
Page me45.349
†a F. Engels, Anti-Dühring.
Page me45.349
†b H. Greulich, Der Staat vom sozialdemokratischen Standpunkte aus. Eine Auseinandersetzung mit den Anarchisten.
Page me45.350
†a The words in square brackets were added by the compiler of the catalogue presumably because the name was illegible in the original.
Page me45.350
†b Probably Carl Schorlemmer.
Page me45.351
†a See this volume, p. 348.
Page me45.352
†a William I
Page me45.352
†b yes or no
Page me45.353
†a Freiheit
Page me45.353
†b See this volume, p. 312.
Page me45.354
†a this is in strict confidence
Page me45.354
†b of Capital
Page me45.354
†c branch
Page me45.355
†a See Marx' letter to Danielson of 12 December 1880 (present edition, Vol. 46).
Page me45.356
†a George Allen
Page me45.356
†b consummation of business
Page me45.357
†a common people
Page me45.358
†a [Kaufman] I. I. Kaufman, Teoriya i praktika bankovago dyela.
Page me45.358
†b the point of view of an expert

Page me45.358
†c Marx's pseudonym
Page me45.359
†a Marx is presumably referring to the tenth instalment of the French edition of his Capital.
Page me45.359
†b R. Meyer, Politische Gründer und die Corruption in Deutschland.
Page me45.361
†a See previous letter.
Page me45.361
†b Cf. this volume, pp. 257-58.
Page me45.362
†a See this volume, pp. 253-54.
Page me45.362
†b Die Zukunft. Socialistische Revue. Prospect. See also Höchberg's leading article, 'Der Socialismus und die Wissenschaft', published in 1877 in the first issue of the Zukunft.
Page me45.363
†a J. Gugenheim
Page me45.363
†b See this volume, pp. 359-60.
Page me45.365
†a Really
Page me45.366
†a In the original, the following passage is deleted: 'and the class struggle which finally leads to a social revolution. What distinguishes critical and revolutionary socialism from its predecessors is, in my opinion, precisely this materialist basis. It shows that at a certain stage of historical development the animal inevitably transforms into a man'.
Page me45.366
†b In the manuscript of the draft: 'which I trust you received (it was registered)'.
Page me45.367
†a The following is deleted in the manuscript of the draft: 'That C. Hirsch cannot assume the editorship in these circumstances without quite specific guarantees of his independence vis-á-vis his superior on the financial side, goes without saying. I doubt very much whether sufficient guarantees of this kind could be given, and regard it as fairly certain that the negotiations with C. Hirsch will come to nothing. But even were they to succeed, it is virtually certain that Hirsch's position would ultimately become untenable through his being controlled by two superiors of whom one, who provides the finances, is not a social democrat but a social philantropist, and the other, as Liebknecht admits, “would himself like to be editor”.'
Page me45.368
†a The following is deleted in the manuscript of the draft: 'We shall continue to correspond with C. Hirsch and shall see what can be done if he accepts the editorship. As circumstances are now, he is, of all possible editors, the only one in whom we would have sufficient confidence.'

Page me45.368
†b R. Meyer, Politische Gründer und die Corruption in Deutschland.
Page me45.368
†c Eleanor Marx
Page me45.369
†a Jean Longuet
Page me45.371
†a by degrees
Page me45.371
†b It's as well to stock the world with boys, particularly since statistics in England show a surplus of girls.
Page me45.372
†a jocular name for Marx
Page me45.373
†a 18 August
Page me45.373
†b inevitable
Page me45.374
†a See p. XXVIII of the Preface.
Page me45.374
†b See previous letter.
Page me45.375
†a 28 August
Page me45.375
†b new-born son, Edgar Longuet
Page me45.376
†a See this volume, pp. 372-74.
Page me45.376
†b 20 August
Page me45.377
†a See this volume, p. 374.
Page me45.377
†b 22 August
Page me45.378
†a See previous letter.
Page me45.378
†b re
Page me45.378
†c See next letter.
Page me45.378
†d who is the interested person
Page me45.379
†a 23 August
Page me45.379
†b From the final couplet of Goethe's Faust: 'The Eternal-Feminine entices us on'.
Page me45.379

†c Der Sozialdemokrat
Page me45.380
†a See this volume, pp. 376-77.
Page me45.380
†b Ibid., pp. 374-76.
Page me45.381
†a See this volume, p. 411.
Page me45.382
†a Jean Longuet
Page me45.382
†b Rudolph Meyer
Page me45.382
†c on 29 August 1879
Page me45.383
†a Carl Schorlemmer
Page me45.383
†b Der Sozialdemokrat
Page me45.383
†c See this volume, pp. 367-68.
Page me45.384
†a without more ado
Page me45.384
†b See also this volume, p. 387.
Page me45.385
†a See this volume, pp. 392-93.
Page me45.386
†a See Lübeck's reviews of the following books: C.F.W. Walther, Kommunismus und Sozialismus, St. Louis, 1878; G. Cohn, Was ist Sozialismus?, Berlin, 1878; J.B. Meyer, Fichte, Lassalle und der Sozialismus, Berlin, 1878; C. Frantz, Der Föderalismus als leitendes Prinzip für die soziale, staatliche und internationale Organisation, Mainz, 1879. In: Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik. Zürich-Oberstrass, 1879.
Page me45.386
†b M. Sch[lesinger], 'Bericht über den Fortgang der sozialistischen Bewegung: Deutsches Reich, I'. In: Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik, Zürich-Oberstrass, 1879.
Page me45.386
†c In short
Page me45.387
†a See this volume, pp. 394-408.
Page me45.387
†b Ibid., p. 384.
Page me45.387
†c 5 September
Page me45.388
†a Engels used a dialectal expression here: es is nix zu wolle.
Page me45.388

†b See this volume, p. 386.
Page me45.388
†c perpetual motion
Page me45.389
†a for the time being
Page me45.389
†b See this volume, p. 381.
Page me45.389
†c That's the enemy!
Page me45.389
†d One always returns to one's first love (somewhat paraphrased words of a romance from Isouard's opera — libretto by Ch. G. Étienne — Joconde, Act III, Scene 1).
Page me45.389
†e William I
Page me45.389
†f Meanwhile
Page me45.390
†a See this volume, p. 388.
Page me45.390
†b Ibid., p. 389.
Page me45.390
†c 14 September
Page me45.390
†d See this volume, pp. 387-88.
Page me45.391
†a Marx is referring to a cheque (see next letter).
Page me45.391
†b 13 September
Page me45.391
†c Like Wilhelm Wolff
Page me45.391
†d Edgar Longuet
Page me45.391
†e Rudolph Meyer
Page me45.391
†f Jenny Marx
Page me45.392
†a Helene Demuth
Page me45.392
†b Marx is referring to the correspondence over the publication of the newspaper Der Sozialdemokrat.
Page me45.392
†c See this volume, pp. 383-84.
Page me45.393
†a Ibid., p. 385.
Page me45.393

†b at bottom
Page me45.393
†c See next letter.
Page me45.394
†a The original erroneously has: '29'.
Page me45.394
†b See this volume, p. 393.
Page me45.396
†a Louis Viereck
Page me45.397
†a Wilhelm Liebknecht
Page me45.397
†b See this volume, pp. 398-400.
Page me45.398
†a Ignaz Auer and Karl Grillenberger
Page me45.398
†b On 26 July 1879.
Page me45.398
†c Eduard Bernstein's letter to Carl Hirsch of 31 July 1879.
Page me45.398
†d See this volume, p. 397.
Page me45.399
†a See 'Programm der sozialistischen Arbeiterpartei Deutschlands', Der Volksstaat, No. 59, 28 May 1875.
Page me45.399
†b Deleted in the manuscript: 'Even admitting that two or three other Social-Democratic deputies (for it is unlikely that any more were there) had allowed themselves to be misled into permitting Kayser to recite his inanities in front of all and sundry, and vote Bismarck funds, it was their duty publicly to assume responsibility for this and then wait and see what Hirsch would say.'
Page me45.402
†a See this volume, p. 394.
Page me45.402
†b Höchberg, Bernstein and Schramm
Page me45.402
†c Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik, p. 84.
Page me45.402
†d These two sentences were substituted by the authors for the following passage deleted in the manuscript: 'Schweitzer was a great blackguard, but very talented intellectually. His particular merit consisted in his having broken free of the original, narrow Lassalleanism with its limited panacea of state aid... Whatever wrong he may have done out of corrupt motives and however much, too, he may have clung to the Lassallean panacea of state aid in order to preserve his domination, he nevertheless had the merit of having broken free of the original, narrow Lassalleanism, of having broadened the party's economic horizons and thus paved the way for its subsequent merger with the German party as a whole. The class struggle between proletariat and bourgeoisie, that pivot of all revolutionary socialism, had already been advocated by Lassalle. If Schweitzer stressed this point even more strongly it was, at any rate, a step forward so far as the cause was concerned, however much of a pretext he may thus have afforded dangerous individuals for calling his dictatorship in question. It may rightly be said that he turned Lassalleanism into a one-sided struggle of the industrial workers to promote their own interests. But one-sided only in the sense that, for reasons that were politically corrupt, he wished to have nothing to do with the farm workers' struggle to promote their own interests vis-á-vis the big landowners. It is not that with which he is reproached here; rather the 'trivialisation' consists in his emphasising its character as a class struggle of industrial workers against the bourgeoisie.'

Page me45.402

†e Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik, p. 84.

Page me45.403

†a Ibid., p. 85.

Page me45.403

†b Ibid., p. 86.

Page me45.403

†c Ibid., pp. 87-89.

Page me45.404

†a Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik, pp. 87-88.

Page me45.404

†b Ibid., p. 88.

Page me45.405

†a Ibid., p. 87.

Page me45.405

†b 'Programm der sozialistischen Arbeiterpartei Deutschlands'.

Page me45.405

†c Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik, p. 88.

Page me45.405

†d Ibid.

Page me45.405

†e Ibid., p. 95.

Page me45.406

†a Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik, pp. 95, 96.

Page me45.408

†a K. Marx, 'Provisional Rules of the Association' (see present edition, Vol. 20, p. 14).

Page me45.410

†a Marx's pseudonym

Page me45.410

†b Johann Philipp Becker

Page me45.410

†c See this volume, p. 393.

Page me45.410

†d The new edition of Weitling's Garantien der Harmonie und Freiheit came out in New York in 1879 under the title Des seligen Schneider's Weitling Lehre vom Sozialismus und Communismus.
Page me45.411
†a Carroll Davidson Wright
Page me45.411
†b See this volume, p. 377.
Page me45.411
†c Ibid., pp. 362-63.
Page me45.411
†d Ibid., pp. 364-65.
Page me45.412
†a sense of logic.
Page me45.412
†b Der Sozialdemokrat
Page me45.412
†c William I
Page me45.412
†d wonderful to relate
Page me45.413
†a See this volume, pp. 366-68.
Page me45.413
†b Ibid., p. 393.
Page me45.413
†c See Most's review of Schäffle's book Bau und Leben des sozialen Körpers, Bände III-IV, Tübingen 1878, in the Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik. Zürich-Oberstrass, 1879.
Page me45.413
†d at bottom
Page me45.413
†e despite himself
Page me45.414
†a See this volume, pp. 394-408.
Page me45.414
†b so much the worse
Page me45.415
†a of 19 September 1879
Page me45.415
†b See this volume, pp. 392-93.
Page me45.415
†c Fraser's Magazine
Page me45.416
†a B. Augusti, Ein verhängnisvolles Jahr. In: Kölnische Zeitung, Nos. 247-302, 6 September-31 October 1879.
Page me45.417

†a The following is deleted in the manuscript of the draft: 'If the Zurich trio had no pretensions to censorship, why were those pretensions, which were so loudly and insistently voiced by them, not immediately quashed by Leipzig? Only two things were needed to induce Hirsch to go to Zurich: 1. Information about the true facts of the case, such as we have now had, 2. Notification to the effect that we, the Leipzigers, have written to the Zurichers telling them that they are not to intervene officially in the editorship, and, if they nevertheless do so, you must take no notice; you are responsible to us and to us alone'.

Page me45.417

†b of the newspaper Der Sozialdemokrat

Page me45.417

†c See this volume, pp. 400-01.

Page me45.418

†a The following is deleted in the manuscript of the draft: 'to invoke the point in the programme that rejects all indirect taxation and the tactics which prohibit voting this government any taxes, and to adopt as the sole precept abstention from voting'.

Page me45.418

†b In the manuscript of the draft: 'this wretched piece of trash'.

Page me45.419

†a The following is deleted in the manuscript of the draft: 'Bismarck treats him as he deserves, i.e. spurns him, and he therefore idolises Bismarck.'

Page me45.420

†a See this volume, pp. 393, 413.

Page me45.420

†b The following is deleted in the manuscript of the draft: 'at least so far as the party is concerned'.

Page me45.420

†c [I. Auer,] 'Von der Niederelbe, 23. Oktober', Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 5, 2 November 1879.

Page me45.420

†d See this volume, pp. 394-408.

Page me45.420

†e The following is deleted in the manuscript of the draft: 'I have no intention of discussing Auer's attack, as stupid as it is infamous and provoked. I should, however, remark that Auer appears to imagine...'

Page me45.421

†a Der Sozialdemokrat

Page me45.421

†b Ignaz Auer

Page me45.421

†c In the manuscript of the draft: 'and to the party leadership'.

Page me45.421

†d Ibid.: 'practical'.

Page me45.422

†a See this volume, pp. 392-93.

Page me45.422

†b Ibid., pp. 410-14.
Page me45.422
†c Eduard Bernstein and Carl August Schramm
Page me45.423
†a See this volume, p. 420.
Page me45.423
†b Ibid., p. 417.
Page me45.423
†c Ibid., pp. 417-18.
Page me45.424
†a See this volume, p. 419.
Page me45.425
†a Johann Most
Page me45.425
†b Paris is really worth a Mass.
Page me45.426
†a The postscript is missing in the manuscript.
Page me45.426
†b A. Loria, La rendita fondiaria e la sua elisione naturale.
Page me45.427
†a 14 December
Page me45.427
†b Dear
Page me45.427
†c Walstone's jocular name derived from the German word Waldhorn meaning French horn.
Page me45.427
†d Presumably N. Vasiliyev.
Page me45.427
†e good-bye and farewell
Page me45.428
†a The Pall Mall Gazette
Page me45.428
†b Wilhelm Bracke
Page me45.428
†c Louis Viereck
Page me45.429
†a Karl Höchberg, Eduard Bernstein and Carl August Schramm
Page me45.430
†a The following is deleted in the manuscript of the draft: 'and claim the right within the party to advocate as socialism their petty-bourgeois hesitations and limitations, it's a different matter. A party to which they belong is no place for us, nor can we even treat with such people so long as they do not constitute themselves an independent petty-bourgeois-socialist faction of the party, or so long as they insist that they belong to the same party as ourselves, we cannot even treat with them.'
Page me45.430

†b The following is deleted in the manuscript of the draft: 'We cannot, and never shall be, able to work hand in hand with petty-bourgeois socialism.'
Page me45.431
†a La Revue socialiste
Page me45.432
†a of Capital
Page me45.432
†b See previous letter.
Page me45.433
†a K. Marx and F. Engels, Manifesto of the Communist Party.
Page me45.433
†b K. Marx, The Poverty of Philosophy.
Page me45.433
†c See this volume, pp. 392-93, 410, 422.
Page me45.439
†a K. Marx, The Poverty of Philosophy.
Page me45.440
†a See this volume, p. 153.
Page me45.440
†b here: the family of
Page me45.440
†c thus in the police statement
Page me45.441
†a Journal des Débats politiques et littéraires
Page me45.442
†a Father, I have sinned (Luke 15:21)
Page me45.442
†b 11 August
Page me45.442
†c Eleanor Marx
Page me45.443
†a See this volume, p. 135.
Page me45.443
†b Wagner's opera
Page me45.443
†c See Engels' letter to Becker of 17 August 1880 (present edition, Vol. 46).
Page me45.443
†d on 1 August 1876
Page me45.443
†e 'who will die rather than surrender'.
Page me45.443
†f See this volume, p. 141.
Page me45.444
†a Quotation from Max Schneckenburger's poem Wacht am Rhein.
Page me45.445
†a La Révolution française

Page me45.445
†b [P.] Lissagaray, Histoire de la Commune de 1871.
Page me45.446
†a [P.] Lissagaray, Histoire de la Commune de 1871.
Page me45.447
†a See this volume, p. 189.
Page me45.447
†b Jean Longuet
Page me45.447
†c girth
Page me45.447
†d Gillot process
Page me45.447
†e See p. XXIX of the Preface.
Page me45.448
†a Cf. this volume, pp. 155-56.
Page me45.448
†b New-York Daily Tribune
Page me45.448
†c See this volume, p. 115.
Page me45.449
†a 1879 in the original
Page me45.449
†b See this volume, p. 446.
Page me45.449
†c L'Égalité
Page me45.450
†a K. Marx and F. Engels, Manifesto of the Communist Party.
Page me45.451
†a Here and below Jules Guesde quotes Marx.
Page me45.452
†a D. Ricardo, On the Principles of Political Economy, and Taxation.

Author's Notes
Page me45.258b
†* Indicated in the translation of the diagram by angled brackets.

Page Break me46.i

VOLUME 46

Page Break me46.ii
Page me46.ii
KARL MARX
FREDERICK ENGELS

COLLECTED WORKS

INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS
NEW YORK

Page Break me46.iii

FRONTMATTER Titlepage
Page me46.iii
KARL MARX
FREDERICK ENGELS

Volume
46

MARX AND ENGELS: 1880-83

INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS
NEW YORK

Page Break me46.iv

Copyright Page
Page me46.iv
This volume has been prepared jointly by Lawrence & Wishart Ltd., London, International Publishers Co. Inc., New York, and Progress Publishing Group Corporation, Moscow, in collaboration with the Russian Independent Institute of Social and National Problems (former Institute of Marxism-Leninism), Moscow.

Editorial commissions:

GREAT BRITAIN: Eric Hobsbawm, John Hoffman, Nicholas Jacobs, Monty Johnstone, Martin Milligan, Jeff Skelley, Ernst Wangermann, Ben Fowkes.

USA: Louis Diskin, Philip S. Foner, James E. Jackson,
Leonard B. Levenson, Victor Perlo, Betty Smith,
Dirk J. Struik.

RUSSIA: for Progress Publishing Group Corporation
— Yu. V. Semyonov, Ye. N. Vladimirova; for the Russian Independent Institute of Social and National Problems
— L.I. Golman, M.P. Mchedlov, V.N. Pospelova, G.L. Smirnov

Copyright © Progress Publishing Group Corporation, Moscow, 1992
© Lawrence & Wishart, London, 1992
© International Publishers, New York, 1992

All rights reserved. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study, research, criticism or review, no part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, electronic, electrical, chemical, mechanical, optical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of the copyright owner.

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

Marx, Karl, 1818-1883.
Karl Marx, Frederick Engels: collected works.
1. Socialism — Collected works. 2. Economics —
Collected works. I. Engels, Friedrich, 1820-1895.
Works. English. 1975. II. Title
HX 39. 5. A 16 1975 335.4 73-84671
ISBN 0-7178-0546-8 (v. 46)

Printed in the USA

Page Break me46.v

Contents
Page me46.v
PrefaceXVII

KARL MARX AND FREDERICK ENGELS
LETTERS
January 1880-March 1883

1880

1. Engels to Wilhelm Liebknecht. 10 January 3
2. Marx to Charles Walstone (Waldstein). 26 January 5
3. Engels to Carl Hirsch. 17 February5
4. Marx to Bernhard Kraus. 26 March 6
5. Engels to Johann Philipp Becker. 1 April 7
6. Engels to H. Meyer. 3 April 9
7. Engels to August Bebel. After 27 April 10
8. Engels to Paul Lafargue. 4 May 12
9. Marx to Paul Lafargue. About 4-5 May 15
10. Marx to Ferdinand Domela Nieuwenhuis. 27 June 16
11. Engels to Minna Gorbunova. 22 July 17
12. Marx to Philip Stephen King. 27 July 19
13. Engels to Minna Gorbunova. 2 August 19
14. Engels to Minna Gorbunova. 5 August 20
15. Marx to John Swinton. 15 August 22
16. Engels to Johann Philipp Becker. 17 August 23

Page Break me46.vi
17. Marx to Friedrich Adolph Sorge. 30 August 24
18. Engels to Laura Lafargue. 3 September 25
19. Engels to Paul Lafargue. 3 September 26
20. Engels to Paul Lafargue. 9 September 27
21. Marx to Nikolai Danielson. 12 September 30
22. Engels to Paul Lafargue. 12 September 32
23. Engels to Marx. 13 September 35
24. Marx to Ferdinand Fleckles. 29 September 36
25. Engels to Eugen Oswald and an Unknown Correspondent.
5 October 36
26. Engels to Johann Philipp Becker. 12 October 38
27. Engels to Harry Kaulitz. 28 October 38
28. Marx to John Swinton. 4 November 40
29. Marx to Friedrich Adolph Sorge. 5 November 42
30. Marx to Friedrich Adolph Sorge. 5 November 46
31. Marx to Ferdinand Fleckles. 12 November 47
32. Marx to Achille Loria. 13 November 48
33. Marx to Henry Mayers Hyndman. 8 December 49
34. Engels to Johann Philipp Becker. 24 December 50
35. Marx to Carl Hirsch. 29 December 51
Page me46.vi
1881

36. Marx to Charles Longuet. 4 January 52
37. Marx to an Unknown Correspondent. 31 January 55
38. Engels to Karl Kautsky. 1 February 56
39. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 2 February 58

40. Marx to Carl Pearson. 15 February 60
41. Marx to Nikolai Danielson. 19 February 60
42. Marx to Ferdinand Domela Nieuwenhuis. 22 February 65
43. Engels to Jenny Longuet. 24 February 67
44. Marx to Vera Zasulich. 8 March 71
45. Engels to S.F. Kaufmann. 11 March 72
46. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 12 March 73
47. Engels to Johann Philipp Becker. 28 March 76
48. Engels to August Bebel. 30 March 77
49. Engels to Gottlieb Lemcke. 2 April 79
50. Engels to Johann Philipp Becker. 4 April 80

Page Break me46.vii
51. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 11 April 81
52. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 14 April 85
53. Engels to August Bebel. 28 April 87
54. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 29 April 89
55. Engels to Jenny Longuet. 31 May 91
56. Marx to John Swinton. 2 June 93
57. Marx to Friedrich Adolph Sorge. 2 June 94
58. Engels to Friedrich Adolph Sorge. 2 June 94
59. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 6 June 95
60. Engels to Jenny Longuet. 17 June 97
61. Marx to Friedrich Adolph Sorge. 20 June 98
62. Marx to Henry Mayers Hyndman. 2 July 102
63. Engels to Marx. 7 July 104
64. Engels to Norris A. Clowes. 22 July 105
65. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 22 July 106
66. Marx to Engels. 27 July 107
67. Engels to Marx. 29 July 108
68. Marx to Engels. 3 August 110
69. Engels to Marx. 6 August 113
70. Marx to Carl Hirsch. 6 August 115
71. Marx to Engels. 9 August 115
72. Marx to Laura Lafargue. 9 August 118
73. Engels to George Shipton. 10 August 119
74. Engels to Marx. 11 August 120
75. Engels to George Shipton. 15 August 122
76. Marx to Engels. 16 August 124
77. Marx to Pyotr Lavrov. 16 August 124
78. Engels to Marx. 17 August 125
79. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 17 August 126
80. Engels to Marx. 18 August 130
81. Marx to Engels. 18 August 132
82. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 18 August 134
83. Marx to Engels. 19 August 136

84. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 20 August 136
85. Engels to August Bebel. 25 August 137
86. Engels to Karl Kautsky. 27 August 140
87. Marx to Karl Kautsky. 1 October 142

Page Break me46.viii

88. Marx to Minna Kautsky. 1 October 143
89. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 25 October 144
90. Engels to Johann Philipp Becker. 4 November 151
91. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 30 November 152
92. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 7 December 156
93. Marx to Johann Philipp Becker. 10 December 159
94. Marx to Nikolai Danielson. 13 December 160
95. Marx to Friedrich Adolph Sorge. 15 December 161
96. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 17 December 164
97. Engels to Karl Kautsky. 18 December 165
98. Engels to Ferdinand Domela Nieuwenhuis. 29 December 166
99. Marx to Roland Daniels. 31 December 167
100. Engels to Lev Hartmann. End of December 168

Page me46.viii

1882

101. Marx to Laura Lafargue. 4 January 169
102. Marx to Engels. 5 January 171
103. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 6 January 172
104. Engels to Marx. 8 January 174
105. Marx to Engels. 12 January 176
106. Engels to Emil Engels. 12 January 178
107. Marx to Amalie Daniels. 12 January 180
108. Engels to Marx. 13 January 180
109. Marx to Engels. 15 January 183
110. Marx to Pyotr Lavrov. 23 January 184
111. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 25 and 31 January 186
112. Engels to Karl Kautsky. 7 February 191
113. Engels to Johann Philipp Becker. 10 February 196
114. Marx to Engels. 17 February 198
115. Engels to Pyotr Lavrov. 18 February 201
116. Marx to Engels. 21 February 202
117. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 22 and 25 February 203
118. Engels to Pyotr Lavrov. 23 February 211
119. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 23 February 212
120. Marx to Engels. 1 March 213
121. Marx to Engels. 3 March 216
122. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 16 March 217

Page Break me46.ix

123. Marx to Paul Lafargue. 20 March 220
124. Marx to Engels. 23 March 222
125. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 27 March 223
126. Marx to Engels. 28-31 March 225
127. Engels to Henry Mayers Hyndman. Circa 31 March 228
128. Marx to Engels. 4 April 228
129. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 6 and 7 April 230
130. Marx to Engels. 8 April 233
131. Engels to Pyotr Lavrov. 10 April 235
132. Engels to Berthold Sparr. 12 April 236
133. Engels to Friedrich Adolph Sorge. 13 April 237
134. Marx to Laura Lafargue. 13 and 14 April 238
135. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 17 April 244
136. Marx to Engels. 18 April 245
137. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 21 April 247
138. Marx to Engels. 28 April 248
139. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 28 April 250
140. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 3 May 250
141. Marx to Laura Lafargue. 6 May 252
142. Marx to Engels. 8 May 253
143. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 8 May 255
144. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 10 May 256
145. Engels to August Bebel. 16 May 259
146. Marx to Engels. 20 May 261
147. Marx to Eleanor Marx. 21 May 264
148. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 26 May 265
149. Marx to Eleanor Marx. 28 May 266
150. Marx to Engels. 30 May 270
151. Marx to Jenny Longuet. 4 June 271
152. Marx to Engels. 5 June 272
153. Marx to Engels. 9 June 275
154. Marx to Engels. 15 June 276
155. Marx to Laura Lafargue. 17 June 277
156. Engels to Friedrich Adolph Sorge. 20 June 278
157. Engels to August Bebel. 21 June 280
158. Marx to Engels. 22 June 283
159. Marx to Engels. 24 June 284

Page Break me46.x

160. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 26 June 285
161. Marx to Engels. 4 July 290
162. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 15 July 291
163. Engels to Adolf Hepner. 25 July 293
164. Engels to Pyotr Lavrov. 31 July 295
165. Marx to Engels. 3 August 295
166. Engels to Johann Philipp Becker. 9 August 299

167. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 9 August 300
168. Marx to Engels. 10 August 303
169. Engels to Friedrich Adolph Sorge. 10 August 304
170. Engels to Marx. 20 August 305
171. Engels to Emil Engels Jun. 20 August 306
172. Marx to Engels. 21 August 308
173. Marx to Engels. 24 August 310
174. Engels to Marx. 25 August 311
175. Engels to Marx. 26 August 312
176. Engels to Jenny Longuet. 27 August 315
177. Marx to Engels. 4 September 317
178. Engels to Marx. 12 September 318
179. Engels to Karl Kautsky. 12 September 320
180. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 13 September 323
181. Marx to Engels. 16 September 326
182. Engels to Marx. 18 September 328
183. Engels to Laura Lafargue. 20 September 329
184. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 22 September 331
185. Engels to August Bebel. 23 September 334
186. Marx to Engels. 28 September 337
187. Marx to Engels. 30 September 338
188. Marx to Laura Lafargue. 9 October 339
189. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 20 October 341
190. Engels to Laura Lafargue. 21 October 344
191. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 27 October 346
192. Engels to August Bebel. 28 October 349
193. Engels to Paul Lafargue. 30 October 351
194. Engels to Marx. 1 November 353
195. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 2 and 3 November 353
196. Engels to Marx. 3 November 358

Page Break me46.xi

197. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 4 November 359
198. Engels to Marx. 6 November 363
199. Marx to Engels. 8 November 364
200. Marx to Philipp Stephen King. 9 November 367
201. Engels to Friedrich Adolph Sorge. 9 November 368
202. Marx to Eleanor Marx. 10 November 371
203. Engels to Marx. 11 November 372
204. Marx to Engels. 11 November 374
205. Engels to Karl Kautsky. 15 November 376
206. Marx to Engels. 20 November 377
207. Engels to Marx. 21 November 378
208. Marx to Engels. 22 November 380
209. Engels to Marx. 22 November 381
210. Engels to Marx. 23 November 383

211. Marx to Engels. 27 November 385
212. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 28 November 386
213. Engels to Marx. 30 November 390
214. Marx to Engels. 4 December 392
215. Marx to Engels. 8 December 393
216. Engels to Marx. 8 December 394
217. Engels to Marx. 13 December 396
218. Engels to Laura Lafargue. 14 December 397
219. Marx to Laura Lafargue. 14 December 398
220. Engels to Marx. 15 December 399
221. Engels to Laura Lafargue. 15 December 401
222. Engels to Marx. 16 December 403
223. Engels to Johann Philipp Becker. 16 December 405
224. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 16 December 407
225. Marx to Engels. 18 December 409
226. Engels to Marx. 19 December 410
227. Engels to Marx. 22 December 412
228. Engels to August Bebel. 22 December 414
229. Marx to Eleanor Marx. 23 December 417
Page me46.xi
1883

230. Marx to James M. Williamson. 6 January 419
231. Marx to Eleanor Marx. 8 January 420

Page Break me46.xii
232. Engels to Marx. 9 January 421
233. Marx to Eleanor Marx. 9 January 422
234. Marx to Engels. 10 January 424
235. Marx to Eleanor Marx. 10 January 426
236. Marx to Mrs James M. Williamson. 11 January 429
237. Marx to James M. Williamson. 13 January 429
238. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 18 January 430
239. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 8 February 432
240. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 10 February 435
241. Engels to Karl Kautsky. 10 February 436
242. Engels to Laura Lafargue. 16 and 17 February 439
243. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 27 February 442
244. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 27 February-1 March 445
245. Engels to Karl Kautsky. 2 March 451
246. Engels to August Bebel. 7 March 453
247. Engels to Laura Lafargue. 10 March 456
248. Engels to Charles Longuet. 14 March 457
249. Engels to Friedrich Adolph Sorge. 14 March 457
250. Engels to Wilhelm Liebknecht. 14 March 458
251. Engels to Eduard Bernstein. 14 March 459

252. Engels to Johann Philipp Becker. 15 March 460
253. Engels to Friedrich Adolph Sorge. 15 March 460
254. Engels to Friedrich Lessner. 15 March 463
255. Engels to Pyotr Lavrov. 24 March 464
256. Engels to Laura Lafargue. 25 March 465
257. Engels to Friedrich Theodor Cuno. 29 March 466
Page me46.xii
APPENDICES

1. Jenny Longuet to Charles Longuet. 1 October 1880 469
2. From Jenny Longuet's Letter to Charles Longuet. 27 October 1880 471
3. From Jenny Longuet's Letter to Charles Longuet. 31 October 1880 472
4. Jenny Longuet to Charles Longuet. 23 November 1880 473
5. Jenny Marx to Jenny Longuet. 20 August 1881 475
Page me46.xii
NOTES AND INDEXES

Notes 479
Name Index 534

Page Break me46.xiii
Index of Quoted and Mentioned Literature 569
Index of Periodicals 586
Subject Index 593
Page me46.xiii
ILLUSTRATIONS

Frederick Engels, Socialism: Utopian and Scientific,
Paris, 1880 13
Jenny Marx, wife of Karl Marx 158-59
Karl Marx. London, August 1875 166-67
Marx's letter to Roland Daniels of 31 December 1881
on the reverse of his photograph of 1875 166-67
The last photograph of Karl Marx, Algiers, 1882 214-15
Marx's congratulation to Mrs James M. Williamson on the reverse of his photograph of 1875 427
Jenny Longuet428-29
The memorial of Karl Marx in London's Highgate Cemetery 456-57

Page Break me46.xiv

Page Break me46.xv
Page me46.xv
TRANSLATORS:

RODNEY LIVINGSTONE: Letters 8, 9, 19, 20, 25, 32, 83,

84, 115, 118, 131, 164, 193, 255, Appendix 5

STANLEY MITCHELL: Letters 100, 123

PETER and BETTY ROSS: Letters 1, 3-7, 10, 11, 13, 14, 16, 17, 23, 24, 26, 27, 29-31, 34, 35, 38, 39, 42, 45-53, 61, 63, 65-72, 74, 76, 78-81, 85-93, 95-98, 101-14, 116, 117, 120-22, 124, 126-28, 130, 132-46, 149-63, 165-75, 177-82, 184-89, 191, 192, 194-99, 201-17, 219, 220, 222-29, 231-35, 238-41, 243-46, 250-54, 257

STEPHEN SMITH: Letter 99

Page Break me46.xvi

Page Break me46.xvii

Preface
Page me46.xvii

Volume 46 of the Collected Works of Karl Marx and Frederick Engels contains letters dating from January 1880 to March 1883. It was during these last few years of Marx's life that Engels assumed the main burden of corresponding with leaders of the international working-class movement.
Page me46.xvii

Marx concentrated on his economic research; he also studied the history and culture of primitive society, world history, agriculture and peasant conditions in different countries, notably socio-economic relations and the state of the peasant commune in Russia after the abolition of serfdom. He also pursued his interest in higher mathematics and collected new facts for Capital. His plans to complete Capital, however, were not destined to be realised by him. His health deteriorated rapidly, compelling him to devote much time to medical treatment and often live out of London. Deprived of his library, he could not work on the second and third volumes of Capital (see this volume, pp. 158, 161) and even failed to finish reading the proofs of the third German edition of the first volume (pp. 425, 434). All this is reflected in this volume.
Page me46.xvii

Responding to Paul Lafargue's request and prompted by the vital need of the workers' movement, Engels in this period wrote Socialism: Utopian and Scientific (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 281-325), destined to become the most widely read Marxist book alongside the Manifesto of the Communist Party.
Page me46.xvii

Socialism: Utopian and Scientific, produced in the spring of 1880, was based on three chapters of Anti-Dühring. The introduction to the Page Break me46.xviii

French edition was written by Marx and published over the signature of Paul Lafargue (see pp. 16, 332). The pamphlet played a conspicuous role in imparting the Marxist outlook to the French socialists. '... I have seen what a regular revolution the thing has wrought in the minds of many of the better people in France,' wrote Engels (p. 300). This encouraged Engels to prepare a separate German edition (1882). To make it more comprehensible to factory workers (pp. 335, 352, 369), he revised the text, added a few new passages, and wrote a special preface (p. 331). An essay on the history of landownership in Germany from the ancient commune to the 1870s, 'The Mark' (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 439-56), was appended.

Page me46.xviii

The essay, which later appeared under separate cover, entitled, Der deutsche Bauer. Was war er? Was er ist? Was könnte er sein?, completed Engels' research of 1881-82 into the social system of the ancient Germans. Its inclusion as a supplement in the German-language edition of Socialism: Utopian and Scientific was meant to arouse the German Social-Democrats' interest in the peasantry as the working class's potential ally. The importance Marx and Engels attached to this is reflected in Engels' letter of 23 September 1882, urging Bebel to read up on the subject, thus gaining 'solid foundations to go on in any debate [in the Reichstag] about landownership or agrarian questions' (p. 336).

Page me46.xviii

Engels tried to resume his study of the philosophy of natural science he had begun in 1873 and dropped owing to his work on Anti-Dühring (see present edition, Vol. 25). But only short spells of time were available to him, though, as he put it, the book (Dialectics of Nature), 'has also long been pending' (p. 350). He managed to write a few fragments in 1880-82 (see Vol. 25, p. 660). The problems raised in Dialectics of Nature, and the history of primitive society which Engels studied in the early 1880s, were only partly reflected in his letters of that period.

Page me46.xviii

By the 1880s, socialist workers' parties had sprung up in Austria, France, Denmark, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, and the United States of America. The emergence of national working-class parties was an objective trend that had begun in the 1860s. The letters in this volume produce a fairly good cumulative picture of the help that Marx and especially Engels had given them in drawing up their programme and in their strategy and tactics.

Page Break me46.xix

Page me46.xix

Marx and Engels took the emergence of self-dependent national working-class parties as a sign of the times. They were critical of the untimely attempts at re-establishing the International and working out a single legislative political and economic programme for all countries where socialists could come to power. Since the matter had been put on the agenda of the impending international congress in Switzerland, called on the initiative of the Belgian socialists, the Dutch Social-Democrat Ferdinand Domela Nieuwenhuis requested Marx in January 1881 to give his opinion on this score.

Page me46.xix

The reply to Nieuwenhuis (see p. 61) and Engels' letter to Johann Philipp Becker of February 10, 1882, stressed it would be not only useless but also harmful to restore the International or hold international congresses at the time 'in so far as they do not relate to the immediate, actual conditions obtaining in this or that specific nation' (p. 67). The formation of mass socialist parties was still far from completed. Indeed, it had only just begun in some countries, so that a new, 'reorganised International ... would only give rise to fresh persecution' (p. 196). As Marx and Engels saw it, international contacts between socialist organisations were then, in fact, maintained through the socialist and workers' press, and through contacts between recognised workers' leaders (see p. 197). This meant new ways of consolidating the workers' international unity were coming to the fore. Not until later, when the workers' movement attained a higher level and the ideas of scientific socialism spread, would the ground be ready for 'the establishment of an official, formal International' (p. 198).

Page me46.xix

Marx's and Engels' contacts with the German working-class movement were especially strong. The Socialist Workers' Party of Germany was then the largest proletarian political organisation in the world. It had proved its viability despite the difficult climate created by the Anti-Socialist Law of October 1878. Continuously persecuted, it managed to maintain its membership, establish an underground organ, the newspaper Sozialdemokrat, in Switzerland, and to keep alive its contacts with the masses.
Page me46.xix

The letters in this volume give a good idea of the diversity of Marx's and Engels' aid to the German Social-Democrats. They urged them to combat the reformist sentiment introduced by bourgeois intellectuals who, admitted to the party before the enactment of the Page Break me46.xx

Anti-Socialist Law, opposed the revolutionary tactics of the left wing, and tried, as Engels wrote, 'to get rid of the Anti-Socialist Law at any cost and to do so ignominiously by means of moderation and meekness, tameness and toadyism' (p. 279).
Page me46.xx

Engels countered this by examining the situation in the party and in Germany, and stressing that this course of action had no hope of succeeding. 'After 3 years of unprecedented persecution...,' he wrote to Eduard Bernstein on 30 November 1881, 'our lads have returned, not only in all their former strength, but actually stronger than before' (p. 153). And he amplified: 'the movement ... from being restricted to a few local centres, has only now come to be a national movement. And that is what frightens the bourgeois most of all' (p. 154).
Page me46.xx

Engels had deep faith in the perseverance of the German workers. Bismarck's policy, which amounted to war against the workers (a state of siege had been declared in a number of cities, and the like), he noted, only helped the German Social-Democrats' influence to grow. 'The infamies to which socialist workers everywhere have been subjected,' Engels wrote Sorge on 20 June 1882, 'have everywhere made them much more revolutionary than they were even 3 years ago' (p. 279). Not submission, as suggested by the right-wing leaders (Blos, Hasenclever, and others), but workers' pressure, Engels held, could force the government to repeal the Anti-Socialist Law.
Page me46.xx

The clash with the reformist elements in the party and division on fundamental and tactical issues were objectively unavoidable, because the right and left wings of the German Social-Democratic movement reflected the interests of different social groups. In principle, Marx and Engels considered a break with the reformists desirable because, as Engels wrote Bebel on 21 June 1882, the schism would 'serve to elucidate the situation and we shall be rid of an element that in no way belongs to us' (pp. 281-82). But considering the Anti-Socialist Law, Engels advised against needless haste, because in the circumstances the workers might think the break would weaken the party and augur loss of its gains. Division over controversial issues, he held, called for a public discussion, which, however, was practically impossible owing to the Anti-Socialist Law. All the same, Marx and Engels promised the party's revolutionary leaders public support if matters should come to 'a show-down with these gentry and the party's left wing declares itself' (p. 282).

Page me46.xx

Engels wrote a large number of letters to Bernstein, editor of the Sozialdemokrat, the party's central organ. He offered advice as to the tactics the paper should follow to suit the conditions of that time. Engels commended the paper's opposition to the reformist stance of the right-wing Social-Democratic deputies in the Reichstag (pp. 173, 203, 244), and advised its editors to seek workers' support and apply for help to correspondents 'from amongst the genuine workers — not those who have become “leaders”' (p. 188). This tactic, worked out jointly by Marx and Engels (see, e.g., p. 393), proved successful. 'I am delighted,' Engels wrote Bernstein on 22 February 1882, 'that subscriptions should have passed the 4,000 mark and that the paper should find regular distribution in Germany, despite the police, etc. It is an incredible feat for a German paper that is banned' (p. 203).

Page Break me46.xxi

Page me46.xxi

At a difficult time for the German Social-Democrats, Marx and Engels undertook to represent the party in the international workers' movement, explaining its political tactics. In their letters to various countries, they called on the working class to give its moral and material aid to the German Social-Democrats. Marx started collecting funds for victims of the Anti-Socialist Law, addressing himself, among others, to Friedrich Adolph Sorge and journalist John Swinton, who was close to the socialists in the United States. 'Even if the monetary result were not important,' he wrote Swinton on 4 November 1880, 'denunciations of Bismarck's new coup d'état in public meetings held by you, reported in the American press, reproduced on the other side of the Atlantic — would sorely hit the Pomeranian hobereau [Junker] and be welcomed by all the socialists of Europe' (p. 41).

Page me46.xxi

The letters in this volume show the part Marx and Engels played in organising the French Workers' Party. They established contact with Jules Guesde and the editors of the Égalité through Paul Lafargue. This gave them an opportunity to influence the French labour movement. A big role here, as we have said, was played by Engels' Socialism: Utopian and Scientific. In March 1880, Engels contributed an article, 'The Socialism of Mr Bismarck', to the Égalité. It struck out against the Bonapartist social demagogy of that time. At the request of Benoît Malon, Marx drew up a Workers' Questionnaire (see present edition, Vol. 24). More important still, he participated in drawing up the Workers' Party programme, whose theoretical part he simply dictated to Guesde in the presence of Engels and Lafargue (see pp. 43-44). Later, Engels commented: 'A masterpiece of cogent reasoning, calculated to explain things to the masses in a few words;

Page Break me46.xxii
I have seldom seen its like and, even in this concise version, found it astonishing' (p. 148). This, indeed, was the programme the Workers' Party congress adopted in the autumn of 1880 in Le Havre. Its adoption, Marx pointed out, opened an entirely new stage in the French workers' struggle. This was when 'the first real workers' movement' began in France, he said (p. 44).
Page me46.xxii

The theoretical views of the members of the newly formed Workers' Party, however, were still immature. The revolutionary wing headed by Guesde and Lafargue (Collectivists) and the reformist followers of Malon and Brousse (Possibilists) were entangled in a controversy. It had begun before the congress and was especially heated after it. Contrary to any revolutionary transformation of society, the Possibilists advanced the idea of the workers' gradually winning a majority in the municipalities, thus paving the way for broader public services (services publics) and the gradual transfer of the means of production into the possession of the municipal authorities (municipal socialism).
Page me46.xxii

In letters to Bebel and Bernstein, Engels predicted that a conflict within the Workers' Party was objectively unavoidable. 'It would seem,' he wrote, 'that any workers' party in a large country can develop only through internal struggle, as indeed has been generally established in the dialectical laws of development.... Such being the case, it would be sheer folly to advocate unification. Moral homilies are of no avail against teething troubles which, circumstances being what they are today, are something that has got to be gone through' (p. 343).
Page me46.xxii

Marx and Engels sided with the Collectivists, who controlled the Égalité (p. 173). In his letters, Engels informed socialists in different countries of the reasons for the turmoil within the French Workers' Party, and stressed the fundamental nature of the controversy (see pp. 196-97, 332-33, 370). The argument concerned diametrically opposite attitudes to the party's political programme: whether the struggle against the bourgeoisie should be fought as a class struggle or whether the class nature of the movement and the revolutionary programme should be opportunistically renounced in all cases where such renunciation would win it more followers and more votes in elections. Engels pointed out that the Possibilists were 'sacrificing the proletarian class character of the movement' (p. 350).
Page me46.xxii

In addition, Marx and Engels also called attention to the Guesdists' theoretical faults and the many tactical mistakes they made in the heat of the struggle. To begin with, Guesde and Lafargue negated reforms in bourgeois society. They denied the need of fighting for democratisation, and of combining struggle for society's social reorganisation with struggle for democratisation. In the absence of insight, Engels pointed out, 'party politics cannot be pursued with success' (p. 333). Engels therefore faulted Guesde's utterances against the Radicals (Clemenceau) (ibid.), who had in the early 1880s worked for democratisation of the French Republic and thereby furthered the vital tasks of the working-class movement in the country.

Page Break me46.xxiii
Page me46.xxiii
Engels deplored the Guesdists' lack of political skill. He censured them for having involved themselves in a polemic on personal grounds which only obscured the fight for fundamental aims, and also for their contentiousness, quick temper, failure to wait for the right time of action, and for phrase-mongering (pp. 181, 154-55 et seqq.). These blunders prevented Marx and Engels from giving their full support publicly to the Collectivists.
Page me46.xxiii
All the greater was the importance that Marx and Engels attached to correct coverage in the socialist press of Germany of the state of affairs in the French Workers' Party. They called on the French and German socialists regularly to exchange their newspapers — Égalité and Sozialdemokrat (pp. 360-61). In his many letters to the leaders of the German Socialist Workers' Party, Engels never failed to refer to the struggle inside the French party. This was doubly necessary, because, having failed to grasp its substance, the editors of the Sozialdemokrat had initially backed the Possibilists (pp. 386-87). His letters to Bernstein, Bebel, and others, showing the social and political similarity of possibilism and reformist currents in the workers' and socialist movements in other countries, finally prompted the editors of the Sozialdemokrat to back the Guesdists.
Page me46.xxiii
Marx and Engels were aware that the two distinct currents could no longer coexist within one party, it was time the Guesdists and Possibilists parted ways (see pp. 343, 350-51). At the St-Étienne congress in September 1882 the Possibilists had not only emasculated, but in effect totally rejected, the Havre programme by proclaiming local party branches fully autonomous as concerned programme issues (p. 341). That was why neither Engels nor Marx were discouraged by the fact that only a minority followed Guesde and Lafargue as a result of the split. Engels observed: 'The whole of the “workers' party”, both factions included, constitutes only a small and dwindling portion of the Parisian working-class masses' (p. 333). The party, he said, was in the first stage of the internal struggle that the socialists in Germany had already passed (p. 351).

Page Break me46.xxiv
Page me46.xxiv
Marx and Engels believed that being champions of revolutionary principles, the Guesdists had a far better future than the Possibilists, even though the latter were in the majority. 'To be momentarily in the minority — quoad [as to] organisation — and have the right programme,' Engels wrote to Bernstein in November 1882, 'is at least better than having no programme and a large, though almost entirely nominal and bogus, following' (p. 389). Years later, he was proved right.

Page me46.xxiv

The correspondence of Marx and Engels in 1880-83 is evidence of their unflagging interest in the British labour movement, which was experiencing change, however slow, due to Great Britain's changing economic situation. The prolonged depression had shaken the Empire's industrial monopoly. The condition of the working people deteriorated. Radical workers' clubs sprang up in London. This was a new symptom, Marx wrote to Pyotr Lavrov at the end of January 1882 (p. 185), and evidence of the appeal socialist ideas had won among a section of the working class which began to oppose the Liberal Party, Gladstone's government, and 'official trades-unionism' (ibid.).

Page me46.xxiv

The labour movement's vitalisation in the early 1880s also stimulated interest in scientific socialism among a part of the democratic intelligentsia. 'The English,' Marx wrote to Sorge in December 1881, 'have latterly begun to take rather more notice of Capital' (p. 162). He had been asked for permission to translate it into English or to translate it himself (ibid.). In letters to his friends, Marx said the first honest reviews had appeared in the British press. He commended young English philosopher Belfort Bax's article, 'Karl Marx', in the journal Modern Thought of December 1881, and described it as the first English publication 'pervaded by a real enthusiasm for the new ideas themselves' and standing up boldly against British philistinism (p. 163).

Page me46.xxiv

Engels' letters contain the story of his association with The Labour Standard, a trades union newspaper, in 1881. The attempt at addressing trades union members directly, setting forth the basics of the Marxian political economy and propagating the ideas of scientific socialism, proved unsuccessful. In letters to the Labour Standard editor George

Page Break me46.xxv

Shipton of August 10 and 15, 1881, Engels deplored that the impact his articles had made on readers was very weak (pp. 123 and 121). He explained: 'The British working man just doesn't want to advance; he has got to be galvanised by events, the loss of industrial monopoly' (p. 121).

Page me46.xxv

Despite its various setbacks, Marx and Engels noted, the British bourgeoisie was able to offer more favourable conditions to more highly qualified workers thanks to Britain's enormous colonial possessions and its supremacy in the world market. They saw this as the reason for the weakness of the British labour and socialist movement, the slow spread of socialist ideas in the labour movement, and the protracted formation of an independent labour party. But Engels' contributions to The Labour Standard had not passed without influence. George MacDonald, a British socialist with Marxist leanings, pointed out, among others, that it had been Engels' articles in The Labour Standard that prompted him to accept scientific socialism (see How I Became a Socialist, London, 1896, pp. 61-62).

Page me46.xxv

Letters showing Marx's and Engels' relationship with Henry Mayers Hyndman, a prominent English radical, are of considerable interest. Marx tried to explain what factors he thought created possibilities for power to pass peacefully into the hands of the British working class. In December 1880, he wrote: 'If you say that you do not share the views of my party for England I can only reply that that party considers an English revolution not necessary, but — according to historic precedents — possible. If the unavoidable evolution turn into a revolution, it would not only be the fault of the ruling classes, but also of the working class. Every pacific concession of the former has been wrung from them by “pressure from without”' (p. 49).

Page me46.xxv

Marx's letter to Hyndman of 2 July 1881 shed light on the reasons for their estrangement. Hyndman had put out a pamphlet, England for All, as a kind of commentary on the programme of the Democratic Federation he had founded the month before, in which he set out the content of a number of sections from the first volume of Capital without crediting Marx. The latter objected to this publication, chiefly because the Federation's bourgeois democratic goals conflicted with the ideas borrowed from Capital. The pamphlet would have made sense, Marx pointed out, 'for the foundation of a distinct and independent Working Class Party' (p. 103). Later, however, even though he was strongly critical of Hyndman (pp. 161-62, 234, 347), Marx admitted the objective usefulness of Hyndman's pamphlet because it propagated the ideas of Capital (p. 163).

Page Break me46.xxvi
Page me46.xxvi

Numerous letters from 1880 to 1883 show Marx's and Engels' continual interest in Ireland. At the end of 1880 in a letter to John Swinton, Marx stressed the connection between the land questions in Ireland and England. Defeat of English landlordism in Ireland, he believed, would bring about the collapse of the land system in England (p. 40). But the Land League's peasant war against English landlordism and Gladstone's rule, and the heightened activity of Irish M.P.s under Charles Parnell, led Marx to conclude that Home Rule was the only possible solution of the Irish problem. This he wrote to Jenny Longuet at the end of April 1881 (see p. 90) and Eduard Bernstein in July 1882. 'In the absence of a foreign war or the threat thereof,' he wrote, 'an Irish uprising has not the remotest prospect of success' (p. 287), and amplified: 'The only recourse remaining to the Irish is the constitutional method of gradual conquest, whereby one position is taken after another' (pp. 287-88).
Page me46.xxvi

The letters also show that Marx and Engels followed events in North America. Engels noticed 'the colossal speed with which the concentration of capitals' was taking place there (p. 251). The two friends were aware that the labour movement in the United States followed a specific and anything but easy road. Apart from objective conditions (free land in the West, and so on), the spread of socialist ideas was hindered by strong sectarian tendencies imparted by German socialist immigrants, on the one hand, and the dissociation of socialist propaganda from the daily struggle of the workers, on the other, leaving the stage free for the spread of various radical bourgeois theories. Highly popular, for example, were the ideas of the radical economist Henry George. Nationalisation of landed property, which he considered the lever of social reconstruction, found a following among farmers and those workers who still dreamed of returning to the land and were angered by the plunderous ways of real estate profiteers, railroad companies, and the like. Marx, however, thought the attempt at blaming all social evils on private landownership wholly groundless. Contrary to George's theory, cheap land in the United States was contributing to the growth of the capitalist system at a rate unheard of in Europe. In June 1881, writing of George's ideas to Swinton and Sorge, Marx described them as 'merely an attempt, tricked out with socialism, to save the capitalist régime and, indeed, to re-establish it on an even broader basis than at present' (p. 101).

Page Break me46.xxvii
Page me46.xxvii

Marx's and Engels' ties with Russian revolutionaries and public leaders continued to expand. Their letters of 1880 to 1883 to Lavrov, Vera Zasulich, Danielson, Hartmann, Minna Gorbunova and others, reflect their lasting interest in the social-economic and political processes underway in Russia and in the life of their Russian acquaintances. Revolution was in the air in Russia. Marx and Engels held that the country stood 'on the threshold of a world historical crisis' (p. 18). As before they believed that events in Russia would create a revolutionary situation in Europe (see p. 209). And even though they were wrong about the time the crisis would break out, Engels predicted quite correctly in 1882 that the collapse of the Russian Empire would be a long process that would 'go on for years' (p. 208).

Page me46.xxvii

Intensive ideological search was under way within the Narodnik (Populist) movement, leading to its split and the emergence of two groups, Narodnaya Volya (People's Will) and Chorny Peredel (General Redistribution), whose members (Georgi Plekhanov and Vera Zasulich) founded the Emancipation of Labour group, the first Russian Marxist group, in 1883, after Marx's death. The future of the peasant commune and its place in the social reorganisation, that is, the idea of non-capitalist development in Russia, was the central problem that occupied the Russian revolutionary movement at that time. Marx's works, notably Capital, were fairly well known in Russia (see p. 45), and he was repeatedly asked to give his views on the matter (see, e.g., pp. 71-72).

Page me46.xxvii

The volume contains Marx's letter to Vera Zasulich, outlining his ideas about the future of the peasant commune in Russia. The analysis in Capital, he observed, 'does not adduce reasons either for or against the viability of the rural commune', and added that it might become 'the fulcrum of social regeneration in Russia' provided 'the deleterious influences which are assailing it from all sides' are eliminated, and it is ensured normal conditions for spontaneous development (pp. 71-72). To be sure, the letter did not speak of the long reflections that led up to this answer. This we see from the drafts of the letter examining the development of the peasant commune after the abolition of serfdom in 1861 (see Vol. 24).

Page me46.xxvii

Marx had ties with the Executive Committee of Narodnaya Volya, which he and Engels considered a revolutionary party 'of exceptional devotion and vigour' (p. 18). They had always opposed terrorism as a means of political struggle, but regarded its terrorist acts in Russia's specific conditions of the time as a reaction to governmental terrorism and the absence of elementary democratic freedoms for open political struggle.

Page Break me46.xxviii

Page me46.xxviii

The volume contains a number of letters concerning the question of national independence and the views of Marx and Engels on concrete independence struggles of oppressed peoples. Engels pointed out in a letter to Kautsky in February 1882 that 'it is historically impossible for a great people to discuss this or that internal question in any way seriously so long as national independence is lacking' (p. 191).
Page me46.xxviii

Marx and Engels considered the work of setting the West European proletariat free a priority, at least for Europe, with everything else being subordinate to that aim (see p. 205). They took the example of the liberation struggle of the Slav peoples to show that the value of any movement of oppressed nations in the historical setting of the time depended on whether it clashed with the interests of the working class. They were convinced that only 'the victory of the proletariat will liberate them [the oppressed nations] in reality and of necessity' (ibid.).
Page me46.xxviii

Until the end of his life, Marx followed developments in India. In February 1881, in a letter to Danielson, he observed that serious complications had arisen there for the British government, if not a general outbreak, caused by merciless exploitation of the indigenous population (see p. 63). It was the duty of the proletariat of Europe, Marx and Engels held, to back the liberation struggles of the oppressed peoples. Marx commended the meetings organised by the French followers of Guesde in defence of the popular movement in Egypt (see p. 297).
Page me46.xxviii

At the same time, Marx and Engels warned the European socialists against indiscriminate acceptance of national movements and their leaders, calling attention to the intrinsic contradictions of social processes. 'As I see it,' Engels wrote in reference to the National Party of Egypt and its leader Arabi Pasha in August 1882, 'we can perfectly well enter the arena on behalf of the oppressed fellaheen without sharing their current illusions (for a peasant population has to be fleeced for centuries before it learns from experience), and against the brutality of the English without, for all that, espousing the cause of those who are currently their military opponents' (p. 302).
Page me46.xxviii

Reflecting on the future of the colonies, Engels said he was sure they would all become independent. But he refused to predict how exactly this would occur. As he saw it, revolutions could win in India and Algeria and Egypt. That, he added, 'would certainly suit us best' (p. 322), meaning the revolutionary proletariat in the advanced countries. Engels assumed, however, that the proletarian revolution would first occur in Europe, and the colonial countries would 'have to be temporarily taken over by the proletariat and guided as rapidly as possible towards independence' (ibid.).

Page Break me46.xxix
Page me46.xxix

Marx's and Engels' letters to each other in the last few years of their joint activity produce an inspiring picture of intellectual collaboration and intimacy. Engels, naturally, saw to it that Marx had the best doctors and the best health resorts in Europe, and even Algeria. 'Your altruistic concern for me is unbelievable,' Marx wrote in September 1882 (p. 326). But bereavements occurred one after the other: Marx's wife died in 1881, and his eldest daughter Jenny in January 1883. This was a blow Marx could not survive. He passed away on 14 March 1883.

Page me46.xxix

'Mankind is the poorer for the loss of this intellect — the most important intellect, indeed, which it could boast today,' wrote Engels (p. 462), who was destined to outlive his friend and carry on the cause to which they had both devoted their lives.

* * *

Page me46.xxix

Volume 46 contains 257 letters by Marx and Engels, of which 138 are published in English for the first time and 119 were published in this language earlier, 45 of them in part only. Those previously published in English are indicated in the notes. The Appendices present four letters of Jenny Longuet's and one of Jenny Marx's. They contain thoughts expressed by Marx at one time or another and show his attitude towards various events. All the letters in the Appendices appear in English for the first time.
Page me46.xxix

Obvious slips of the pen have been silently corrected. Proper and place names and separate words the authors had abbreviated, are given in full. Defects in the manuscripts are indicated in the footnotes, while passages of lost or illegible texts are indicated by omission points. Texts crossed out by the authors are reproduced in footnotes only where they substantially affect the meaning.

Page Break me46.xxx
Page me46.xxx

Foreign words and expressions are retained in the form in which they were used by the authors, with a translation where necessary in the footnotes, and are italicised (if underlined by the authors, they are given in spaced italics). English words and expressions used by Marx and Engels in texts written in German and French are printed in small caps. Longer passages written in English in the original are placed in asterisks.
Page me46.xxx

The numbers of notes relating to the same facts and events given in the texts of different letters, are duplicated.
Page me46.xxx

The texts of the letters and the notes were prepared by Alexander Zubkov. He also wrote the preface. The volume was edited by Valentina Smirnova. The name index and the indexes of quoted and mentioned literature and of periodicals were prepared by Victoria Reznikova (Institute of the History and Theory of Socialism).
Page me46.xxx

The translations were made by Rodney Livingstone, Peter and Betty Ross and Stanley Mitchell and edited by Nicholas Jacobs (Lawrence & Wishart), K.M. Cook, Stephen Smith, Margarita Lopukhina, Andrei Skvarsky and Yelena Vorotnikova (Progress Publishers) and Norire Ter-Akopyan (USSR Academy of Sciences).
Page me46.xxx

The volume was prepared for the press by the editor Margarita Lopukhina (Progress Publishers).

Page Break me46.1

KARL MARX
and FREDERICK ENGELS

LETTERS
January 1880-March 1883

Page Break me46.2
Page Break me46.3

1880

1
ENGELS TO WILHELM LIEBKNECHT
IN LEIPZIG
Page me46.3
London, 10 January 1880

Dear Liebknecht,

Your-letter arrived slap in the middle of the festive hurly-burly which, in view of the multiplication of the Marx family†1 and also because two of our friends†a from Manchester were staying with us, assumed pretty formidable proportions. In order to forward your letter I had to consult the latest POST OFFICE DIRECTORY which was not to be had except at some distance from this house. Enfin†b I laid my hands on it at the beginning of this week and sent your letter to Alexander Macdonald Esq. M.P.
Well Hill (according to the DIRECTORY, Well hl.)
by Hamilton, North Britain (N.B.)
Macdonald is the bigger scoundrel of the two†2 but more deeply involved officially with the coal miners. Maybe you will get his reply before mine. As soon as Parliament opens, you can address your letters simply: Alexander Macdonald, House of Commons.
Page me46.3
Since you say you have asked Macdonald for the documents mentioned in the main body of your letter, I shall of course do nothing further on this score until I hear from you again.
Page me46.3
The silver and/or bimetallism†3 affair is the chimera of a few cotton speculators in Liverpool. Since it is virtually only silver that circulates among the Indian and Chinese traders, and silver has fallen from 1/15.5 to 1/17.5-1/18 of the value of gold over the past 10 years, this circumstance has, of course, further accentuated the crisis in the said article brought about by the over-export of cotton goods to the Far East. In the first place, prices fell as the result of increased supply, and then, on top of that, these depressed prices represented an even lower gold value than hitherto so far as the English exporter was concerned. The crafty men of Liverpool, to whom it was quite inconceivable that cotton could ever fall in price as well, now blamed everything on the difference in the currency and thought that all would be in order and the Indo-Chinese trade would flourish, once it had been decreed here that silver should again be 1/15.5 of the value of gold; i.e. that the British public must put up with silver at 13%-15% above its value so that cotton goods exporters might profit by that amount. That's all there is to the swindle, and a few more CROTCHET-MONGERS have latched on to it. It was never of any significance. Not long ago The Times was philanthropic enough to opine that gold currency was unsuited to so poor a country as Germany and that it would be preferable to revert to the more convenient silver currency — in the unspoken hope of creating an outlet for the London money market where the latter could dispose of its depreciated silver at a price higher than its value. Again a pious hope, of course, just like our friend Bismarck's childish fancy not long since to go back to bimetallism and reissue the taler as good for all payments, although it is worth 15% less than the amount it is supposedly good for. However, the German money chaps have grown so crafty under friend Bismarck that this no longer proved an attraction and the talers that had been issued came hurtling back at lightning speed into the Bank and the imperial treasuries.

Page Break me46.4
Page me46.4
I, too, wish you and all the others success in the New Year, as I do the Russian revolution which will surely get under way in the course of it and at once impose a quite different character upon Europe. For this too we are largely indebted to our friend Bismarck. With his ostentatious trip to Austria and the alliance he concluded there†4 he presented the Russian government at precisely the right moment (for us!) with the alternative: war or revolution. Quel génie!†a

Your
F.E.

Page me46.4
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.5

2
MARX TO CHARLES WALSTONE (WALDSTEIN)†5
IN LONDON

Page me46.5
[London,] 26 January 1880

Dear Waldhorn,†a

If I don't find you in, I shall leave this note for you. I am prepared to come at 7 o'clock on Wednesday evening, WIND AND WEATHER PERMITTING. THAT IS TO SAY, IF IT BE NOT TOO COLD FOR THE PRESENT CONDITIONS OF MY corpus delicti.†b For in this world all promises are relative.

Meanwhile, salut
Your
Moor

Page me46.5
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 50, Moscow, 1981

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

3
ENGELS TO CARL HIRSCH
IN LONDON
Page me46.5
Page me46.5
[London,] 17 February 1880

Dear Hirsch,

Many thanks for the banker's letter which I return herewith. But I have not the faintest idea what can be meant by 'negotiated á 340c'. I can discover no rational connection whatever between this figure and German or Austrian currency. If the man would tell us how many marks he thinks he will be able to get for 200 Austrian gulden,

Page Break me46.6
Borkheim could decide what to do, and I think he would probably send them to him for realisation.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.6

First published in Marx/Engels, Werke, Bd. 39, Berlin, 1968

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

4
MARX TO BERNHARD KRAUS†6
IN LONDON
Page me46.6
[Copy]

[London,] 26 March 1880

Dear Dr Kraus [Kranz?],

I had quite forgotten that today was Good Friday; hence found the Café Royal shut on arriving there with my daughter Eleanor at 12 o'clock, waited until 1 o'clock and, not seeing you arrive, [proceeded?] to your hotel. Would you be so kind as to write to me today — so that I have your reply tomorrow — and let me know whether you might honour us with your company at dinner this Sunday at 5 o'clock (not 2).
Page me46.6
With best wishes from MISS Eleanor.

Yours,
Karl Marx

Page me46.6
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to a copy in an unknown hand

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.7

5
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER†7
IN GENEVA
Page me46.7
London, 1 April 1880

Dear Old Man,

This is to notify you that I have taken out a money order for you at the post office for four pounds sterling — should amount to 100 frs 80 cts — and hope it will reach you safely. I trust that your health and that of your wife has improved now that the bitter winter is happily behind us. Here things are so-so. Mrs Marx is still not quite up to the mark and Marx, too, could be better. When winter's over, he always has his worst time; his coughing fits prevent him from sleeping.

Page me46.7

For the rest, things have reverted to what they were in 1850. The Workers' Society has split up into a multitude of parties†8 — Most here, Rackow there — and it is as much as we can do not to get drawn into this maelstrom.†a So many storms in a teacup, which may have an altogether salutary effect on some of the participants in that they contribute to their development but, so far as the march of events is concerned, whether 100 German working men here declare themselves for this side or for that is pretty immaterial. If they could exert any influence on the English — but there's no question of that. In his thirst for action Most cannot keep still but nor, for that matter, can he get anything done; people in Germany just won't see that, because Most has been statutorily slung out of the country, the moment of revolution is at hand. The Freiheit is to become, by hook or by crook, the most revolutionary paper in the world, but this cannot be achieved simply by repeating the word 'revolution' in every line. Luckily it matters very little what's in the paper and what isn't. The same thing applies to the Zurich organ,†b which advocates revolution one day, only to declare on the next that a violent upheaval is the greatest of misfortunes, which is afraid on the one hand of being outdone by Most's rhetoric and fears on the other that the workers may take its own rhetoric to heart. Well, take your pick between the empty rantings of the Freiheit and the narrow philistinism of the Sozialdemokrat.

Page Break me46.8

Page me46.8

I fear that our friends in Germany are deluding themselves as to the kind of organisation that ought to be maintained under present circumstances. That elected members of parliament should wish to place themselves in the van because there would otherwise be no leadership — to that I have no objection. But they can neither demand nor impose the implicit obedience that could be demanded by the former party leadership, specifically elected for the purpose. Least of all under present circumstances, without a press, without mass meetings. The more loose-knit the organisation now seems to be, the more tightly-knit it is in reality. Instead of this, the old system is to be retained, the party leadership is to have the final say (although there is no congress to discipline or, if necessary, dismiss it), and anyone who attacks one of its members is branded a heretic. At the same time, the best of them are themselves aware that they have in their midst all sorts of incapable and otherwise not very savoury persons, and they must be obtuse indeed if they fail to see that it is not they who are in control of their organ, but Höchberg, thanks to his money-bags, and with him his fellow philistines Schramm and Bernstein. In my view, the old party, together with its former organisation, is finished. When, as may be expected, the European movement shortly gets going again, then it will be joined by the vast mass of the German proletariat, of which the 500,000 men of 1878†9 will form the trained and educated nucleus, and then, too, the old 'rigorous organisation' deriving from the Lassallean tradition will become a brake which, though it might hold back a waggon, no one could hope to apply to an avalanche.

Page me46.8

At the same time, these men are doing a number of things which may wholly disrupt the party. First, the party is to go on maintaining its former agitators and editors by saddling itself with a mass of papers which contain nothing more than may be found in any middle-class local rag. And the workers are supposed to tag along with that indefinitely! Secondly, their bearing in the Reichstag and in the Saxon Diet is for the most part so meek as to discredit both them and the party in the eyes of the whole world; they make 'positive' suggestions to the existing government as to how it might do better in minor questions of detail, etc. And the workers, who have been declared outside the law and delivered up, bound hand and foot, to the tender mercies of the police, are expected to regard this as adequate representation! Thirdly, there is their tolerance of the philistine petty bourgeoiserie of the Sozialdemokrat. In every letter we are told that we must on no account believe any reports of splits or differences of opinion within the party, but everyone who comes here from Germany assures us that our people are completely bewildered by this conduct on the part of their leaders and that they by no means agree with it. Nor could it be otherwise, given the character of our workers which has so splendidly stood the test. It is a peculiarity of the German movement that all the mistakes committed by the leadership are invariably put right by the masses, and no doubt such will again be the case this time.†10

Page Break me46.9
Page me46.9

Well, keep your pecker up and drop us a line occasionally. Borkheim is still in pretty well the same helpless condition as before.†a

Your
F.E.

Page me46.9
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

6
ENGELS TO H. MEYER
IN LONDON
Page me46.9
[London,] 3 April 1880
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

Mr H. Meyer,

Your favour of 25 March†11 did not come into my hands until late at night on Saturday, 27 March, and hence, if only for that reason, I could not accept your invitation.
Page me46.9
In view of the rifts and differences of opinion that have recently occurred among German Social-Democrats here and elsewhere, I am unable for the time being to declare myself in favour either of one party or of the other, especially as I cannot but reprobate, not only the policy of the Zurich Sozialdemokrat, but also and no less that of the London Freiheit.†b

Page Break me46.10
Page me46.10
I would request you to be good enough to convey this to the executive, and meanwhile remain

Yours very truly,
F. Engels

Page me46.10
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXIX, Moscow, 1946

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

7
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL
IN LEIPZIG
Page me46.10
[London, after 27 April 1880]†12

[...]†a so as to make the whole thing impossible without actually prohibiting it.
Page me46.10
Mr Hasselmann will soon become harmless if you people bring to light really compromising facts about him and take the wind out of his sails in the Reichstag, i.e. proceed in a frankly revolutionary way, which can be done by using quite temperate language, as you yourself did in exemplary fashion in your speech on the persecutions.†13 If, however, a person is constantly afraid of being thought by the philistine, as often happens, to be a bit more extreme than he really is, and if in fact the enclosed cutting from the Kölnische Zeitung is correct in reporting that the Social-Democrats have brought a motion intended to restore the guild privilege of trading in home-made goods, then the Hasselmanns and Mosts will have an easy task.

Page me46.10

None of this, however, is really of much consequence. What is now keeping the party alive is unobtrusive, spontaneous activity on the part of individuals; like its organisation, it is kept going by their irrepressible journeyings. In Germany we have fortunately reached the stage when every action of our adversaries is advantageous to us; when all historical forces are playing into our hands, when nothing, absolutely nothing, can happen without our deriving advantage from it. For that reason we can quietly allow our adversaries to work for us. Bismarck is working for us like a real Trojan. He has now won Hamburg for us†14 and will shortly also make us a present, first of Altona, and then of Bremen. The National Liberals†15 are working for us, even though all they do is submit to kicks and vote taxes. The Catholics are working for us, even though they voted first against, and then for, the Anti-Socialist Law,†16 in return for which they, too, have simply been delivered by Bismarck over to the tender mercies of the government, i.e. also placed outside the law. Anything we can do is a mere drop in the ocean compared with what events are doing for us at this moment. Bismarck's feverish activity, which is throwing everything into disorder and putting everything out of joint without achieving anything of a remotely positive nature; which is stretching the philistine's tax-paying potential to the utmost limit, and this for nothing and worse than nothing; which wants one thing one day and the opposite the next and is forcibly driving into the arms of the revolution the philistine who would so gladly grovel at his feet — this is our strongest ally, and I'm delighted at your being able to confirm from actual observation that there has in fact been a shift to the left, as was inevitable in the circumstances.

Page Break me46.11

Page me46.11

In France, too, things are progressing well. Our communist viewpoint is breaking new ground everywhere and the best of those advocating it are all of them former anarchists who have come over to us without our raising a finger.†a Unanimity has thus been established among European socialists; any who are still shilly-shallying aren't worth mentioning now that the last remaining sect, the anarchists, has melted away. There, too, we find increasingly a general shift to the left among the bourgeois and peasants, as you have already remarked; but there's one snag here: this shift to the left is primarily tending towards a war of retribution and that must be avoided.

Page me46.11

The victory of the Liberals here has at least one good aspect in that it puts a spoke in the wheel of Bismarck's foreign policy.†17 Since he might just as well dismiss the Russian war from his mind now, he will, as usual, doubtless sell his ally — Austria — to the first comer. After all, the bitter experiences of 1864-66 have already shown the Austrians that Bismarck seeks allies only to betray them†18 — but they're too stupid and will again fall into the trap.

Page Break me46.12

Page me46.12

In Russia, too, everything is proceeding splendidly, despite judicial murder, banishments and an appearance of calm. You can't banish sheer lack of money. Not one banker will make a loan without a guarantee from the Imperial Assembly. Hence the present desperate recourse to an internal loan. On paper it will be a success, in reality a total failure. And then they will have to convene some assembly or other if only to obtain cash — always supposing something else doesn't happen in the meantime.

Page me46.12

Kindest regards to you and Liebknecht from Marx and

Yours
F.E.

Page me46.12
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

8
ENGELS TO PAUL LAFARGUE†19
IN LONDON
Page me46.12
London, 4 May 1880

My dear Lafargue,

What are we to do about the introduction Malon has submitted?†20 Grateful as I am for his good intentions, what is needed here are facts, and where would he get them from? The history of German socialism from 1843 to 1863 is not yet in print, and Malon's German friends in Zurich know hardly anything about that period, which preceded their entry into political life. So it is natural enough that Malon's introduction should omit the most important facts while going into details which can hardly interest the French reader and should, besides, be riddled with mistakes of a fairly serious kind. To mention only one — Lassalle was never editor of the Neue Rheinische Zeitung. He never so much as contributed to it, if one excepts a feuilleton in a single issue — a feuilleton which was, moreover, completely rewritten by the editorial staff. At that time Lassalle was almost wholly taken up with the adulteries and divorce proceedings of Countess Hatzfeldt and her husband†21; and had he offered to join the editorial department, we should have refused outright to associate ourselves with a man up to his eyes in the filth necessarily arising from the conduct of such a scandalous case. Neither Marx nor I have ever collaborated with Lassalle. In about 1860 he suggested we should join him in founding a big daily newspaper in Berlin, but the conditions we laid down were such that he was bound to find them unacceptable.†22

Page Break me46.13

Page Break me46.14

Page Break me46.15

Page me46.15

Come to that, if someone is needed to introduce me to the French public, as is very possible, it seems to me that it could only be you, who have taken the trouble to translate my articles†a and who alone are in a position to get hold of the necessary information which I have asked Marx to let you have. To my mind, I owe it to you as much as to myself to take on no one else.

Yours ever,
F. Engels

Page me46.15
First published in F. Engels, P. et L. Lafargue, Correspondance, t. I, Paris, 1956

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

9
MARX TO PAUL LAFARGUE†23
IN LONDON
Page me46.15
[London, circa 4-5 May 1880]

Dear Lafargue,

Here is the fruit of my consultation (of yesterday evening) with Engels. Polish the phrases, leaving the gist intact.

Yours ever,
Karl Marx

Page me46.15
First published as a facsimile in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 19, Moscow, 1961

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.16

10
MARX TO FERDINAND DOMELA NIEUWENHUIS†24
IN THE HAGUE
Page me46.16
London, 27 June 1880
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

Dear Sir,

At the urgent insistence of my doctor I must refrain from work of any kind for some time to come; [indeed]†a I should already have left London on a recuperative trip to the seaside or mountains had I not been prevented from doing so by the very serious illness of my wife. Letters sent to the above address, however, will always find me, as they will be forwarded.
Page me46.16
But my present state of health apart, I could not have complied with your request,†25 if only because I don't know enough Dutch to be able to judge whether this or that expression is appropriate.
Page me46.16
Nevertheless, to go by the essays of yours I have read in the Jahrbuch der Sozialwissenschaft (Volume I, Second Half),†26 I have not the slightest doubt that you are the right man to provide the Dutch with a résumé of Capital — I would also mention en passant that Mr Schramm (C.A.S., p. 81)†b misconstrues my theory of value. From a note in Capital to the effect that A. Smith and Ricardo are mistaken in lumping together value and price of production†27 (let alone market prices, therefore) — he could already have gathered that the connection between 'value' and 'price of production', hence also between 'value' and the market prices that oscillate about the 'price of production', has no place whatever in the theory of value as such, still less can it be anticipated by cliché-ridden, scholastic generalisations.
Page me46.16
Under present circumstances the 2nd part of Capital†28 cannot appear in Germany, which I am quite glad of inasmuch as certain economic phenomena are, at this precise moment, entering upon a new phase of development and hence call for fresh appraisal.
Page me46.16
With kindest regards,

Yours sincerely,
[Karl Marx]

Page me46.16
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Istorik-marksist, Vol. 6 (40), Moscow, 1934

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.17

11
ENGELS TO MINNA GORBUNOVA
IN BIARRITZ
Page me46.17
London, 22 July 1880
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

Dear Madam,

After a number of vagaries, your letter from Biarritz†29 has safely reached me here, where I have been living for the past 10 years, and I hasten to let you have such information as it is within my power to give.
Page me46.17
I have talked over the matter with my friend Marx, and we both take the view that no better sources on the English industrial school system are to be had over here than the official reports†a you already possess. The content of other non-official literature on the subject amounts to little more than window-dressing, where it is not expressly designed to provide an advertisement for some humbug or other. I shall have a look round and see if I can find anything that might interest you among the reports of the SCHOOL BOARDS and the Education Department in recent years, and shall send you further details if you would be so kind as to let me know to what address I should write or send packages, either within the next fortnight or so, or else in the autumn (since I shall be away from London for some time†30). The industrial education of young people is in an even worse state here than in most countries on the Continent and what is being done, is done mostly for appearances' sake. You will have seen from the actual reports that the 'INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS' are by no means on a par with continental industrial schools, but are a kind of penal institute where neglected children are committed for a given number of years by order of court.
Page me46.17
On the other hand, the efforts made in America might perhaps be of greater interest to you. The United States has sent a wealth of material connected with this to the Paris Exhibition,†31 material which must be lodged in the big library in the rue Richelieu†32 and of which you will find details in the catalogue of the exhibition at the said library.

Page Break me46.18
Page me46.18

I am further endeavouring to find out for you the address of a Mr Da Costa†a in Paris; his son†b played a part in the Commune in 1871, and the father is himself employed in education, is passionately interested in his profession and would be more than willing to be of assistance to you.
Page me46.18
Again, the schools for the further education of adult working men over here are not as a rule up to very much. Where anything worth while is done, it is usually thanks to special circumstances and individual personalities, i.e. local and temporary. In all such matters, the only element that systematically recurs here is humbug. The best of establishments relapse after a short while into a stultifying routine and the avowed purpose increasingly becomes a pretext for the employees to earn their keep as comfortably as possible. So much is this the rule that even establishments for the education of the children of the middle classes — bourgeoisie — form no exception. Indeed I have latterly come across a number of notable instances of this very kind.
Page me46.18
I am sorry that at this stage I should not myself be able to place any fresh material at your disposal; for a number of years it has unfortunately been impossible for me to follow the course of public education in any detail. Otherwise I should have been only too delighted to be able to offer you more. Everything that furthers public education and hence the movement, however indirectly, in a country such as Russia, which stands on the threshold of a world historical crisis, and has produced a dynamic party of exceptional devotion and vigour — everything of this nature commands our most ardent sympathy.
Page me46.18
I am, Madam,

Yours truly,
F. Engels

Page me46.18
First published in Russian and in the language of the original (German) in the book Neizdanniye pisma F. Engelsa (F. Engels' Unpublished Letters), Leningrad, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.19

12
MARX TO PHILIP STEPHEN KING†33
IN LONDON
Page me46.19
[London,] 27 July 1880
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

Dear Sir,

Please send me:

Part IV of Reports from Her M's Consuls.

Yours truly,
Karl Marx

Page me46.19
First published in the language of the original (English) in Marx-Engels Jahrbuch, Nr. 8, Berlin, 1985

Reproduced from the original

13
ENGELS TO MINNA GORBUNOVA
IN BIARRITZ
Page me46.19
London, 2 August 1880
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

Dear Madam,

In all haste — for several days my house has been full of friends, come on a visit from the provinces — herewith the address:
Page me46.19
M. Da Costa, 40 rue Gay-Lussac, Paris. Since I have only seen the old gentleman once and very briefly, he will certainly not remember me. But all you need say by way of introduction is that Marx obtained the address expressly for you through his son-in-law Longuet — who is a friend of young Da Costa's.†a

Page Break me46.20
Page me46.20
In the course of this week I shall have time to write to you at greater length, and shall address my letter to Paris, poste restante.
Page me46.20
Meanwhile I remain,

Yours faithfully,
F. Engels

Page me46.20

First published in Russian and in the language of the original (German) in the book Neizdanniye pisma F. Engelsa (F. Engels' Unpublished Letters), Leningrad, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

14
ENGELS TO MINNA GORBUNOVA†34
IN PARIS
Page me46.20
London, 5 August 1880
122†a Regent's Park Road, N.W.

Dear Madam,

Further to my brief note sent to Biarritz,†b all I can tell you is that I don't in fact know of any documents or reports I could recommend to you other than those first enumerated by yourself in your previous esteemed letter.†35 However, after the school holidays, when the various people I'm acquainted with return, I shall make further inquiries, and if I find anything new, shall send it to you in Moscow†36 or report to you further. In order that such correspondence should appear perfectly innocuous, I shall write in English and sign myself E. Burns. When communicating with me from there, you could address your letters: Miss E. Burns, 122 Regent's Park Road, N.W., London. An inner envelope is unnecessary; she is my niece.
Page me46.20
I was most interested to hear about your activities in Moscow and about the prospect of your setting up an industrial school with the help of the president of the zemstvo†c†37; we, too, have the statistical reports of all the Russian zemstva over here, as in general quite excellent

Page Break me46.21
material on economic conditions in Russia, but unfortunately I cannot look it out at this moment as it is at Marx's house and he and all his family are away at the seaside.†38 However it wouldn't be much help to me in answering your inquiry,†39 since this calls for a knowledge of the relevant branches of the cottage industry, its operation, products and competitiveness, and that can only be acquired on the spot. All in all it seems to me that most, at any rate, of the branches of industry you mentioned would probably be capable of competing with large-scale industry for some time yet. Industrial revolutions such as these progress extremely slowly; even the handloom has not yet been entirely superseded in some branches in Germany, whereas in England those same branches did away with it 20 or 30 years ago. In Russia that process might well be even slower. After all, the long winter provides the peasant with a great deal of spare time, and even if he only earns something during the day, that is still so much gain. Admittedly these primitive forms of production cannot escape their ultimate demise, and in a highly developed industrial country, as here, for example, one might claim that it would be more humane to accelerate this process of dissolution rather than prolong it. In Russia the situation may well be different, especially as there is some prospect there of violent changes in the political situation as a whole. The minor palliatives which have proved virtually useless in Germany, as you yourself have of course discovered, and also elsewhere, might in Russia help the people on occasion to surmount the political crisis and keep their industry going until such time as they also have a say. The schools, however, might perhaps enable them to get at least some idea of what they ought to say. And all genuine educative elements that are dispersed among the people will, to a greater or lesser extent, contribute to that end. Technical instruction might perhaps best achieve its aim if it sought, on the one hand, to organise the operations at any rate of the more viable branches of traditional industry in a more rational way and, on the other, to provide the children with sufficient training in general technology to facilitate their transition to other industries. Aside from such generalisations there is, at this distance, little to be said. Except that this much seems pretty clear to me: The Moscow gouvernement is unlikely to become a seat of large-scale industry in the near future, since it is remote from the coal-mining areas, and wood fuel is already in short supply. Cottage industry in some, if not always the same, form might persist there for a bit longer even if protective tariffs were to make feasible the introduction of this or that large enterprise, such as the cotton industry of Shuya and Ivanovo in the Vladimir gouvernement. And, after all, the only way one can really help the peasants is to see that they get more land and cultivate it in associations.

Page Break me46.22
Page me46.22

Your report about the incipient decay of the obshchina†a†40 and the artel†41 confirms news that has also come to us from another quarter. Nevertheless this process of disintegration may go on for a very long time. And since the general current in Western Europe is flowing in precisely the opposite direction and, with the next convulsion, must acquire a strength of a quite different order, it may be expected that in Russia, too, which has certainly produced a great many critical minds over the past 30 years, this current will still be strong enough to make a timely appeal to the people's innate, millennial urge to associate before that urge is completely extinguished. For this reason, productive associations and other means of promoting the associate system among the people in Russia should also be looked at from an aspect other than the Western one. Admittedly they still remain no more than minor palliatives. I remain,

Yours most respectfully,
F. Engels

Page me46.22
First published in Russian and in the language of the original (German) in the book Neizdanniye pisma F. Engelsa (F. Engels' Unpublished Letters), Leningrad, 1924

Printed according to the original

15
MARX TO JOHN SWINTON
IN LONDON
Page me46.22
[Postcard]

Ramsgate, 15 August 1880
10 Cumberland Road

Dear Sir,

I got only today your letter.†42 I am staying here with my family,

Page Break me46.23
and, if your time allows, shall be very glad to see you in Ramsgate.†43

Yours truly
Karl Marx

[On the side reserved for the address]

John Swinton, Esq.
12 Norfolk Street, Strand, London

Page me46.23
First published in the language of the original (English) and in Japanese in: Suzuki Koichiro, Sihonron hekireki, Tokyo, 1971

Reproduced from the original

16
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER†44
IN GENEVA
Page me46.23
Ramsgate, 17 August 1880

Dear Old Man,

Your postcard was not forwarded to me here†30 until today and I immediately took out a money order for you for two pounds sterling, i.e. 50 frs and a few centimes (on which I wrote my London address). It goes without saying, of course, that we wouldn't let you be thrown out of your house while we were restoring our health at the seaside here. There's no need for you to make such a to-do about a few pence; that sort of thing is a matter of course between old comrades-in-arms who have been fighting under the same flag for forty years and who hearken to the same trumpet-calls.

Page me46.23

We are all here — Marx, his wife and his daughters, together with husbands and children,†a and the visit is proving especially beneficial to Marx, who, I hope, will be completely refreshed. His wife has unfortunately been ailing for some time, but is as cheerful as could be expected. I shall be returning to London next week but Marx ought to stay here as long as he possibly can.

Page Break me46.24

Page me46.24

Apropos, I should perhaps add that there's been a great muddle over the letters. Marx has never had letters of yours for safe-keeping, whereas Borkheim was supposed to have had some of yours and, when Mrs Marx was still in Geneva with you, you got her to ask Marx to get Borkheim to give them to him.†a But now Borkheim denies ever having got any from you; so what the actual facts of the case are, we over here are unable to fathom.

Page me46.24

Well, I hope that, for the time being at least, you have extricated yourself from the worst of your predicament and will get a bit of peace. Kindest regards from us all, and in particular from,

Your
F. Engels

Page me46.24

First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

17
MARX TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE
IN HOBOKEN

Page me46.24

[Ramsgate,] 30 August 1880

Dear Sorge,

I am writing from Ramsgate, where I now am with my wife†38; before that I took her up to Manchester for a consultation with my friend Dr Gumpert. She is suffering from a dangerous liver complaint.

Page me46.24

In consequence of our wanderings I only got your letter very belatedly. I am entirely of your opinion. If you can't get hold of any money — i.e. $200 — in YANKEELAND, the matter will have to be dropped.†45 What the position is here will be evident to you if only from the fact that the Égalité went under for want of 3,000 francs.†46 I will, for form's sake, let Liebknecht know about the affair.

Page me46.24
The article from The Sun received with many thanks.†47 Though he may have the best of intentions, the man nevertheless shows that he doesn't understand the first rudiments of the matter about which he writes.

Page Break me46.25
Page me46.25
De minimis non curat lex,†a and among those minima I number, inter alia, the priestly Douai.†48
Page me46.25
With warmest regards,

Your
Karl Marx

Page me46.25
First published in Briefe und Auszüge aus Briefen von Joh. Phil. Becker, Jos. Dietzgen, Friedrich Engels, Karl Marx u. A. an F.A. Sorge und Andere, Stuttgart, 1906

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

18
ENGELS TO LAURA LAFARGUE†49
IN LONDON
Page me46.25
[Bridlington Quay,] 3 September 1880

My dear Laura,

I have only a few minutes to reply to your amiable letter — we have been inspecting a geological amateur's collection this evening and tomorrow we are off to an excursion to Flamboro' Head. The weather here continues grand: regular Rhenish October weather, that is the acme of fine weather as far as I know, not a cloud on the sky, hot sun, cool bracing air at the same time. Why cannot you and Lafargue come for a week, the place is getting empty, plenty of apartments and accommodation of every sort.
Page me46.25
I have not heard from Pumps since the letter I had at Ramsgate dated, I believe, 15th August. I wrote her at once, and since then, on arrival in London, last Friday†b this day week, a postcard, but no reply. Now I am almost certain that she has written to Sarah or her mother Mrs Nicholls who stays in our house during my absence.

Page Break me46.26
Would it be too much trouble for you to call there and inform me of the result of your inquiries as I am getting rather anxious and as I am sure there is some misunderstanding abroad by which I am kept without news?
Page me46.26
It is now half past nine at night, all windows wide open and yet the fine cool air outside will not come in rapidly enough to enable me to keep my coat on. The beer — oh the beer, it would be worth your while to come here only in order to drink one glass of beer at the Pier refreshment rooms, a nice little café — such splendid beer!
Page me46.26
Moore and Beust are off to the 'Parade' (such a thing you know is de rigueur†a at every seaside place) to hear the music and hunt backfishes, of which there are excellent specimens here; you know the backfish†b lives on dry land. At all events before leaving they wished to be kindly remembered to both of you.†c

Yours affectionately
F. Engels

Page me46.26
First published in the language of the original (English) in: F. Engels, P. et L. Lafargue, Correspondance, t. I, Paris, 1956

Reproduced from the original

19
ENGELS TO PAUL LAFARGUE†50
IN LONDON
Page me46.26
Bridlington Quay, Yorkshire,
3 September 1880
7 Burlington Place

My dear Lafargue,

Why Geneva?†51 The seat of the Swiss Federal Government is Berne and, besides, any other Swiss town would do as well as Geneva. Unless you have specific objections, of which I may be unaware, the stuff might just as well be deposited in Zurich where someone could undoubtedly be found to take charge of the business. If it suits you, send the things to me here and we will readdress them to someone who will immediately attend to them.

Page Break me46.27

May the soil rest lightly

On the egalitarian Égalité.†46

Yours ever,
F. Engels

Page me46.27
First published in F. Engels, P. et L. Lafargue, Correspondance, t. I, Paris, 1956

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

20
ENGELS TO PAUL LAFARGUE†19
IN LONDON
Page me46.27
Bridlington Quay, 9 September 1880

My dear Lafargue,

I had to write to you in haste the day before yesterday†52 because we were due to leave at 9.30 for an excursion to Flamboro' Head where our two naturalists†a botanised in the sea. In case I didn't express myself clearly enough, let me summarise.
Page me46.27
The more serious aspect of Grant's scheme is that he alone has the right to raise or lower the value of your shares, if not make them virtually worthless. To begin with, he is deducting 12% per annum for the first 4 guides. If the gross profit amounts to 15%, that leaves a net profit, the shareholders' dividend, of only 3%; if 20% it leaves 8%, etc. But with the generous salaries Grant proposes to pay the local directors, can one count on such profits? That seems to me exceedingly doubtful.
Page me46.27
Let us suppose, however, that the gross profit amounts to 20% or even 25%. What will Grant do then? He will propose to borrow yet more money so as to launch the remainder of the guides. And he will claim that he can only obtain that money at 15% or 20%. Since he will have a ready-made majority, the vote will go his way. And since you and Jervis won't be able to obtain the money at a cheaper rate, you will get nowhere at all by opposing him. Well then, £3,000 at 12%, £3,000 at 20%, gives an average of 16% — just imagine how a business can function if it is saddled with interest at that rate before so much as a thought can be paid to dividends.

Page Break me46.28
Page me46.28
There is nothing to prevent Grant providing you with funds, as soon as there is a further need of them, at still higher interest, the rate of which will depend upon him alone. Since it is he who pockets the interest, at least the greater part thereof, it is in his interest to approach as closely as possible the rate of gross profit generated by the firm. He shares the interest only with the man who advances this money — the net profit he shares with all the other shareholders.

Page me46.28

So in fact the value of your PAID UP shares goes down and down and Grant alone has the right to reduce it to nothing. In other words he pays the two of you for your literary property 1. £400; 2. £300 each the moment it suits him to get rid of you; 3. in virtually worthless shares carrying no dividend; total £500 each, always provided Grant does not find a way of avoiding payment of the £300 — which wouldn't be too difficult — by accusing you of breach of contract, in which case there would be a fine old lawsuit costing you much more than £300, even if you won.
Page me46.28

Grant cannot invoke your letter. Even if it contains what he alleges, that letter ceases to be valid after the month during which you were bound by it.
Page me46.28

Jervis' interest is not identical with yours. If he has neglected his affairs and is prepared to sacrifice the lot of them for £300 a year, that goes to show that they weren't worth the trouble of discussing. Jervis is staying in London. Once launched by Grant on this enterprise, it is in his interest to be launched by him on other enterprises, to act as his UNDERSTRAPPER until such time as he has enough money and enough financial contacts to do without him. You have an entirely different interest. You are going to Paris, you hope to find an assured existence in this enterprise. Ask yourself if such is to be found under the terms proposed by Grant.
Page me46.28

It is likewise in the interests of your SOLICITOR, evidently another underling, to pay court to Grant. And this applies to everyone save yourself. All the more reason not to conclude anything in haste.

Page Break me46.29
Page me46.29

Jervis has undertaken to find the necessary capital; well and good, but this must obviously be on terms acceptable to you, and not on such as would deliver you over bound hand and foot to a money-lender of the first water.
Page me46.29

You would do well to sound Bradshaw. The latter has a twofold interest in coming to an arrangement with you in respect both of this country and of the Continent. If only as a means of putting pressure on Grant. It would be better still to have a choice between the two. And Bradshaw cannot allow himself to go in for the sharp practices that are the other man's stock-in-trade. Unfortunately you can no longer have full confidence in Jervis, once he claims to have tired of the matter and advises you to accept forthwith.
Page me46.29

That is, of course, the gloomier aspect of the affair. Grant may possibly have more generous intentions, but once the contract has been signed you will be at his mercy, of that you may be certain.
Page me46.29

With a man like Grant I see no means of safeguarding oneself. You could insert a condition that all net profits must be used to pay off the £3,000 and that no dividends are distributed so long as the company is paying interest of more than 6% — they would either not accept it or find a way of deleting if at the first shareholders' meeting. And that would merely safeguard the first £3,000; as regards subsequent borrowings it would do nothing of the kind; it would be nonsensical to repay with one hand and borrow with the other.

Page me46.29

My advice is try to manage without Grant and, if you can't, at least try to make him fear that you can do without him, so that he robs you a little less UNMERCIFULLY than he intended. He will rob you anyhow.

Page me46.29

The weather here continues magnificent, sunshine all the time, bracing air, north-east breeze, sea-bathing already somewhat bracing, but this evening I fear I shall have to wear an overcoat as at Ramsgate. The visitors are quite different from those at Ramsgate. Here we have the SHOPKEEPER, the small manufacturer, the TRADESMAN from Leeds, Sheffield, Hull, etc., an atmosphere decidedly more provincial yet at the same time more solid than at Ramsgate; no 'ARRYS. What strikes you most is the fact that all the young girls are backfish†a between 14 and 17 years — what you call the ugly age, although there are some very pretty ones here. Of young girls fashioned to perfection there are none or virtually none. No sooner have they ceased to be backfish than they're put into long skirts and, so it would seem, get married. All the women of 18 and over that one sees are accompanied by their husbands and even by children. Nor did poor Beust, who casts tender glances at the backfish, succeed in initiating any amorous exchanges, however brief. Papa and mama, like the Prussians of Frederick II, are 'constantly on sentry go'.

Page Break me46.30

Page me46.30

My best wishes to Laura. The two herbalists†a send their compliments. The thing has been sent to Beust's father†b in Zurich. The newspapers will be returned to you. I don't know Marx's whereabouts, for I have not had word from him.

Yours ever,
F. Engels

Page me46.30

First published in F. Engels, P. et L. Lafargue, Correspondance, t. I, Paris, 1956

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

21

MARX TO NIKOLAI DANIELSON†53

IN ST PETERSBURG†54
Page me46.30
Ramsgate, 12 September 1880

My dear Sir,

I need not tell you that I should feel only too happy to do anything you consider useful,†55 but a short statement of the circumstances in which I find myself at this moment will convince you that I am at present unfit for theoretical labour. Having been sent here by the medical men in order to 'do nothing' and to restore my nervous system by the 'far niente',†c an illness of my wife, under which she suffered long time since, has suddenly been aggravated to a degree which menaces to tend to a fatal termination. Whatever little time I may snatch for work, is necessarily limited to things which I must get rid of.
Page me46.30
However, the most important part for the public in general is that which you have already performed — the drawing up of the statistical tables and the interpretation of the facts which they imply. It would be a pity if you delayed the publication which I expect myself with the greatest impatience.†56

Page Break me46.31
Page me46.31
Whatever you may have found useful in my letters for that purpose, you may freely dispose of. Only I fear it is not much, since I sent you only a few fragmentary scraps.
Page me46.31
The present crisis was the greatest England has passed through with regard to duration, extent and intensiveness,†57 but despite the failures of some Scotch and English provincial banks — the crowning of the past English great periodical crises, I mean the financial crash in London, shone by its absence. This most extraordinary incident — the absence of the monetary panic properly so called, was due to a concatenation of circumstances the analysis of which would lead me too far at present. One of the most decisive circumstances was, however, this: The heavy bullion drain of 1879 was to a great extent met by the cooperation of the Banque de France and the Imperial Bank of Germany. On the other hand, the sudden revival in the United States — since the spring of 1879 — reacted on England like a deus ex machina.†a
Page me46.31
As to the agricultural crisis, it will gather strength, develop itself, and, by the bye, come to a head, carrying with it quite a revolution in the relations of landed property, — quite independent of the cycles of the commercial-industrial crises. Even such optimists as Mr Caird have commenced 'to smell a rat'. Most characteristic of English blockheadedness is this: since two years there have been published letters of farmers — in The Times as well as in agricultural papers — giving the items of their expenses in cultivating their farms, comparing them with their returns at present prices, and winding up with a positive deficit. Would you believe that not one of the specialists — expatiating upon these accounts — has thought of considering how these accounts would stand if the item of rent was struck out in many cases or reduced 'most feelingly' in many other cases? But this is a delicate point which must not be touched. The farmers themselves, though become unbelievers in the nostrums proposed by their landlords or the 'plumitifs'†b of the latter, dare not yet assume attitudes of bold virility, considering that they, on their part, are denounced by the rustic 'labouring class'. A nice pickle it is altogether.

Page Break me46.32
Page me46.32
I hope there will be no general war in Europe. Though, ultimately, it could not check, but would rather intensify, the social, I mean thereby the economical, development, it would certainly produce a useless exhaustion of forces for some longer or shorter interval.
Page me46.32
Please to send your letters as before to my London address, from where I shall always receive them even in case of momentary absence.

Yours most sincerely
A. Williams†a

Page me46.32
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Minuvshiye gody, No. 1, St Petersburg, 1908

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

22
ENGELS TO PAUL LAFARGUE†58
IN LONDON
Page me46.32
Bridlington Quay, 12th September 1880

My dear Lafargue,

How can I advise you on business if you give me all the information afterwards? If you had sent me the draft articles†59 before, I should have known better what to say. Do not say that you had not got it; it was your business to have had it as soon as printed. Mais on dirait que vous brûlez de vous faire voler.†b
Page me46.32
You say the articles forbid to borrow at more than 10%. Whoever told you that, reckoned upon your credulity. Article 74 says distinctly that the directors can raise money upon such terms and conditions in all respects as they think fit. Now I do not know and cannot be expected to know whether the acts of parliament forbid limited companies to raise money at more than 10%. I doubt it. But if it be the fact, you have before your eyes the proof that that is no use whatever. Have you not written to me that Grant wanted to raise £3,000 — at 10% and a bonus of 20% at the end of five years? 20% divided by 5 is 4, and 10 + 4 are 14; thus, you pay really 14% for your money. Why do you not speak of that when people want to make you believe that Grant cannot get more than 10% out of your company in interest?

Page Break me46.33
Page me46.33
Then you say, Jervis and Mason had pris des garanties contre Grant, en ce que rien de nouveau pouvait être décidé sans qu'on ait au moins le vote des 4/5 des actionnaires, et que Grant n'avait que 55% et que par conséquent il ne pouvait rien faire sans votre consentement.
Page me46.33
Décidément on se moque de vous.†a In the whole agreement not a word about 4/5 of the shareholders. All resolutions by simple majorities. It may be in the acts of parliament that 4/5 are required to alter the original deed of association. But that is not the question. I have shown you the way how Grant by his system of loans at 10% and any bonus he likes, can suck all the profits out of the company. And Article 74 gives him the right to do so, without even consulting anybody but his directors who, whatever they may be, are sure to be his puppets.
Page me46.33
Secondly. All the capital being subscribed you have
Page me46.33
1) 5,000 votes for original capital — £5,000.-
Page me46.33
2) 3,000 votes for preference shares 3,000 at £5 each (Art. 49). 8,000 votes in all. Out of these you, Jervis and Mason have together 2,250 votes, that is to say not 45% against 55%, but 28% against 72%. Still more than 1/5, but not very far off. Let a few shares be sold by one of you, and the power to stop even alterations of deed of association is lost by you. You will be told that it is not intended to issue all the preference shares. But how long that remains so, will depend upon Grant.
Page me46.33
There is another article which may affect you and alter the case. Art. 21 says that for calls not yet made, but paid up by the shareholder voluntarily, interest up to 10% shall be paid. I should presume that this applies to your paid up shares, only, if it was so, Jervis and Mason would have pointed it out to you; at least I should think so. If that be the case and you can secure 10% on the greater part of your shares that would be so much in your favour. See whether it is so or not.

Page Break me46.34
Page me46.34
Upon the whole I think, after your last letter, a little more favourably of the business. If the money raised at such ruinous interest can be limited to the first £3,000.- and these repaid after the 5 years or before, the thing may work well. But it strikes me that it will require very large profits indeed to pay all these lavish expenses. £50.- to each director, £100.- to the Chairman, £? to the Manager, £300.- to the directors in London and Paris and so forth. All that with a working capital of £3,000.-, less than three times the salaries named above! And 14% interest besides.

Page me46.34
I cannot write to you about Jervis as you say you read my letters to him and Mason. Else I should have something to say to that. Anyhow, the honesty of a financier is different from that of some people, be it ever so honest in its own way.
Page me46.34
I must conclude; dinner is going to be laid. Si vous ne voyez pas d'autre voie, naturellement vous vous êtes trop avancé pour reculer tout seul. Mais réfléchissez bien, et rassurez-vous sur les points indiqués ci-dessus.
Page me46.34
Je n'ai que l'argent absolument nécessaire pour mon voyage et même peut-être pas cela. Mon CHEQUE-BOOK est á Londres oú je serai de retour samedi soir†30; jusque lá, je ne pourrai rien faire.
Page me46.34
Si vous pouvez retarder l'affaire G. jusqu'á mon arrivée, on pourrait peut-être avoir plus de renseignements.
Page me46.34
Bien des choses á Laura de la part de nous tous.

Bien á vous
F.E.
Page me46.34
Je rapporterai les articles d'association á moins que vous n'en avez un besoin immédiat.†a

Page me46.34
First published, in the languages of the original (English and French), in F. Engels, P. et L. Lafargue, Correspondance, t. I, Paris, 1956

Reproduced from the original

Page Break me46.35

23
ENGELS TO MARX
IN LONDON
Page me46.35
Bridlington Quay, 13 September 1880
7 Burlington Place

Dear Moor,

Have received the enclosed from Liebknecht. I am writing to tell him that, provided he hears nothing to the contrary within the next few days, we shall be back in London again from next Sunday, 19 September,†30 and shall be expecting them (him and Bebel).†60 So if you should be prevented in any way, kindly let me know.
Page me46.35
I haven't had an answer to a postcard sent from here to your address in Ramsgate†38 on 29 August; no doubt it didn't arrive. Yesterday I heard from Lafargue, who said you would be returning to London today.
Page me46.35
We shall be returning at the end of this week; wet weather since the day before yesterday, before which the weather was splendid.
Page me46.35
I hope your wife is better.
Page me46.35
Warmest regards to all, likewise from Moore and Beust.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.35
First published in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.36

24
MARX TO FERDINAND FLECKLES
IN KARLSBAD
Page me46.36
[London,] 29 September 1880

My Dear Friend,

My best thanks for your letter.†61 Ladies have their own ideas about things. Which is why my wife†a didn't want to reply on this side of the form, nor indeed, in accordance with any formula, but after her own fashion. Not having read her letter, I don't know whether her answer is appropriate; however, women will have their way.†b
Page me46.36
Eleanor sends her kind regards.

Tout á vous,†c
Karl Marx

Page me46.36
First published in Beiträge zur Geschichte der deutschen Arbeiterbewegung, Nr. 1, Berlin, 1966

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

25
ENGELS TO EUGEN OSWALD AND AN UNKNOWN CORRESPONDENT†62 IN LONDON
Page me46.36
[London,] 5 October 1880
122 Regent's Park Road

Dear Oswald,

Many thanks for the recommendations for Beust,†d which have all been attended to. As regards Kaulitz, I got an identical letter — my reply on the reverse. As regards Br.,†a we are unlikely to quarrel.

Page Break me46.37

Ever yours
F. Engels
Page me46.37
[On the reverse of the letter]

* (Copy) Confid.

Sir,

Mr Kaulitz was introduced to me on his arrival in England last spring, by a letter from an old friend in Germany. The letter stated that Mr Kaulitz was of a very good family, his father being one of the first notaries in Brunswick (a position of much importance and great trust in Germany), and recommended him warmly to me. From what I have seen of him since, he appears to be a man of very great business abilities and to have succeeded very well, so far, in the scholastic line; but on this point no doubt the professional gentleman to whom Mr K. may have referred you, will be able to give you more satisfactory information.

I am etc.
F.E.*

Page me46.37
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 34, Moscow, 1964

The letter to Oswald is printed according to a typewritten copy and that to the unknown correspondent reproduced from a photocopy of the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.38

26
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER
IN GENEVA
Page me46.38
London, 12 October 1880

Dear Old Man,

I've heard from Liebknecht that you're still short of cash but that they can't help you just now. By a lucky chance I was on the point of putting a five pound note on one side for you and have lost no time in changing it into a money order for 126 frs. I trust it reaches you safely and soon and will tide you over your initial difficulties until such time as the Leipzigers can do something for you. And so they damned well ought. You're certainly as much a victim of the Exceptional Law†16 as the agitators in Germany who have been deprived of their livelihood.
Page me46.38
Liebknecht was here†60 and promised that the Zurich paper†a would adopt a different attitude in keeping with the party's former attitude. If that is done, it's all we ask.
Page me46.38
Adieu and keep your pecker up.

Your old friend
F. Engels

Page me46.38
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

27

ENGELS TO HARRY KAULITZ
IN LONDON
Page me46.38
[Draft]

[London,] 28 October 1880

Mr H. Kaulitz

I return herewith Mr Burleigh's letter.
Page me46.38
As to the matter of Mr Lafargue, you concede the chief point, namely that you have given his name as a reference without his permission. The rest is beside the point.

Page Break me46.39
Page me46.39
With regard to Beust,†a I do not propose to go into the question of when you offered to give the said lessons elsewhere. This much is certain: that after our return from Bridlington Quay†30 you again offered to give lessons to Beust, that you promised, in the presence of myself and Schorlemmer, to set about the thing in the manner stipulated, that you did the opposite of what you had promised, and that Beust, far from attacking his 'very dear friend Kaulitz' behind his back, told him in Trafalgar Square exactly what he thought of him, adding quite rightly that all three of us had been convinced from the outset that you wouldn't do a single thing you had promised. I should have written you off there and then had it not been for the fact that I avoid making private matters a cause for breaking with people with whom I have been in any way connected politically.
Page me46.39
Concerning the tittle-tattle in the Central News, I will not labour the point as to whether it was you or Most who disseminated it, since I am not permitted to divulge my sources, and since, on the other hand, I lay no store at all by the agent's letter.

Page me46.39
If one is compelled to make a decision such as mine in regard to yourself, one bases it not on this or that particular indiscretion, but rather on the other's whole mode of behaviour, observed over a considerable period. And in any case your almost daily intercourse with Most and Co., which you freely admit, is quite enough to supply, in place of the fact you contest, another that is no less convincing.

Yours very truly

Page me46.39
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.40

28
MARX TO JOHN SWINTON
IN NEW YORK
Page me46.40
London, 4 November 1880
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

My dear Sir,

I have sent you today a copy of the French edition of the Capital.†63 I have at the same time to thank you for your friendly article in The Sun.†43
Page me46.40
Apart Mr Gladstone's 'sensational' failures abroad†64 — political interest centres here at present on the Irish 'Land Question'. And why? Mainly because it is the harbinger of the English 'Land Question'.
Page me46.40
Not only that the great landlords of England are also the largest landholders of Ireland, but having once broken down in what is ironically called the 'Sister'-island, the English landed system will no longer be tenable at home. There are arrayed against it the British farmers, wincing under high rents, and — thanks to the American competition — low prices; the British agricultural labourers, at last impatient of their traditional position of ill-used beasts of burden, and — that British party which styles itself 'Radical'. The latter consists of two sets of men; first the ideologues of the party, eager to overthrow the political power of the aristocracy by mining its material basis, the semi-feudal landed property. But behind these principle-spouters, and hunting them on, lurks another set of men — sharp, close-fisted, calculating capitalists, fully aware that the abolition of the old land laws, in the way proposed by the ideologues, cannot but convert land into a commercial article that must ultimately concentrate in the hands of capital.
Page me46.40
On the other side, considered as a national entity, John Bull has ugly misgivings lest the aristocratic English landed garrison in Ireland once gone — England's political sway over Ireland will go too!
Page me46.40
Liebknecht has to enter prison for 6 months. — The Anti-Socialists' Law†16 having failed to overthrow or even to weaken the German Social-Democratic organisation, Bismarck clings the more desperately to his panacea, and fancies that it must work, if only applied on a larger scale. Hence he has extended the state of siege†65 to Hamburg, Altona, and 3 other Northern towns. Under these circumstances the German friends have written me a letter of which one passage runs thus:

Page Break me46.41

'The Socialist Law, though it could not break and never will break our organisation, does impose pecuniary sacrifices almost impossible to bear. To support the families ruined by the police, to keep alive the few papers left to us, to keep up the necessary communications by secret messengers, to fight the battle on the whole line — all this requires money. We are nearly exhausted and forced to appeal to our friends and sympathisers in other countries.'
Page me46.41
So far this extract.
Page me46.41
Now, we, here at London, Paris, etc., will do our best. At the same time, I believe that a man of your influence might organise a subscription in the United States. Even if the monetary result were not important, denunciations of Bismarck's new coup d'état in public meetings held by you, reported in the American press, reproduced on the other side of the Atlantic — would sorely hit the Pomeranian hobereau†a and be welcomed by all the socialists of Europe. More information you might get from Mr Sorge (Hoboken). Any money forthcoming to be sent over to Mr Otto Freytag, Landtagsabgeordneter,†b Amtmannshof, Leipzig. His address ought of course not to be made public; otherwise the German police would simply confiscate.
Page me46.41
Á propos. My youngest daughter†c — who was not with us at Ramsgate — just tells me that she has cut my portrait from the copy of the Capital I sent you, on the pretext that it was a mere caricature. Well, I shall make up for it by a photogram to be taken on the first fine day.
Page me46.41
Mrs Marx and the whole family send you their best wishes.

Yours most sincerely,
Karl Marx

Page me46.41
First published in Science and Society, Vol. II, No. 2, New York, 1938

Reproduced from the original

Page Break me46.42

29
MARX TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE†63
IN HOBOKEN
Page me46.42
[London,] 5 November 1880

41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

Dear Sorge,

You must excuse my long silence on the grounds 1. of excessive pressure of work, 2. of my wife's exceedingly grave illness which has now lasted for something over a year.

Page me46.42

You have yourself seen what JOHN Most has blossomed out into and, on the other hand, how wretchedly the so-called party organ, the Zurich Sozialdemokrat (not to mention the Jahrbuch†a of that place) — duce†b Dr Höchberg, has been run. As a result Engels and I have been constantly engaged in acrimonious exchanges with the Leipzigers in the course of which many a hard word has been said.†c But we have eschewed any kind of public intervention. It does not befit those who are peacefully — comparativement parlant†d — ensconced abroad to contribute to the gratification of government and bourgeosie by doing anything to aggravate the position of those who are operating in the homeland under the most difficult circumstances and at considerable personal sacrifice. Liebknecht was here a few weeks ago†60 and promised 'improvement' in every respect. The party organisation has been revived, something that could only be done by secret means, i.e. in so far as 'secret' denotes secret from the police.

Page me46.42

It was, believe it or not, in a Russian socialist paper†e that I first discovered what a blackguard Most is. He has never dared print in German what is to be read here in the Russian VERNACULAR. This isn't just an attack on individual persons but a dragging-through-the-mire of the entire German workers' movement. At the same time his utter incomprehension of the doctrine in which he used to traffic is grotesquely in evidence. It's idle chatter, so silly, so illogical, so abysmal that it finally dissolves into the inane, namely into Johannes Most's unbounded personal vanity.†a

Page Break me46.43

Having failed, for all his caterwauling, to achieve anything in Germany — save, perhaps, among certain hoodlums in Berlin — he has allied himself with the Parisian successors of the Bakuninists, the group which publishes the Révolution Sociale (its circulation = 210 EXACTLY, but possesses allies in the shape of Pyat's Commune. Pyat, that cowardly, melodramatic farceur — in whose Commune I figure as Bismarck's right-hand man — has a grudge against me for having always treated him with the utmost contempt and frustrated all his attempts to use the International for his sensation-mongering). At all events there's one good thing Most has done, namely to bring together in one group all the brawlers — Andreas Scheu, Hasselmann, etc., etc.

Page me46.43

In view of Bismarck's new emergency decrees†65 and the persecution of our party members, it is absolutely essential that there should be a whip-round for the party. Yesterday I wrote and said as much to John Swinton†b (for a well-disposed bourgeois is best suited to this job), at the same time telling him that he should refer to you for further information about conditions in Germany.

Page me46.43

Apart from the inanities mentioned on the previous page — and during our long years of exile how many of the same have we not seen explode like squibs and then fizzle out again! — things in general are going splendidly (I mean the course of events in Europe as a whole), as they are within the confines of the genuinely revolutionary party on the Continent.

Page me46.43

You will probably have noticed that the Égalité, in particular, (thanks en premiére instance†c to Guesde's having come over to us and to the efforts of my son-in-law, Lafargue) has become the first 'French' workers' paper in the true sense of the term. Even Malon — albeit with the inconsistencies inseparable from his eclectic nature — has felt bound, in his Revue socialiste, (we used to be enemies, he being one of the original co-founders of the Alliance†67) to espouse le socialisme moderne scientifique,†d i.e. the German variety. I drew up a 'questionneur' [sic]†e for him which was first published in the Revue socialiste and then reprinted in quantity for distribution throughout France. Shortly afterwards Guesde came to London to collaborate with us (MYSELF, Engels and Lafargue) in drafting an electoral programme†68 for the use of the workers in the forthcoming general elections. With the exception of some foolishnesses such as minimum wages fixed by law, etc., which despite our protests Guesde thought fit to dole out to the French workers (I told him that if the French proletariat was so puerile as to require these sops SO IS IT NOT WORTH WHILE DRAWING UP ANY PROGRAMME WHATEVER), the economic section of this very short document consists (apart from some introductory words which define the communist aim in a few lines) solely of demands that have, in fact, arisen spontaneously out of the workers' movement itself. To bring the French workers down to earth out of their verbal cloud-cuckoo land was a tremendous step forward, and therefore aroused much resentment among all those French intellectual frauds who make a living as 'cloud-assemblers'. The programme was first adopted, after most vigorous opposition on the part of the anarchists, in the Région centrale — i.e. Paris and all its purlieus, and later in many other working-class areas. The simultaneous formation of opposing workers' groups — which (sauf les anarchistes,†a not made up of genuine workers, but of déclassé people with a few misguided workers for their rank-and-file) nevertheless adopted most of the 'practical' demands in the programme — as also the ventilation of the most diverse points of view in relation to other matters, is to my mind proof that this is the first real workers' movement in France. Hitherto there have been nothing but sects there which, of course, received their mot d'ordre†b from their founders, while the bulk of the proletariat followed the radical or pseudo-radical bourgeois and fought for them when the day came, only to be slaughtered, deported, etc., on the morrow by the very laddies they had placed at the helm.

Page Break me46.44

Page me46.44

The Émancipation, which first came out a few days ago at Lyons, will be the organ of the 'parti ouvrier'†c — a party that has arisen on the basis of German socialism.

Page me46.44

Meanwhile we have also had — and still have — our pioneers in the very camp of the enemy — i.e. in the radical camp. Theisz has taken on the workers' question in the Intransigeant, Rochefort's organ; after the defeat of the 'Commune' he, like all 'thinking' French socialists, came to London as a Proudhonist and, while there, changed completely as a result of personal intercourse with myself and of a conscientious study of Capital. My son-in-law,†d for his part, gave up his teaching post at King's College,†69 went back to Paris (his family, I'm glad to say, is remaining here for the time being), where he became one of the most influential editors of Justice, owned by Clemenceau, the leader of the extreme left. He has laboured to such good purpose that Clemenceau who, only last April, publicly entered the arena as the opponent of socialism and the advocate of the American-democratic-republican viewpoint, recently made an anti-Gambetta speech†a at Marseilles, in which, to judge by its general tenor no less than its references to the most essential points in the minimum programme, he came over to our side. Whether he sticks to what he promised doesn't really matter. At all events, he has introduced an element of ours into the radical party whose organs, comically enough, now admire as SOMETHING WONDERFUL, on Clemenceau's lips, what had been ignored or sneered at by them when merely a catchword emanating from the 'parti ouvrier'.

Page Break me46.45
Page me46.45

I need hardly tell you — for you know what French chauvinism is like — that the secret strings whereby the LEADERS — from Guesde-Malon to Clemenceau — have been set in motion, must remain entre nous. Il n'en faut pas parler. Quand on veut agir pour Messieurs les Français, il faut le faire anonymement, pour ne pas choquer le sentiment 'national'.†b As it is, the Anarchists denounce our co-operators already as Prussian agents, under the dictatorship of the 'notorious' Prussian agent — Karl Marx.
Page me46.45

In Russia — where Capital is more widely read and acclaimed than anywhere else — our success is even greater. On the one hand, we have the critics (mostly young university professors, some of them personal friends of mine,†c SOME also littérateurs), on the other, the terrorist Central Committee,†70 whose recent programme, clandestinely printed and published in St Petersburg,†71 aroused considerable ire among the anarchist Russians in Switzerland, who bring out The Black Redistribution†d (to translate literally from the Russian) in Geneva. Unlike the terrorists, who risk life and limb, these men — most of whom (but not all) left Russia of their own accord — constitute the so-called Propaganda Party. (In order to disseminate propaganda in Russia — they remove to Geneva! What a quid pro quo!) These gentry are all of them opposed to politico-revolutionary action. Russia is to leap head-over-heels into the anarchist-communist-atheist millennium! Meanwhile they pave the way for that leap by tedious doctrinarianism of which the self-styled principes courent la rue depuis le feu Bakounine.†a

Page Break me46.46
Page me46.46

Well, that's enough for now. Let us [hear] from you soon. Warmest regards from my wife.

Totus tuus,†b
Karl Marx
Page me46.46
I should be most grateful if you could unearth for me some sound stuff (meaty) on economic conditions in California, OF COURSE AT MY EXPENSE. California is of great moment to me because in no other place has revolution by capitalist centralisation been effected with such effrontery at such great speed.

Page me46.46
First published in Briefe und Auszüge aus Briefen von Joh. Phil. Becker, Jos. Dietzgen, Friedrich Engels, Karl Marx u. A. an F.A. Sorge und Andere, Stuttgart, 1906

Printed according to the original

30
MARX TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE
IN HOBOKEN
Page me46.46
[London,] 5 November 1880
IN HASTE

Dear Sorge,

I had just sent off a longish letter to you†c when, after the event — post festum but not before the post office closed — another point occurred to me in connection with that poor devil Borkheim. Last summer, when I went from Ramsgate†38 to see him in Hastings, where I found him ill in bed, he requested me to ask you to dun a certain Francis Murhard (215 Washington Street, Hoboken). This man owes our friend Borkheim some money — £10 if I remember aright — which he lent Murhard for the journey to America and in respect of which he possesses a promissory note.

Page Break me46.47
Page me46.47
Salut.

Your
K.M.

Page me46.47
First published in Briefe und Auszüge aus Briefen von Joh. Phil. Becker, Jos. Dietzgen, Friedrich Engels, Karl Marx u. A. an F.A. Sorge und Andere, Stuttgart, 1906

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

31
MARX TO FERDINAND FLECKLES
IN CARLSBAD
Page me46.47
[London,] 12 November 1880
IN HASTE

Dear Friend,

Herewith a card of introduction to my son-in-law Longuet who is to introduce you to Rochefort.
Page me46.47
No doubt you will by now have received the letter my wife eventually sent off; like all female invalids, she always despairs of the doctors who happen to be attending her.
Page me46.47
With kindest regards,

Yours very sincerely,
Karl Marx
Page me46.47
[Address on the envelope in Marx's hand]

Dr. F. Fleckles, Carlsbad (Austria)

Page me46.47
First published in full in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 50, Moscow, 1981

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.48

32
MARX TO ACHILLE LORIA†72
IN MANTUA
Page me46.48
London, 13 November 1880
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

Dear Mr Loria,

Domestic upsets resulting from my wife's very dangerous illness have delayed my reply to your letter of 14 September.†73 I regret that my lack of personal means does not allow me to provide for your stay in London, the more so since I have the highest opinion of your talent, your learning and your scientific future.†74
Page me46.48

Being of a somewhat solitary disposition and eschewing as I do all contact with the English press, I have very little influence and few connections to place at your disposal. I know from experience that Italian competition, as regards both contributions to the press and private lessons, is OVERDONE in London, as in every other sphere of the struggle for existence.
Page me46.48

Nevertheless, on the re-opening of Parliament — until which time everyone, i.e. THE UPPER TEN THOUSANDS, deserts the metropolis — I shall consult SOME WELL-MEANING AND INFLUENTIAL MEN. In the meantime, perhaps you would be so kind as to let me know whether you speak French and a modicum of English.

Yours very faithfully,
Karl Marx

Page me46.48
First published abridged in A. Loria, Ricordi di uno studente settuagenario, Bologna, 1927 and in full in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 34, Moscow, 1964

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

Page Break me46.49

33
MARX TO HENRY MAYERS HYNDMAN†75
IN LONDON
Page me46.49
[London,] 8 December 1880

My dear Sir,

Mrs Marx, like most sickly people whose illness has assumed a chronic character, becomes sometimes suddenly unable to leave her bedroom and then fit again for social intercourse. Believing she could within a few days pay a visit to Mrs Hyndman, she did not write to her at once, but as we are this week inundated with visitors from the Continent, she begs me to write you that she will give herself the pleasure to call upon Mrs Hyndman next week.

Page me46.49

I welcome the prospect of the journal you speak of. If you say that you do not share the views of my party for England I can only reply that that party considers an English revolution not necessary, but — according to historic precedents — possible. If the unavoidable evolution turn into a revolution, it would not only be the fault of the ruling classes, but also of the working class. Every pacific concession of the former has been wrung from them by 'pressure from without'. Their action kept pace with that pressure and if the latter has more and more weakened, it is only because the English working class know not how to wield their power and use their liberties, both of which they possess legally.

Page me46.49

In Germany the working class were fully aware from the beginning of their movement that you cannot get rid of a military despotism but by a Revolution. At the same time they understood that such a Revolution, even if at first successful, would finally turn against them without previous organisation, acquirement of knowledge, propaganda, and [word illegible]. Hence they moved within strictly legal bounds. The illegality was all on the side of government, which declared them en dehors la loi.†a Their crimes were not deeds, but opinions unpleasant to their rulers. Fortunately, the same government — the working class having been pushed to the background with the help of the bourgeoisie — becomes now more and more unbearable to the latter, whom it hits on their most tender point — the pocket. This state of things cannot last long.

Page Break me46.50

Page me46.50

Please to present my compliments to Mrs Hyndman.

Yours very truly,
Karl Marx

Page me46.50

First published in: H.M. Hyndman, The Record of an Adventurous Life, London, 1911

Reproduced from the book

34

ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER
IN GENEVA

Page me46.50

London, 24 December 1880

Dear Old Man,

This is to advise you in all haste that I have taken out a money order for you for five pounds sterling = 126 frs, which I trust you will receive.

Page me46.50

When Liebknecht was here†60 I hauled him over the coals for having failed so much as to consider you when distributing the relief fund. I told him you were just as much, if not more, a victim of the Anti-Socialist Law†16 as many of the Berliners, amongst whom there are some notorious blackguards. Now he has written to say: Becker will be cared for. So make sure this is done and, if not and supposing it embarrasses you to dun them, drop me a line and I'll see to it for you.

Better luck in the New Year.

Your old friend,
F. Engels

Page me46.50
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.51

35
MARX TO CARL HIRSCH
IN LONDON
Page me46.51
[London,] 29 December 1880

Dear Hirsch,

You would oblige me by coming here next Friday evening (7 o'clock) to dine with us and to celebrate the New Year.
Page me46.51
Salut.

K.M.

Page me46.51
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 39, Moscow, 1966

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.52

1881

36
MARX TO CHARLES LONGUET
IN PARIS
Page me46.52
[London,] 4 January 1881

Dear Longuet,

With the immense agglomerate of old newspapers it would take me too much time to find out The Eastern Post which contains the controversy of the General Council (inclus. its Communard members) with the illustrious Bradlaugh.†a76 However, I suppose Lessner will have the Post ready at hand. This, however, is for you the least important thing. That Bradlaugh denounced the Communards, that he reproduced the worst calumnies, as you told him then in the Post,†b of such papers as the Liberté, the Soir, that he fell foul of the manifesto of the General Council on 'The Civil War in France',†c etc., this will hardly damage him in the eyes of the Paris bourgeoisie. Still the thing may be shortly hinted at as characteristic of the man. In an answer of the General Secretary of the General Council (it was Hales, but that man must not be honoured by naming him) to Bradlaugh (in The Eastern Post, September 1871), he said amongst other things:

'...The wanton destruction of private dwellings (by Thiers' bombardment) was the work of Mr Bradlaugh's friends... Rochefort has been sentenced under the Republic to transportation for life for a press offence. Fancy Mr Bradlaugh being transported for life for his utterances!'†d
Page me46.52
The important thing is that Bradlaugh was denounced by the General Council (extracts of whose sittings were reported by The Eastern Post) as a Courtesan of Plon-Plon (he was at London then) and because of his suspect relations in Paris.†a In the sitting of the General Council of December 19, 1871 I (informed by the Frenchman, who wrote under the name Azamouth or another Turkish name, and who was informed by a lady — probably the Brimont, present at social gathering later on referred to) denounced a recent trip of Bradlaugh's to Paris, where he associated with Détroyat and Émile de Girardin. In his honour the latter gave a dinner where equivocuous, i.e. Bonapartist, ladies assisted and where Bradlaugh rendered himself ridiculous by the boastful display of his pretended London influence.

Page Break me46.53
Page me46.53

If Bradlaugh says that the Brimont was a great patriot, at the time he made her acquaintance, he may be fully believed. Before the battle of Sedan all Bonapartists were so far patriots that they wished victory to their Emperor.†b After the battle of Sedan they still remained patriots, because, from their standpoint, France could only be saved by Louis Bonaparte's restauration, even if that restauration must be accomplished by the aid of Bismarck.
Page me46.53

It is self-understood that you must not name me. As to the details of Bradlaugh's intimacy with the Brimont, Blanc (le vieux)†c is the man to furnish them.
Page me46.53

In his controversy with the General Council Bradlaugh got the help — of the Soir (Paris journal). In the Council's sitting of January 2, 1872 Serraillier communicated:

'He had read an article in Le Soir written in defence of Bradlaugh. It said he (Bradlaugh) had honoured the Journal (Le Soir) by contributing to it and was a safe governmental man, and had nothing to do with demagogic intrigues.'
Page me46.53

When Gladstone dissolved Parliament (the occasion on which he was overthrown by Disraeli), Bradlaugh's lecturing room was decorated by immense placards with the inscription 'Farewell to Iconoclast, the People's Redeemer! Welcome to the great dreadnaught of St Stephen's!'†77 But he had counted without his host. He was not elected member of Parliament, despite his public begging letters (for a good testimonial) to Bright and other leaders of the 'great liberal party', who replied in a very cool way. It was also no use boasting of having dined with a life-Bishop (of the church of England).

Page Break me46.54
Page me46.54

In the last election†a Bradlaugh was happier for this reason: He was one of the noisiest demagogic supporters of Gladstone's pro-Russian campaign against Disraeli — in fact one of the most turbulent tools of the Party who wanted to get in 'Place and Pelf' again, coûte que coûte.†b Moreover, no constituency was to be hazarded in the impending, decisive electoral battle. The prudery of the Whig and radical party had to be thrown overboard. Now Bradlaugh's election at Northampton was not safe, despite the strong contingent of shoemakers in that town who belong to his 'sect'; but these shoemakers had before voted for him like one man, and he had failed. But then there was another liberal candidate, difficult to place, because notorious for his 'affaires véreuses en matiére de finances'†c and moreover damaged by some scandals of another sort (des gifles reçus).†d This man was Labouchere. He is one of the three proprietors of The Daily News, hence the partner of that gros bonnet†e of the liberal party — the pietist capitalist Samuel Morley. Difficult as it was to carry through either Bradlaugh or Labouchere, it was feasible to do so by making a couple of them. Samuel Morley's — the pietist's — public recommendation (by printed letter) of the atheist Bradlaugh secured him the religious element of Northampton, while Bradlaugh secured to Labouchere the infidel shoemakers of that town. Thus both together passed as members for Northampton.
Page me46.54

The utter meanness of Bradlaugh shines most in the manoeuvres by which he has succeeded to oust all the other popular preachers of free thought (the scientific preachers address themselves to other couches sociales†f) such as Mrs Law, who wanted not to be his personal séides,†g by appropriating to himself all the funds of the party. He even succeeded to have all lecturing halls in London shut to them, while he built out of the party's funds a lecturing hall for his own personal use. Mrs Law etc. were so confined to lecturing in the provinces. If it interests you (but I think it is not worth while entering into details), you can have full information on this point from the persons concerned.

Salut
K.M.

(Verte)†h

Page Break me46.55
Page me46.55

Can you give me some information on a person named E. Fortin who has written me several letters addressing me as: 'Mon cher maître.' His demand is very 'modest'. While he studies the Capital he proposes to make monthly résumés which he is kind enough to be willing to send over to me monthly, whereupon I shall correct them monthly, elucidating the points he might have misunderstood. In this quiet way, when he had done with the last monthly résumé, and I sent it back corrected — he would have a manuscript ready for publication and — as he says — inundate France with torrents de lumiére.†a
Page me46.55

Now I shall — even for mere want of time — not answer to his call, but at all events I must reply to his letter. He may be a well-intentioned man. Before writing him I should like to have some information. He resides at present at Beauvais, 22, rue de la Porte de Paris.

Page me46.55
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Voinstvuyushchiy materialist, Book IV, Moscow, 1925

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

37
MARX TO AN UNKNOWN CORRESPONDENT†78
IN LONDON
Page me46.55
[London,] 31 January 1881
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

Dear Sir,

Please to forward me the papers etc. enumerated in the enclosed list. At the same time you would greatly oblige me by the information whether there exists a short compendium of the Factory and Workshops' Acts?
Page me46.55
I possess myself the several Acts, but a member of the French Chamber of Deputies has asked me to procure him such a compendium where he might find the whole matter together. Has not been something of the sort been published by Mr Redpath, Factory Inspector?†a Yours truly,

Page Break me46.56

Karl Marx

Page me46.56
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 35, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

38
ENGELS TO KARL KAUTSKY†79
IN VIENNA
Page me46.56
London, 1 February 1881
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

Dear Mr Kautsky,

Having been long prevented, I am at last able to reply to your letter.†80
Page me46.56
Now, in view of the fact that you intend to come here shortly, it would be a somewhat unnecessary labour to let you have a detailed critique in writing of the book you have been good enough to send me; since I shall, in all probability, have the pleasure of discussing it with you in person, I shall confine myself to just a few points.
Page me46.56
1. What you say on p. 66 etc. is invalidated by the fact that other, real differences exist between surplus value and profit on capital besides the percentage estimate based on the variable or total capital. The main passages from Capital relating to this are summarised in Anti-Dühring, p. 182.†81
Page me46.56

2. Even if the armchair socialists†82 persist in demanding that we proletarian socialists should help them solve the problem of how to avoid what looks like imminent over-population and the threat of collapse this poses to the new social order, that is very far from being a reason why I should do them such a favour. To resolve all the doubts and scruples of these chaps which they owe to the excess of their own muddle-headed wisdom, or even to refute, for example, all the monstrous twaddle which Schäffle alone has assembled in his many fat tomes,†83 is, in my opinion, a sheer waste of time. It would fill a fair-sized book were one merely to attempt to put right all the misquotations from Capital inserted by these gentlemen between inverted commas. They should first learn to read and copy before demanding to have their questions answered.

Page Break me46.57

Page me46.57
Moreover, I do not regard the question as in any way a burning one at a moment when American mass production, as yet only in its infancy, and really large-scale agriculture are threatening to all but suffocate us by the sheer volume of the means of subsistence produced; on the eve of an upheaval of which one of the first consequences must be to populate the globe — what you say on the subject on pp. 169-70, skates too lightly over this point — and which, moreover, will of necessity call for considerable demographic growth in Europe.
Page me46.57
Euler's calculation†84 has about as much merit as the one concerning the kreutzer which, invested at compound interest in the year dot, doubles every 13 years and therefore now amounts to some †144 gulden, a silver nugget larger than the earth. When you say on p. 169 that social conditions in America are not very different from those in Europe, this holds good only so long as you consider nothing but the large coastal cities, or even the outward legal forms those conditions assume. There can be no doubt that the vast mass of the American people live in conditions that are exceedingly favourable to demographic growth. The stream of immigrants is proof of this. And yet it has taken more than 30 years to double itself. Alarmism doesn't come into it.
Page me46.57
The abstract possibility that mankind will increase numerically to such an extent that its propagation will have to be kept within bounds does, of course, exist. But should communist society ever find itself compelled to regulate the production of humans in the same way as it has already regulated the production of things, then it, and it alone, will be able to effect this without difficulty. In such a society it would not, or so it seems to me, be particularly difficult to obtain deliberately a result which has already come about naturally and haphazardly in France and Lower Austria. At all events, it's for those chaps to decide whether, when and how it's to be done and what means they wish to use. I don't consider myself qualified to supply them with suggestions and advice about this. Indeed, these chaps will, presumably, be every bit as clever as we are.

Page Break me46.58
Page me46.58

Incidentally, as early as 1844 I wrote (Deutsch-Französische Jahrbücher, p. 109): 'For even if Malthus were completely right, this' (socialist) 'transformation would have to be undertaken straight away; for only this transformation, only the education of the masses which it provides, makes possible that moral restraint of the propagative instinct which Malthus himself presents as the most effective and easiest remedy for over-population.'†a
Page me46.58

That must suffice until I am able to discuss the other points with you in person. You are quite right to come over here. You are one of the few among the younger generation who really tries to learn something, and hence it will do you a lot of good to get out of the atmosphere of non-criticism in which all the historical and economic literature currently being produced in Germany is going to wrack and ruin.
Page me46.58

With sincere regards,

Yours,
F. Engels

Page me46.58
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

39
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN
IN ZURICH
Page me46.58
London, 2 February 1881

Dear Mr Bernstein,

Enclosed a letter to Kautsky,†b which kindly forward; I don't know whether the Vienna address I was given is still the right one.

Page Break me46.59
Page me46.59

The 5 nos. of the Sozialdemokrat since the year began testify to a significant step forward. Gone are the melancholy, despairing tones of a 'beaten man', the complementary grandiloquence of stuffy respectability, the incessant revolutionary rhetoric á la Most alternating with philistine tameness, finally the constant preoccupation with Most. The tone has become lively and purposeful. The paper will no longer act as an opiate if it stays like this; rather it will put new heart into our people in Germany. As you have the Neue Rheinische Zeitung you would do well to take a look at it occasionally. The mockery and contempt with which we treated our opponents were precisely what brought us in almost 6,000 subscribers in the 6 months prior to the state of siege†85 and, although we started again from scratch in November, we again had the full tally and more by May '49. The Kölnische Zeitung has now admitted that in those days it only had 9,000.

Page me46.59

As it seems that you are short of material for your feuilleton, you might, sometime, reprint the poem from No. 44 of 1848: 'This morning I went to Düsseldorf'; possibly with the title 'A Socialist-Eater of 1848' (feuilleton to the Neue Rheinische Zeitung of 14 July 1848) and, under it, the author: Georg Weerth (died Havana, 1856).†86 So just keep it up!

Yours,
F.E.
Page me46.59

'Thou shalt not steal' and the apology for the execution of Louis XVI†87 are very good.

Page me46.59
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.60

40
MARX TO CARL PEARSON†88
IN LONDON
Page me46.60
[London,] 15 February 1881
41 Maitland Park, N.W.

My dear Sir,

I should have answered before but for great pressure of work during the last days.
Page me46.60

Will you give me the pleasure to call on me on Thursday next,†a 8 o'clock p.m.?

Yours truly,
Karl Marx

Page me46.60

First published in Neues Deutschland, 15./16. Dezember 1984 as a facsimile and in German translation

Reproduced from the original

41
MARX TO NIKOLAI DANIELSON†7
IN ST PETERSBURG
Page me46.60
London, 19 February 1881

My dear Sir,

In all haste these few lines in answer to your friendly letter.
Page me46.60
Since my return from Ramsgate†38 my health was generally improving, but the detestable weather, lasting for months, we are passing through, has blessed me with a perpetual cold and coughing, interfering with sleep, etc. But the worst is that Mrs Marx's state becomes daily more dangerous notwithstanding my resort to the most celebrated medical men of London, and I have besides a host of domestic troubles, which it would be tedious entering upon. On the other hand, I had and have to struggle through an immense lot of blue books†89 sent to me from different countries, above all from the United States, so that my working time is hardly sufficient for the task, since all night labour has for many years absolutely been interdicted by my medical advisers. Hence an awful correspondence-indebtedness starts me in the face. Just now my whole family is in a hubbub because of the removal of my eldest daughter, Madame Longuet, with her children,†a from London to Paris, where her husband†b — (since the amnesty; he was in the interval Professor of King's College, London)†69 — has become one of the editors of the Justice (he inspired Clemenceau's semi-socialistic speech at Marseilles†c). You understand how painful — in the present state of Mrs Marx — this separation must be. For her and myself our grandchildren, three little boys, were inexhaustible sources of enjoyment, of life.

Page Break me46.61
Page me46.61
Now first as to the enclosed manuscript.†90 Its author, Mr Lafargue, is the husband of my second daughter,†d and one of my direct disciples. He has requested me to try whether through your interference he could become a contributor to a Petersburg Review, the Otechestvennyya Zapiski or the Slovo. (I think they are the only ones where he might have a chance.) If so, you would be empowered to change or suppress anything not suitable to the St Petersburg Meridian. As to his 'name', the initials would do. At all events it will interest you to read the manuscript.
Page me46.61
I have read with the greatest interest your article†56 which is in the best sense of the word 'original'. Hence the Boycotting. If you break through the webs of routine thought, you are always sure to be 'boycotted' in the first instance; it is the only arm of defence which in their first perplexity the routiniers know how to wield. I have been 'boycotted' in Germany for many many years, and am still so in England, with that little variation that from time to time something so absurd and asinine is launched against me that I would blush to take any public notice of it. But try on: The next thing to do — in my opinion — is to take up the wonderfully increasing indebtedness of the landlords, the upper class representatives of agriculture, and show them how they are 'crystallised' in the retort under the control of the 'new pillars of society'.

Page Break me46.62
Page me46.62

I am very anxious to see your polemics with the Slovo.†91 As soon as I shall sail in more quiet waters I shall enter more fully upon your Esquisse.†a For the present I cannot omit one observation. The soil being exhausted and getting not the elements — by artificial and vegetable and animal manure, etc. — to supply its wants, will with the changing favour of the seasons, of circumstances independent of human influence — still continue to yield harvests of very different amounts, though, summing up a period of years, as f.i. from 1870-80, the stagnant character of the production presents itself in the most striking character. Under such circumstances the favourable climatic conditions pave the way to a famine year by quickly consuming and setting free the mineral fertilizers still latent in the soil, while vice versa a famine year, and still more a series of bad years following it, allow the soil-inherent minerals to accumulate anew, and to work efficiently with returning favour of the climatic conditions. Such a process goes of course everywhere on but elsewhere it is checked by the modifying intervention of the agriculturist himself. It becomes the only regulating factor where man has ceased to be a 'power' — for want of means.

Page me46.62

So we have 1870 an excellent harvest in your country, but that year is a climax year, and as such immediately followed by a very bad one; the year 1871, the very bad harvest, must be considered as the starting point for a new little cycle, till we come to the new climax year 1874, which is immediately followed by the famine year 1875; then the upwards movement begins again, ending in the still worse famine year 1880. The summing up of the years during the whole period proves that the average annual production remained the same and that the mere natural factors have alone produced the changes comparing the single years and the smaller cycles of years.

Page me46.62

I wrote you some time ago,†b that if the great industrial and commercial crisis England has passed through went over without the culminating financial crash at London, this exceptional phenomenon was only due to — French money. This is now seen and acknowledged even by English routiniers. Thus The Statist (January 29, 1881) says:

'The money market has only be[en] so easy as it has been during the past year through an accident. The Bank of France in the early autumn permitted its stock of gold bullion to fall from £30 Millions to £22 Millions... Last autumn undoubtedly there was a very narrow escape.' (!)

Page Break me46.63

Page me46.63

The English railway system rolls on the same inclined plane as the European Public Debt system. The ruling magnates amongst the different railway-nets directors contract not only — progressively — new loans in order to enlarge their networks, i.e. the 'territory', where they rule as absolute monarchs, but they enlarge their respective networks in order to have new pretexts for engaging in new loans which enable them to pay the interest due to the holders of obligations, preferential shares, etc., and also from time to time to throw a sop to the much ill-used common shareholders in the shape of somewhat increased dividends. This pleasant method must one day or another terminate in an ugly catastrophe.

Page me46.63

In the United States the railway kings have become the butt of attacks, not only, as before this, on the part of the farmers and other industrial 'entrepreneurs' of the West, but also on the part of the grand representative of commerce — the New York Chamber of Commerce. The octopodus railway king and financial swindler Gould has, on his side, told the New York commercial magnates:

You now attack the railways, because you think them most vulnerable considering their present unpopularity; but take heed: after the railways every sort of corporation (means in the Yankee dialect joint stock company) will have its turn; then, later on, all forms of associated capital; finally, all forms of capital; you are thus paving the way to — Communism whose tendencies are already more and more spreading among the people.

Page me46.63

M. Gould 'a le flair bon'.†a

Page me46.63

In India serious complications, if not a general outbreak, is in store for the British government. What the English take from them annually in the form of rent, dividends for railways useless to the Hindoos, pensions for military and civil servicemen, for Afghanistan and other wars, etc. etc. — what they take from them without any equivalent and quite apart from what they appropriate to themselves annually within India, speaking only of the value of the commodities the Indians have gratuitously and annually to send over to England, it amounts to more than the total sum of income of the 60 millions of agricultural and industrial labourers of India! This is a bleeding process, with a vengeance! The famine years are pressing each other and in dimensions till now not yet suspected in Europe! There is an actual conspiracy going on wherein Hindus and Mussulmans cooperate; the British government is aware that something is 'brewing', but this shallow people (I mean the governmental men), stultified by their own parliamentary ways of talking and thinking, do not even desire to see clear, to realize the whole extent of the imminent danger! To delude others and by deluding them to delude yourself — this is: parliamentary wisdom in a nutshell! Tant mieux!†a

Page Break me46.64

Page me46.64

Can you tell me whether Prof. Lankester's 'Chapter on Deterioration'†92 (I have seen it quoted in your article) is translated into Russian? He is a friend of mine.

Page me46.64

Last month we had here Russian visitors, amongst others Prof. Sieber (now settled at Zurich) and Mr Kablukoff (Moscow). They were all day long studying at the British Museum.
Page me46.64
No news of our 'mutual' friend†b?
Page me46.64
Apropos. Janson's last statistical work†c — comparing Russia with Europe — has made much sensation. I should be glad to see it.†93
Page me46.64
With best compliments

Yours very truly,
Karl Marx
Page me46.64
Should Lafargue's article find no 'home' in Petersburg, be so kind as to return it to me.†94

Page me46.64
First published, in Russian, in Minuvshiye gody, No. 1, St Petersburg, 1908

Reproduced from the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.65

42
MARX TO FERDINAND DOMELA NIEUWENHUIS†95
IN THE HAGUE
Page me46.65
London, 22 February 1881
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

Dear Comrade,

My prolonged silence is due to the fact that I wished to enclose in my reply to your letter of 6 January a conspectus of the amendments that you might care to make in the event of a 2nd edition of Kapitaal en Arbeid.†96 As a result of domestic disturbances, unforeseen labours and other disruptions, I have not yet got this done and shall therefore be sending off this letter without the enclosure for the present, lest my continued silence be misconstrued by you. The amendments I consider necessary relate to details; the main thing, the spirit of the thing, is there already.
Page me46.65
I have to thank you for the kind dedication,†97 since you, personally, have thereby thrown down the gauntlet before our bourgeois antagonists.

Page me46.65

The author†a of Mannen van beteekenis,†98 an inspector of schools OR SOMETHING OF THAT SORT, wrote to me requesting material for a biographical memoir and, in addition, got his publisher to approach my brother-in-law, Juta, with a view to his persuading me to accede to a request of the kind I habitually turn down. The gentleman — the author of Mannen — wrote to me saying he did not share my views but recognised their importance, protested his esteem, etc. The selfsame individual subsequently had the effrontery to embody in his pamphlet a libellous fabrication by that notorious Prussian spy, Stieber, and likewise, — on the inspiration, no doubt, of one of the armchair socialists†82 in Bonn, — to accuse me of deliberate misquotation, nor, in so doing, did the estimable fellow even go to the trouble of reading up my polemic against the worthy Brentano in the Volksstaat,†99 where he would have seen that Brentano, who had originally denounced me in the Concordia (manufacturers' sheet) for 'formal and substantive falsification', later extricated himself with the lie that he had misunderstood me, etc. A Dutch journal proposed to open its columns to me for the chastisement of the 'inspector of schools', but on principle I do not reply to pin-pricks of this kind. I have never, even in London, taken the slightest notice of such literary yapping. Any other course would mean wasting the better part of my time on making rectifications all over the place, from California to Moscow. In my younger days I sometimes did some hard hitting, but wisdom comes with age, at least in so far as one avoids useless DISSIPATION OF FORCE.

Page Break me46.66

Page me46.66

The forthcoming Zurich Congress's 'question' which you mention would seem to me a mistake.†100 What is to be done, and done immediately at any given, particular moment in the future, depends, of course, wholly and entirely on the actual historical circumstances in which action is to be taken. But the said question, being posed out of the blue, in fact poses a fallacious problem to which the only answer can be a critique of the question as such. We cannot solve an equation that does not comprise within its terms the elements of its solution. Come to that, there is nothing specifically 'socialist' about the predicaments of a government that has suddenly come into being as a result of a popular victory. On the contrary. Victorious bourgeois politicians immediately feel constrained by their 'victory', whereas a socialist is at least able to intervene without constraint. Of one thing you may be sure — a socialist government will not come to the helm in a country unless things have reached a stage at which it can, before all else, take such measures as will so intimidate the mass of the bourgeoisie as to achieve the first desideratum — time for effective action.

Page me46.66

You may, perhaps, refer me to the Paris Commune but, aside from the fact that this was merely an uprising of one city in exceptional circumstances, the majority of the Commune was in no sense socialist, nor could it have been. With a modicum of COMMON SENSE, it could, however, have obtained the utmost that was then obtainable — a compromise with Versailles beneficial to the people as a whole. The appropriation of the Banque de France alone would have rapidly put an end to the vainglory of Versailles, etc., etc.

Page me46.66

The general demands of the French bourgeoisie before 1789 were, mutatis mutandis,†a just as well-defined as are today, with a fair degree of uniformity, the primary, immediate demands of the proletariat in all countries where there is capitalist production. But could any 18th-century

Page Break me46.67

Frenchman, a priori, have the least idea of the manner in which the demands of the French bourgeoisie would be implemented? A doctrinaire and of necessity fantastic anticipation of a future revolution's programme of action only serves to distract from the present struggle. The dream of the imminent end of the world inspired the struggle of the early Christians against the Roman Empire and gave them confidence in victory. Scientific insight into the inevitable disintegration, now steadily taking place before our eyes, of the prevailing social order; the masses themselves, their fury mounting under the lash of the old governmental bogies; the gigantic and positive advances simultaneously taking place in the development of the means of production — all this is sufficient guarantee that the moment a truly proletarian revolution breaks out, the conditions for its immediate initial (if certainly not idyllic) modus operandi†a will also be there.

Page me46.67

My own conviction is that the critical conjuncture for a new international working men's association has not yet arrived; hence I consider all labour congresses and/or socialist congresses, in so far as they do not relate to the immediate, actual conditions obtaining in this or that specific nation, to be not only useless but harmful. They will invariably fizzle out in a host of rehashed generalised banalities.

Yours most cordially,
Karl Marx

Page me46.67

First published, in Russian, in Pravda, No. 62, 14 March 1928

Printed according to the original

43

ENGELS TO JENNY LONGUET†101
IN PARIS

Page me46.67

[London,] 24 February 1881

My dear Jenny,

Well may the illustrious Regnard recommend his factum to your 'charity'.†102 This Jacobin defending English respectable Protestantism and English vulgar Liberalism with the historical appareil of that same vulgar Liberalism is indeed an object of deepest charity. But to his 'facts'.

Page Break me46.68

Page me46.68
1) The 30,000 protestants' massacre of 1641. The Irish Catholics are here in the same position as the Commune de Paris. The Versaillais massacred 30,000 Communards and called that the horrors of the Commune. The English protestants under Cromwell massacred at least 30,000 Irish and, to cover their brutality, invented the tale that this was to avenge 30,000 protestants murdered by the Irish Catholics.
Page me46.68
The facts are these.
Page me46.68
Ulster having been taken from its Irish owners who at that time 1600-1610 held the land in common, and handed over to Scotch protestant military colonists, these colonists did not feel safe in their possessions in the troublous times after 1640. The puritan English Government officials in Dublin spread the rumour that a Scotch Army of Covenanters†103 was to land in Ulster and exterminate all Irish and Catholics. Sir W. Parsons, one of the two Chief Justices of Ireland, said that in a 12-month there would not be a Catholic left in Ireland. It was under these menaces, repeated in the English Parliament, that the Irish of Ulster rose on 23rd October 1641. But no massacre took place. All contemporaneous sources ascribe to the Irish merely the intention of a general massacre, and even the two protestant Chief Justices (proclam. 8th February 1642) declare that 'the chief part of their plot, and amongst them a general massacre, had been disappointed.' The English and Scotch however, 4th May 1642, threw Irish women naked into the river (Newry) and massacred Irishmen. (Prendergast, Cromwellian Settlement of Ireland, 1865.)
Page me46.68
2) L'Irlande la Vendée de l'Angleterre.†104 Ireland was Catholic, Protestant England Republican, therefore Ireland — English Vendée. There is however this little difference that the French Revolution intended to give the land to the people, the English Commonwealth intended, in Ireland, to take the land from the people.
Page me46.68
The whole Protestant reformation, as is well known to most students of history save Regnard, apart from its dogmatical squabbles and quibbles, was a vast plan for a confiscation of land. First the land was taken from the Church. Then the Catholics, in countries where Protestantism was in power, were declared rebels and their land confiscated.
Page me46.68
Now in Ireland the case was peculiar.

Page Break me46.69
'For the English,' says Prendergast, 'seem to have thought that god made a mistake in giving such a fine country as Ireland to the Irish; and for nearly 700 years they have been trying to remedy it.'
Page me46.69
The whole agrarian history of Ireland is a series of confiscations of Irish land to be handed over to English settlers. These settlers, in a very few generations, under the charm of Celtic society, turned more Irish than the aborigines. Then a new confiscation and new colonization took place, and so in infinitum.

Page me46.69

In the 17th century, the whole of Ireland except the newly Scotchified North, was ripe for a fresh confiscation. So much so, that when the British (puritan) Parliament accorded to Charles I an army for the reduction of Ireland, it resolved that the money for this armament should be raised upon the security of 2,500,000 acres to be confiscated in Ireland. And the 'adventurers'†105 who advanced the money should also appoint the officers of that army. The land was to be divided amongst those adventurers so that 1,000 acres should be given them, if in Ulster for £200.- advanced, in Connaught for £300, in Munster for £450, in Leinster for £600. And if the people rose against this beneficent plan they are Vendéens! If Regnard should ever sit in a National Convention, he may take a leaf out of the proceedings of the Long Parliament,†106 and combat a possible Vendée with these means.
Page me46.69

The Abolition of the Penal Laws†107! Why the greater part of them were repealed, not in 1793 but in 1778, when England was threatened by the rise of the American Republic, and the second repeal, 1793, was when the French Republic arose threatening and England required all the soldiers she could get to fight it!
Page me46.69

The Grant to Maynooth by Pitt.†108 This pittance was soon repealed by the Tories and only renewed by Sir R. Peel in 1845. But not a word about the other cadeau que faisait á l'Irlande ce grand homme (c'est la premiére fois qu'il trouve grâce devant les yeux d'un Jacobin),†a that other 'dotation' not only 'considérable' but actually lavish — the 3 Million £ by which the Union of Ireland with England†109 was bought. The parliamentary documents will show that the one item of the purchase money of rotten and nomination boroughs alone cost no less a sum than £1,245,000 (O'Connell, Memoir on Ireland addressed to the Queen).

Page Break me46.70
Page me46.70

Lord Derby instituted le systéme des écoles nationales.†110 Very true but why did he? Consult Fitzgibbon, Ireland in 1868, the work of a staunch Protestant and Tory, or else the official Report of Commissioners on Education in Ireland, 1826. The Irish, neglected by the English government, had taken the education of their children into their own hands. At the time when English fathers and mothers insisted upon their right to send their children to the factory to earn money instead of to the school to learn, at that time in Ireland the peasants vied with each other in forming schools of their own. The school-master was an ambulant teacher, spending a couple of months at each village. A cottage was found for him, each child paid him 2d. a week and a few sods of turf in winter. The schools were kept, on fine days in summer, in the fields, near a hedge, and then known by the name of hedge-schools. There were also ambulant scholars, who with their books under the arm, wandered from school to school, receiving lodging and food from the peasants without difficulty. In 1812 there were 4,600 such hedge-schools in Ireland and that year's report of the Commissioners says that such education was 'leading to evil rather than good', 'that such education the people are actually obtaining for themselves, and though we consider it practicable to correct it, to check its progress appears impossible: it may be improved but it cannot be impeded'.

Page me46.70

So then, these truly national schools did not suit English purposes. To suppress them, the sham national schools were established. They are so little secular that the reading-book consists of extracts both from the Catholic and Protestant Bibles, agreed upon by the Catholic and Protestant Archbishops of Dublin. Compare with these Irish peasants the English who howl at compulsory school attendance to this day!

Page me46.70
First published, in Russian, in the collection Sredniye veka (Middle Ages), Book XIX, Moscow, 1961

Reproduced from the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.71

44
MARX TO VERA ZASULICH†111
IN GENEVA
Page me46.71
London, 8 March 1881
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

Dear Citizen,

A nervous complaint which has assailed me periodically over the last ten years has prevented me from replying any sooner to your letter of 16 February. I am sorry that I cannot provide you with a concise exposé, intended for publication, of the question you have done me the honour of putting to me. Months ago I promised the St Petersburg Committee to let them have a piece on the same subject.†112 I hope, however, that a few lines will suffice to dispel any doubts you may harbour as to the misunderstanding in regard to my so-called theory.
Page me46.71

In analysing the genesis of capitalist production I say:
Page me46.71

'At the core of the capitalist system, therefore, lies the complete separation of the producer from the means of production ... the basis of this whole development is the expropriation of the agricultural producer. To date this has not been accomplished in a radical fashion anywhere except in England... But all the other countries of Western Europe are undergoing the same process' (Capital, French ed., p. 315).
Page me46.71

Hence the 'historical inevitability' of this process is expressly limited to the countries of Western Europe. The cause of that limitation is indicated in the following passage from Chapter XXXII:
Page me46.71
'Private property, based on personal labour ... will be supplanted by capitalist private property, based on the exploitation of the labour of others, on wage labour' (l.c., p. 341).
Page me46.71
In this Western movement, therefore, what is taking place is the transformation of one form of private property into another form of private property. In the case of the Russian peasants, their communal property would, on the contrary, have to be transformed into private property.
Page me46.71
Hence the analysis provided in Capital does not adduce reasons either for or against the viability of the rural commune, but the special study I have made of it, and the material for which I drew from original sources, has convinced me that this commune is the fulcrum of social regeneration in Russia, but in order that it may function as such, it would first be necessary to eliminate the deleterious influences which are assailing it from all sides, and then ensure for it the normal conditions of spontaneous development.

Page Break me46.72
Page me46.72
I have the honour to be, dear Citizen,

Yours very faithfully,
Karl Marx

Page me46.72
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

45
ENGELS TO S.F. KAUFMANN
IN LONDON
Page me46.72
[Draft]

[London,] 11 March 1881
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

Dear Mr Kaufmann,

In reply to your esteemed note of the 9th inst. I regret that I am unable to fall in with your wishes regarding the guarantee. My experiences with guarantees have been such that I have resolved once and for all to advance the money straight away myself, if I can, rather than give a guarantee. However the money is not available; if I had it and could do without it, I should regard it as my prime duty to hand it over to the party in Germany to whom we now owe every penny we can spare.†a

Page Break me46.73
Page me46.73

Trusting that you will find elsewhere the means of obtaining the funds you need,

I remain,
Yours very truly

Page me46.73
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

46
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†113
IN ZURICH
Page me46.73
London, 12 March 1881

Dear Mr Bernstein,

Herewith some material on the anti-adultery commandment.†114 Whether you'll be able to use it, I confess I don't know. It's a ticklish subject and you must know whether more harm than good will be done by touching on it. At all events I wanted to show you one way of dealing with this commandment without relapsing into moral philistinism, and it may be useful to you anyway to have the historical material on the case, in so far as it was available to me.
Page me46.73

For the rest, the paper†a is doing very well on the whole and some of the nos. are very good; rather less doctrinaire articles, like the one on state socialism,†b would do no harm. How can one lump together Turgot, one of the leading economists of the 18th century, with Necker, that highly practical man of haute finance,†c precursor of your Laffittes and Péreires and, worse still, the wretched Calonne, the man of hand-to-mouth expedients, who was a genuine aprés moi le déluge†d†115 aristocrat? How can one place these — Turgot in particular and even Necker — cheek by jowl with Bismarck who, at the most, wants money regardless, á la Calonne, and the said Bismarck in his turn quite summarily cheek by jowl with Stoecker on the one hand and Schäffle and Co. on the other, every one of whom in his turn pursues quite different lines? If the bourgeois lump them all together, that is no reason why we should proceed as uncritically. Here, precisely, are the roots of doctrinairism, in that one believes the self-interested and narrow assertions of one's opponent and proceeds to construct on those assertions a system which naturally stands or falls with them. With Bismarck it is a case of money, money and again money, and the pretexts he gives change in accordance with purely external considerations. Give him a differently composed majority in the Reichstag and he'll jettison all his present plans and prepare conflicting ones. That's why one can never ever infer a declaration of modern society's bankruptcy from anything that is done by an animal as irrational in theory and inconsistent in practice as Bismarck. Still less from the intellectual St Vitus dance of a fool like Stoecker. Nor yet from the twaddle of 'thinking men' á la Schäffle. Their 'thinking' (and this is pretty well all they do 'think') is not directed towards declaring modern society bankrupt. On the contrary, they are, of course, simply living in the hope of patching it up again. But what kind of a thinking man is e.g. Schäffle? In his Quintessenz†a the silly Swabian admits that he pondered one of the (simplest) points in Capital for ten years before getting to the bottom of it; in fact the bottom he got to was pure nonsense.†116

Page Break me46.74
Page me46.74
It is nothing but self-interested misrepresentation on the part of the Manchester bourgeois to describe as 'socialism' all interference by the state with free competition: protective tariffs, guilds, tobacco monopoly, nationalisation of branches of industry, the Overseas Trading Company,†117 royal porcelain factory. That is something we should criticise, but not believe. If we do the latter and base a theoretical argument thereon, this will collapse together with its premisses, — simply upon it's being proved, that is, that this alleged socialism is nothing but feudal reaction on the one hand and, on the other, a pretext for extortion, its secondary object being to turn as many proletarians as possible into officials and pensioners dependent on the state, and to organise, alongside the disciplined army of officials and military, a similar army of workers. Compulsory suffrage imposed by senior functionaries instead of by factory overseers — fine socialism that! This is where you get if you believe what the bourgeois himself doesn't believe but only pretends to, namely that the state = socialism.
Page me46.74
Otherwise I find that your views on the attitude to be adopted by the paper coincide entirely with my own, and I'm also glad that of late there has no longer been such liberal use of the word revolution as there was at the outset. That was quite all right earlier on, after the sorry opiate-mongering of 1880,†118 but it would be preferable, and this, too, with an eye to Most, to be wary of high-flown rhetoric. One may express revolutionary thoughts without forever harping on the word revolution. The pitiful Most is, by the way, quite beside himself; he's at a loss where to pull in and now, on top of that, the success of Fritzsche and Viereck in America†119 has taken the last bit of wind out of his sails.

Page Break me46.75

Page me46.75

The paper can now really serve to encourage and cheer up our people in Germany, something a number of them, or at least their socalled leaders, are much in need of. I've received a few more jeremiads and answered them in accordance with their deserts. Viereck was very down in the mouth at the start, but a few days in the fresh air of London were enough to restore his resilience. The paper must import that fresh air into Germany and by far the best way of doing so is to mock our adversaries, treat them with contempt. Once the people learn to laugh at Bismarck & Co. again, much will have been gained. But it mustn't be forgotten that this is the first time such a thing has happened to the people, at any rate the vast majority, or, more especially, that a large number of agitators and editors will have the discomfort of being jolted out of their very comfortable berths. Such being the case, it is just as necessary to cheer people up as it is constantly to remind them that Bismarck & Co. are still the same jackasses, the same scoundrels and the same poor wretches, impotent in face of the historical movement, as they were before the attempted assassinations.†120 So any joke at the expense of this rabble is of value.
Page me46.75

As regards Ireland, only this much: The people are far too canny not to know that an uprising would spell their ruin; it would stand no chance save in the case of war between England and America.†121 Meanwhile the Irish have forced Gladstone to introduce continental standing orders in Parliament,†122 thus undermining the whole of the English parliamentary system. They have further forced Gladstone to forswear all his cant and to become more Tory than even the worst of TORIES. The Coercion Bills†123 have gone through, the Land Bill†124 will either be thrown out by the Upper House, or else it will be castrated, and then the fun will begin, in other words, the covert disintegration of the parties will become overt. Since Gladstone's nomination, the WHIGS and moderate TORIES, i.e. the big landowners generally, have been secretly combining to form a big landed property party. As soon as this comes to fruition, and family and personal interests have been adjusted, or as soon as the new party is driven out into the open in consequence of, say, the Land Bill, the administration and the present majority will disintegrate. Then the new bourgeois-radical party will come out in opposition to the new conservative party, but with nothing to fall back on save the workers and the Irish peasants. And so that there may be no recurrence of bilking and trickery here, a proletarian-radical party is in process of formation under the leadership of Joseph Cowen (M.P. for Newcastle), an old Chartist who is half, if not wholly, communist and a very worthy chap. Ireland is responsible for all this, Ireland is the driving force in the realm. This for your private information. More on the subject anon.

Page Break me46.76
Page me46.76

Regards,

Yours
F.E.
Page me46.76

Since Kautsky — will you give him my regards? — will be coming over here soon, there's no point in answering him at length. My regards to Beust should you see him.

Page me46.76
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

47
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER†125
IN GENEVA
Page me46.76
London, 28 March 1881
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

Dear Old Man,

I shall send you some money the instant you put me in a position to do so by letting me have your new address. For I have to produce this, and such addresses as I find in the Précurseur do not seem to me really fit to be produced if they are not to create difficulties. The moment I have had a reply you will at once get 100 frs and a lengthy reply from

Page Break me46.77

Your
F. Engels

Page me46.77
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

48
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL
IN LEIPZIG
Page me46.77
London, 30 March 1881

Dear Bebel,

Viereck (a postcard from whom I enclose) wants me to give you an account of the Boston meeting; but here too, as commonly in combined operations, there has been hitch after hitch; 1. Harney wrote a week later; 2. he forgot to enclose the newspaper report which I did not get till yesterday. Today I gave this to Kautsky, who is over here, for him to work on for the Sozialdemokrat.†126

Page me46.77

The meeting in Boston was first-rate; ill-advertised but nevertheless attended by 1,500 people, 1/3 German. The first speaker was Swinton, an American communist who came to visit us here last summer†43 and is the proprietor of a big New York paper.†a Then Fritzsche. Finally, Wendell Phillips, the great anti-slavery man who, with the exception of John Brown, did more than anyone else for the abolition of slavery and the prosecution of the war, and is the foremost speaker in America — maybe in the world. He returned thanks to the Germans and gave them credit for the fact that in 1861, in every large city, it was the German gymnasts who shielded him with their own bodies from the American mob, and who kept St Louis in the Union.†127 To give you just one example of how he spoke:

Page Break me46.78

'Being as far as I am away from the field of battle, I would not presume to criticise the method of combat. I look at Russia, 4,000 miles away, and see what a nightmare weighs on the shoulders of the people there. I only hope that someone will be found to relieve them of it. And if the dagger alone can do it, I say: Welcome to the dagger! Is there any American here who would disapprove? If he would, then he should look (pointing to a picture on the wall) at Joe Warren who died at Bunkers Hill.'†a

Page me46.78

That was on the 7th of March. On the 13th a bomb did what the dagger had been unable to do.†128

Page me46.78

According to today's Standard, Most is to be prosecuted by the British government because of the article on the assassination attempt!†129 If the Russian Embassy and Gladstone are absolutely intent on making a great man out of the silly nincompoop, no one can stop them. At the same time, it's far from certain that Most will be found guilty. The moral indignation about the bomb in the big newspapers was largely a matter of observing the proprieties, something your bourgeois here never omits to do, if only for appearances' sake. The humorous papers, which reflect public opinion far more faithfully, have taken an altogether different view of the case and, by the time the trial draws to a close, much may have changed in this respect, so that it's far from certain whether the 12 jurymen will reach the unanimous verdict that is called for.

Page me46.78

To return to our American friends, Wendell Phillips' championship (induced by a young American journalist, Willard Brown, who was over here last year, when he consorted much with Marx and generally did his utmost for them with the American press and gave them the boosting they needed) is of the first importance. Their success has altogether exceeded my expectations and shows that Bismarckery has fallen greatly in the esteem of the Germans, even middle-class Germans, in America. However 's†b hopes of a second trip with Liebknecht would hardly seem practicable; it is inadvisable to turn up twice in rapid succession. Moreover, such a trip — anyhow inadmissible before next year — ought to have been rendered unnecessary by the great event in Petersburg and its inevitable consequences. Alexander III, whether he wants to or not, will have to take some decisive step to get things moving, but before that there might be a short period of intensive persecution, and Switzerland will no doubt soon embark on mass expulsions. Meanwhile old William,†c if not actually on his last legs, becomes dottier and dottier, Bismarck grows daily more rabid and seems absolutely intent on playing the part of a rampaging Prussian Roland, the bourgeois parties go further off the rails every day, while the government's taxation mania sees to the rest. Even if we all sat with our hands in our laps, events would forcibly propel us to the fore and pave the way for victory. It is a real pleasure to see a revolutionary world situation we have long predicted mature into a general crisis, blinkered opponents do our work for us, and the inexorability of a development that is heading for universal collapse prevail in, and as a result of, the general confusion.

Page Break me46.79

Regards from Marx and from your
F.E.

Page me46.79
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

49
ENGELS TO GOTTLIEB LEMCKE
IN LONDON
Page me46.79
[London,] 2 April 1881
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

Dear Mr Lemcke,

I have just heard that one of my brothers†a will be passing through London with his family this evening, and this will mean my spending with them the few hours they will be pausing here. I therefore greatly regret that I shall be unable to take advantage of your kind invitation to the opening ceremony of the new club-house.†130 Hoping that the club will prosper and flourish, I remain

Yours very truly,
F. Engels

Page me46.79
First published in the journal Internationale wissenschaftliche Korrespondenz zur Geschichte der deutschen Arbeiterbewegung, Nr. 10, Berlin (West), 1970

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.80

50
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER†131
IN GENEVA
Page me46.80
London, 4 April 1881

Dear Old Man,

I am writing to you just before the post goes, having only this moment got the money order, four pounds sterling = 100 frs 80 cts, which I trust will be paid over to you without delay. Your address was indispensable,†a as the post office here insists on it, otherwise no money order. I shall press Liebknecht about his false promises†b; those fellows must do something for you. I'm glad, by the way, that our people have plucked up courage again; for a time most of them were suffering from a bad attack of cold feet; the paper,†c too, is giving a good account of itself. That philistine Most is definitely in luck; his Freiheit was on its last legs, whereupon the British government felt impelled to give it a helping hand, and did so in the most brilliant manner.†129 Such colossal stupidity passes all belief, but it so happens that we have the liberals at the helm and they are capable of any stupidity, any dirty trick. They went ahead in such a hurry that so far they don't even know under which Act they will charge Most! But Bismarck needed this coup for his socialist debate in the Reichstag†132 and, since Gladstone, our premier, is an enthusiastic admirer of the bumped-off Alexander,†d there was no difficulty about the thing. It will be all the more difficult for them to draw up an indictment, let alone produce a jury that will find Most guilty. So Most will become famous on the cheap, even if only for a brief spell, while Bismarck, even though he, too, may be gently rubbing his hands just now, will ultimately find himself discredited yet again.

Kindest regards from Marx and your
F. Engels

Page me46.80
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.81

51
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET†133
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.81
[London,] 11 April 1881

My dear Jennychen,

It's been boring ever since you left — without you and Johnny and Harra! and MR 'TEA!'†a Sometimes I hurry across to the window when I hear children's voices which sound like those of our children, momentarily oblivious of the fact that the little chaps are on the other side of the Channel!
Page me46.81
One comfort is that you have found a nice place to live and that it suits the children; otherwise everything seems to be RATHER WORSE than in London, with the exception, however, of the climate, whose beneficial effect — beneficial also to asthma — you will discover BY AND BY.
Page me46.81
I have found yet another doctor for Mama, one recommended to me by Prof. Lankester, namely Dr Donkin; HE SEEMS A BRIGHT AND INTELLIGENT MAN; but for Mama's complaint it does indeed strike me that ONE MAN [is] AS GOOD, AND PERHAPS BETTER, THAN ANOTHER MAN. However, the CHANGE OF MEDICAL ADVISERS serves to distract her and, during the initial period — which doesn't usually last long — she is full of praise for the new Aesculapius. Longuet's eyeglass turned up immediately after his departure; it was, in fact, tucked away in your bedroom. Hirsch has been selected to bring it to you, but that gossip-hunter seems hardly able to tear himself away from London at a moment when there is so much to be smelt out. The 'great' Most affair†129 alone is an inexhaustible source of fresh water (if by no means a 'cooling stream') for the said hart.†b Now he threatens to postpone his departure till 18 April. Then, too, he has found a kindred spirit in Kautsky — on whom he had frowned so grimly; even Engels takes a much more tolerant view of this joker†c since the latter gave proof of his considerable drinking ability. When the charmer — the little joker,†c I mean — first came to see me, the first question that rose to my lips was — are you like your mother†a? Not in the least, he exclaimed, and silently I congratulated his mother. He's a mediocrity, narrow in outlook, overwise (only 26 years old), a know-all, hard-working after a fashion, much concerned with statistics out of which, however, he makes little sense, by nature a member of the philistine tribe, for the rest, a decent fellow in his own way; I unload him onto amigo†b Engels as much as I can.

Page Break me46.82

Page me46.82

The day before yesterday the Dogberry CLUB†134 was here; yesterday, besides the 2 Maitland girls†c — and, briefly, Lankester and Dr Donkin — we were invaded by Hyndman and his wife,†d both of whom have too much staying-power. I quite like the wife on account of her brusque, unconventional and determined manner of thinking and speaking, but it's amusing to see how admiringly she hangs on the lips of her complacent chatterbox of a husband! Mama grew so weary (it was close on half past ten at night) that she withdrew. But there was some BYPLAY which tickled her. For Tussy has discovered a new infant prodigy amongst the Dogberries — one Radford; this youth is already a BARRISTER-AT-LAW, yet looks down upon the jus†e and works in the same LINE as Waldhorn. HE LOOKS WELL, CROSS between Irving and the late Lassalle (but has nothing in common with the latter's cynical, smarmily importunate mannerisms á la marquis-cum-Jew), AN INTELLIGENT AND SOMEWHAT PROMISING BOY. WELL, that's him in a nutshell. So shockingly did Dolly Maitland pay court to him that during supper Mama and Tussy were constantly exchanging signals. Finally, Mr Maitland also turned up, pretty well sober, and began a verbal duel with his instructive neighbour, Hyndman, on the subject of Gladstone in whom Maitland, a spiritualist, believes. I — rather annoyed by a bad throat — felt glad when the whole lot vanished. It is a strange thing that one cannot well live altogether without company, and that when you get it, you try hard to rid yourself of it.
Page me46.82

Hartmann is working hard in Woolwich as a COMMON WORKMAN; it is becoming increasingly difficult to converse with him in any language. The Russian REFUGEES in Geneva insist that he should disavow Rochefort and do so publicly. This he neither will nor can, even had this not been made impossible by the immoderate letter sent to Rochefort by the Petersburg Committee and published by him in the Intransigeant.†135 The Genevans have, indeed, long been trying to convince

Page Break me46.83
Europe that it was, in fact, they who were directing the movement in Russia; now that the lie they themselves had disseminated has been taken up by Bismarck et cie and constitutes a threat to them, they assert the opposite and vainly endeavour to convince the world of their innocence. In fact, they are mere doctrinaires, muddle-headed anarcho-socialists, and their influence on the Russian 'theatre of war' is ZERO.
Page me46.83

Have you been following the course of the legal proceedings against the assassins in St Petersburg?†136 They are sterling chaps through and through, sans pose mélodramatique,†a simple, matter-of-fact, heroic. Shouting and doing are irreconcilable opposites. The Petersburg Executive Committee,†70 which took such vigorous action, issues manifestoes of exquisite 'moderation'. It is remote indeed from the bungling way in which Most and other puerile ranters advocate TYRANNICIDE as a 'theory' and

'PANACEA' (the same thing was done by ENGLISHMEN as innocent as Disraeli, Savage Landor, Macaulay and Mazzini's friend, Stansfeld); they, on the other hand, are at pains to teach Europe that their modus operandi†b is a specifically Russian and historically inevitable mode of action which no more lends itself to moralising — for or against — than does the earthquake in Chios.†137

Page me46.83

In this connection there was a fine old scandal in the House of Commons (as you know, so as to oblige Bismarck and Gorchakov these miserable Gladstonites are making an onslaught, in the person of the pitiful Most,†129 on the freedom of the press in England, in which they are unlikely to succeed). Lord Churchill, a bumptious Tory youth, and member of the Marlborough FAMILY, questioned Sir Charles Dilke and Brassey, both UNDERSTRAPPERS in the CABINET, about the financial support afforded to the Freiheit. This was flatly denied and Churchill was compelled to name his authority. He named the ubiquitous Mr Maltman Barry! I enclose a cutting about this affair from the Weekly Dispatch (the Dilkes' paper, edited by the 'PHILOSOPHICAL RADICAL', Ashton Dilke, brother of the great 'Dilke'), and a statement by Maltman Barry in The Daily News. Clearly Dilke is lying. How pitiful that this braggart, the self-appointed future 'President of the English republic' should, for fear of losing his post, allow Bismarck to dictate upon what journals he ought or ought not to bestow £ 1! Only suppose it became known that, immediately after Hartmann's arrival in London, Ashton Dilke invited him to a LUNCHEON! But Hartmann turned this down, not wanting to 'exhibit' himself.

Page Break me46.84

Page me46.84

Apropos the Comtist renegade Maxse. This laddie is done far too great an honour in La Justice which handles him with kid gloves. In the eyes of this peculiar clique — ENGLISH LIBERALS and their even worse subspecies, the SO CALLED RADICALS — it is indeed a crime on the part of La Justice that, flouting all tradition and contrary to agreement, it fails to treat these SHAMS AND HUMBUGS in the accepted manner, to perpetuate the legend that is current about them in the liberal press on the Continent! If one considers the enormous effrontery with which the London press attacks socialist parties in all European countries, and how difficult it is for anyone who thinks it worth the trouble to say a word in return or even to get a brief answer into that press — it is really a bit too much to have to recognise the principle that, should a Paris newspaper venture to criticise that arch-hypocrite and CASUIST of the old-fashioned school, the 'great' Gladstone, it is duty-bound to put entire columns at the disposal of Mr Maxse and his prose, in order that he might repay Gladstone IN KIND for the avancement†a provided by the latter!

Page me46.84

Assuming the policy adopted by Gladstone (man of the COERCION†123 and ARMS ACT†138) vis-á-vis Ireland to be as right as it is in fact wrong, would this constitute any reason to talk of that man's 'générosité' and 'magnanimité'? As though there was any question of any such things between England and Ireland! Maxse really ought to be told that, while such Pecksniffian expressions may have free currency in London, they do not have it in Paris!

Page me46.84

Get Longuet to read Parnell's speech in Cork in today's Times.†b He will find in it the substance of what ought to be said about Gladstone's new LAND ACT†124; in this connection it should not be forgotten that Gladstone, by his disgraceful preliminary measures (incl. abolishing the freedom of speech of members of the Lower House),†122 has brought about the conditions under which mass EVICTIONS are now taking place in Ireland, while the ACT is pure humbug, seeing that the LORDS who can get anything they want from Gladstone, and no longer have to tremble before the Land League†139 — will DOUBTLESS throw it out or else so castrate it that the Irish themselves will end up by voting against it.

Page Break me46.85

Page me46.85

Give the children a hundred kisses from me; regards to Longuet. Write and tell me, DEAR CHILD, about the state of your health.

Page me46.85

Adio.

Your OLD NICK†a

Page me46.85

DEAR JOHNNY, HOW DO YOU LIKE FRANCE?†b

Page me46.85

First published abridged, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899 and in full in Bolshevik, No. 5, Moscow, 1931

Printed according to the original

52

ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†140
IN ZURICH

Page me46.85

London, 14 April 1881

Dear Mr Bernstein,

Very many thanks for the excerpt — for numerous reasons, however, it is desirable that we should read the full text of the relevant speeches. Kautsky will already have asked you to let us have the shorthand report†141 for a day or two. So much has been said in the Reichstag and Landtags that would have been better left unsaid that we cannot express an opinion on such matters unless we are fully acquainted with the case.

Page me46.85

Your announcement that you wished to resign from the paper†c came as a most unpleasant surprise. We can see absolutely no reason for it and it would give us great pleasure if you were to reconsider your decision. You have edited the paper ably from the outset, have given it the right tone, at the same time developing the humorous side it needed. Erudition in a newspaper editor is far less important than the ability speedily to interpret things from the aspect that matters, and this you have nearly always done. Kautsky, for example, would never be able to do that; he always has too many secondary viewpoints, which is perfectly all right for longish articles in a revue, but in the case of a paper, where rapid decisions are called for, frequently makes it impossible to see the wood for the trees, and that mustn't happen in a party organ. Alongside you, Kautsky would be quite all right, but on his own he would, I'm afraid, be all too often prevented by qualms of conscience over theory from following up a crucial advantage as unswervingly as is required by the Sozialdemokrat. I don't see who could take your place at this juncture, so long as Liebknecht remains in jail†142 and doesn't go to Zurich, which would be senseless except in an emergency, since there's much more need of him in the Reichstag. So you'll have to stay on after all whether you like it or not.

Page Break me46.86
Page me46.86
If we have not yet come forward directly and by name in the Sozialdemokrat, the fault, I do assure you, does not lie with your editorship of this paper up till now. On the contrary. It lies with the very statements made in Germany I alluded to at the beginning. Admittedly, we have been promised that this won't recur and that the revolutionary nature of the party is to be plainly spelled out and adhered to. But we should like to see evidence of it first, nor do we have any great confidence (rather the reverse) in the revolutionary bent of certain of these gentlemen, and that is precisely why it is most desirable that we should have the stenographic reports of the speeches made by all our deputies. After you have used them you can easily send them over here for a day or two; I guarantee their prompt return. That will help to clear away the last obstacles that still exist — through no fault of our own — between ourselves and the party in Germany. This in confidence.
Page me46.86
It would seem that Gladstone has paved the way for the triumph of Most. It's hardly likely that 12 jurors will be found who will unanimously find Most guilty, and, if only one finds him innocent, the case will fall to the ground. Admittedly, he can be brought before another jury, but this hardly ever happens. On top of that, however, the 1861 Act,†143 under which Most is being charged, has never been applied before and by and large it is the opinion of jurists that the wording is inapplicable to the case.

Page me46.86
Argyll's resignation from the Ministry because the Irish LAND BILL†124 confers on tenants a measure of co-ownership of the land is an ill omen for the fate of the BILL in the Upper House. Meanwhile Parnell has made a successful start in Manchester to his English agitational tour. The position of the grand liberal coalition is becoming ever more critical. But then over here everything moves slowly, if the more surely for that.

Page Break me46.87

Page me46.87
So don't be deterred by the initial difficulties; don't lose heart but carry on editing just as before. If the worst comes to the worst, you could write to Leipzig and ask them to send you an assistant. That would probably be the best way of overcoming the difficulties you have to contend with. Then, when you have taught the new man the ropes, there will still be time enough to talk of resigning.
Page me46.87
Kindest regards.

Yours
F. Engels

Page me46.87
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

53
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL
IN LEIPZIG
Page me46.87
London, 28 April 1881

Dear Bebel,

In response to your inquiry I asked my source (a stockbroker) whether the person concerned would do better to continue paying the GREAT BRITAIN MUTUAL & Co. (Office 101, Cheapside, it's the same surely? GREAT BRITAIN MUTUAL INSURANCE?) or to stop payment of the calls, and received the reply:

'We fear there is no alternative but to keep on paying the calls as they are made.'†a
Page me46.87
Ede†b has sent us the stenographic reports of the Reichstag debates on the state of siege and the Accident Insurance Bill.†144 We congratulate you on both your speeches. The one on the Accident Bill pleased us particularly. It strikes the right note — high-minded, yet based on a real knowledge of the facts, and ironically superior. Your criticism of the Bill was all that could have been said or desired. I have been expressly asked to tell you all this on Marx's behalf as well as my own. It was the best speech of yours we have ever read, and the debate gave one the impression that the turner, Bebel, was the only educated man in the whole of the Reichstag.

Page Break me46.88
Page me46.88

At the 2nd reading you might possibly include the following: You might perhaps ask us, gentlemen, how we can prevail upon our consciences to grant money to this government, even though it be for the relief of workers who have met with an accident? Gentlemen, after what the Prussian Landtag and you yourselves have done in the matter of subventions, the power of the Reichstag in financial affairs, its ability to wring concessions from the government by virtue of the fact that it holds the purse-strings, has gone by the board. The Reichstag and Landtag have thrown away their entire budgetary authority with nothing to show for it in return, and here it is certainly no longer a case of a paltry million or two. — All those subventions, moreover, were for purposes of exploitation (protective tariffs, purchase of the railways at 30% above their value — Rhenish Rail were standing at less than 120, rose to 150 as a result of the government's offer to purchase, now 160!), and this time it is, after all, at least supposed to be for the workers.
Page me46.88
For the rest, the terms of acceptance you proposed fully protect you to your rear.
Page me46.88
But what a typically inflated, maliciously stupid, Prussian Junkercum-bureaucrat Brother von Puttkamer is!†145

Your
F.E.
Page me46.88
Marx sends kindest regards.
Page me46.88
Ede writes to say that he is staying on for the time being.†a

Page me46.88
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.89

54
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET†146
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.89
[London,] 29 April 1881
41 Maitland Park, N.W.

My dear Jenny,

I congratulate you upon the happy delivery; at least I presume that everything is right from your taking the trouble to write. My 'womankind' expected the 'newcomer' to increase 'the better half' of the population; for my own part I prefer the 'manly' sex for children born at this turning point of history. They have before them the most revolutionary period men had ever to pass through. The bad thing now is to be 'old' so as to be only able to foresee instead of seeing.

Page me46.89

The 'newcomer'†a steps in pretty closely to your own birthday, Johnny's, and mine. He, like ourselves, patronizes the merry month of May. I am of course charged by Mama (and Tussy, though she finds perhaps yet the time to write herself) to wish you all possible good things, but I do not see that 'wishes' are good for anything except the glossing over one's own powerlessness.

Page me46.89

I hope by and by you will find the servants you want and get your 'ménage'†b into some quiet routine. I felt rather anxious about the too many troubles weighing upon you just now, at such a critical moment.

Page me46.89

Johnny, according to your last letter, is recovering his health. He is in fact the most delicate of the three boys†c whom I have the honour to know personally. Tell him that while walking yesterday through the park — our own Maitland Park — that glorious person, the park-keeper, suddenly approached, asked for news about Johnny, and at last communicated me the important fact that he will 'retire' from his office and make place to a younger 'force'. With him one of the pillars of the 'Lord Southampton' disappears.†147

Page me46.89

There is little going on in 'our circle' as Beesly daubed it. Pumps still awaits 'news' from Beust; has in the meanwhile thrown an eye upon 'Kautsky' who, however, did not yet 'declare'; and she will always feel grateful to Hirsch for having not only virtually 'declared', but, after a refusal, renewed his 'declaration', just before his trip to Paris. This Hirsch becomes more and more a nuisance. My 'opinion' of him grows less and less.

Page Break me46.90

Page me46.90

The last London craze was the Disraeli exaltation which gave John Bull the satisfaction of admiring his own magnanimity. Is it not 'grand' to act the sycophant with regard to a dead man whom just before his kicking the bucket you had saluted with rotten apples and foul eggs? At the same time this teaches the 'lower classes' that however their 'natural superiors' may fall out amongst each other during the struggle for 'place and pelf', death brings out the truth that the leaders of the 'ruling classes' are always 'great and good men'.

Page me46.90

It is a very fine trick of Gladstone — only the 'stupid party' does not understand it — to offer at a moment when landed property in Ireland (as in England) will be depreciated by the import of corn and cattle from the United States — to offer them at that very moment the public Exchequer where they can sell that property at a price it does no longer possess!†148

Page me46.90

The real intricacies of the Irish land problem — which indeed are not especially Irish — are so great that the only true way to solve it would be to give the Irish Home-rule and thus force them to solve it themselves. But John Bull is too stupid to understand this.

Page me46.90

Engels comes just, sends you his best compliments, and as it is almost post-time, so that I cannot afterwards finish this letter, I must abruptly end it.

Page me46.90

With my compliments to Johnny, Harry and the 'good' Wolf†a (who is indeed an excellent boy) and also to father Longuet.

Yours,
Old Nick

Page me46.90
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Reproduced from the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.91

55
ENGELS TO JENNY LONGUET
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.91
London, 31 May 1881
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

My dear Jenny,

Many thanks for your kind letter, it is really too good of you to sit down and write to us in the midst of the trouble you have to pass through. But let me at once pass to the main thing. I have every reason to hope that unless unforeseen accidents occur, you still will soon have your Mama†a with you. Mohr told me on Sunday that the doctor†b thinks she is getting strong enough for the journey. There are great changes in her state from time to time, sometimes she goes about in the day and even to theatres in the evening, but at other times she suffers from very bad pains and scarcely leaves her bed for a couple of days. But these attacks seem to pass off as they come and not to leave her visibly worse. Still she is upon the whole losing flesh and this seems to be the only constant symptom which if not arrested may turn out serious. What the nature of the complaint is I am totally ignorant of and am apt to conclude that the doctors are equally in the dark, anyhow they don't seem to agree at all about it. When Tussy wrote to you, your Mama was just suffering from one of these attacks, and I believe there was a slight misunderstanding about what the doctor said, namely that she was then temporarily not in a fit state to travel. The doctor himself wishes her very much to go, as he anticipates a good effect from the change.

Page me46.91

Now about Mohr's Turkish baths, they need not frighten you, he is taking them merely for the sake of his rheumatically stiff leg which bothers him in walking. As to his cold, the present warm weather will soon reduce it to an infinitesimal quantity and a change to the seaside will finish it off — that is my opinion. I have just taken him up to Hampstead Heath, I hope the walk will do him good. Your Mama was out, so she cannot be so very bad just now.
Page me46.91

I am glad that amidst all the petites miséres de la vie de campagne†c you still are well pleased with house, garden and climate which after all are the main thing, to the rest you will either gradually find remedies or — get used to them. My especial envy is directed of course to the wine cellar and the cellars generally for which we may sigh in vain here in London.

Page Break me46.92
Page me46.92

You must indeed have risen tremendously in the eyes of old Collett since you and Longuet have got Clemenceau round to the only 'correct' view about Tunis.†149 I can very well imagine the old man's enthusiasm at seeing the truly orthodox policy preached in a large Paris daily. Fancy the old buffer, who all his life has defended the power of the Crown, now talking of a saviour of the Republic.
Page me46.92

We are going on here much in the usual way, excepting that we have Mrs Pauli here who brings her eldest step-daughter to Manchester where she is going to stay some time with an old friend of Pauli's. She is not quite so stout as she was but quite as lively. Last Sunday by a godsend we got some waldmeister,†a and with the help of a dozen of Moselle we brewed three bowls of Maitrank†b which were duly emptied by a — rather numerous — company. There were fourteen of us, and they were very jolly. Lenchen was there also and told me this morning it had not very well agreed with her: 'she never had such a Katzenjammer†c in her life' (please don't let it out!). Mrs Pauli is very sorry she cannot see you here this time and wishes to be most kindly remembered to you.

Page me46.92

Hartmann called yesterday with the news that he is off to America, it is a good thing for him, he could never settle down here properly until he got work for a short time in Siemens' electric factory in Woolwich but that is at an end now too. He talks of coming back in a few months.
Page me46.92

Pumps is going on as usual, suffers now and then from headaches, my only complaint is an increasing left-ear deafness, I hope the summer may cure it.
Page me46.92

Kind regards to you and Longuet. Pumps sends her love and I join her in it.

Yours affectionately,
F. Engels

Page me46.92
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 35, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.93

56
MARX TO JOHN SWINTON
IN NEW YORK
Page me46.93
London, 2 June 1881
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

Dear Mr Swinton,

I need hardly recommend you the bearer of these lines, my excellent friend, Mr Hartmann. I send you through him a photogram of mine; it is rather bad, but the only one left to me.
Page me46.93
As to the book of Mr Henry George,†a I consider it as a last attempt — to save the capitalistic regime. Of course, this is not the meaning of the author, but the older disciples of Ricardo — the radical ones — fancied already that by the public appropriation of the rent of land everything would be righted. I have referred to this doctrine in the Misére de la Philosophie (published in 1847 against Proudhon).†b
Page me46.93
Mrs Marx sends you her best compliments. Unfortunately her illness assumes more and more a fatal character.
Page me46.93
Believe me, dear Sir,

Yours most sincerely,
Karl Marx
Page me46.93
The 'Viereck' was so stultified at his arrival in the US that he confounded my friend Engels with myself and transformed my compliments to you in those of Engels; he did the same with regard to another American friend of mine†c by whose letter I was informed of the quid pro quo.

Page me46.93
First published in A Souvenir from Jimmie Higgins Book Shop, New York, 1923

Reproduced from the original

Page Break me46.94

57
MARX TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE†150
IN HOBOKEN
Page me46.94
London, 2 June 1881

Dear Sorge,

I recommend to you most heartily the bearer of this card, my friend Hartmann.

Page me46.94
First published in The New-York Herald, No. 16455, 10 September 1881

Reproduced from the newspaper

58
ENGELS TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE
IN HOBOKEN
Page me46.94
London, 2 June 1881

My dear Sorge,

In the person of the bearer I introduce to you our friend Leo Hartmann, of Moscow celebrity. To recommend him specially to your attention could be superfluous. If during his stay in America you can in any way be of service to him you will by that render a service to the common cause and a personal favor to Marx and myself.

Yours truly,
Fr. Engels

Page me46.94
First published in The New-York Herald, No. 16455, 10 September 1881

Reproduced from the newspaper

Page Break me46.95

59
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.95
[London,] 6 June 1881

My dearest Don Quixote,

I am really wrong to have not written before this, but you know my good intentions and weak doings in this line. There passes, however, no day, when my thoughts are not with you and the lovely children.†a
Page me46.95
As to my health you need not trouble you[rself]; I had a nasty cold, almost as sempiternal as was the Stockschnupfen†b of Seguin selig†c — but it is now rapidly passing away.
Page me46.95
As to Möhmchen, you are aware that there is no cure of the illness she suffers from, and she gets indeed weaker. Fortunately the pains are not such as they mostly are in such cases, the best proof of which is that she attends still several times during the week at London theatres. She keeps in fact wonderfully up, but travelling to Paris is quite out of the question. I consider it a most happy event that Lina Schoeler surprised us yesterday and is to stay about a month.
Page me46.95
Has Johnny got Reineke or rather Renard the Fox†d I sent him? and has the poor fellow somebody to read it for him?
Page me46.95
To-day (Bank Holiday)†151 and yesterday infernal rainy and cold weather, one of the bad tricks the celestial father has always in store for his London plebeian cattle and sheep. Yesterday he spoiled by the rain the Hyde Park Demonstration of Parnell's.†152
Page me46.95
Hartmann has on Friday last left for New York and I am glad that he is out of harm's way. But foolishly, a few days before his departure, he asked the hand of Pumps from Engels — and this by writing, telling him at the same time that he believed he committed no mistake in doing so, alias, he (Hartmann) believed in his (Hartmann's) acceptance on the part of Pumps — the which girl had indeed rather hardly flirted with him, but only to stir Kautsky. I learn now from Tussy that the same Hartmann had offered himself to her before her voyage to Jersey. But the present case is the worse as the distinguished

Page Break me46.96
Perovskaya, the victim of the Russian movement, had lived with Hartmann in 'free' marriage. And she has hardly died on the gallows.†153 From Perovskaya to Pumps — rather too bad this, and Mama is quite disgusted with it and the whole male sex!

Page me46.96

Longuet's article on Ireland was good. We all thought there had something happened seeing that for some time he seemed more and more to disappear from the columns of the Justice. Have you seen or heard anything of the illustrious Hirsch? He sent me today two New York papers.

Page me46.96

There is only one news worth reporting. A Yankee†a is said to have invented a coal-cutting machine which would do away with the greatest part of the present labour of the colliers — viz. the 'hewing' of coal in the coal-measures and mines, leaving to the miners only the task of breaking the cut of coal and loading it into trucks. If this invention prove successful — as there is every reason to believe — it will give an immense stir in Yankeeland and do great damage to John Bull's industrial supremacy.

Page me46.96

Mama also asks me to tell you that the pretext for Lina's [Schoeler] presence is the wedding of Lisa Green, daughter of the†b successful admirer of Martin Tupper.

Page me46.96

Laura does everything to amuse and cheer Möhmchen.

Page me46.96

Helen†c sends you her love.

Page me46.96

And now kiss many many times for me Johnny, Harra and the noble Wolf†d. As to the 'great unknown' one,†e I dare not make so free with him.

Page me46.96

How is your asthma? Does it still cling to you? I hardly understand how you manage to get breathing time with 4 children and only nominal servants.

Farewell, my dear child,
Old Nick

Page me46.96

First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.97

60

ENGELS TO JENNY LONGUET
IN ARGENTEUIL

Page me46.97

London, 17 June 1881
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

My dear Jenny,

I hasten to reply to your letter of the 15th received this morning only. When I wrote to you last,†a the doctor†b insisted upon your Mama going to Paris and it was herself who resisted, saying she did not feel strong enough for the journey. A few days later the doctor found that she had indeed become so much weaker that he could no longer advise her to go to Paris. She is indeed getting extremely thin and emaciated and complained to me today a great deal about increasing weakness, especially when dressing, she has begun to stay the greater part of the day in bed and the doctor made her get up and go out for a walk while I was there. He has now told Mohr that the best thing to do is for both of them to go to Eastbourne, and that at once. We tried to persuade her, but of course she offered all kinds of resistance: now she ought to go to Paris if anywhere, and so forth, so we told her that a fortnight's stay at Eastbourne would perhaps restore her forces sufficiently to enable her to go to Paris afterwards, etc., etc. I left them at it, and you will probably hear the result in a day or two from Tussy who said she would write to you soon.
Page me46.97

Whatever the nature of the complaint may be, this constant and increasing loss of flesh and strength seems a very serious feature, especially as it does not seem to come to a stop — most of the doctors said that this was not in itself a dangerous symptom unless it went beyond a certain point; that they had known cases where the weakening all of a sudden had been arrested and strength recovered. I hope the seaside will have that effect, if we only had her there already.
Page me46.97

To Mohr the change will be equally favourable, he wants a bit of bracing up too, his cough is not so bad at nights and he sleeps better, that is one thing.

Page Break me46.98
Page me46.98

A very great piece of good luck has been the arrival of Lina Schoeler who is now staying at your house, as lively and good-natured as ever, and a good deal more deaf. Her presence cheers your Mama up a good deal, I hope she will stay for some time.
Page me46.98

Sam Moore has passed his final examination as Barrister successfully last week.
Page me46.98

I hear from Tussy that you have got a fresh servant and that she seems to suit you, so your household troubles bid fair to diminish too.
Page me46.98

I close this letter so as to send it by early mail in the morning, hoping thus it may reach you to-morrow night. Miss Parnell's letter I shall return in a few days. Kind regards to Longuet and Johnny from yours affectionately

F. Engels

Page me46.98

First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 35, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

61
MARX TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE†154
IN HOBOKEN
Page me46.98
[London,] 20 June 1881

Dear Sorge,

Today I had broken off some other work I was doing, meaning to embark at long last on a lengthy letter to you and now, as ill luck would have it, I've had one visitor after another and thus hardly have time enough left to drop you a few lines before the post goes. Hence a brief survey.
Page me46.98
Your son†a pleases everyone he meets here. Since I have been suffering continuously for 6 months and more from a cough, cold, sore throat and rheumatism, which only seldom permit me to go out and keep me out of society, he and I have an hour or so of private conversation

Page Break me46.99
ABOUT ONCE A WEEK and I find that he has, au fond,†a absorbed rather more of our views than would appear. He is an altogether capable, decent lad with, moreover, cultivated manners and a pleasant temperament. He is, besides, and that is all-important, FULL OF ENERGY.
Page me46.99
My last visitors, only just gone, were Viereck and his newly married wife, also née Viereck.†b I had not seen the gentleman since he came back from America.†119 A few days ago he sent Kautsky to see me with sundry scraps of paper for me to sign (one written by Liebknecht and also signed by him in his own and Bebel's names). All of them related to certain agreements respecting the Lingenau legacy†45 negotiated by Viereck with the 'New Yorker Volkszeitung' et cie. I refused to sign since, in this matter, I am obliged, as I explained, to deal only with our chief executor, Sorge. At the same time I gave Viereck to understand that, in my view, the first thing to be done was to pay you the 120 dollars for the lawyer in St Louis out of what still remained of the American fund in New York. Viereck now tells me today that — upon my accepting responsibility vis-á-vis the Leipzigers — he at once sent off instructions to that effect to New York. He arrived IN THE NICK OF TIME, for otherwise a formal protest would have gone off from me to Leipzig tomorrow, a protest against the modus operandi†c of the Leipzig party leaders who had hitherto conducted themselves in this matter as if the decision rested solely with them.

Page me46.99

Now, post festum,†d Viereck has mentioned your claim in respect of an advance of 80 dollars. I told him that, after the court decision, should this be unfavourable, we, the executors, would indemnify you, as we damned well ought.

Page me46.99

Before getting your copy of Henry George,†e I had already had 2 others, one from Swinton and one from Willard Brown. I therefore gave one to Engels and one to Lafargue. Today I shall have to confine myself to a very brief assessment of the book. Theoretically, the man is totally arriére.†f He has understood nothing of the nature of surplus value and hence, after the English pattern, but lagging far behind the English, he loses himself in speculations about those portions of surplus value that have become independent — about the relations between profit, rent, interest, etc. His basic tenet is that everything would be in order were rent to be paid to the State. (You will also find payment of this kind among the transitional measures in the Communist Manifesto.†a) This view owes its origin to the bourgeois economists; it was first advanced (if we disregard a similar postulate in the late 18th century) by the earliest radical disciples of Ricardo immediately after the latter's death. In 1847, in my anti-Proudhon book, I commented on it thus: 'Nous concevons que des économistes, tels que Mill' (senior, not his son John Stuart who repeats the same thing in somewhat modified form), 'Cherbuliez, Hilditch et autres, ont demandé que la rente soit attribuée á l'État pour servir á l'acquittement des impôts. C'est la franche expression de la haine que le capitaliste industriel voue au propriétaire foncier, qui lui parait une inutilité, une superfétation, dans l'ensemble de la production bourgeoise.'†b

Page Break me46.100

Page me46.100

As already mentioned, we ourselves adopted the appropriation of rent by the State amongst many other transitional measures which, as is likewise indicated in the Manifesto, are and cannot but be contradictory in themselves.

Page me46.100

But making a socialist PANACEA of this desideratum of the English radical bourgeois economists, declaring this procedure to be a solution of the antagonisms inherent in today's mode of production — this was the prerogative of Colins, a native of Belgium and on old, retired officer of Napoleon's Hussars who, in the latter days of Guizot and the early ones of Napoleon le petit,†155 sent out into the world from Paris bulky volumes on the subject of this, his 'discovery',†c likewise making the further discovery that, while there is indeed no God, there is an 'immortal' human soul, and that animals have 'no sensitivity'. For had they any sensitivity, i.e. soul, we would be cannibals and a kingdom of righteousness could never be set up on this earth. His 'anti-landed property theory', along with his soul, etc., theory, has for years been advocated month after month in the Paris journal Philosophie de l'Avenir by his few remaining disciples, mostly Belgians. They call themselves 'collectivistes rationnels' and have applauded Henry George.

Page me46.100

In the same vein as them, and at much the same time, one Samter, amongst others, a shallow-pated Prussian banker and lottery collector

Page Break me46.101
from East Prussia, distended this 'socialism' to fill a hefty tome.†a
Page me46.101

All these 'socialists' since Colins have this in common — they allow wage labour and hence also capitalist production to subsist, while endeavouring to delude themselves and the world into believing that the transformation of rent into taxation paid to the State must bring about the automatic disappearance of all the abuses of capitalist production. So the whole thing is merely an attempt, tricked out with socialism, to save the capitalist régime and, indeed, to re-establish it on an even broader basis than at present.
Page me46.101

Again, this cloven hoof, which is at the same time an ass's hoof, is unmistakably in evidence in the declamations of Henry George. It is all the more inexcusable in his case in that he ought, on the contrary, to have asked himself the question: How comes it that in the UNITED STATES, where the land was relatively — i.e. by comparison with civilised Europe — accessible to the great mass of the people and TO A CERTAIN DEGREE (again relative) still is, the capitalist economy and the corresponding enslavement of the working class have developed more rapidly and brazenly than in any other country?
Page me46.101

On the other hand, George's book, like the sensation it created in your midst, is significant in being a first, if unsuccessful, attempt at emancipation from orthodox political economy.
Page me46.101

H. George, by the by, seems to know nothing of the history of the earlier American ANTI-RENTERS†156 who were men of practice rather than theory. In other respects he is a talented writer (talented, too, in the matter of boosting the YANKEES), as is shown by, e.g., his article on California in the Atlantic.†157 He also has the revolting presumptiousness and arrogance that is the unmistakable hallmark of all such PANACEA-mongers.
Page me46.101

Between ourselves, my wife's illness is, alas, incurable. In a few days' time I shall be taking her to the SEASIDE at Eastbourne.
Page me46.101

Salut fraternel.†b

Your
K. Marx

Page me46.101
First published abridged in Die Neue Zeit, Bd. 2, Nr. 33, 1891-92 and in full in the book Briefe und Auszüge aus Briefen von Joh. Phil. Becker, Jos. Dietzgen, Friedrich Engels, Karl Marx u. A. an F.A. Sorge und Andere, Stuttgart, 1906

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.102

62
MARX TO HENRY MAYERS HYNDMAN
IN LONDON
Page me46.102
[Draft]

Eastbourne, Sussex, 2 July 1881
43 Terminus Road

My dear Sir,

The state of Mrs Marx's health which becomes daily more critical and demands my continual attendance upon her, will account for my belated reply to your letter d.d. June 5.
Page me46.102
I confess to some astonishment at the discovery that, during your stay at London, you should have so closely kept the secret of your plan, then matured and executed, to publish, with certain modifications, the rejected article of The Nineteenth Century as chapters II and III of England for All, that is to say of your comments on the Federation's Foundation Program.†158
Page me46.102
In your letter which does not at all refer to the surprise thus kept in store for me, you say:

'If you think I ought to acknowledge your book by your name, etc.'
Page me46.102
That question, it seems to me, ought to have preceded your publication instead of coming behind it.
Page me46.102
You favour me with two reasons for freely using the Capital, a work not yet Englished, without mentioning the book itself or its author.
Page me46.102
One reason is, that 'many (Englishmen) have an horror of Socialism and that name'. Was it with a view to assuage this 'horror' that you evoked [on] p. 86 'the demon of Socialism'?
Page me46.102
Your second and last reason is, that 'the Englishmen have a dread of being taught by a foreigner'!
Page me46.102
I have not found it so during the times of the 'International', nor of Chartism.†159 But let that pass. If this dread of 'the' Englishmen frightened you, why tell them in the preface p. VI that the 'ideas' etc. of chapters II and III, whatever else they may be, bear at all events the stigma of being no home-make? The Englishmen you have to deal with can hardly be so dense as to fancy that the above-said passage points to an — English author.

Page Break me46.103
Page me46.103

Apart, however, from your rather humorous reasons, I am decidedly of opinion that to have named the Capital and its author, would have been a big blunder. Party programs ought to keep free of any apparent dependence upon individual authors or books. But allow me to add that they are also no proper place for new scientific developments, such as those borrowed by you from the Capital, and that the latter are altogether out of place in a commentary on a Program with whose professed aims they are not at all connected. Their introduction might have had some fitness in the Exposé of a Program for the foundation of a distinct and independent Working Class Party.
Page me46.103

You are good enough to inform me that your brochure 'though marked “price half-a crown” is not published', but 'merely' to be 'distributed to members of the Democratic Federation, etc.' I am quite sure that this was your intention, but I know that it is not opinion of your printer. A friend of mine saw your brochure in my study, wanted it, copied its title and place of printing, ordered it through his booksellers Williams and Norgate on the 13th of June and got it by them with their account note d.d. 14th June.
Page me46.103

And this brings me to the only point of practical import. In case the public press should pounce upon your brochure, I might be obliged to speak, considering that chapters II and III consist in part of passages simply translated from the Capital, but separated by no marks of quotation from a remainder, much of which is not exact or even implies misunderstandings.
Page me46.103

I have written with that full frankness which I consider the first condition of friendly intercourse.
Page me46.103

Best compliments of Mrs Marx and myself to Mrs Hyndman.

Yours very truly,
K.M.

Page me46.103
First published, in the language of the original (English), in Annali, an. III, Milano, 1960

Reproduced from the original

Page Break me46.104

ENGELS TO MARX
IN EASTBOURNE†160
Page me46.104
[London,] 7 July 1881
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

Dear Moor,

In my last letter I quite forgot to mention money; owing to Schorlemmer's presence I have been somewhat restricted in my movements. You can now have £100 á £120, and it's simply a question of whether you want it all at one go and how much is to be sent there and how much is for here. When you get this letter, make up your mind straight away so that I get your answer by tomorrow. For Schorlemmer and Pumps are going to the theatre tomorrow evening, while I shall remain at home. I can then at once make out a CHEQUE in favour of Lenchen and take it to her. You or your wife can of course decide what is to be done with the money.
Page me46.104
Tussy and Dolly Maitland acted very well; the girl showed a great deal of SELF POSSESSION and looked quite charming on the stage. Tussy was very good in the emotional scenes, though it was somewhat apparent that she had taken Ellen Terry for her model, as Radford had Irving, but she'll soon wean herself from that; if she really wants to make her mark in public she must unquestionably STRIKE OUT A LINE OF HER OWN, and she'll do that all right.
Page me46.104
I hear that the sea air has not yet had the desired effect on your wife; that often happens in the early days; it may, and I trust will, come later.
Page me46.104
Pumps is going to Manchester with Schorlemmer on Monday†a to bring back little Lydia; I hear you have written to Tussy asking her to join you. I may perhaps come later when Pumps is back. We shall probably be going to Bridlington Quay†161 shortly and then to Jersey with Schorlemmer when he returns from Germany; at any rate that's what we've planned to date.
Page me46.104
Best wishes from us all to your wife and yourself.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.104
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.105

64
ENGELS TO NORRIS A. CLOWES
IN NEW YORK
Page me46.105
[Draft]

London, 22 July 1881
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

Norris A. Clowes Esq.†162

Dear Sir,

I am sorry my time will not allow me to write to you the statement you desire.†a However, if you wish to make yourself acquainted with the present state of the Labour Movement in Great Britain, you will find the necessary information in the weekly Labour Standard published at 2 Whitefriars St. of which twelve numbers have up to now been issued. Most of the non-signed leaders are written by me.†163
Page me46.105
If you wish to enter into communication with Mr Most, you had better write to the Editor of the Freiheit,†b 252 Tottenham Court Road, W., London, who will be able to tell you whether such communication will be possible under present circumstances.
Page me46.105
I shall be glad to see you in case you should come to London.

I remain
Yours very truly,
F.E.

Page me46.105
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.106

65
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET
IN ARGENTEUIL

Page me46.106
[London,] 22 July 1881

*My dear Jenny,

The doctor†a has just left Mama, and we shall start on Tuesday or Wednesday next. You will be informed by telegram of the exact day.
Page me46.106
Please write at once, because Mama will not get away from London before you have written her which things from London may be required by you. You know she is fond of that sort of commission-business.*
Page me46.106
I enclose £5, since you will have to pay cash for the hire of bed-linen etc.; the remainder will be paid when I arrive. Only on these terms will I agree to the arrangement you have suggested.
Page me46.106
As *to the story Hirsch has told you with respect to Lafargue, it is a mere lie. Lafargue, as I was sure from the beginning, has never written anything of the sort to his Paris correspondents.
Page me46.106
Adio, dear child, with 1000nd kisses to the children

Old Nick*

Page me46.106
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.107

66
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.107
Argenteuil†164, 27 July 1881
11 Boulevard Thiers

Dear Engels,

I can't write at any greater length today as I have a mass of letters to get off and on this, our first day, the little ones†a have rightly laid claim to me.
Page me46.107

The journey from London to Dover went off as well as could be expected, i.e. my wife, who was most unwell when we set out from Maitland Park, did not notice any change for the worse as a result of the journey. On the boat she at once went to the ladies' cabin where she found an excellent sofa to lie on. The sea was quite calm and the weather couldn't have been finer. She landed in Calais in better shape than when she had left London and decided to carry on. The only stations where our TICKETS allowed us to break the journey to Paris were Calais and Amiens. She thought the latter place (ABOUT 2 HOURS' journey from Paris) too close to stop at. Between Amiens and Creil she felt diarrhoea coming on, and the griping pains also grew more violent. At Creil the train stopped for only 3 minutes, but she had just enough time to do what was necessary. In Paris, where we arrived at 7.30 in the evening, we were met at the station by Longuet. However the direct train from this station to Argenteuil left too late for us to wait for it. So, after the douaniers†b had examined our trunks, by CAB to St Lazare station and from there, after waiting some while, by RAILWAY to our destination which we did not reach, however, until ABOUT 10 O'CLOCK. She was in very poor shape, but this morning (at any rate now, ABOUT 10 O'CLOCK) feels better than she used to do in London at a similar hour. At all events, the return journey will be made in much easier stages.
Page me46.107

Longuet is introducing me to his doctor†c today, so that we can act immediately in the event of the diarrhoea recurring.

Page Break me46.108
Page me46.108

We found everyone well here, except that Johnny and Harry had slight colds as a result of the change of temperature (all the children, especially Johnny, had been affected by the days of extreme heat). As a summer residence the house is first-class, must obviously have once served as such for a richard.†a
Page me46.108

WITH BEST COMPLIMENTS TO Pumps.

Your
Moor
Page me46.108

It would seem that Tussy has written to her correspondent over there†b telling him of my arrival and hence, or so Longuet tells me, this is already an open secret. The 'anarchists', he says, will impute to me the malicious intention of swinging the vote.†165 Clemenceau told him that I had absolutely nothing to fear from the police.

Page me46.108
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

ENGELS TO MARX
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.108
Bridlington Quay, Yorkshire
29 July 1881
1 Sea View

Dear Moor,

I got your letter†c yesterday morning before we left†161 and was very glad to hear that you did, after all, have a reasonably good journey. But you are right in proposing to break the return journey; it's far too risky, letting such an invalid remain on the go for 12 hours.

Page Break me46.109
I only hope that the change of air and scene doesn't fail to produce the desired effect.
Page me46.109
We left at 10.30 and arrived here at 5.5, minus my trunk, which had gone astray, but turned up before evening. After perhaps a quarter of an hour's search we found lodgings that were first-rate and not too dear (2 doors away from last year's, but a great improvement in every way). We had some rain yesterday, but today it seems to be slowly clearing up. The day before yesterday, by way of insuring myself against rainy weather such as we have again become familiar with lately in London, I went to fetch the Skaldin and the first two volumes of Maurer's Fronhöfe†a from Tussy.
Page me46.109
Our present plan is to remain here for 3 weeks or, perhaps, 4, depending on the weather and other circumstances. I have got some CHEQUES with me, so if you need anything, don't hesitate to let me know roughly how much you want. Your wife must not and shall not want for anything; if there's something she would like to have or something you know would give her pleasure, then have it she must.
Page me46.109
Tussy dropped in to see us the day before yesterday, so I accompanied her home to fetch the books and drink the inevitable glass of Pilsener with her. Here one can pretty well do without German beer, for the BITTER ALE in the little café on the pier is excellent, and has a head on it like German beer.
Page me46.109
Write again soon and tell me how things are.
Page me46.109
Warm regards from all of us to your wife and Jenny. Pumps sends her special love to Johnny, as do I. Our regards, too, to Longuet.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.109

First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.110

68
MARX TO ENGELS†166
AT BRIDLINGTON QUAY
Page me46.110
Argenteuil, 3 August 1881
11 Boulevard Thiers

DEAR FRED,

Drawing so heavily on your EXCHEQUER is a great embarrassment to me, but the anarchy which has wrought havoc with the housekeeping over the past 2 years and given rise to all sorts of arrears has been oppressing me for some considerable time. On the 15th of this month I have £30 to pay in London, and this has been a weight on my mind since the day we left.
Page me46.110
When we shall return is far from clear. Every day we experience the same ups and downs here as we did in Eastbourne,†160 only with the difference — as for instance yesterday — that there are sudden and frightful bouts of pain. Our Dr Dourlen, who is an excellent doctor and fortunately lives quite close by, immediately intervened and used one of the powerful opiates which Donkin had been deliberately keeping up his sleeve. After that she†a had a good night and today feels so well that she got up for once as early as 11 o'clock and is finding distraction in the company of Jenny and the children.†b (The diarrhoea was STOPPED on the 2nd day after our arrival. From the start Dourlen had said that if it was merely an ACCIDENT, it didn't matter; but it might also be a symptom of an actual intestinal infection. Fortunately this was not the case, therefore.)
Page me46.110
The temporary 'improvements' do not, of course, inhibit the natural course of the disease, but they delude my wife and fortify Jenny — despite my objurgations — in the belief that our stay in Argenteuil should last as long as possible. I know better how things stand, and my anxiety is all the greater for that. Last night, IN FACT, was the first occasion on which I had anything like a decent sleep. My thoughts, they are so dull and dead as turned a mill-wheel in my head.†c And this is why I have so far remained exclusively in Argenteuil, neither visiting Paris nor writing so much as a line to anybody there encouraging them to come and visit me. Longuet has already heard Hirsch,†a in the office of La Justice, express legitimate surprise at this 'abstention'.

Page Break me46.111

Page me46.111
And, INTO THE BARGAIN, a Kotzebue-like drama has been played out here during the past 5 days.
Page me46.111
Jenny had, for cook, A VERY LIVELY YOUNG GIRL FROM THE COUNTRY with whom she was satisfied in every respect, since she also behaved most amiably towards the children. Her only testimonial from her last MISTRESS, wife of Dr Reynaud (another Argenteuil doctor), was a 'negative' one to the effect that she had quitted her service voluntarily. Old MOTHER Longuet who, so far as she is able, exercises a dictatorship over Jenny, was by no means satisfied with this, nor could she think of anything better to do than to go and write, off her own bat, to Madame Reynaud.
Page me46.111
Madame Reynaud is a pretty coquette and her husband a dissolute jackass; hence things happen in this couple's house that are much gossiped about in Argenteuil. They didn't know that their former maid had again taken service in the same locality, and with none other than Mr Longuet, an intimate friend of Dr Dourlen's whose wife was an intimate enemy of Madame Reynaud's! THIS WAS TO BE LOOKED AFTER.
Page me46.111
So one fine morning along comes Madame Reynaud — not, hitherto, personally acquainted with Jennychen —, tells the latter that the girl had had improper affairs with men (et Madame?) and, what is worse, is a thief having, dans l'espéce,†b stolen a gold ring of hers; she assures Jenny that she means to settle the matter en famille,†c without appealing to the 'autorités' etc. Well and good, Jennychen SUMMONS THE GIRL, Madame Reynaud chats with and AT THE SAME TIME threatens her, the girl confesses, returns the ring — whereat Dr Reynaud denounces the unfortunate creature to the juge de paix.†d UPSHOT: yesterday she was brought before the juge d'instruction†e at Versailles. As you know, the Code,†167 being a relic of Roman Law whereby familia = servi,†f refers to Assizes petty crimes which would ordinarily come before a police court.
Page me46.111
In the meantime Jenny had made every imaginable representation to the juge de paix, an excellent man, but the matter had ceased to rest with him the moment he had been officially notified of it. Nevertheless, Jenny's statements, which he wrote down, and la Reynaud's extra-judicial procedure, which she also placed on record, will be of some benefit to the girl.

Page Break me46.112
Page me46.112
Jenny's defence of the girl surprised the juge de paix, but he took it all in a very light vein. Mais vous ne voulez pas défendre le vol? he asked her. — Mais non, Monsieur, commencez par arrêter tous les grands voleurs d'Argenteuil, et de Paris par dessus le marché!†a
Page me46.112

The immediate upshot is that she has no cook. The stupid GIRL from London — sister of our one-time Carry — IS GOOD FOR NOTHING IN THAT LINE and in any case has her hands full with the 4 children.
Page me46.112
Apropos. Nordau — who is taking Hirsch's place on the Vossische Zeitung — was awarded a French order! Whereupon Hirsch denounced him to La Justice! The latter attacked the government for decorating such a traducer of France (he is a German-Hungarian Jew who attacked Tissot on Bismarck's behalf in his le vrai pays des milliards†168), likewise Bleichröder who wished to encumber la belle France with indemnities of 10 rather than 5 milliards.†169
Page me46.112
That jackass Nordau, presently in Paris, replied to La Justice, in a letter in which he made himself out to be the CHAMPION of France. Whereupon he was unmasked in La Justice and, the day after, in La République française.
Page me46.112
Salut.

Your
Moor

Page me46.112
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.113

69
ENGELS TO MARX
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.113
Bridlington Quay, Yorkshire
6 August 1881
1 Sea View

Dear Moor,

Your letter arrived on the evening of the day before yesterday, to all intents open, thanks to the envelope. A trip to Flamborough Head had been arranged for yesterday, so I haven't got round to replying to you until today.
Page me46.113

As regards the paltry £30, don't let it give you any grey hairs. Unless I hear to the contrary I shall send off in plenty of time a CHEQUE for that amount to Tussy whom you will be instructing. Should you need more, however, let me know and I shall make the CHEQUE larger. For I only brought a few CHEQUE forms with me and have to be economical with them.

Page me46.113

Very many thanks for the news of the patient.†a If I were you, I would stick as closely as possible to the period laid down by Donkin; I'm sure the local doctor†b will also back you up there. Should the bouts of pain grow more frequent, they might well occur while you were en route and that could land you in a very serious predicament.

Page me46.113

The business with the maid is at any rate funnier for us than for poor Jennychen. How fortunate that she should at least have Lenchen there just now. It is impossible to know which of the two French bourgeoises is the more admirable, old Mother Longuet who, on the pretext of finding Jennychen virtuous maids, sees to it that she is perpetually maidless, or the good doctor's wife†c who gives her word (without which she would never have got her ring back) only to break it in the interests of public morality as soon as the ring is returned to her.

Page me46.113

Up here everything follows its usual somewhat dreary SEASIDE course, except that I've unfortunately had to give up bathing, as it was making me deafer and deafer. I find this most disagreeable, but there's nothing else for it if I'm not prematurely to go about Allsop-fashion. I am writing to Laura today, inviting her to spend some time here; she can then so arrange things that she will be back in London at the time of your return, or at any rate shortly afterwards.†170

Page Break me46.114

Page me46.114

Enclosed a letter from Gumpert which will surprise you. I need hardly say that the person concerned is the sister, resident in Manchester, of Berta Böcker of London.†a

Page me46.114

The award of an order to Nordau is really incomprehensible. It was only a short while ago that I saw his vile book, Aus dem wahren Milliardenlande, reviewed with the utmost satisfaction in the Kölnische Zeitung.†b But it agrees in one respect with Bleichröder as also with Nordau's conclusions, namely that there is still a remarkable amount to be got out of the country. Of this the starving Prussian Junkers will take mental note.

Page me46.114

My ink is running out; there is still just enough left for Laura, so I shall close, with warm regards to you all from

Your
F.E.

Page me46.114

You're quite right not to bother about Paris any more than you think fit, whatever Hirsch and all the rest may say.

Page me46.114
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.115

70
MARX TO CARL HIRSCH
IN PARIS
Page me46.115
Argenteuil, 6 August†a 1881
11 Boulevard Thiers

Dear Hirsch,

I have been here for nearly a fortnight†164; haven't visited Paris or any of my acquaintances. My wife's condition has permitted neither the one nor the other.
Page me46.115
Because of her growing weakness, it is possible that I shall have to leave much earlier than I originally planned and I therefore intend (if NO ACCIDENT INTERFERES) to come to Paris TOMORROW MORNING with Lenchen and Johnny. I shall take a cab to your house and, if your time permits, count on your accompanying us.†171
Page me46.115
Regards to Kaub.

Your
K. Marx

Page me46.115
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 50, Moscow, 1981

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

71
MARX TO ENGELS

AT BRIDLINGTON QUAY
Page me46.115
[Argenteuil,] 9 August 1881

DEAR FRED,

Have just received your letter. I am registering this one; Longuet says that, while there can be no question of Stieberian tampering with letters, registered ones, especially at little places like Argenteuil, are handled with greater despatch.

Page Break me46.116
Page me46.116
On Saturday†a we took my wife to Paris; she watched it go by from an open carriage, which pleased her much (on myself it made the impression of a foire perpétuelle†b). A few pauses, of course, and SITTING DOWN BEFORE cafés. On the way back she felt momentarily sick, but wants to go there again.
Page me46.116
Her condition is, as usual, sometimes too much to bear, sometimes better for hours on end. She grows steadily thinner and at the same time weaker. Yesterday there was slight cutaneous bleeding which the doctor†c considers a symptom of debility. I told him we must seriously consider going home; he said we could wait a day or two before finally deciding. She herself, after I had spoken to her about leaving at the end of this week, played a trick on me by sending out a mass of washing which will not be returned until the beginning of next week. At all events I shall let you know by telegraph when we are leaving (should there not be time SIMPLY to notify you beforehand by letter). Oddly enough, though I get damned little rest at night and my days are racked with worry, everyone tells me how well I look — as is, indeed, the case.
Page me46.116
Jennychen's asthma is bad, the house being a very draughty one. The child is heroic, as always.
Page me46.116
On Sunday I was to show Helen†d round Paris. I wrote and advised Hirsch†e of it beforehand — and IN THE NICK OF TIME. He was just on the point of leaving for Germany (to the intense annoyance of Kaub and the chagrin of his wife). He wants to show the party leaders in Germany that there's nothing out of the way about exposing oneself to apprehension by the police. He made off yesterday.
Page me46.116
A pleasant couple, Jaclard and his Russian wife,†f came to déjeuner†g here yesterday. Today we expect, for the same PERFORMANCE, Lissagaray and our doctor's wife (along with her sister).
Page me46.116
From Jaclard we learned that he had attended an election meeting at Batignolles where the following put themselves up as candidates: Henry Maret, our Dr Regnard and — Pyat, who turned up — SELF-UNDERSTOOD with the permission of the police — suddenly and unexpectedly. Pyat was frightfully jeered at. When he mentioned the Commune there was a general cry of 'Vous l'avez lâchée!'†a Regnard fared no better. In order to appear paradoxical and profound, the idiot opened with the declaration: 'Je suis contre la liberté!'†b GENERAL HOWLING! His subsequent declaration that it was 'liberté des congrégations'†c he had meant availed him nothing. The champion of anti-clericalism†172 was a flop, likewise Henry Maret.

Page Break me46.117
Page me46.117

It may be that the extreme left will slightly increase its numbers, but the chief upshot of this will PROBABLY be victory for Gambetta. Things being what they are in France, the shortness of the election period will decide the issue in favour of faiseurs†d with numerous 'strongholds' in their possession, prospective bestowers of places in the machinery of government, and the men who control the 'exchequer', etc. The 'Grévystes'†e could have licked Gambetta if, after the latter's recent FAILURES, they had had the energy to throw his appendages, Cazot, Constans and Farre, out of the cabinet. Since they didn't, the place-hunters, speculators on the Bourse, etc., etc., are saying to themselves, 'GAMBETTA IS THE MAN!' THEY HAVE NOT DARED TO ATTACK HIM IN HIS STRONGHOLDS, YOU CANNOT RELY UPON THEM. The general onslaughts daily made upon him in the radical and reactionary press CONTRIBUTE TO ENHANCE HIM DESPITE ALL HIS TOMFOOLERIES. On top of which the peasants regard Gambetta as the nec plus ultra†f in possible republicanism.
Page me46.117

At the same time as this letter, another will go off to Tussychen, telling her what to do. I shall need a little more money, since this time the journey is going to cost a lot (the doctor thinks, moreover, that a few days in Boulogne might do the patient good because of the sea air), we shall have to meet a large doctor's bill and also make some compensation to Jennychen for all the expenses we have put her to.
Page me46.117

So Gumpert is founding a 3rd (or is it 2nd?) family? Good luck to him. It seems a sensible thing for a doctor to do. My wife has heard a number of people extolling the Böcker woman of Manchester.
Page me46.117

Salut.

Your
Moor

Page Break me46.118
Page me46.118

Beesly is making ever more of an ass of himself. Weiler ought to put a stop to the glorification of Max Hirsch in The Labour Standard.†173

Page me46.118
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

72
MARX TO LAURA LAFARGUE†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.118
[Argenteuil,] 9 August 1881

Dear Laurachen,

I can only write you a line or two as the post is about to go.
Page me46.118
Mama is in a serious condition as a result of her growing weakness. It was therefore my intention (as we shall only be able to travel by easy stages this time) to set off at all costs at the end of the week, and I informed the patient accordingly. Yesterday, however, she thwarted my plan by sending out our washing. So there can be no question of our leaving before the beginning of next week.
Page me46.118
We may — depending on the state she is in — stop in Boulogne for a few days. The doctor†a thinks that (given favourable conditions) the sea air might momentarily have an invigorating effect.
Page me46.118
Next time (but for this purpose you must write at once giving me your latest address) I shall send you a fuller report. Best wishes to Paul.†b

Your
OLD NICK

Page me46.118
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 35, Moscow, 1964

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.119

73
ENGELS TO GEORGE SHIPTON
IN LONDON
Page me46.119
[Draft]

Bridlington Quay,
10 August 1881

Dear Mr Shipton,

I return the proof-sheet†174 altered as you wish. The first passage you seem to me to have misunderstood and the second alteration is merely formal.†a Anyhow, I do not see what good such alterations can do if asked for on Tuesday, received here on Wednesday, to arrive again in London on Thursday after the publication of the paper.†b
Page me46.119

But there is another thing. If such very mild and innocent things as these begin to appear to you too strong, it must occur to me that this must be the case, in a far higher degree, with my own articles, which are generally far stronger. I must therefore take your remarks as a symptom, and conclude that it will be better for both of us if I discontinue sending you leading articles. It will be far better than going on until, upon some inevitable point, we come to an open rupture. Moreover my time will certainly not allow me to go on writing leaders regularly,†163 and on this ground alone I had come to some similar resolution to be executed, as I then thought, after the Trades Union Congress.†175 But the sooner I stop the better will be perhaps your position before that Congress.
Page me46.119

There is another point: I consider you ought to have sent me before publication the copy or proof of the article on the Max Hirsch Trades Unions in Germany,†c as to the only man on your staff who knew anything of the matter and could make the necessary notes to it. Anyhow it will be impossible for me to remain on the staff of a paper which, without consulting me, lends itself to writing up these Trades Unions, comparable only to those worst English ones which allow themselves to be led by men openly sold to, or at least paid by the middle class.

Page Break me46.120
Page me46.120

I need not add that otherwise I wish every success to The Labour Standard and if desired shall now and then contribute occasional information from the continent.

Yours truly
F.E.

Page me46.120
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

ENGELS TO MARX
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.120
Bridlington Quay, Yorkshire
11 August 1881
1 Sea View

Dear Moor,

Your registered letter arrived yesterday evening but it, too, was open, this time completely. I enclose the envelope for you to see; it just wasn't stuck down.
Page me46.120
I've this moment sent Tussy a CHEQUE for £50, REGISTERED. If you want all or part of the remaining £20 (over and above the £30 you spoke about) sent to Paris, Tussy can arrange things more quickly than if payment was made by a CHEQUE on London posted straight to you over there. She can easily get hold of a money order on Paris.
Page me46.120
As regards the French elections I am entirely of your opinion. This Chamber won't continue sitting much longer anyway; once the scrutin de liste†a has come through, it will soon be dissolved again.
Page me46.120
Yesterday morning I informed Mr Shipton that he wouldn't be getting any more leading articles from me.†b Kautsky had sent me an insipid thing on international factory legislation in a poor translation which I corrected and sent to Shipton.†174 Yesterday the proof and a letter arrived from Shipton who thought 2 of the passages 'too strong', having, what's more, misconstrued one of them; he asked me whether I would be prepared to tone them down. I did so and replied as follows:

Page Break me46.121
Page me46.121
1. What did he mean by submitting me the request for amendments on Tuesday†a — i.e. Wednesday up here — when my reply couldn't have reached London until Thursday, after the paper†b had come out.
Page me46.121
2. If he thought this too strong, how much more so my own far stronger articles? Accordingly it would be better for us both if I gave up.
Page me46.121
3. My time no longer permitted me to write a leading article regularly each week and I had already planned to inform him of this after the TRADE UNION CONGRESS (September).†175 Under the circumstances, however, it would no doubt improve his position vis-á-vis that congress were I to give up then and there.
Page me46.121
4. He damned well ought to have shown me the Max Hirsch article before it was printed.†173 I couldn't remain on the staff of a paper which lends itself to writing up these German Trade Unions, comparable only to those very worst English ones which allow themselves to be led by men sold to, or at least paid by the middle class.†c Apart from that I wished him the best of luck, etc. He will get my letter this morning.

Page me46.121

I didn't tell him the most vital reason of all, namely, the total ineffectiveness of my articles so far as the rest of the paper and its readers are concerned. Any effect there may be takes the form of an invisible response on the part of unavowed apostles of FREE TRADE. The paper remains the same old omnium-gatherum of probable and improbable CROTCHETS; in matters of politics it is ±,†d but if anything more Gladstonian. The RESPONSE, which once showed signs of awakening in one or 2 nos., has died away again. The BRITISH WORKING MAN just doesn't want to advance; he has got to be galvanised by events, the loss of industrial monopoly. En attendant, habeat sibi.†e
Page me46.121

We have been here for a fortnight now, weather changeable, mostly cold and often threatening, but not very often actually wet. We shall stay at least another week, perhaps a fortnight, but certainly no longer.
Page me46.121

Since I've been here I have been taking The Daily News instead of the Standard. It is even more stupid, if that's possible. Preaches antivivisectionism! Also as deficient in news as the Standard.

Page Break me46.122
Page me46.122

Hirsch†a may suffer for his pleasure jaunt. But he can't help being what he is.
Page me46.122

Best wishes to everyone.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.122
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

75
ENGELS TO GEORGE SHIPTON
IN LONDON
Page me46.122
[Draft]

Bridlington Quay,
15 August 1881

Dear Mr Shipton,

I cannot make it out, how you could so strangely misunderstand Mr Kautsky's article.†174 To the first passage you objected because State interference went against the grain of 'many prominent men in the Unions'. Of course it does, because they are at heart Manchester School†176 men and so long as their opinions of such are taken into account, no working-class paper is possible. But my addition to the passage in question must have convinced you, that the State interference here alluded to, was such, and such only, as has been in England the law of the Land for years: factories and workshops' acts,†177 and nothing further: things not objected to by even your 'prominent men'.

Page me46.122

As to the second passage, Mr Kautsky says: an international regulation of the war of competition is as necessary as that of open warfare; we demand a Geneva Convention†178 for the workpeople of the world. The 'Geneva Convention' is an agreement entered into by the various Governments for the protection of wounded and ambulances in battle. What therefore Mr Kautsky demands, is a similar agreement between the various Governments for the protection of the workpeople not of one state only, but of all, against overwork especially of women and children. How out of that you can make an appeal to the workpeople of the world to meet in a Convention of delegates at Geneva, I am utterly at a loss to understand.†a

Page Break me46.123

Page me46.123

You will own that the occurrence of such misunderstanding on your part cannot at all encourage me to alter my resolution.†b

Page me46.123

As to the Hirsch article,†173 I do know Mr Eccarius and only too well for a traitor to the cause and it will be utterly impossible for me to write for a paper which opens its columns to him.

Page me46.123

Moreover, I do not see any progress. The Labour Standard remains the same vehicle of the most various and mutually contradictory views on all political and social questions which it was, perhaps unavoidably, on the first day of its existence, but which it ought no longer to be by this time, if there was an undercurrent among the British working class tending towards emancipation from the liberal Capitalists. Such undercurrent not being shown itself up to now, I must conclude it does not exist. If there were unmistakable signs of its existence, I might make an extra effort to assist it. But I do not think that one column a week drowned as I might say amongst the remaining multifarious opinions represented in The Labour Standard could do anything towards producing it.

Page me46.123

And as I told you, I had resolved to stop writing after the Trade Unions Congress,†175 because of want of time; so whether I write a few articles more till then, would make no difference.

Page me46.123

So waiting and hoping for better times, I remain

Faithfully yours,
F.E.

Page me46.123
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.124

76
MARX TO ENGELS
AT BRIDLINGTON QUAY
Page me46.124
[Argenteuil,] 16 August 1881

DEAR Engels,

We shall have to leave tomorrow, as I have received a letter from MISS Maitland†a saying that Tussy is very ill, will not allow Miss Maitland to attend her any longer, has called no doctor, etc. Lenchen will possibly, indeed probably, have to accompany Mama to London; I shall have to set off at once (i.e. TO-MORROW and then carry on non-stop).

Your
K.M.
Page me46.124
I at once wrote to Dr Donkin about Tussy; however he may no longer be in London.

Page me46.124
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

77

MARX TO PYOTR LAVROV
IN PARIS
Page me46.124
[Argenteuil,] 16 August 1881

My dear Lavroff,

I must leave to-morrow and will therefore have no occasion to see you again for this time. But having once found my way to Paris, I shall put in my appearance from time to time.

Page Break me46.125

En attendant au revoir
Tout á vous†a
K. Marx

Page me46.125
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Letopisi marksizma, Book V, Moscow, 1928

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

78
ENGELS TO MARX
IN LONDON
Page me46.125
Bridlington Quay, Yorkshire
17 August 1881
1 Sea View

Dear Moor,

Your telegram just received. I hope your wife managed the journey all right and conclude from the above that you evidently arrived by the night boat. Drop me a line to say how things are going.
Page me46.125
As regards our departure, we ourselves were very much in the dark. Owing to a variety of circumstances we were unable to make preparations for tomorrow when our week expires. On receiving your telegram we arranged with the LANDLADY that we should pay another half week's rent and shall now be arriving back in London on Monday†b evening if nothing crops up in the meantime. The weather: pretty well continuously overcast, threatening and cold; since yesterday it has been decidedly wet and in conditions like that Bridlington Quay becomes a downright bore.

Page Break me46.126
Page me46.126
Gambetta HOOTED DOWN trés-bien†a in Charonne.†179

Your
F.E.

Page me46.126
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

79
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†180
IN ZURICH
Page me46.126
Bridlington Quay, Yorkshire,
17 August 1881

Dear Mr Bernstein,

Having spent the past 3 weeks at the seaside here,†161 I am making the most of the bad weather that has set in to drop you a few lines before I leave for home on Monday, the 22nd. If I have time, I shall also write to Kautsky,†b but he will in any case very shortly be getting a reply and a copy of his article in The Labour Standard.†174
Page me46.126
I presume the anti-Semitica got back to you all right; I sent them to Kautsky as you hadn't let me have a more precise address.†181 Never have I seen anything so stupid and puerile. This movement is of importance only in the sense that in Germany — thanks to the cowardice of the bourgeoisie — any movement instigated from above is of importance, namely as an electioneering ploy to obtain a conservative majority. As soon as the elections are over, or even earlier if the movement (as now in Pomerania) overshoots the mark set by those in higher places, it will, on orders from above, collapse like a pricked balloon and 'never more be seen'†c. Movements of this kind cannot be treated with too much contempt and I am glad that the Sozial-demokrat did so.†182 I have, by the way, heard from C. Hirsch who, acting on a sudden whim, took a jaunt to Berlin, whence he writes†183:

'The anti-Semitic movement has been organised entirely — one might almost say on orders — from above. I have gone into the poorest of haunts and no one has taken exception to my nose; nowhere, either in omnibuses or trains, have I heard a word spoken against the Jews. The semi-official papers, which hawk round anti-Semitic goods, have very few readers. Germans have a natural aversion to Jews, but I notice that the hatred felt for the government by working men as well as by petty-bourgeois and philistine progressives is far more virulent.'

Page Break me46.127

Page me46.127
Of the thousand and one secret police in Berlin, he says that everyone is aware who they are and

'in consequence they know nothing. They are so naive that they always frequent the same pubs and sit at the same tables'.
Page me46.127
Your articles on the subject of 'intellects'†184 are very good. Again, your treatment of Bismarck's mania for nationalisation as something we should not endorse but which, like everything else that happens, nevertheless turns out nolens volens†a in our favour, is quite outstanding, and likewise your treatment of 'intellects' as being those of people who, in so far as they are worth anything, come to us of their own accord but, in so far as we have first to recruit them, can only do us harm through what remains of the old leaven. There is much else of equal merit, though anyone could, of course, find occasional fault with the way things are put. The last number, too, was very good as a whole — the right kind of tone, brisk, assured, which the leaders had lost after the assassination attempts†128 and the exceptional law,†16 is back again and makes up for what Frederick William IV used to call 'trouser trumpetings'. You've given Bradlaugh a first-class drubbing.†b
Page me46.127
A few notes as to detail:
Page me46.127
1. There's no need to be so complimentary about Vallés.†185 He is a wretched man of letters, or rather, literatus, an absolutely worthless peddlar of stock phrases who, for want of talent, took up with extremists so as to dabble in tendencies — so-called isms — and thus find a market for his indifferent belletristic wares. During the Commune he did nothing but pontificate and, if he exerted any kind of influence, it was for the worse. Don't allow Parisian cliquishness (for which Malon also has a great proclivity) to mislead you about this drôle de fanfaron.†c What kind of politician he is may be seen from his letter to Grévy†186 when the latter became president, advising him to introduce the socialist republic par ordre du mufti†d, etc., a letter which retarded the amnesty by many months.

Page Break me46.128
Page me46.128
2. The Spaniards are by no means a bunch of anarchists. There's a quite outstanding nucleus in Madrid (the erstwhile nueva federación madrileña†187) and, in addition, some very good elements, notably in Valencia and in certain of the smaller Catalonian industrial towns, not to mention others dispersed elsewhere. The most energetic and clear-sighted is our friend José Mesa, presently in Paris, a quite excellent fellow who also collaborates with Guesde and the rest of them over there, and keeps them in touch. If you want news about Spain, write to him in French (Malon will be able to forward the letter direct or through Guesde — I haven't got his address up here). You can mention my name.

Page me46.128

On the whole I consider that a young man who is doing so well in and by his post as you, ought by rights to stick to that post. It is, I think, most questionable whether Kegel, who in any case is still in jug, would prove equally adaptable. What his theoretical standpoint is, I do not know, and in any case there is nothing to show that his qualifications are suited to anything more than a local paper, and a humorous one at that. LET WELL ALONE, as the English say; don't try and improve on what is good. I must confess that the thought of any change fills me with mistrust and uneasiness.
Page me46.128

Well, now for the Revolutionary Congress.†188 Lafargue has got hold of an Italian who was a delegate but — why I don't know — was thrown out. In addition, Lafargue has met various other members of that gang, likewise anarchists, at the house of a French wine and provisions merchant. It appears that:
Page me46.128

1. The congress consisted of twenty-odd people, mostly resident in London with mandates from elsewhere. Also a few Frenchmen and Italians and one Spaniard. They held their sessions in public. But not a soul turned up, neither dog, nor cat, nor reporter. After this vain wait for a public had lasted 3 or 4 days and still continued in vain, they took an heroic resolution and declared the sessions were to be secret!
Page me46.128

2. The first thing that was noted was the general disappointment caused by the ineffectuality of the anarchist movement as a whole, and the certain knowledge that nowhere at all was there anyone at all behind the vociferous few. Everyone knew this to be true of himself and his own locality and, although everyone had hoodwinked everyone else into believing the most colossal lies about the colossal strides made by the movement in his own district, everyone had none the less believed the lies told by everyone else. So colossal was the collapse of their illusions that, even in the presence of strangers, they were unable to suppress their astonishment at their own ineffectuality.

Page Break me46.129
Page me46.129

3. The congress was retrieved up to a point, first by the meeting to which, of course, they invited reporters, and next by the silly questions asked in Parliament by idiotic Tories and even more idiotic Radicals. In view of the present plague of nihilists, it was only to be expected that the press should make capital out of a meeting attended by at most 700 men.
Page me46.129

So when the Freiheit speaks of delegate No. 63, etc.,†189 this refers to the number of the mandate made out by 1, 2 or 3 men, either in blank or in the name of a man wholly unknown to them and resident in London, or by 10-20 in the name of a delegate travelling to London. The number of delegates actually present was nearer 20 than 30, and of those who actually went there from elsewhere, certainly below 10.

Page me46.129

NB. All this to be used with circumspection, as I have it third-hand. E.g. your allusion to it might take the form of a question — whether that was how it happened.†190 The gentlemen always fasten on one inaccurate word. It's the same old story as in the case of all anarchist congresses. You should read in Fictitious Splits in the International what the fellows wrote about their own Congress of the Fédération Jurassienne, or the account in the Alliance of Socialist Democracy of the first congress after the split.†191 With those chaps, the first form anarchy assumes is that all want to be officers, and none rankers. Take, for instance, that raging anarchist Adhémar Schwitzguébel (quel nom!†a) whose objection to acceptance of office from the state as a betrayal of the cause doesn't prevent him from being a lieutenant dans l'armée fédérale suisse†b!
Page me46.129

Kindest regards to yourself and also to Kautsky who will get a letter when next it rains.

Yours,
F. Engels

Page me46.129
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.130

80
ENGELS TO MARX
IN LONDON
Page me46.130
Bridlington Quay,
18 August 1881
1 Sea View

Dear Moor,

Not until last night did I get your Argenteuil letter explaining your sudden arrival. I trust Tussy's indisposition is of no real significance — she wrote me a cheery letter only the day before yesterday; at all events, I shall presumably hear further details tonight or tomorrow morning, and also whether your wife accompanied you as far as Boulogne or Calais or whether she stopped off before that.
Page me46.130

Yesterday, then, I at last plucked up the courage to make a thorough study of your mathematical mss.†192 without any reference to manuals and was glad to find I had no need of them. I offer you my congratulations. The thing is so crystal clear that one can only marvel at the obstinacy with which mathematicians insist on shrouding it in mystery. But that is what comes of those gentry's one-sided mentality. To write firmly and categorically dy/dx = 0/0 could never enter their heads. And yet it is obvious that dy/dx can only be the pure expression of a process undergone by x and y when the last trace of the terms x and y has disappeared and all that remains is the expression, free from all quantity, of the process of variation they are undergoing.

Page me46.130

There is no need to fear that some mathematician may have anticipated you in this. The above method of differentiating is, after all, much simpler than any other — so much so that I myself have just used it to deduce a formula that had momentarily slipped my mind, afterwards verifying it in the usual way. The process would undoubtedly create a great stir, especially since it clearly demonstrates that the usual method, ignoring dx dy, etc., is positively wrong. And the particular beauty of it is that only when dy/dx = 0/0 is the operation absolutely correct mathematically.

Page Break me46.131

Page me46.131

So old Hegel was quite right in supposing that the basic premiss for differentiation was that both variables must be of varying powers and at least one of them must be to the power of at least 2 or 1/2.†a Now we also know why.

Page me46.131

When we say that in y = f(x), x and y are variables, this is an assertion which, so long as we continue to maintain it, has no implications whatsoever and x and y still remain, pro tempore,†b factual constants. Only when they really change, i.e. within the function, do they become variables in fact, nor does the relationship implicit in the original equation — not of the two quantities as such, but of their variability — come to light till then. The first derivate ddy/ddx shows this relation as it occurs in the course of true variation, i.e. in any given variation; the final derivate = dy/dx shows it purely and simply in its generality and hence, from dy/dx we can arrive at any ddy/ddx we choose, while this itself never covers more than the particular case. But in order to proceed from the particular case to the general relation, the particular case as such has to be eliminated. Hence, after the function has gone through the process from x to x' with all this implies, one can simply let x' revert to x; it is no longer the old x, a variable only in name; it has undergone real variation, and the result of that variation remains, even if we again eliminate that variation itself.

Page me46.131

Here at last we are able to see clearly what has long been maintained by many mathematicians who were unable to produce rational grounds for it, namely that the differential quotient is the prototype, while the differentials dx and dy are derived: the derivation of the formula itself requires that the two so-called irrational factors should originally constitute one side of the equation and only when one has reduced the equation to this, its original form, dy/dx = f(x), can one do anything with it, is one rid of the irrational factors, replacing them with their rational expression.

Page me46.131
The thing has got such a hold over me that it not only keeps going round in my head all day, but last night I actually had a dream in which I gave a fellow my studs to differentiate and he made off with the lot.

Page Break me46.132

Your
F.E.

Page me46.132
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

81
MARX TO ENGELS
AT BRIDLINGTON QUAY
Page me46.132
[London], 18 August 1881

DEAR FRED,

No doubt you will by now have had the brief note I wrote you day before yesterday from Argenteuil and have gathered from it that I am here without my wife (not with her as you necessarily supposed in your letter).
Page me46.132
On hearing the news of Tussy's condition I resolved to leave that very same day if possible; my wife, on the other hand, was to set off today with Helen†a and travel FIRST CLASS, first to Amiens and spend the night there; then, the next day, to Boulogne and rest therefor at least a day, but 2 or 3 days if she wished; thence to Folkestone and, depending on circumstances, from there straight on to London or else (and this seemed to me best), by a later train of her own choosing. It was, of course, distressing to part from her, but the REAL SUPPORT FOR HER IS Helen; MY OWN PRESENCE wasn't absolutely necessary. Moreover, my departure compelled her finally to make up her mind to tear herself away from Argenteuil, which after all had got to happen in view of her growing weakness.
Page me46.132
So I left Paris on Tuesday†b evening at 7.45 by EXPRESS TRAIN via Calais, and arrived in London at ABOUT 6 O'CLOCK (MORNING).
Page me46.132
I at once telegraphed Dr Donkin who was here by 11 o'clock and had a long consultation with Tussy. HER STATE IS ONE OF UTTER NERVOUS DEJECTION. She has been eating next to nothing for weeks, less than Dr Tanner during his experiment.†193 Donkin says there's no organic trouble, HEART SOUND, LUNGS SOUND, etc.; fundamentally the whole condition is attributable to a PERFECT DERANGEMENT OF ACTION OF STOMACH which has become unaccustomed to food (and she has made matters worse by drinking a great deal of tea: he at once forbade her all tea) and a DANGEROUSLY OVERWROUGHT NERVOUS SYSTEM. Hence SLEEPLESSNESS, NEURALGIC CONVULSIONS, etc. It was a miracle, he said, that a COLLAPSE of this kind hadn't happened before. He intervened at once and, what is most important of all in this little person's case, brought it home to her that, if she was an obedient patient, there would be no danger, but that if she insisted on having her own way, all would be perdu.†a (Indeed he is convinced that this is so.) Fortunately she promised to do as he said, and when she makes a promise she keeps it. Later on, he says, she will have to go away in order to distract herself.

Page Break me46.133
Page me46.133

Another reason for hastening my departure was the knowledge that Donkin intended to take his HOLIDAYS in the Hebrides from 17 August. He is staying here until Saturday on Tussy's account and will then leave a remplaçant†b for her and my wife.
Page me46.133

At the latest meeting of électeurs Mr Gambetta learnt something inside the MEETING-HALL†179 that he had learnt only at the hands of the crowd outside the meeting-hall at the first Belleville MEETING.†194 This second meeting also consisted solely of people who had been invited by his own COMMITTEE, and none of them was admitted except after a twofold triage†c by the stewards appointed by the comité. Hence the uproar was all the more significant. On both occasions Galliffet! was the cri that predominated. Thus Gambetta learnt the lesson that effrontery of the Italian variety is out of place in Paris. Had Rochefort been able to speak in public and had he thus been enabled to offer himself then and there as a competing candidate, Gambetta would certainly have been defeated. As a result of what happened at the time of the Commune, the Belleville working-class population lost about 20,000 men, most of whom have been replaced by lower middle-class philistines. And even the remaining or newly arrived working-class population of Belleville (both arrondissements) is one of arriérés, stick-in-the-muds, whose ideal, if it goes beyond Gambetta, stops at Rochefort; both were returned as deputies there in 1869.

Page Break me46.134
Page me46.134

As to the state of the parti ouvrier†a in Paris, someone who is wholly impartial in this respect, namely Lissagaray, admitted to me that, although only existing en germe,†b it alone counts for anything vis-á-vis the bourgeois parties OF ALL NUANCES. Its organisation, though still tenuous and plus ou moins fictive,†c is nevertheless sufficiently disciplined for it to be able to put up candidates in every arrondissement — to make its presence felt at MEETINGS and annoy the OFFICIAL SOCIETY PEOPLE. I myself have been following this aspect in Paris papers of every complexion and there's not one that doesn't grind its teeth at that GENERAL NUISANCE — le parti ouvrier collectiviste.†d†195

Page me46.134
As regards the latest splits among the leaders of the parti ouvrier, it would be best if I told you about this in person later on.
Page me46.134
With best wishes to Pumps and Mrs Rendstone.

Your
Moor

Page me46.134
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

82
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.134
[London,] 18 August 1881

My dear sweet child,

I came to London, i.e.†e in Maitland Park about 7 o'clock.
Page me46.134
Tussychen is looking pale and thin, since weeks she eats almost nothing (literally); her nervous system is in a state of utter dejection; hence continuous sleeplessness, trembling of the hands, neuralgic convulsions of the face, etc.
Page me46.134
I telegraphed at once to Dr Donkin; he put in his presence at 11 o'clock (yesterday morning), had a long consultation with and examination of Tussy. He says that there is no organic disease, heart sound, lungs sound, etc., but only action of stomach quite deranged by her foolish way of living, and nervous system fearfully overwrought.

Page Break me46.135
Page me46.135
He has succeeded to frighten her into obedience to his prescriptions, and you know, if she once gives way and promises, she will keep her promise. With all that, her recovery cannot but be slow, and I arrived in the very nick of time. There was the greatest danger in case of any further delay.

Page me46.135

Donkin was about — as he had informed me before our departure — to leave this day London for the Hebrides. Because of Tussy, and hoping still to hear something of Maman, he will now stay till the end of the week.

Page me46.135

Tell me about the state of Maman, whether she has left you, etc. How is Longuet and Harra†a? and yourself and the other dear children†b?

Page me46.135

How do you go on with your new servant?

Page me46.135

Apropos. Sarah†c (Engels' Sarah), now for some hours daily the helpmate of Tussy, a girl of the best character and fitness for every thing, told Tussy that she had nothing liked better than to go with you, but Pumps did never tell her about Lizzy's having left you and about your want of a remplaçant†d for her. She has also told Tussy and again myself, that she is still ready to come over to you. Only she dares not travel alone to France, but this matters little. I myself can bring her over later on.

Page me46.135

And now adio, dear child. The pleasure to be with you and the dear children has given me a more substantial satisfaction than I could have found anywhere else.

Page me46.135

My compliments to that excellent Dr Dourlen.

Page me46.135

With 1000 kisses for the children

Yours,
Old Nick

Page me46.135

Tussy sends her best wishes to Wolf†e and the whole family.

Page me46.135

First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.136

83
MARX TO ENGELS
AT BRIDLINGTON QUAY

Page me46.136

[London,] 19 August 1881,
11.30 p.m.

Page me46.136

Mama and Helen†a have JUST arrived via Folkestone, after stopping at Boulogne.
Page me46.136
What I didn't write and tell you — Longuet and little Harry are very ill. Nothing but misfortune in the family at the moment.
Page me46.136
Salut.

K.M.

Page me46.136
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

Published in English for the first time

84
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET†196
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.136
[London,] 20 August 1881
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

My Sweetheart,

You may find it difficult to make head or tail of the above scrawl. But in effect, Mama and Helen arrived safely last night.

Page me46.136
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 50, Moscow, 1981

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.137

85
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL

IN LEIPZIG
Page me46.137
London, 25 August 1881

Dear Bebel,

I would have replied sooner to your letter of 13.5.†197 But, after the Leipzig 'local',†198 I waited to see whether you might perhaps send me another forwarding address; as you haven't I am using the old one, and also enclosing a letter from Tussy Marx to Mrs Liebknecht, for whom we haven't got an address either.
Page me46.137
Bernstein still writes to say he wants to leave the Sozialdemokrat, and now proposes that Kegel be taught the ropes and, once he knows them, appointed in his place. My view is that any change would be for the worse. Bernstein has made good, so greatly exceeding our expectations (for instance, his articles on 'intellects'†184 were, trifles apart, quite excellent and written along exactly the right lines) that it would be hard to find anyone better. Kegel hasn't proved himself, at any rate in this sphere, and, as things stand now, all experimentation should be avoided. I have urgently requested Bernstein to stay,†a and believe you could do no better than give him similar advice. In his hands the paper is getting better and better, and so, too, is he. He has genuine tact and is quick on the uptake — just the reverse of Kautsky, who is an exceptionally good chap, but a born pedant and hair-splitter in whose hands complex questions are not made simple, but simple ones complex. Like all the rest of us, I am very fond of him as a person and, in longer articles of the review type, he might occasionally do something pretty good, but even with the best will in the world he can't go against the grain, c'est plus fort que lui.†b On a newspaper, a doctrinaire of this kind is a real disaster; even Ede†c was forced to append a critical note to one of his articles in the last Sozialdemokrat. On the other hand, he has written a fly-sheet for the consumption of peasants in Austria†a in which he gives proof of something of his mother's†b gift for short story writing; aside from one or two erudite expressions, it's really good and should be effective.

Page Break me46.138
Page me46.138
I wrote to Liebknecht about the speeches in the Landtag, and in reply†199 was told that these had been a matter of 'tactics' (but I had pointed out that it was precisely those tactics that prevented us from siding openly with him) and that speeches of a different kind would shortly be made in the Reichstag. True, this has now been done by you†200 — but what is one to think of Liebknecht's unfortunate and wholly unnecessary remark about the 'Reich Chancellor's honesty'†201? It may have been meant ironically, but that's not evident from the report, and what capital the bourgeois press made out of it! I have sent no further reply — it does no good, after all. But Kautsky, too, has told us not only that Liebknecht is writing letters all over the place — e.g. to Austria — saying Marx and I are in complete agreement with him and had sanctioned his 'tactics', but also that people believe him. This really can't go on indefinitely! Again, the Freiheit has got a lot of fun of Hartmann's†c speech on the Accident Bill†202 which, if the passage they quote is genuine, was certainly a pretty wretched affair.

Page me46.138

In France, working-class candidates obtained 20,000 votes in Paris and 40,000 in the provinces†203 and, if their leaders hadn't perpetrated one stupidity after another since setting up the collectivist workers' party, things would have gone even better. But there, too, the masses are better than most of their leaders. For instance, several Parisian candidates lost thousands of votes through using empty revolutionary verbiage (as much part of the business in Paris as patter is of trade) in the provinces as well where it was taken seriously and people asked: 'How can you make a revolution without weapons and organisation?' For the rest, developments in France are taking their regular, normal and very necessary course along peaceful lines, and that is a very good thing just now, for otherwise the provinces could not be swept earnestly into the movement.
Page me46.138

I understand very well that your fingers should itch, when everything's going so nicely for us in Germany and you, having your hands tied, cannot reap the fruits of victories that are all but falling into your laps. But this does no harm. Many people in Germany have set too much store by overt propaganda (Viereck, who was completely cast down by the impossibility of making overt propaganda, is just one striking example of this), and too little by the real impetus of historical events. It can do nothing but good if experience acts as a corrective in this case. The fact that we cannot reap the fruits of our victories at the moment in no way means that they are lost to us. The galvanising of the indifferent, inert masses can only be effected by actual events and even if, in present circumstances, those thus galvanised are left in a state of some considerable bewilderment, the word of deliverance will, when the time comes, strike home with all the more force; the effect upon state and bourgeoisie will be all the more drastic when the 600,000 votes†204 are suddenly multiplied threefold, when, besides Saxony, all the big towns and industrial districts fall to us and even rural workers are, for the first time, so situated as to be intellectually accessible to us. To take the masses by storm in this way is of far greater value than to win them over gradually by overt propaganda which, under present circumstances, would in any case quickly be stamped on. As things are now, the Junkers, clergy and bourgeois cannot allow us to cut the ground from under their feet and hence it is better to let them take care of this themselves. For a time will surely come when a different wind will blow. Meanwhile it's you people who must in person go through the mill, it's you who must endure the infamies of the government and the bourgeoisie, and that's no laughing matter. But mind you don't forget any of the dirty tricks played on yourselves and on all our people; the day of retribution is nigh and it must be exploited to the full.

Page Break me46.139

Your
F.E.
Page me46.139

Viereck is in Copenhagen. Address poste restante, Copenhagen.

Page me46.139
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.140

86
ENGELS TO KARL KAUTSKY
IN ZURICH
Page me46.140
London, 27 August 1881

Dear Mr Kautsky,

In a day or two you will be getting by post 1. The Labour Standard containing your article,†a in connection with which there have been sundry comic interludes, 2. a Nature of 18 August, 3. your ms. back.
Page me46.140
After I had somewhat revised what was an altogether bungled translation, I sent it to Shipton for a leading article. However, the worthy Shipton got it all wrong and complained to me,†b but as usual too late. God knows what the man took the bit about 'State interference' in favour of the workers to mean — certainly not what it said, nor that such State interference has long existed in England in the shape of FACTORIES AND WORKSHOPS ACTS.†177 Still worse: into the words WE DEMAND A GENEVA CONVENTION†178 FOR THE WORKING CLASSES he read a demand by you for the convening of a conference of delegates in Geneva to settle the matter!! What can one do with such an oaf? I made this business the occasion to go ahead with my decision and break with The Labour Standard, as that paper is getting worse rather than better.
Page me46.140
In Nature you will find a speech made by John Simon†c before the international Medical Congress here†205 in which the bourgeoisie is virtually put on the mat by medical science. J. Simon is MEDICAL OFFICER TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL,†206 virtual head of Britain's entire public health inspectorate, and the same who is so frequently and approvingly quoted by Marx in Capital, a man — perhaps the last of the old really professional and conscientious officials of the 1840-60 period who, in the performance of his duty, everywhere found that bourgeois interests were the first obstacle he was obliged to combat. Hence, his instinctive hatred of the bourgeoisie is as violent as it is explicable. Now he, a doctor, finding his own special field invaded by the Church-led bourgeoisie and their anti-vivisection movement, has turned the tables on them. Instead of preaching dull and colourless sermons like

Page Break me46.141
Virchow, he goes into the attack comparing the few scientific experiments made by doctors on animals with the vast commercial experiments made by the bourgeoisie upon the popular masses, thereby placing the question for the first time in its true perspective. An extract from this would make a splendid feuilleton for the Sozialdemokrat.†207
Page me46.141

The Congress, by the way, declared unanimously that vivisection was essential to science.
Page me46.141

Your fly-sheet†a shows that you have inherited something of your mother's†b gift for short story writing. It pleased me more than anything you have written hitherto. A little more polishing might have enabled you to improve one or two expressions and turns of speech, and I would advise you to do this in the case of a second edition. Literary German is a very clumsy idiom for narrative prose and erudite words such as reaction, which mean nothing to the peasant, ought to be avoided. The thing is worthy of being seriously revised by you along these lines. It is the best fly-sheet I have ever seen.
Page me46.141

Your Mostian chaps in Austria will have to learn by painful experience; there are no two ways about it. It's a process during which many otherwise good elements come to grief, but if those elements are positively intent on conspiring for the fun of it and with no particular purpose in mind, there's no helping them. Luckily the proletarian movement has an enormous reproductive capacity.
Page me46.141

Viereck and wife†c had an awful lot of bad weather in Scotland, after which they left for Copenhagen where they have now arrived. They will be remaining there for the time being — address poste restante, Copenhagen.
Page me46.141

Our French friends, it seems, are still not satisfied with the many stupidities perpetrated over the past 2 years out of officiousness, cliquism, an itch for oratory, etc. Le Citoyen has, it seems, been sold to the Bonapartists who have not yet unceremoniously kicked our men out, but have stopped their pay and otherwise treated them en canaille,†d as though trying to push them into striking and so get rid of them. On top of that, all our chaps have fallen out with one another, as so often happens when things go wrong. One of the most unhappy is Brousse, a thoroughly honest chap but a consummate muddle-head and one who positively insists that the entire movement should devote itself to converting erstwhile anarchist friends. It was he, too, who was originally responsible for the crazy resolution concerning the rejection of candidature.†208 For the rest, the steady, peaceful course of events in France can, in the long run, only prove favourable to us. Not until the provinces have been drawn into the movement, as has been happening since 1871, and emerge, as they are increasingly doing, as a power in the land — along normal legal lines, that is, — can an end be put in the interests of us all to the spasmodic form hitherto assumed by developments in France, derived from coups in Paris and for years retarded by reaction in the provinces. Then, when the time has come for Paris to act, it will not have the provinces against it, but behind it.

Page Break me46.142

Page me46.142
Kindest regards from all,

Yours
F. Engels

Page me46.142
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

87
MARX TO KARL KAUTSKY†209
IN ZURICH
Page me46.142
[London,] 1 October 1881
In great haste

Dear Mr Kautsky,

I enclose a line to your mother†a together with the enclosed note for my daughter.†b210 It would have saved time if you had sent me your mother's Paris address.
Page me46.142
I would have asked your mother to spend a few days at my house and at the same time take a look round London with me. My wife's fatal illness, which day by day is drawing closer to its consummation, prevented this. I am her garde malade.†a

Page Break me46.143
Page me46.143
I get the Arbeiterstimme regularly; it edifies but does not surprise me, for I've known my Swiss for decades.
Page me46.143
With regard to Mr McGuire, it would appear from your letter that he is in London. How comes it that none of our New York friends gave him letters of recommendation? I have, prima facie,†b always been somewhat suspicious of YANKEE socialists and know in particular that the kind that Shipton keeps in touch with are very crotchety and sectarian. With all that, Mr McGuire may be an excellent party man.

Yours very sincerely,
Karl Marx

Page me46.143
My wife and daughter†c send you their compliments.

Page me46.143
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

88
MARX TO MINNA KAUTSKY
IN PARIS
Page me46.143
London, 1 October 1881
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

Dear Madam,

I enclose herewith a note for my daughter.†210 Argenteuil is quite close to Paris, about 20 minutes from the Gare†d St Lazare.
Page me46.143
I would have taken the liberty of inviting you to stay at my house in London — and your son will have told you how greatly everyone in the family admires your works — had not my wife's shocking and,

Page Break me46.144
I fear, fatal illness put a stop, as it were, to our intercourse with the outside world.
Page me46.144
With sincerest wishes for your future prosperity,

Yours very truly,
Karl Marx

Page me46.144
First published in the yearly, Das Jahr, Wien, 1929

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

89
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†211
IN ZURICH

Page me46.144
London, 25 October 1881

Dear Mr Bernstein,

I am most grateful to you for having written to me about the Égalité business.†212 Aside from the point at issue, this provides me with an opportunity of letting you know what is Marx's attitude, and hence also my own, towards the French movement. And from this one instance you will be able to gauge our attitude towards other non-German movements, in so far as these are in sympathy with us and we with them.
Page me46.144
I am glad that you are not at present in a position to give financial support to the Égalité. Lafargue's letter was another of those coups de tête†a which the French, in particular those south of the line Bordeaux-Lyons, now and again find themselves unable to resist. So certain was he of perpetrating a stroke of genius and a blunder rolled into one, that he didn't even tell his wife†b (who has prevented many such things) about it until after the event. With the exception of Lafargue, who is always in favour of 'something being done', n'importe quoi,†c we over here were unanimously against Égalité No. 3.†d I confidently predicted that, with their 5,000 frs (if as much), they would last out for 32 numbers. If Guesde and Lafargue are intent on acquiring the reputation in Paris of tueurs de journeaux,†a we can't stop them, but nor shall we do anything else. If, contrary to all expectation, the paper improves again, and if it gets really good, we shall always be able to see what can be done if it finds itself in a predicament. But it's absolutely essential that these gentlemen should learn at last how to stand on their own feet.

Page Break me46.145
Page me46.145
The fact of the matter is that, during the past 12 or 15 months, our French friends, who are trying to set up the parti ouvrier,†b have made one blunder after another, and this applies to all of them without exception. The first was committed by Guesde when, for absurdly purist reasons, he prevented Malon from accepting the editorship of the labour department on the Intransigeant at a salary of 12,000 frs. That was when the whole squabble began. This was followed by the unpardonable folly over the Émancipation, when Malon allowed himself to be misled by the false promises of the Lyonnais (the worst working men in France), while Guesde showed himself no less feverishly anxious to have a daily paper á tout prix.†c Next came the hair-splitting over the matter of candidature,†208 in which connection it is more than probable that Guesde was guilty of the solecism you reprobate, though it is obvious to me that Malon was seeking to pick a quarrel. Finally, the ingress into, followed by the egress from, the Citoyen français, of Mr Bourbeau, alias Secondigné, an adventurer of the worst repute — his egress being due simply to non-payment of salary, not to any political motive. Next, Guesde, in very mixed company, joined the most recent Citoyen, and Malon and Brousse the miserable Prolétaire which they — or Malon at any rate — had always secretly opposed as a vulgar loutish rag.

Page me46.145

The Prolétaire was the organ of the very narrowest clique of the most inveterate scribblers among the Parisian workers. It was axiomatic that access could be had and contributions made only by genuine manual workers. The most bigoted Weitlingian 'scholar'-baiting was the order of the day. The sheet was in consequence quite without substance, while preening itself on being la plus pure expression†d of the Parisian proletariat. Hence, for all its apparent cordiality, it always secretly looked upon other papers, including the 2 Égalités, as mortal enemies and intrigued against them.

Page Break me46.146

Page me46.146

When Malon now maintains that the French workers' party is endeavouring to create an organ for itself in the Prolétaire, and questions the need for a competing Égalité, no one is better aware than Malon, 1. that the two first Égalités also existed alongside the Prolétaire simply because 2. nothing could be made of the Prolétaire, and Malon knows the Prolétaire people just as well as Guesde does, and 3. that the few blockheads on the Prolétaire, together with Malon and Brousse, don't by any means make up the whole of the French workers' party. Hence he knows that all this is a red herring and that it is he who is seeking to create an organ for himself in the Prolétaire, having made things too hot for himself everywhere else.

Page me46.146

But the link that binds Malon and Brousse to this potty little sheet is their common jealousy of Marx. To the majority of French socialists it is an anathema that the nation which confers upon the world the boon of idées françaises†a and has a monopoly of ideas — that Paris, centre des lumiéres†b — must now all of a sudden import its socialist ideas ready-made from a German, Marx. But there's no denying the fact and, what is more, Marx's genius, his almost excessive scientific scrupulousness and his incredible erudition place him so far above all the rest of us that anyone who ventures to criticise his discoveries is more likely to burn his fingers than anything else. That is something which must be left to a more advanced epoch. If, then, French socialists (i.e. the majority) are obliged, whether they like it or not, to bow to the inevitable, it will not happen without a certain amount of grumbling. It is the Prolétaire people who say, of both Guesde and Lafargue, that they are Marx's mouthpieces or, translated into more familiar idiom, that ils veulent vendre les ouvriers français aux Prussiens et á Bismarck.†c And in everything M. Malon writes, this grumbling is most plainly audible and, what's more, in most ignoble form: Malon is at pains to find or impute other progenitors (Lassalle, Schäffle and actually De Paepe!) on whom to father Marx's discoveries. Now it is, of course, perfectly in order to disagree with party members, no matter whom, as to their mode of procedure in this or that case, or to dispute or differ on a point of theory. But thus to contest the right of a man like Marx to his own achievements is to betray a pettiness such as is found, one might almost say, only in a compositor, — a race of whose self-conceit you will surely have had ample experience. I simply cannot understand how anyone can be envious of genius; it's something so very special that we, who have not got it, know it to be unattainable right from the start; but to be envious of anything like that one must have to be frightfully small-minded. The furtive way Malon goes about it, doesn't improve matters. The fact that it is he who eventually comes out worst, betraying his lack of knowledge and discernment at every turn, is something of which he might at some time be made unpleasantly aware, should it at any time become necessary to scrutinise Malon's goodly Histoire du Socialisme 'depuis les temps les plus reculés'†a (!!) and other productions with an eye to their substance.

Page Break me46.147

Page me46.147

Brousse is, I think, the most hopelessly muddle-headed man I have ever known. He has dropped the anarchy — i.e. opposition to political activity and voting — out of anarchism, while at the same time retaining all its other catchwords and, more notably, its tactics. Thus, in tedious articles in the Prolétaire directed against Guesde (but not naming him), he is currently brooding on the insoluble question of how to set up an organisation in such a way as to preclude a dictatorship (Guesde's!!). If this consummate literary and theoretical ignoramus, whose forte, however, is cliquism, is again able to play a part, the blame must be shared by Lafargue, Guesde and Malon.
Page me46.147

Lastly Guesde. In matters of theory this man is by far the most lucid thinker amongst the Parisians, and one of the few who takes no exception at all to the German origins of present-day socialism. Hinc illae lacrimae.†b Which is why the gentlemen of the Prolétaire are letting it be known that he is merely Marx's mouthpiece, a rumour which, with lugubrious mien, Malon and Brousse carry further afield. Outside that clique no one dreams of such a thing. What there is to it, we shall see anon. That he is domineering may well be true. Every one of us is domineering in the sense that he would like to see his views predominate. If Guesde seeks to do this by direct and Malon by tortuous means, it says much for Guesde's character and for the superiority of Malon's worldly wisdom — especially in dealing with people like the Parisians who obstinately dig their heels in if you try to dictate to them but are only too delighted to let you lead them by the nose. Come to that, whenever I have heard anyone who is worth his salt described as domineering, I have only been able to conclude that there was nothing that could really be said against the man. Guesde's failings are of quite a different kind. First, the Parisian superstition that the word revolution is something one must continually bandy about. And secondly, boundless impatience. He is suffering from a nervous complaint, believes he has not much longer to live and is absolutely determined to see something worthwhile happen before he goes. That, and his morbid excitability, provide the explanation for his exaggerated and sometimes destructive thirst for action.

Page Break me46.148
Page me46.148

If, in addition, you take the inability of the French, especially the Parisians, to conceive of differences that are other than personal, and it is obvious enough how it was that these gentry, as soon as they had scored a few small successes, saw themselves already at the goal, sought to divide as yet inexistent spoils, and fell out with each other in the process.
Page me46.148

Guesde's pamphlets and articles, by the way, are the best to have appeared in the French language, and he is, moreover, one of the best speakers in Paris. Also, we have always found him forthcoming and reliable.
Page me46.148

Now for ourselves. We, i.e. Marx and I, do not even correspond with Guesde. We have only written to him for specific reasons of business. We have no more than a general idea of what Lafargue says in his letters to Guesde, nor have we by any means read everything Guesde writes to Lafargue. Heaven only knows what plans the two of them have exchanged of which we have no inkling. Every now and again Marx, like myself, has transmitted advice to Guesde via Lafargue, but it has hardly ever been taken.
Page me46.148

It is true, however, that Guesde came over here when the question arose of drafting a programme for the French workers' party.†68 The considérants to this was dictated to him by Marx,†a here in my own room, in the presence of Lafargue and myself: the worker is free only when he is the owner of his instruments of labour — this may assume either individual or collective form — the individual form of ownership is being daily and increasingly superseded by economic developments, hence, all that remains is that of communal ownership, etc. — a masterpiece of cogent reasoning, calculated to explain things to the masses in a few words; I have seldom seen its like and, even in this concise version, found it astonishing. The remaining contents of the programme were then discussed; we added this and took out that, but as for Guesde being Marx's mouthpiece, how little this holds water is evident from the fact that he insisted on including his nonsense about the minimum du salaire†a and since not we but the French were responsible for the thing, we eventually gave him his head, although he admitted that, theoretically, it was absurd.

Page Break me46.149
Page me46.149

Brousse was in London at the time and would have liked to join us. But Guesde was short of time and anticipated, not incorrectly, that Brousse would engage in tedious arguments about ill-digested anarchist terms; he therefore insisted that Brousse should not attend this meeting. C'était son affaire.†b But Brousse has never forgiven him for it and it's to that time that his intrigues against Guesde go back.
Page me46.149

This programme was subsequently discussed by the French and accepted with a few alterations, including Malon's which were by no means improvements.
Page me46.149

Then, too, I wrote 2 articles for the Égalité No. II on Le socialisme de M. Bismarck†c and that, so far as I'm aware, is the sum total of our active participation in the French movement.
Page me46.149

But what mainly annoys the small-minded carpers who count for nothing, yet like to think themselves all-important, is the fact that Marx, thanks to his theoretical and practical achievements, has attained a position in which he enjoys the complete trust of the best people in all the labour movements in the various countries. At critical junctures it is to him they turn for advice, when they generally find that his advice is the best. He occupies that position in Germany, in France, and in Russia, not to speak of the smaller countries. Hence it is not Marx who imposes his opinion, let alone his will, on these people; rather it is these people who come to him of their own accord. And it is precisely on this that Marx's peculiar influence rests, an influence of the utmost importance to the movement. Malon also wished to come here, but to procure a special invitation from Marx through Lafargue, which naturally he didn't get. We were as prepared to deal with him as we are with anybody else de bonne volonté,†d but invite him! Why? Who has ever had an invitation of that kind from us?

Page me46.149

Marx's attitude, and hence also my own, towards the French is the same as towards the other national movements. We are constantly in touch with them in so far as it is worth our while and opportunities present themselves, but any attempt to influence people against their will would only do us harm, destroy the old trust that dates from the International. And we have, after all, too much experience in revolutionaribus rebus†a to do that.

Page Break me46.150
Page me46.150

Now for two more FACTS.
Page me46.150

1. It was Guesde, and with him Lafargue, who, in the Égalité, brought quite undeserved fame to Malon, turned him, as it were, into a legend, and this simply because Guesde thought, in typically French fashion, that as a writer one had to have a working man beside one.
Page me46.150

2. And here is something the recipient of the letter has authorised me to tell you: Lissagaray, who was the chairman of the meeting at which Malon arraigned that blackguard Lullier, writes to say that, just as the meeting was supposed to begin, Lullier sent word to Malon requesting a short discussion. Malon departed, didn't return, and finally his Comité went in search of him (Lissagaray was the chairman of the Comité and the meeting) only to find him toping most jovially and on the brink of a peaceable understanding with Lullier, the man he had (rightly) described as the dirtiest of blackguards. Had not Malon had to leave at 9 o'clock for the congress at Zurich,†213 there would have been the risk of a full reconciliation. And he describes himself as a man of politics!
Page me46.150

Mesa's address is: J. Mesa, 36 Rue du Bac, Paris.
Page me46.150

Marx knows nothing about this letter. He has been in bed for the past 12 days with bronchitis and all kinds of complications, but since Sunday†b — due precautions having been taken — there has no longer been any danger. I've been anxious enough, I can tell you. Now things are looking up and tomorrow, 27 October, we shall, I trust, show the world that we are still there as large as life.†214 Kindest regards to Kautsky.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.150

As regards the Égalité, I think it would be best if our people were not to found a new paper for the time being, at any rate until the state of affairs within the party has become a little less obscure. If they do want to start one, however, neither we nor anyone else can stop them, though I don't see how it's going to be managed this time without a row between the Égalité and the Prolétaire. This wouldn't be a major disaster, but it would still be a perhaps unnecessary case of teething trouble.

Page Break me46.151

Page me46.151

What kind of operation is Kautsky having? — I trust he won't let himself be cut up into a complete Malthusian!

Page me46.151

First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

90

ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER
IN GENEVA

Page me46.151

[London,] 4 November 1881
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

Dear Old Man,

Your postcard re the congress†215 arrived too late for me to write to you about it. Since then we have also had sundry calamities over here. Mrs Marx has been in bed for months, critically ill, and then Marx went down with bronchitis accompanied by all sorts of complications which, at his time of life and considering the general state of his health, was certainly no laughing matter. Fortunately the worst is over and, so far as Marx is concerned, all danger has been completely eliminated for the time being, though he has to spend the greater part of the day in bed and is greatly weakened.

Page me46.151

Herewith money order for 4 pounds sterling = 100 frs 80 c. which is what I have to send you this time. I trust it will come in handy for, delighted though I am to hear that you have been able to make a start at earning a living, it is after all only a start and I'm only sorry that of late I myself have been somewhat short and therefore unable to step into the breach any sooner.

Page me46.151

I'm always glad when a so-called international congress passes off, as it did on this occasion, without anyone making an ass of himself in public. You always get such a hotchpotch of people attending these affairs, some of whom have no other object than to look important in public and who for that very reason are capable of any stupidity. Well, this time it went off without any mishap.

Page Break me46.152
Page me46.152

Our people in Germany have given a splendid account of themselves at the elections.†216 In 23 or 27 constituencies (I can't find out the exact number) they were in the second ballot, despite the fact that on this occasion all the other parties turned out to the very last man. And this under the stress of the exceptional law†16 and state of siege,†65 without a press, without meetings, without any means of public agitation and in the certain knowledge that by way of return the livelihood of some thousands within the party would again be sacrificed. It is altogether splendid and the impression it has made throughout Europe, and particularly here in England, has been quite tremendous. How many seats we get is neither here nor there. Enough anyway to say what is necessary in the Reichstag. But the fact that we have gained ground in the larger towns instead of losing it — that is first rate and here's three cheers for our lads in Germany!

Your old friend,
F.E.

Page me46.152
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

91
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†217
IN ZURICH
Page me46.152
London, 30 November 1881

Dear Mr Bernstein,

If any one outside event has contributed to putting Marx more or less to rights again, then it is the elections.†216 Never has a proletariat conducted itself so magnificently. In England, after the great defeat of 1848,†218 there was a relapse into apathy and, in the end, resignation to bourgeois exploitation, with the proviso that the TRADES UNIONS fought individual battles for higher wages. In France the proletariat disappeared from the stage after the 2nd December.†219 In Germany, after 3 years of unprecedented persecution and unrelenting pressure, during which any form of public organisation and even communication was a sheer impossibility, our lads have returned, not only in all their former strength, but actually stronger than before.†16 And stronger in one crucial respect, in that the movement's centre of gravity has shifted from the semi-rural districts of Saxony to the large industrial towns.

Page Break me46.153

Page me46.153

The bulk of our people in Saxony consist of hand-loom weavers, who are doomed to obsolescence by the power-loom and are only just enabled to keep going by starvation wages and secondary occupations (gardening, toy carving, etc.). These people find themselves in an economically reactionary situation and represent an obsolescent stage of production. So they are not born representatives of revolutionary socialism — not, at any rate, to the same degree as are the workers in large-scale industry. Hence they are not reactionary by nature (as, for instance, the remaining hand-loom weavers eventually became over here — the hard core of the 'CONSERVATIVE WORKING MEN') but cannot be relied upon in the long run. This is also very largely due to their appallingly miserable condition, which means that they have far less power of resistance than townsmen, and also to their dispersion, which makes them easier to enslave politically than the inhabitants of large towns. The facts reported in the Sozialdemokrat†a fill one with admiration for the heroism with which so many of those poor devils continued to stand firm.
Page me46.153

But they are not the right kind of nucleus for a great national movement. In certain circumstances — as in 1865-70 — their poverty renders them more readily receptive to socialist views than the inhabitants of large towns. But this same poverty also makes them unreliable. A drowning man clutches at any straw, nor can he wait for a boat to push off from the bank and come to his rescue. The boat is socialist revolution, the straw, protective tariffs and state socialism. It is significant that there, in our old constituencies, it was almost only conservatives who stood any chance against us. And if, on a previous occasion, Kayser could talk such rubbish about protective tariffs†220 without anyone's venturing any real objection, whose was the blame — as Bebel himself remarked in a letter to me†221 — if not the constituents', and Kayser's in particular?

Page Break me46.154
Page me46.154

Now everything's different. Berlin, Hamburg, Breslau, Leipzig, Dresden, Mainz, Offenbach, Barmen, Elberfeld, Solingen, Nuremberg, Frankfurt am Main, Hanau, as well as Chemnitz and the Erzgebirge districts — that's backing of quite a different order. A class that is revolutionary by reason of its economic situation has come to be the nucleus of the movement. Aside from that, the movement is evenly distributed over the entire industrial area of Germany and, from being restricted to a few local centres, has only now come to be a national movement. And that is what frightens the bourgeois most of all.
Page me46.154

As regards those who have been elected, we shall have to hope for the best, although I find it very difficult to do so where some of them are concerned. But it would be a disaster if, this time, Bebel were not to be returned.†222 For there will be many new elements — each armed, no doubt, with his own little schemes — whom Bebel alone, with his unerring tact, would be able to keep in order and prevent from making asses of themselves.

Page me46.154

As regards the French, it would now be best simply to let Messrs Malon and Brousse have their head, and show what they can do. But it's unlikely to come to that. One of these days the Égalité will appear; Brousse will, as before, be guardedly libellous, launching attacks in the Prolétaire without naming names, while the others, falling headlong into the snare, will, in their attacks, name names from the outset, whereupon they will be hailed as disturbers of the peace, sectarians, spreaders of dissension and budding dictators. Nothing can be done to stop this. The fellows are completely incapable of waiting until their opponents have got into a mess of their own contriving, but must perforce take issue with them and thus give them a longer lease of life. Left to their own devices Malon and, more especially, Brousse would scupper themselves (and probably each other) within 6 months. But as things are, it may take longer.

Page me46.154

Like almost all such congresses, the Congress of Rheims†223 served to impress the outside world but, seen in the cold light of day, was a swindle. Of the 'federations' represented there, only the Centre, Nord and Est really exist; the others exist only on paper. The Algerian federation had elected the bourgeois Henry Maret (radical deputy) as its delegate!!, which just shows what kind of allies Malon has got. Guesde had wanted only properly organised federations to be represented on the Comité national — but his proposal was turned down. This was misrepresented, i.e. suppressed, in the official account in the Prolétaire.†a Thus, half the delegates to the congress and on the Comité national represent nothing at all, or at best only castles in Spain. The haste to declare the Prolétaire, already completely taken over by Malon and Brousse, an official gazette was due solely to the desire to steal a march on the forthcoming Égalité. As usual, none of the resolutions on organisation were determined by expediency but by the opportunist considerations of the parties concerned.

Page Break me46.155

Page me46.155

Here is something that will give you an idea of Malon's Marxophobia: last spring he asked Lafargue, when the latter was in Paris, to obtain from Marx a foreword to the new edition of Malon's Histoire du Socialisme; needless to say, Lafargue laughed in his face and told him he must have a very poor idea of Marx if he thought him capable of lending himself to such humbug.

Page me46.155

G. Howell, luckily not returned as 'labour candidate' for Stafford, is undoubtedly the biggest blackguard of all the politicanti†b ex-working men here. He was until recently secretary of the TRADES UNIONS PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE (needless to say, a salaried post) and took occasion to cook the books, this being only hushed up with some difficulty; however, he was given the sack.

Page me46.155

Within the next few days I shall write to K.K. of Käsburg†c about the Polish affair.†224 In the meantime, give him my best regards.

Page me46.155

Marx is still very run down, isn't allowed to leave his room or engage in any serious occupation, but he is visibly gaining weight. His wife is growing ever weaker.

With best regards,
Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.155

First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.156

92

MARX TO JENNY LONGUET†140
IN ARGENTEUIL

Page me46.156

London, 7 Décembre 1881

My dear, sweet Jennychen,

You will, assuredly, find it quite natural that I should not feel in the mood for 'writing' at the moment and hence only now be sending you this brief note. Since I haven't yet even left the sick room, there was no gainsaying the doctor's interdict on my attending the funeral. Moreover I resigned myself, for only the day before her death our dear departed†a had told her NURSE, apropos some neglected formality: 'WE ARE NO SUCH EXTERNAL PEOPLE!'

Page me46.156

Schorlemmer came up from Manchester of his own accord.

Page me46.156

I still have to paint my chest, neck, etc., with iodine and, when regularly repeated, this produces a somewhat tiresome and painful inflammation of the skin. The said operation, which is only being performed to prevent a relapse during convalescence (now complete apart from a slight cough), is therefore doing me sterling service just at this moment. There is only one effective antidote for mental suffering, and that is physical pain. Set the end of the world on the one hand against a man with acute toothache on the other.

Page me46.156

It now gives me extraordinary happiness to recall that, despite numerous misgivings, I ventured on the trip to Paris. Not only because of the time itself that she, of undying memory, spent with you and the little ones†b — 'barely' marred by the image OF A CERTAIN DOMESTIC BULLY et Mirabeau de la cuisine,†c but also the reliving of that time during the final phase of her illness. There can be no doubt that during that phase the presence of you and the children could not have distracted her to such good purpose as her mental preoccupation with you all!
Page me46.156

Her resting-place is fairly close to that of dear 'Charles'.†d
Page me46.156

It is a comfort to me that her strength gave out before it was too late. Because of the highly unusual location of the growth — which meant that it was moveable, not static — the really typical and unbearable pain did not set in until the very last days (and even then could still be kept within limits by the injection of morphine which the doctor had intentionally held in reserve for the end, since with protracted use it ceases to have any effect). As Dr Donkin had predicted, the course of the illness assumed the form of a gradual decline, as in the weakness that comes of old age. Even during her last hours, there were no death agonies, a gradual falling asleep, her eyes larger, lovelier, more luminous than ever.

Page Break me46.157
Page me46.157

Apropos. Engels — as always the truest of friends — has sent you at my request a copy of the Irish World in which an Irish bishop declares himself against landownership (private). This was one of the last items of NEWS I passed on to your mamma, and she thought you might get it into A FRENCH PAPER so as to horrify the French clericals. At all events it shows that such gentlemen are able to pipe any tune they like.
Page me46.157

(In La Justice of 2 December 1881 a certain laddie by the name of B. Gendre†a seeks, under the title 'Le catholicisme socialiste en Allemagne', to assuage his chauvinism by taking au sérieux,†b like Laveleye before him, the fanciful statistics of our friend R. Meyer (in his book Emancipationskampf des 4. Standes). The fact is that, since the German Empire came into being, the so-called Catholic socialists have only once elected a deputy to the Reichstag and that, from the moment of his election, he 'figured' only as a 'member of the Centre'.†225 As to the numerical strength of the Catholic labour unions, on the other hand, our R. Meyer accords France a number disproportionately greater even than that he accords Germany.)
Page me46.157

Have just received La Justice of 7 Décembre and see that, under the rubric Gazette du jour, there is an obituary, which says inter alia:

'On devine que son' (il s'agit de votre mére) 'mariage avec Karl Marx, fils d'un avocat de Tréves, ne se fit pas sans peine. Il y avait á vaincre bien des préjugés, le plus fort de tous était encore le préjugé de race. On sait que l'illustre socialiste est d'origine israélite.'†c
Page me46.157

Toute cette histoire†d IS A SIMPLE INVENTION, THERE WAS NO préjugés á vaincre.†e I suppose, I am not mistaken in crediting Mr Ch. Longuet's inventive genius with this literary 'enjolivement'.†f *The same writer when speaking of the limitation of the working day and the factory acts, mentioned in another number of the Justice — 'Lassalle and Karl Marx', the former having never printed or spoken a syllable on the matter in question. Longuet would greatly oblige me in never mentioning my name in his writings.

Page Break me46.158
Page me46.158

The allusion to your Maman's occasional anonymous correspondence (in fact in behalf of Irving)†226 I find indiscreet. At the time she wrote to the Gazette de Francfort (she never wrote to the Journal de Francfort — as the Justice calls it —, a simply reactionary, and philistine paper) the latter (the Gazette) was still on more or less friendly terms with the socialist party.
Page me46.158

As to the 'von Westphalen[s]', they were not of Rhenish, but of* Brunswickian origin. The father of your mother's father†a was the factotum of the notorious Duke of Brunswick†b (during the 'seven years' war'). As such he was also overwhelmed with favours on the part of the British government and married a near relative of the Argyll's.†c His papers relative to the war and politics have been published by the Minister v. Westphalen.†d On the other hand, 'par sa mére,'†e your mother descends from a small Prussian functionary†f and was actually born at Salzwedel in the Mark. All these things need not be known, but knowing nothing of them, one ought not to pretend correcting d'autres†g 'BIOGRAPHIES'.
Page me46.158

*And now, my dear child, send me a long description of the doings of Johnny et Co. I still regret that Henry was not left to us at the time he went on so well. He is a child who wants a whole family's attendance being singly, exclusively concentrated upon him. As it is, with so many other little ones requesting your care, he is rather an impediment.
Page me46.158

With many kisses to you and your 'little men'†h

Your devoted father,
K.M.
Page me46.158

I was rather disagreeably affected by Meissner's communication, that a new third edition of the Capital Vol. I has become necessary. I wanted indeed to apply all my time — as soon as I should feel myself able again — exclusively to the finishing of the 2nd volume.†227

Page Break me46.158a
Page me46.158a

Page Break me46.159

Page me46.159
Please write a few words in my name to Reinhardt. I could not find his address. He was an acquaintance of Mama's.*†a

Page me46.159
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

93
MARX TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER†72
IN GENEVA
Page me46.159
[Postcard]

London, 10 December 1881

Dear Friend,

You may have already learned from the papers of my wife's death (she breathed her last on 2 December). You will find it natural enough that, during the first days following upon this irreplaceable loss, I should have been in no state to write letters; in fact, apart from her brother, Edgar von Westphalen, in Berlin you are the only one whom I have so far informed in person; other friends and acquaintances have been notified by my youngest daughter.†b
Page me46.159
To the last my wife remained your loyal friend and was rightly incensed by the party's failure to help you — a man who has, for so many years, been a staunch and heroic standard bearer — and your loyal spouse†c in your struggle for existence.
Page me46.159
I myself am still an invalid, but on the road to recovery; so serious a grip had pleurisy combined with bronchitis gained over me that for a time, i.e. several days, the doctors doubted whether I would pull through.
Page me46.159
Farewell, dear friend. Regards to your wife.

K.M.

Page Break me46.160
Page me46.160
[On the side reserved for the address]

M.J. Ph. Becker, Chemin des Vollandes, Eaux Vives.

Genéve (Switzerland)

Page me46.160
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

94
MARX TO NIKOLAI DANIELSON
IN ST PETERSBURG
Page me46.160
London, 13 December 1881

My Dear Friend,

On the second of this month, after a long and painful malady, I lost my wife. I had been with her during the autumn months — as her garde-malade,†a first to the English seaside (Eastbourne), afterwards to Argenteuil (about 20 minutes from Paris) where she and myself enjoyed together the great pleasure to be with our eldest daughter (Madame Longuet) and her 4 little boys†b (the eldest about 5 years), all exceedingly attached to their grandparents.
Page me46.160
It was a very risky affair, on my part, to undertake this voyage to Paris, considering the enfeebled state of my dear wife. But trusting to my excellent friend, Dr Donkin, I dared it in order to procure her this last satisfaction!
Page me46.160
Unfortunately, my own health having been more or less shaky during all this time, I suddenly underwent — after our return to London — an attack of bronchitis complicated by a pleurisy, so that during 3 out of the last 6 weeks of her life, I could not see my wife, although we were in two rooms contiguous to each other.
Page me46.160
Till now I was not yet able to leave my house. I was very near 'leaving this bad world'. The doctors want to send me to the south of France or even to Algeria.

Page Break me46.161
Page me46.161
The letters of condolence I have received from all sides were so far a great source of consolation for me, as there rang through them (except a single Russian letter) a true ring of sympathy, of true acknowledgment and understanding of the rare qualities of my dear wife.
Page me46.161
My German editor†a informs me that a third edition of the Capital has become necessary. This comes at a moment anything but opportune. In the first instance I must first be restored to health, and in the second I want to finish off the 2nd vol.†227 (even if to be published abroad) as soon as possible. I have now the additional interest to have it ready in order to inscribe in it a dedication to my wife.

Page me46.161
However that may be, I will arrange with my editor that I shall make for the 3d edition only the fewest possible alterations and additions, but, on the other hand, that he must this time only draw off 1,000 copies, instead of 3,000, as was his want. When these 1,000 copies forming the 3d edition are sold, then I may change the book in the way I should have done at present under different circumstances.

Believe me always Your true friend
A. Williams†b

Page me46.161
First published, in Russian, in Minuvshiye gody, No. 1, St Petersburg, 1908

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

95
MARX TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE†228
IN HOBOKEN
Page me46.161
[London,] 15 December 1881

Dear Sorge,

Having heard our news from over here by word of mouth from your son,†c you must surely have been prepared to learn of the death of my wife, my unforgettable and beloved partner (on 2 December).

Page Break me46.162
I myself had not recovered sufficiently to pay her my last respects. Indeed, I have so far been confined to the house, but am to go to Ventnor (Isle of Wight) next week.
Page me46.162
I am emerging from this last illness doubly handicapped, emotionally by the loss of my wife, physically in that I am left with a thickening of the pleura and increased sensitivity of the bronchial tubes.
Page me46.162
I shall, alas, have to fritter away a certain amount of time on schemes for restoring my health.
Page me46.162
Another edition of the German text of Capital†227 has now become necessary. Most inopportune so far as I'm concerned.

Page me46.162

Your Henry George is increasingly revealing himself to be a humbug.

Page me46.162

I trust Sorge jun. arrived in good shape; give him my regards.

Your
K. Marx

Page me46.162

The English have latterly begun to take rather more notice of Capital, etc. For instance, in last October's (or November's, I am not quite sure) issue of the Contemporary, there was an article by John Rae on GERMAN SOCIALISM.†a (Very inadequate, full of mistakes, but 'FAIR', as one of my ENGLISH FRIENDS remarked to me day before yesterday.) And why FAIR? Because John Rae does not suppose that for the forty years I am spreading my pernicious theories I was being instigated by 'bad' motives. 'I must praise his magnanimity!' *The fairness of making yourself at least sufficiently acquainted with the subject of your criticism seems a thing quite unknown to the penmen of British philistinism.

Page me46.162

Before this, in the beginning of June, there was published by a certain Hyndman (who had before intruded himself into my house) a little book: England for All. It pretends to be written as an exposé of the programme of the 'Democratic Federation'†158 — a recently formed association of different English and Scotch radical societies, half bourgeois, half prolétaires.†b The chapters on Labour and Capital are only literal extracts from, or circumlocutions of, the Capital, but the fellow does neither quote the book, nor its author, but to shield himself from exposure remarks at the end of his preface:

Page Break me46.163

'For the ideas and much of the matter contained in chapters II and III, I am indebted to the work of a great thinker and original writer, etc., etc.'

Page me46.163

Vis-á-vis myself, the fellow wrote stupid letters of excuse, for instance, that 'the English don't like to be taught by foreigners', that 'my name was so much detested, etc.' With all that his little book — so far as it pilfers the Capital — makes good propaganda, although the man is a 'weak' vessel, and very far from having even the patience — the first condition of learning anything — of studying a matter thoroughly. All these amiable middle-class writers — if not specialists — have an itching to make money or name or political capital immediately out of any new thoughts they may have got at by any favourable windfall. Many evenings this fellow has pilfered from me, in order to take me out and to learn in the easiest way.

Page me46.163

Lastly, there was published on the 1st December last (I shall send you a copy of it) in the monthly review Modern Thought an article: 'Leaders of Modern Thought: No. XXIII — Karl Marx. By Ernest Belfort Bax.'

Page me46.163

Now this is the first English publication of that kind which is pervaded by a real enthusiasm for the new ideas themselves and boldly stands up against British philistinism. This does not prevent that the biographical notices the author gives of me are mostly wrong, etc. In the exposition of my economic principles and in his translations (i.e. quotations of the Capital) much is wrong and confused, but with all that the appearance of this article, announced in large letters by placards on the walls of West End London, has produced a great sensation. What was most important for me, I received the said number of Modern Thought already on the 30th of November, so that my dear wife had the last days of her life still cheered up. You know the passionate interest she took in all such affairs.*

Page me46.163
First published in Briefe und Auszüge aus Briefen von Joh. Phil. Becker, Jos. Dietzgen, Friedrich Engels, Karl Marx u. A. an F.A. Sorge und Andere, Stuttgart, 1906

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.164

96
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET†72
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.164
London, 17 December 1881
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

My Dear Child,

Tussy, SUPPORTED BY Engels, is this moment taking the Christmas hamper for our little ones by CAB to the PARCEL COMPANY. Helen†a wants me to point out specially that 1 little jacket for Harry, 1 for Eddy,†b and a woollen bonnet for Pa†c are from her; again for the selfsame Pa, a 'little blue frock' from Laura; from myself a SAILOR'S SUIT for MY DEAR Johnny. On one of the last days of her life, Möhmchen†d laughed so merrily when telling Laura how you and I took Johnny to Paris, and chose a suit for him there in which he looked like a little bourgeois gentilhomme.†e
Page me46.164
The letters of condolence I get from near and far, and from people of such various nationalities, professions, etc., etc., are, in their appreciation of Möhmchen, all of them animated by a spirit of truth and a depth of feeling rarely found in what are as a rule merely conventional tributes. I ascribe this to the fact that everything about her was natural and genuine, unforced and without affectation. Hence the impression she made on others was one of vivaciousness and lucidity; even Mrs Hess writes:

'In her, Nature has destroyed its own masterpiece, for never in my life have I met so witty and loving a woman.'†229
Page me46.164

Liebknecht writes to say that, without her, he would have succumbed to the wretchedness of exile,†230 etc., etc.
Page me46.164
How exceptionally healthy she was by nature, for all her delicate constitution, is evident from the fact that, despite being bed-ridden for so long, she did not have a sore spot on her body, much to the astonishment of the doctors; during my recent illness I already had a number of sore places after only two weeks of being confined to bed.

Page Break me46.165
Page me46.165
The weather has been very bad since I got over my illness, so I have been under house arrest up till now, but next week, on doctors' orders, I am to go to Ventnor (Isle of Wight) and from there, later on, somewhere further south. Tussy will accompany me.

Page me46.165
You will be getting (posted at the same time as this) an article about me in the monthly review Modern Thought.†a It's the first time an English critic has gone into the matter with such enthusiasm. It arrived in time to cheer Möhmchen up. Where the QUOTATIONS from the German 'text' are too bad (I MEAN too badly DONE INTO ENGLISH), I have got Tussy to write in corrections on such few copies as we are reserving for friends. The mistakes that occur under the heading 'LIFE' are indifferent.
Page me46.165
And now, my dear child, the best service you can do me is to keep your chin up! I hope that I shall spend many more happy days with you and worthily fulfil my functions as a GRANDPA.
Page me46.165
With a thousand kisses to you and the little ones,

Your loving
OLD NICK
Page me46.165
I could have written much more about Vivanti, etc., but believe that Tussy has bagged this for herself.

Page me46.165
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Printed according to the original

97
ENGELS TO KARL KAUTSKY
IN ZURICH
Page me46.165
London, 18 December 1881

Dear Mr Kautsky,

I got the telegram from you and Bernstein at 3.50 this afternoon and am glad to be able to inform you that Marx has now recovered to the extent that he can be sent — initially — to the south coast of England. He will be going there in the course of this week; as soon as he has grown a little more accustomed to the open air and there is no further fear of a relapse, he will then probably move on to the south of Europe and spend some time there.

Page Break me46.166
Page me46.166
I couldn't reply to you by telegram, as it would have meant going to the CENTRAL OFFICE and, as usual, I had Pumps, her husband†a and Sam Moore (all of whom send you their best wishes) here for a meal and later on, as you can imagine, more people dropped in. There would hardly be any point in telegraphing tomorrow as this letter will doubtless arrive just as soon (±).†b
Page me46.166
About the Poles, something presently†224; things here have been rather at sixes and sevens of late.
Page me46.166
So the Égalité is appearing again. Almost all the articles in No. 1 begin quite splendidly and end up most disappointingly.†231 I haven't seen No. 2 yet.
Page me46.166
Best wishes to Bernstein.

Yours
F. Engels

Page me46.166
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

98
ENGELS TO FERDINAND DOMELA NIEUWENHUIS
IN THE HAGUE
Page me46.166
London, 29 December 1881
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

Dear Comrade,

I am glad to be able to inform you that the news according to which Karl Marx is mortally sick is wholly false and fictitious. He has now got over his illness (bronchitis and pleurisy) and, on the advice of his doctors, has today left for Ventnor (the Isle of Wight); they hope that the warm climate and dry air there will rapidly complete his recovery. I will forward your letter to him.

Page Break me46.166a

Page Break me46.166b

Page Break me46.167

Yours sincerely,
F. Engels

Page me46.167
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Istorik-Marksist, Vol. 6 (40), Moscow, 1934

Printed according to the original

Translated from the Dutch

Published in English for the first time

99
MARX TO ROLAND DANIELS†232
IN COLOGNE
Page me46.167
To Mr Roland Daniels with compliments

Karl Marx
Ventnor (Isle of Wight),
31 December 1881

My daughter†a happened to bring this photogram with her when we left London; she told me of this when my letters to your esteemed mother†b and yourself†233 had already been despatched. Hence this is being sent later.

Page me46.167
First published in German and in Russian in: Karl Marx, Frederick Engels, Collection of Photographs, Moscow, 1976

Printed according to the copy of the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.168

100
ENGELS TO LEV HARTMANN
IN LONDON
Page me46.168
[Draft]

[London, end of December 1881]

I have a letter from America for you, but I am instructed to hand it to you personally.
Page me46.168
Can you come and receive it?

Your†a

Page me46.168
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

Translated from the Russian

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.169

1882

101
MARX TO LAURA LAFARGUE†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.169
Ventnor, 4 January 1882
1 St Boniface Gardens

Dear Laurachen,

Today is our first sunny and tolerable day in Ventnor. The weather is said to have been excellent — up till the time of our arrival.†234 Thereafter GALES EVERY DAY, wind raging and howling throughout the night, in the morning THE SKY OVERCAST, LEADEN, LONDONLIKE. Temperature significantly lower than in London and, on top of that, and most tiresome of all, a great deal of rain. (The air itself was of course 'purer' than in London.)
Page me46.169

In the circumstances it was only natural that my cough, IN FACT my bronchial catarrh, should have got worse rather than better. But for all that I have progressed to the extent that for part of the night I sleep naturally, without opium, etc. However my general condition is not such as to render me fit for work. Today, ABOUT the end of the first week of our stay, it looks as though a change is setting in. Given warmer weather this would certainly be a splendid health resort for convalescents of my description.
Page me46.169

My companion†a (this strictly between ourselves) eats practically nothing; suffers badly from nervous tics; reads and writes all day long, when not engaged in buying the necessary provisions or taking short walks. She is very taciturn and, INDEED, seemingly endures staying with me simply out of a sense of duty, as a self-sacrificing martyr.
Page me46.169

Has there been no more news from Jenny about the arrival of the CHRISTMAS BOX†b? I'm worried about the thing.

Page Break me46.170
Page me46.170

You will understand, dear child, if I have nothing positive to report to you from here, my experiences hitherto having been purely negative, unless it be the great discovery that local literature here is represented by 3 newspapers, and that there is even A SCHOOL OF ART and SCIENCE INSTITUTION where a big lecture is to be given next Monday evening ON THE CASTES AND 'MÉTIERS' OF INDIA.
Page me46.170

Today I received a letter from Reinhardt in Paris in which he speaks of our sad bereavement†a in the MOST SINCERE and MOST SYMPATHETIC manner. The vehemence with which the bourgeois papers in Germany have announced either my demise, or at any rate the inevitable imminence thereof, has tickled me hugely, and the 'man at odds with the world' will have to get fit for action again, if only to oblige them.
Page me46.170

Willard Brown has written to Tussy from New York; he has entrusted the business of your house to a very intimate and competent friend of his in new Orleans†235; the latter has written to say that AT FIRST SIGHT there has been a great deal of underhand work but that he must first make further investigations in order to obtain actual proof.
Page me46.170

I enclose, as a curiosity for Paul,†b a cutting from the MONEY ARTICLE in The Times (29 December 1881) which was obviously inserted by Messrs Say and Rothschild.†c (Regards to Paul and Helen.†d)
Page me46.170

Adio, MY DEAR CHILD, write soon.

Your
OLD NICK

Page me46.170
First published in the language of the original (German) in Annali, an. I, Milano, 1958

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.171

102
MARX TO ENGELS†140
IN LONDON
Page me46.171
Ventnor, 5 January 1882
1 St Boniface Gardens

Dear FRED,

Cold and wet during the day, raging winds at night; that, by and large, is the kind of weather and climate we've been experiencing here up till today.†234 — The exception was yesterday, when it was dry with brilliant sunshine. — According to letters received by Tussy, it has been the same everywhere on the south coast of England; disappointment everywhere on the part of the not inconsiderable number of convalescing, etc., rabble. Qui vivra verra.†a Perhaps there will be a change for the better.
Page me46.171
I now wear — (au cas de besoin†b) — a muzzle, alias RESPIRATOR; this makes one less dependent on the caprices of the weather when taking one's obligatory walk.
Page me46.171
I still have a tiresome and persistent cough and bronchial catarrh; but it's an undoubted step forward that I should get a few hours sleep at night without recourse to artificial remedies, and this despite the roar of the wind across the sea close by; on the contrary, the noise helps to send me to sleep.
Page me46.171
My companion, Tussy, is sorely plagued with nervous tics and insomnia, etc. However I hope that her frequent excursions in the fresh air — for she goes into 'town' every day to attend to this and that — will have a beneficial effect on her.
Page me46.171
What has tickled me greatly was the announcement by the LIBERAL ASSOCIATION — I no longer recall where, Birmingham perhaps†236 — that, in celebration of some ANNIVERSARY or other, not only will OLD Bright and THE ILLUSTRIOUS VESTRYMAN AND CAUCUSMAN Chamberlain be speaking, * but that also old Obadiah's 'son', Mr Jacob Bright jun.†237 and several 'Miss' Cobden, are to put in their appearance. It is not said whether one of the 'Miss' Cobden or all of them will be given away to the young Obadiah, so as to perpetuate in the most appropriate and safest way the Bright-Cobden stock. *

Page Break me46.172
Page me46.172

A different picture is presented by the 3,000 LANDLORDS' MEETING AT Dublin,†238 duce†a Abercorn, the sole aim of which is 'to maintain... contracts and the freedom between man and man in this realm'. The laddies' rage at the ASSISTANT COMMISSIONERS is comical. Their attacks on Gladstone are, by the by, fully justified, but it is only the latter's COERCITIVE [sic] MEASURES and his 50,000 men,†123 not counting the police, that permit these gentlemen to confront him in so critical and threatening a manner. All this uproar is, of course, merely aimed at getting John Bull ready to pay 'compensation costs'. SERVES HIM RIGHT.

Page me46.172

You will see from the enclosed letter from Dietzgen that the unhappy fellow has 'progressed' backwards and safely 'arrived' at the Phänomenologie.†239 I regard the case as an incurable one.

Page me46.172

I have also had a very kind letter of condolence from Reinhardt in Paris who asks me to give you, amongst others, his kindest regards. He always had a soft spot for my beloved partner.

Page me46.172

I wish I were fit for action again; not yet reached that stage, alas.

Page me46.172

With best wishes from Tussy.

Your
Moor

Page me46.172
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

103
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN
IN ZURICH
Page me46.172
London, 6 January 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

I am writing to you in haste today in order to shed some light on the peculiar expressions that occur in the last number of the Égalité

Page Break me46.173
on the subject of the Sozialdemokrat. The point is that, out of the goodness of his heart, Guesde engaged for the German section of the paper a person known to be the mortal enemy of everything appertaining to 'Zurich',†a and the said person was unable to refrain from thus expressing his displeasure that the Sozialdemokrat should survive and not the Laterne. You would oblige us and serve the cause by taking no notice of this. If it happens again, we shall at once put a stop to it. By contrast, we were delighted that the Sozialdemokrat should not have hesitated to accuse the deputies of downright cowardice, thus bringing matters to a head, something which many of them, had Bebel not been there, would doubtless have sooner avoided.†240
Page me46.173
The Égalité people, by the way, have been luckier than, au fond,†b they deserved. Malon and Brousse made horrible fools of themselves in connection with Joffrin's candidature by putting forward a watered-down programme — in defiance of the congressional resolution passed at Rheims,†223 and quite simply suppressed one of the points discussed there, just because it happened not to suit their book (Égalité, No. 4, p. 7, Paris).†c In this way they put the Égalité in the right which, in the circumstances and on tactical grounds, was absolutely imperative — not Guesde and Co., but Malon and Co., were the real 'autoritaires',†d the strivers after dictatorship.†e And, now that the struggle has come out into the open, I need hardly say that our sympathies lie wholly with Guesde and his friends. Moreover, the Égalité is, and always has been, infinitely superior to the Prolétaire as far as content is concerned. Malon and Brousse are again behaving like true Bakuninists: they accuse others of hankering for dictatorship and, under pretence of maintaining their 'autonomy', want to rule the roost themselves without regard for party resolutions.
Page me46.173
Marx is at Ventnor in the Isle of Wight, but writes to say that the weather is atrocious,†f worse than here. Well, it will soon change, no doubt; at all events, there would now seem to be no real danger of a relapse. The haste the bourgeois press was in to disseminate the news of his confidently anticipated demise did him no end of good: 'Now I must live to a ripe old age, if only to spite the damned rascals.'

Page Break me46.174
Page me46.174
Kautsky will have to be patient for a few more days. Schorlemmer is still here, which means that the most that I can do is dabble in natural science; on top of that, there's all the coming and going which won't be over until next week. Then, when time's no object, as Schorlemmer says Darmstadt-fashion, I'll write to him about the Poles.†a
Page me46.174
Kindest regards to him and you,

from yours

F. Engels

Page me46.174
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

104
ENGELS TO MARX
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.174
London, 8 January 1882

Dear Moor,

We were glad to hear that there was no reason for yours and Tussy's silence and, even though you couldn't be expected to make very much progress in view of the adverse weather, you have at least benefited to the extent that the danger of a relapse has now been pretty well eliminated, which was, after all, the main reason why you were sent to Ventnor.
Page me46.174
The festive season here ends tomorrow. Schorlemmer will be returning to Manchester, and then it's back to the grindstone. I am looking forward to it; things were really getting too much. Tuesday with Lenchen, Friday with Pumps, yesterday with the Lafargues, today here at my house — and every morning the eternal Pilsener; it couldn't go on indefinitely. Lenchen was always one of the party, of course, and still is, so she hasn't felt too lonely.

Page Break me46.175
Page me46.175
By the time you get this note you will have been edified by old William's†a magnificent proclamation in which he avows his solidarity with Bismarck and declares all this to be the free expression of his own opinion.†241 I also liked the bit about the inviolability of the person of the monarch having persisted in Prussia since time immemorial. Particularly when one considers the shots fired by Nobiling.†120 How comforting for Alexander II and III that their persons should be inviolable! One might, by the way, imagine that one was living under a travesty of Charles X when one reads that sort of drivel.
Page me46.175
There has been yet another nice item in The Standard, a letter from a Russian general about the situation and the Nihilists,†242 just like what used to be said and written by the Prussian generals of 1845 about demagogues,†243 liberals, Jews, the bad principles of the French, and the universal and undying loyalty to the king felt by the sound core of the nation. Which didn't, of course, set the revolution back one day. You will have seen that the zemstvos†37 have rebelled against Ignatiev, partly via the medium of petitions, partly by an outright refusal to convene.†244 That is a most important step, the first to be taken by official bodies under Alexander III.

Page me46.175

Like you, we hope for better weather. Yesterday was very fine with a north-wester from which you will have been sheltered. Schorlemmer and I were on the go the whole day and it was not until half past midnight that we accompanied Lenchen home from Laura's, covering the whole distance on foot. Today it's been beastly and wet, though during a brighter spell we got out and about for an hour or so with Sam Moore who turned up again the day before yesterday. It's blowing good and hard again outside. How is Tussy actually? Regards to her and to you from us all.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.175
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.176

105
MARX TO ENGELS†166
IN LONDON
Page me46.176
Ventnor, 12 January 1882
1 St Boniface Gardens

Dear Engels,

I am going to try spending one more week here (the 3rd as from today); so far there's been no improvement in the weather — if anything the reverse. On Monday, Tussy is going up to London for a theatrical performance she is taking part in, after which she will come back here.
Page me46.176

By the time I left London, I had to pay out SOMEWHAT LESS THAN £20 of the £40 you gave me on unavoidable expenses. Here my lodgings cost me 2 GUINEAS a week and with coal and gas but excluding other EXTRAS, ABOUT £2 15s.; remaining weekly expenditure ABOUT 4 GUINEAS. Considering the climatic performance this hole has put up, it's a tidy sum. Including travelling expenses, I have spent ABOUT £17 and have still got £5. This will not suffice for the last week (incl. Tussy's INCIDENTAL London TRIP and our probable return together next week). So I'd be grateful if you could let me have SOME £ by Monday NEXT, if it can be done.

Page me46.176

As for future plans, the first consideration must be to relieve Tussy of her role as my companion (when I again set forth I shall be able to dispense with an escort altogether). The girl is under such MENTAL PRESSURE that it is undermining her health. Neither travelling, nor CHANGE OF CLIMATE, nor PHYSICIANS CAN DO ANYTHING IN THIS CASE. All one can do for her is to do as she wishes, and let her take a course of theatrical LESSONS with Madame Jung. She has an ardent desire to open up a career for herself, or so she imagines, as an independent, active artist and, once this has been conceded, she is undoubtedly right in saying that, at her age, there's no more time to be lost. Not for anything in the world would I have the girl think she is to be sacrificed as an old man's 'nurse' on the altar of family. In fact, I am convinced that pro nunc†a Madame Jung is the only doctor for her. She is not open with me; what I say is based on observation, not on her own statements. Nor is the above assertion in any way incompatible with the fact that the most disquieting symptoms, which notably occur at night, are of an alarmingly hysterical nature, or so MISS Maitland†a told me (she spent 2 days here). But for this, too, no remedy is available just now save an absorbing and congenial pursuit. I have certain conjectures about her affairs of the 'heart', but that is too delicate a subject to admit of discussion in black and white.

Page Break me46.177
Page me46.177

I have had a letter from the Sorge family,†245 written by the old man, countersigned by Mrs Sorge and Sorge jun.,†b in which they invite me TO TURN OVER A NEW LEAF, i.e. go and settle with them in New York. Well meant, at any rate!
Page me46.177

In the Arbeiterstimme in which C. Schramm, invoking myself, attacked Karl Bürkli,†c Bürkli now attacks Schramm,†d for whose benefit he demonstrates that everything he [Schramm] has adduced is quite beside the point since I nowhere consider the kind of money he, Bürkli, proposes, namely 'interest-bearing mortgage bank certificates'. Bürkli does, however, express surprise that I should make no mention of the Pole, August Cieszkowski (Du crédit et de la circulation, Paris, 1839), although in his Systéme des contradictions économiques that 'rough diamond Proudhon' frequently, if respectfully, takes issue with Cieszkowski (the 'prior inventor' of Bürkli's bank certificates). The said Cieszkowski — a count, as Bürkli, NATIVE of Switzerland, remarks, and a ['doctor of philosophy' and 'Hegelian']†e INTO THE BARGAIN, if not actually a 'fellow-countryman of Marx', i.e. as 'deputy for Posen' in the 'Prussian' National Assembly — the said count, etc., did in fact once call on me in Paris (at the time of the Deutsch-Französische Jahrbücher), and such was the impression he made on me that I neither wanted nor would have been able to read anything whatever of his contriving. Nevertheless, it's a notable fact that the inventors of 'real' credit money, which was meant to serve as a means of circulation at the same time, as opposed to what they call 'personal' credit money (e.g. present-day bank-notes), should have chanced their hand — albeit in vain — as far back as the founding of the Bank of England, and this in the interests and at the behest of the landed aristocracy.†f At all events, Bürkli is under a delusion as to the 'historical' date of birth of the Cieszkowskian 'idea', independently rediscovered by himself.

Page Break me46.178
Page me46.178
What has struck me from the first about the Bismarck-William manifesto†241 is the confusion as between Prussian king and German emperor! In the latter capacity, the laddie has, after all, no historical antecedents whatsoever, nor yet Hohenzollern traditions (on which a start has now been made with the 'Prince of Prussia's' ostentatious trip to England — to study the Constitution!†246). After the nauseous protestations, expiring in submissive love, of your Mommsens, Richters, Hänels†247 et tutti quanti,†a it was charming of Bismarck to play this card — however silly his manner of doing it. With any luck we shall yet see something happen.

Your
K.M.

Page me46.178
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

106
ENGELS TO EMIL ENGELS
IN ENGELSKIRCHEN
Page me46.178
London, 12 January 1882

Dear Emil,

After sundry disturbances and unforeseen events, among which the eating and drinking that goes with the festive season, I have composed myself sufficiently to send you, Lottchen, Elisabeth and her fiancé†b my heartiest congratulations on their engagement. I would never have thought, when travelling to Manchester with August Erbslöh in the late autumn of 1842†248 (I've only seen him once or twice since then in Barmen), that his son would marry a niece of mine. Admittedly, neither of the two young people had been so much as thought of at that time. It is a subject that lends itself to all kinds of suitable and unsuitable remarks — which, however,

Page Break me46.179

I shall refrain from making since anyone can easily do that for himself and the young couple will in any case be much too preoccupied with present and future to have time for utterly useless comments on a past that is antecedent to their births.
Page me46.179

Apart from that, I shall soon be moved to hope that engagements in our family, along with their more immediate and more remote consequences, will come at rather less frequent intervals, though admittedly in a family as numerous and prolific as ours these cases multiply proportionately to the square of the distance in time from a starting-point that lies over 60 years behind us, and there's no going against a natural law such as that.
Page me46.179

I'm keeping quite well on the whole, except that I'm rather deaf in my left ear and regularly catch cold during the winter, but I got used to that years ago. At all events, the mild winter will help you shake off the effects of pneumonia, or at any rate alleviate them. Today it turned so warm again that I had to take my greatcoat off, despite a bit of SCOTCH MIST.
Page me46.179

Love to you all, especially to Lottchen and the happy couple.

Your Friedrich
Page me46.179

I shall be glad to see Emil†a here.

Page me46.179
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.180

107
MARX TO AMALIE DANIELS
IN COLOGNE
Page me46.180
[Ventnor,] Isle of Wight, 12 January 1882
1 St Boniface Gardens

My dear Mrs Daniels,

On the same day as I wrote to you,†233 my daughter†a found an even earlier photograph of mine among the papers she had brought with her from London. I at once sent it to Cologne†b in the enclosed envelope, the same in which it was returned to me by the 'Imperial Post Office'.

Page me46.180
Perhaps you would be so good as to send me your exact address. I shall then despatch the corpus delicti†c anew.†249
Page me46.180
Best regards.

Yours very sincerely,
K. Marx

Page me46.180
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

108
ENGELS TO MARX
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.180
London, 13 January 1882

Dear Moor,

First, I enclose £20 in 4 bank-notes á 5 GK 53969, 70, 71, 72. London, 7 October 1881. I have in addition given Lenchen £10 so that she can pay the RATES and still have something in hand. Next week, larger amounts will become available and then, after your return, we shall be able to make further plans.

Page Break me46.181
Page me46.181
I'm very glad that you should feel strong enough to be able to travel alone in future.
Page me46.181
I skimmed through part of the Schramm-Bürkliade†a and was greatly tickled by it. Even before 1842, Cieszkowski had already written a book on natural philosophy (botany)†b and, if I am not mistaken, also contributed to the Deutsche, if not actually the Hallische Jahrbücher.†c
Page me46.181
Our Parisian friends have reaped what they had sown. What we had both of us told them would happen has actually come to pass. They have, by their impatience, ruined what was a first-rate position which, if they were to have made the most of it, called precisely for discretion and the ability to wait and see. For Malon and Brousse had set a trap for them in true old Alliance style†67 — calumny in the form of mere hints, no open naming of names, and supplemented on the sly by word of mouth; they went straight into it like so many schoolboys (Lafargue in the van), inasmuch as they counterattacked by name and were then dubbed disturbers of the peace. Moreover, their argument is so utterly puerile; as soon as one reads their opponents' retort, this leaps to the eye. Thus Guesde suppresses important qualificative passages of Joffrin's because they don't suit his book, and fails to mention the fact that, despite his opposition, the Comité national†250 declared Joffrin's programme to be more radical than the programme minimum,†251 thus giving Joffrin the party's blessing. A fact which he, of course, triumphantly parades before Guesde.†d Then Lafargue words his articles in such a way as to enable Malon to say in reply: 'But have we ever maintained that the struggles of the medieval communiers†e against the feudal aristocracy were anything but class struggles — and do you, Mr Lafargue, contest this?' — And now we get jeremiad after jeremiad from Paris, saying that they have been hopelessly defeated and, at the next meeting of the Comité national, would even be set upon physically, and Guesde is as despairing as he was uppish 4 weeks ago, and can see no salvation in anything short of secession by the minority. And now, finding to their astonishment that they are having to lie on the bed they have made, — now they come to the laudable conclusion that they must eschew all personalities!

Page Break me46.182
Page me46.182
I am sending you an old Kölnische Zeitung which, however, contains a very interesting article on Russia.†252
Page me46.182
Incidentally, the factum (anti-Guesde) in the Prolétaire, written by Malon and Brousse and signed by Joffrin, is a splendid example of Bakuninist polemics and very much in the style of the 'Sonvillier circular',†253 but ruder.
Page me46.182
So the ukase has been issued re the reduction of vykup†a payments.†254 Having regard to the colossal nedoimki,†b the paltry per cent or two will, no doubt, make a great deal of difference! But every million it doesn't get makes a difference to the Russian Treasury.
Page me46.182
Bismarck, by the way, has had better luck than might have been expected: the Reichstag has endorsed his pilgrimage to Canossa by a 2/3 majority.†255 But that would seem to be about the only thing upon which this Reichstag is able to agree. A fine majority: feudalists, ultramontanes, particularists, Poles, Danes, Alsatians, a few men of Progress,†256 demoscratchers and socialists!
Page me46.182
Ad vocem†c pilgrimages, this morning I met Furnivall wearing a blue ulster, belted at the waist, and a broad-brimmed hat — he looked exactly like a pilgrim going to the Holy Land on a quest for St Anthony's beard.
Page me46.182

Kindest regards to Tussy.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.182
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.183

109
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me46.183
[Ventnor,] 15 January 1882

DEAR FRED,

BEST THANKS FOR THE £20.
Page me46.183
I have resolved to leave tomorrow as the weather is getting progressively 'colder', which does my swollen cheek no good. So I shall lose only 2 days, and this will also save Tussy the double journey.
Page me46.183
Though repeatedly warned, our people in Paris have got themselves into a nice mess†a (SERVES Lafargue AND Guesde RIGHT); however, since they possess two papers,†b they may, with a little ingenuity, nevertheless gain command of the field.
Page me46.183
I regard it as a major victory, not only in Germany itself but vis-á-vis the outside world GENERALLY, that Bismarck should admit in the Reichstag that the German workers have to some extent 'given the thumbs down' to his state socialism.†257 London's rascally bourgeois press always sought to disseminate the opposite.
Page me46.183
I have received an extraordinarily kind letter from OLD Frankel from the 'state prison', ditto a letter from Wróblewski who was évidemment†c writing on behalf of his Polish party in Geneva†258; but in his haste he forgot to append not only the party's name but also his own.
Page me46.183
If, as Joffrin relates in his factum in the Prolétaire,†d he once staged a pro-Guesde demonstration in London against the 'International' there, it was at all events such a platonic demonstration that no one knew anything about it apart from Joffrin himself and perhaps a few of his closest accomplices, i.e. it was carried out entirely in 'private'.

Page me46.183
Salut.

Your
Moor

Page me46.183
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.184

110
MARX TO PYOTR LAVROV†72
IN PARIS
Page me46.184
London, 23 January 1882
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

Dear Friend,

I enclose a few lines for the Russian edition of the Communist Manifesto†a; as these are to be translated into Russian they have not been polished to the degree that would be necessary if they were to be published IN THE GERMAN VERNACULAR.
Page me46.184
I have only been back in London for a few days. For as a result of pleurisy and bronchitis, from which I had recovered, I was left with chronic bronchial catarrh which my doctor†b hoped to clear up by sending me to Ventnor (Isle of Wight), a place that is usually warm, even in winter. On this occasion, however, — during the 3 weeks of my stay there — Ventnor was invaded by cold, wet, dull, misty weather while at the same time in London the weather turned almost summery, only to change again, however, on my return.
Page me46.184
The intention now is to send me somewhere in the south, possibly Algiers. It is a difficult choice, because Italy is barred to me (a man was arrested in Milan for having a name like mine); I can't even go from here to Gibraltar by STEAMER, as I have no passport and even the English demand a passport there.
Page me46.184

Despite all the urging on the part of doctors and those closest to me, I would never have agreed to such a time-wasting operation were it not for the fact that this accursed 'English' disease impairs one's intellect. Moreover a relapse, even if I pulled through, would take up still more time. All the same I intend to carry out some further experiments here first.

Page me46.184

*I send you a number of Modern Thought with an article on myself†c; I need not tell you that the biographical notice of the author is altogether wrong. My daughter — your correspondent Eleanor, who sends you her love — has in the copy forwarded to you taken upon herself to correct the English misquotations from the Capital. But however badly Mr Bax — I hear he is quite a young man — may translate, he certainly is the first English critic who takes a real interest in modern socialism. There is a sincerity of speech and a ring of true conviction about him which strike you. A certain John Rae — I think he is lecturer of Political Economy at some English University — has, some months ago, published in The Contemporary Review an article on the same subject,†a very superficial (though he affects to quote many of my writings he has evidently never seen), and full of that pretence of superiority which the true Briton is inspired with thanks to a peculiar gift of stolid blockheadedness. Still he tries hard to be so condescending as to suppose, that from conviction, and not from interested motives, I am, for almost 40 years, misleading the working class by unsound doctrines! Generally speaking, people here commence to yearn for some knowledge of socialism, nihilism, and so forth. Ireland and the United States on the one hand; on the other, the impending struggle between farmers and landlords, between agricultural labourers and farmers, between capitalism and landlordism; some symptoms of revival among the industrial working class, as f.i. at some late partial elections for the House of Commons, where the official workingmen's candidates (especially the renegade of the International, miserable Howell†259), proposed by the acknowledged leaders of Trades' Unions and publicly recommended by Mr Gladstone, 'the people's William' — were disdainfully rejected by the workmen; the demonstrative radical clubs forming in London, mostly composed of workmen, English and Irish intermingling, dead against the 'great liberal party', official trades-unionism, and the people's William, etc. etc. — all this induces the British philistine to want just now some information on Socialism. Unfortunately, the reviews, magazines, journals, etc., exploit this 'demand' only to 'offer' the public the expectorations of venal, ignorant, and sycophantic penny-a-liners (suppose even that they are shilling-a-liners).

Page Break me46.185

Page me46.185

There appears a 'weekly', called The Radical, full of good aspirations, bold in language (the boldness is in the sans gêne,†b not in the vigour), trying to break through the trammels of the British press, but, with all that, of feeble performance. What the paper lacks, are intelligent editors. Many months ago these people wrote to me, I was then at Eastbourne†160 with my dear wife, then at Paris,†164 etc., so that they had not yet any interview with me. I consider it in fact useless.

Page Break me46.186

The more I have read of their paper, the more I feel convinced that it is incurable.

Page me46.186
My daughter†a reminds me that it is high time to finish this letter, the last minutes for letter delivery being near.*

Salut,
Karl Marx

Page me46.186
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Letopisi marksizma, Book V, Moscow-Leningrad, 1928

Printed according to the original

111
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†260
IN ZURICH
Page me46.186
London, 25 January 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

Not until today have I been able to get round to answering your letter of the 12th. Marx is home from the Isle of Wight with his youngest daughter,†a both considerably better, and Marx strong enough to go walking with me yesterday for 2 hours without a break. Since he isn't working yet and the Lafargues as often as not also drop in before dinner (i.e. 5 o'clock) when a bottle of good Pilsener is served up, my hours of daylight are usually frittered away and I have never liked writing by lamplight after the warning (chronic conjuctivitis) that was given to my left eye 3 years ago.
Page me46.186
Just now I happen to be at Marx's, so would you be so good as to thank Höchberg very much on Marx's behalf for his kind offer which, however, he is unlikely to be able to make use of; all that he knows for certain about his journey south is that he is not going to the Riviera or to any part of Italy, if only on account of the police. The first proviso where convalescents are concerned is that there should be no harassment by the police, in which respect Italy can hold out fewer guarantees than anywhere else — save, of course, Bismarck's empire.

Page Break me46.187
Page me46.187
We were greatly interested by what you told us of the goings-on among the 'leaders' in Germany. I have never made a secret of my opinion that the masses in Germany have been far better than their leaders, particularly since the press and agitation combined to turn the party into the latter's milch cow and butter purveyor, only to see the said cow abruptly slaughtered by Bismarck and the bourgeoisie.†261 For the thousands instantly ruined thereby, it is a personal disaster not to have been placed in an immediately revolutionary situation, i.e. exile. Otherwise not a few who are now bemoaning their fate would have gone over to Most's camp or at any rate found the Sozialdemokrat far too moderate. The majority of our people remained in Germany, as they needs must, for the most part going to fairly reactionary places, where they remained social outcasts dependent for their living on philistines and became, to a great extent, themselves tainted with philistinism. For them, everything soon began to turn on the hope that the Anti-Socialist Law would be repealed. Small wonder that, under pressure from the philistine establishment, some of them became obsessed with the idea — in reality an absurd one — that this could be attained by the exercise of moderation. Germany is a truly infamous country for people without much willpower. The narrowness and pettiness of prevailing conditions, both civil and political, the provincial character of even the cities, the petty but cumulative harassment in the running battle with police and bureaucracy — all this enervates instead of stimulating resistance, and in this way many of those in the 'great nursery'†a grow childish themselves. Petty conditions engender a petty outlook, so that a great deal of intelligence and vigour is called for if anyone living in Germany is to look beyond the immediate future, to keep his eyes fixed on the wider context of world events and not succumb to that complacent 'objectivity' that cannot see beyond its own nose and is therefore the most blinkered subjectivity, even though it be shared by a thousand other such fellow-subjects.

Page me46.187

True, the emergence of such a tendency, cloaking its lack of insight and resolution under the mantle of 'objective' wisdom, is natural enough; nevertheless it must be ruthlessly combated. And for this the working masses themselves provide the best purchase. They alone in Germany live in anything approaching modern conditions, all their misfortunes, great and small, are attributable to the pressure exerted by capital and, whereas all other struggles in Germany, both social and political, are petty and paltry and revolve round paltry issues which have long been surmounted elsewhere, the workers' struggle alone is noble, it alone is abreast of the times, it alone does not enervate the participants but is for them a constant source of fresh energy. So the more you are able to draw your correspondents from amongst the genuine workers, — not those who have become 'leaders' — the better will be your chance of counterbalancing the whines of the leadership.

Page Break me46.188
Page me46.188

This time it was inevitable that all manner of peculiar people should get into the Reichstag. All the more unfortunate, then, that Bebel should not have been elected.†222 He alone is lucid, politically far-sighted and energetic enough to prevent blunders being committed.
Page me46.188

Could you not, after you have done with them, let us have for a week or two the 'stenographic reports' of debates†a in which our deputies have played a serious part? I will vouch for their return. Newspaper reports, as we have often seen, simply cannot be relied on and none of the deputies, not even Liebknecht, could be induced to send us speeches that do them no honour.
Page me46.188

31 January

More interruptions. Amongst others, little Hepner has been here, on his way to seek refuge in America, his purse and heart alike empty of content. A poor little chap in every respect, author of a well-intentioned pamphlet on distraint, the law governing bills of exchange, the Jewish question and postal reform, dull as dull can be, all the old Jewish stuff he turned out 10 years ago,†262 completely gone to rack and ruin; I almost felt like advising him to get baptised. Yet he provided me with the opportunity of finding out about the new imperial judicial code.†263 It really is unutterably infamous! All the dirty tricks of Prussian law combined with all the infamies of the Code Napoléon,†264 and without any of the latter's better side. The judge has freedom of decision in all spheres, being bound by nothing save — the Disciplinary Law which, in political cases, will undoubtedly, and indeed does, grant him power of 'discretion'. Thus — within the general German context — the judge inevitably becomes the executive official and tool of the police. Incidentally, here is a joke (originating no doubt from Windthorst) about Leonhardt, who is alleged to have said on his death-bed: 'Now I have avenged myself on Prussia; I've given it a legal system that's bound to bring it to its knees.'

Page Break me46.189
Page me46.189

Bürkli's interest-bearing mortgage certificates, also supposed to represent money, go back much further than that thoroughly addlepated, old Hegelian Pole, Cieszkowski.†a Similar schemes for the general good of mankind had already been adumbrated as far back as the founding of the Bank of England. Since there is no mention whatever of credit in the first volume of Capital (apart from the conditions governing simple debt), credit money admits of consideration here only, if at all, in its very simplest form (token of value, etc.) and in relation to its lowliest monetary functions, while interest-bearing credit money does not admit of consideration at all. Hence Bürkli is right in telling Schramm that none of these passages in Capital apply to my particular monetary paper; and Schramm is right when he proves to Bürkli from Capital that he, Bürkli, hasn't the faintest idea of the nature and function of money.†b This is not to say, however, that Bürkli's own particular monetary proposal is actually reduced to its own absurdity; that would require, besides general proof that this 'money' is incapable of fulfilling the most essential monetary functions, particular proof as to the functions which such paper might really be able to fulfil. Moreover, when Bürkli says, 'What concern have I with Marx? I stick to Cieszkowski' — the whole argument adduced by Schramm against Bürkli falls to the ground. — How fortunate that the Sozialdemokrat shouldn't have got mixed up in all this business! No doubt the whole hullabaloo will eventually die down of its own accord.
Page me46.189

That crises are one of the most powerful levers of political upheaval has already been pointed out in the Communist Manifesto and was expounded in the Neue Rheinische Zeitung Review up to and including 1848, not without the rider, however, that a recurrence of prosperity will in turn hamstring the revolutions and pave the way for the victory of reaction.†a Any detailed argument in support of this should take into consideration intermediate crises, some being of a more localised and some of a more specialised character; we are currently experiencing one such intermediate crisis which may be attributed entirely to swindle on the stock exchange; up till 1847 they were recurring middle terms, which is why, in my Condition of the Working Class,†b the cycle is still shown as a five-year one.

Page Break me46.190

Page me46.190

In France, there have been gross blunders on both sides. However, in the end Malon and Brousse, in their impatience to bring matters to a head and engineer the suspension of the Égalité (which is quite outside the competence of the Union Fédérative†265), have put themselves so clearly in the wrong that they are likely to suffer for it. Such bungling would be incomprehensible in cabalists as wily as Malon and Brousse, unless they felt that time was against them. For the Prolétaire is said to be on its last legs and, if it expires, they will have no paper at all while the others will have two.†c Hence the issue had to be decided while they still had a paper in which the resolutions were published. The scurrilities and pure fabrications they are now disseminating against Guesde, Lafargue, etc., and in particular Joffrin's concoction†d — not concocted by him, however, but by Brousse and Malon — are altogether in the style of the old Bakuninist Alliance,†67 and have awakened old memories in us. The Sozialdemokrat is absolutely right not to get involved until things have cleared up a bit, which they will, I think, before very long.
Page me46.190

I had also meant to write to Kautsky about the Poles,†224 but will have to drop that for today. Kindest regards,

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.190
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.191

112
ENGELS TO KARL KAUTSKY†140
IN ZURICH
Page me46.191
London, 7 February 1882

Dear Mr Kautsky,

I have at last got round to answering your letter of 8 November.†224
Page me46.191

One of the real tasks of the revolution of '48 (and the real as distinct from illusory tasks of a revolution are always carried out on the strength of that revolution) was the restoration of the oppressed and disunited nationalities of Central Europe in so far as these were at all viable and, in particular, ripe for independence. In the case of Italy, Hungary and Germany, this task was carried out by the executors of the revolution, Bonaparte, Cavour and Bismarck, in accordance with the circumstances obtaining at the time. There remained Ireland and Poland. Ireland need not be considered here; it is only very indirectly concerned with conditions on the Continent. But Poland lies in the middle of the Continent and keeping it partitioned is precisely the bond that continually re-cements the Holy Alliance†266 and hence Poland is of great interest to us.
Page me46.191

Now it is historically impossible for a great people to discuss this or that internal question in any way seriously so long as national independence is lacking. Prior to 1859 there was no question of socialism in Italy; even the republicans were few in number, although they constituted the most vigorous element. Not until 1861 did the republicans begin to expand,†267 subsequently yielding their best elements to the socialists. Similarly in Germany. Lassalle was on the point of giving up the cause for lost when he was lucky enough to be shot. It was not until 1866, the year that actually decided Little Germany's Greater Prussian unity,†268 that both the Lassallean and the so-called Eisenach parties†269 acquired any significance, and it was not until 1870, when the Bonapartist urge to interfere had been eliminated for good, that the cause gathered momentum. If we still had the old Federal Diet†270, where would our party be now? Similarly in Hungary. It wasn't until 1860 that it was drawn into the modern movement — sharp practice above, socialism below.†271
Page me46.191

Generally speaking an international movement of the proletariat is possible only as between independent nations. What little republican internationalism there was in the years 1830-48 was grouped round the France that was to liberate Europe, and French chauvinism was thus raised to such a pitch that we are still hampered at every turn by France's mission as universal liberator and hence by its natural right to take the lead (seen as a caricature in the case of the Blanquists but also much in evidence in that of e.g. Malon & Co.). In the International, too, the French not unnaturally took this view. They, and many others, had first to learn from events, and must still do so daily, that international co-operation is possible only among equals, and even a primus inter pares†a at most for immediate action. So long as Poland remains partitioned and subjugated, therefore, there can be no development either of a powerful socialist party within the country itself or of genuine international intercourse between Poles other than émigrés and the rest of the proletarian parties in Germany, etc. Every Polish peasant and workman who rouses himself out of his stupor to participate in the common interest is confronted first of all with the fact of national subjugation; that is the first obstacle he encounters everywhere. Its removal is the prime requirement for any free and healthy development. Polish socialists who fail to put the liberation of the country at the forefront of their programme remind me of those German socialists who were reluctant to demand the immediate repeal of the Anti-Socialist Law†16 and freedom of association, assembly and the press. To be able to fight, you must first have a terrain, light, air and elbow-room. Otherwise you never get further than chit-chat.

Page Break me46.192

Page me46.192

Whether, in this connection, a restoration of Poland is possible before the next revolution is of no significance. It is in no way our business to restrain the efforts of the Poles to attain living conditions essential to their further development, or to persuade them that, from the international standpoint, national independence is a very secondary matter when it is in fact the basis of all international co-operation. Besides, in 1873, Germany and Russia were on the brink of war†272 and the restoration of some kind of Poland, the embryo of a later, real Poland, was therefore a strong possibility. And if these Russian gents don't soon put a stop to their pan-Slav intrigues and rabble-rousing in Herzegovina,†273 they may well find themselves with a war on their hands, a war neither they, nor Austria nor Bismarck will be able to control. The only people who are concerned that the

Page Break me46.193
Herzegovina affair should take a serious turn are the Russian Pan-Slav Party and the Tsar; no one can really concern himself with the rapacious Bosnian riff-raff any more than with the idiotic Austrian ministers and officials who are presently pursuing their activities there. So even without an uprising, as a result, rather, of purely European conflicts, the establishment of an independent Little Poland would be by no means impossible, just as the Prussian Little Germany invented by the bourgeois owed its establishment not to the revolutionary or parliamentary methods they had dreamed of, but to war.
Page me46.193

Hence I am of the opinion that two nations in Europe are not only entitled but duty-bound to be national before they are international — Ireland and Poland. For the best way they can be international is by being well and truly national. That's what the Poles have understood in every crisis and proved on every revolutionary battleground. Deprive them of the prospect of restoring Poland, or persuade them that before long a new Poland will automatically fall into their laps, and their interest in the European revolution will be at an end.
Page me46.193

We, in particular, have absolutely no reason to impede the Poles in their necessary efforts to attain independence. In the first place they invented and put into practice in 1863 the methods of struggle which the Russians are now so successfully imitating (cf. Berlin und [St] Petersburg, Appendix 2)†274 and, in the second, they were the only reliable and capable military leaders in the Paris Commune.†275
Page me46.193

Come to that, who are the people who oppose the Poles' national aspirations? First, the European bourgeoisie in whose eyes the Poles have been utterly discredited since the 1846 insurrection with its socialist tendencies†276 and, secondly, the Russian pan-Slavs and those they have influenced, such as Proudhon, who saw this through Herzen's spectacles. But up till today few Russians, even the best of them, are free of pan-Slav tendencies and recollections; they take Russia's pan-Slav vocation for granted, just as the French do France's natural revolutionary initiative. In reality, however, pan-Slavism is an imposture, a bid for world hegemony under the cloak of a non-existent Slav nationality, and it is our and the Russians' worst enemy. That imposture will in due course disintegrate into the void, but in the meantime it could make things very awkward for us. A pan-Slav war, as the last sheet-anchor for Russian Tsardom and Russian reaction, is presently in preparation; whether it will actually materialise is a moot point, but if it does there is one thing of which we may be certain, namely that the splendid progress in the direction of revolution now being made in Germany, Austria and Russia itself will be totally disrupted and forced into different and quite unpredictable channels. At best, this would set us back by 3-10 years; in all likelihood it would mean one last respite for a constitutional 'new era'†277 in Germany and also, perhaps, Russia; a Little Poland under German hegemony, a war of retribution with France, renewed racial incitement and, finally, another Holy Alliance. Hence pan-Slavism is now more than ever our mortal enemy, despite — or perhaps just because of — its having one foot in the grave. For the Katkovs, Aksakovs, Ignatievs and Co. know that their empire will be gone for ever the moment Tsardom is overthrown and the stage taken by the Russian people. And hence this ardent desire for war at a moment when the treasury contains less than nothing and not a banker is willing to advance the Russian government so much as a penny.

Page Break me46.194
Page me46.194

That is precisely why the pan-Slavs have a mortal hatred of the Poles. Being the only anti-pan-Slav Slavs, they are consequently traitors to the sacred cause of Slavdom and must be forcibly incorporated into the Great Slav Tsardom of which the future capital is Tsarigrad, i.e. Constantinople.
Page me46.194

Now you may perhaps ask me whether I have no feeling of sympathy for the small Slav peoples and fragments thereof which have been split apart by those three wedges — the German, the Magyar and the Turkish — driven into the Slav domain? To tell the truth, damned little. The Czecho-Slovak cry of distress:

Boze! ... Ach nikdo není na zemi Kdoby Slavum (sic) spravedlivost cinil?†a has been answered by Petersburg, and the entire Czech national movement cherishes the aspiration that the Tsar should spravedlivost ciniti†b them. The same applies to the others — Serbs, Bulgarians, Slovenes, Galician Ruthenians (at least some of them). But these are aims of a kind we cannot support. Only when the collapse of Tsardom frees the national aspirations of these diminutive peoples from their entanglement in pan-Slav hegemonic tendencies, only then can we let them do as they please and, in the case of most of the Austro-Hungarian

Page Break me46.195

Slavs, I am sure that six months of independence will suffice to bring them begging for re-admittance. But in no circumstances will these little nationalities be granted the right they are presently arrogating to themselves in Serbia, Bulgaria and East Rumelia — of preventing, that is, the extension of the European railway network to Constantinople.
Page me46.195

Now as for the differences that have arisen between the Poles in Switzerland, these are émigré squabbles†224 such as are seldom of any consequence, least of all in the case of an emigration which will be celebrating its centenary in 3 years' time and which, owing to the urge felt by all émigrés to do, or at any rate plan, something, has given birth to plan after plan, one new so-called theory after another. But, as you will see from the foregoing, we are not of the same opinion as the Równo&sa;c people and, indeed, we told them as much in a message sent on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of 29 November 1830, which was read out at the meeting in Geneva.†a You will find a Polish version of it in the report (Sprawozdanie, etc. — Biblijoteka Równo&sa;ci: No. 1, Geneva, 1881), pp. 30 ff. The Równo&sa;c people have apparently allowed themselves to be impressed by the radical-sounding slogans of the Genevan Russians and are now anxious to prove that they are not open to the reproach of national chauvinism. This aberration, of which the causes are purely local and transitory, will blow over without having any appreciable effect on Poland as such, and refuting it in detail would be more trouble than it was worth.
Page me46.195

How the Poles, by the way, will sort things out with the White and Little Russians and Lithuanians of the old Poland, or with the Germans as regards the frontier is, for the time being, no concern of ours.
Page me46.195

Proof, by the way, of how little the workers, even in allegedly 'oppressed' countries, are tainted by the pan-Slav yearnings of the academics and bourgeois is provided by the splendid accord between German and Czech workers in Bohemia.
Page me46.195

But enough for now. Kindest regards from

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.195
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.196

113
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER†113

IN GENEVA
Page me46.196
London, 10 February 1882

Dear Old Man,

We had absolutely no idea that you were so seriously ill; all we knew was that you had been suffering from erysipelas and that's something that can be cleared up pretty easily. Had I had an inkling of how matters stood, I should have raised some money for you straight away, even though I myself was very short at the time and calls were being made on me from all sides. However, it's still not too late and I've therefore taken out a money order for you for four pounds = 100 frs 80 cts. of which you will doubtless have already been advised; because of an irregularity that cropped up here I wasn't able to write until today.
Page me46.196
Between ourselves, one might almost count it a blessing that Marx should have been so preoccupied with his own illness during his wife's last days as to prevent him being unduly preoccupied with his loss, both when it was impending and when it actually happened. Even though we had known for 6 months or more how matters stood, the event itself still came as a terribly hard blow. Marx left yesterday for the South of France†278; where he will go from there won't be definitely decided until he gets to Paris. Under no circumstances will he make for Italy first; at the start of his convalescence even the possibility of harassment by the police must be avoided.
Page me46.196
We have thought about your proposal†279 and take the view that the time has not yet come, though it soon will, to put it into effect. Firstly, a new, formally reorganised International in Germany, Austria, Hungary, Italy and Spain would only give rise to fresh persecution and ultimately leave one with the choice either of giving the thing up, or of carrying on in secret. The latter option would be a calamity on account of the inevitable passion for coups and conspiracies and the no less inevitable admittance of mouchards.†a Even in France the renewed application of the law banning the International,†280

Page Break me46.197
a law which has not been repealed — far from it — is by no means impossible. — Secondly, in view of the current wrangles between the Égalité and the Prolétaire, there's absolutely no counting on the French; we would have to declare ourselves for one party or the other and that, too, has its disadvantages. As individuals we are on the side of the Égalité, but shall take good care not to support them publicly just now after the succession of tactical blunders they have made, despite our express warnings. — Thirdly, the English are proving more intractable than ever at present. For 5 whole months I tried, through The Labour Standard, for which I wrote leading articles,†163 to pick up the threads of the old Chartist movement and disseminate our ideas so as to see whether this might evoke some response. Absolutely nothing, and since the editor,†a a well-meaning but feeble milksop, ended up by taking fright even at the Continental heresies I introduced into the paper, I called it a day.†b
Page me46.197

Thus, we should have been left with an International confined, apart from Belgium, exclusively to refugees, for with the possible exception of Geneva and its environs we couldn't even count on the Swiss — vide the Arbeiterstimme and Bürkli.†c It would, however, hardly be worth the trouble to set up a mere refugee association. For the Dutch, Portuguese and Danes wouldn't really improve matters either and the less one has to do with Serbs and Romanians the better.
Page me46.197

On the other hand the International does indeed still exist. In so far as it can be effective, there is liaison between the revolutionary workers of all countries. Every socialist journal is an international centre; from Geneva, Zurich, London, Paris, Brussels and Milan the threads run criss-cross in all directions and I honestly don't see how at this juncture the grouping of these small centres round a large main centre could give added strength to the movement — it would probably only lead to greater friction. But once the moment comes for us to concentrate our forces, it will, for that very reason, be the work of a moment, nor will any lengthy preparation be called for. The names of the pioneers in one country are known in all the others and a manifesto signed and supported by them all would make a tremendous impact — something altogether different from the largely unknown names of the old General Council. But that is precisely why such a manifesto should be saved up for the moment when it can really strike home, i.e. when events in Europe provoke it. Otherwise you will detract from its future effect and will simply have put yourselves out for nothing. But such events are already taking shape in Russia where the avant-garde of the revolution will be going into battle. You should — or so we think — wait for this and its inevitable repercussions on Germany, and then the moment will also have come for a big manifesto and the establishment of an official, formal International, which can, however, no longer be a propaganda association but simply an association for action. For that reason we are firmly of the opinion that so splendid a weapon ought not to be dulled and blunted during the comparatively peaceful days on the very eve of the revolution.

Page Break me46.198
Page me46.198

I believe that if you think the matter over again you will come round to our view. Meanwhile we both wish you a good and speedy recovery and hope to hear before long that you are quite all right again.

Ever your old friend,
F.E.

Page me46.198
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

114
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.198
Marseilles, 17 February 1882
Hôtel au petit Louvre,
Rue de Cannebiére

DEAR FRED,

I presume that Tussy dropped you a line yesterday. I had not originally intended to leave Paris until next Monday†a; since my state of health was rather not improving, I took at once the resolution of removing moving to Marseilles, and thence at once, on Saturday, to sail for Algiers.†278

Page Break me46.199
Page me46.199
In Paris, accompanied by my Johnny,†a I called upon but one mortal, namely Mesa. (In fact he, Mesa, sollicitierte†b me to chatter too much, in addition to which I returned to Argenteuil somewhat too late, ABOUT 7 O'CLOCK IN THE EVENING. I didn't sleep a wink all night.) I tried to persuade Mesa to ask his friends, notably Guesde, if they would be kind enough to postpone a meeting with me until my return from Algiers. But all that in vain. In fact, Guesde is so much on all parts assailed just now, that it was important for him to have an 'official' meeting on my side. After all, one was bound to concede that much to the party. Hence I arranged a meeting at the Hôtel de Lyon et de Mulhouse, 8 boulevard Beaumarchais, to which Guesde and Deville came with Mesa at ABOUT 5 in the afternoon. I first received them downstairs in the restaurant, having been accompanied there from Argenteuil (on Wednesday†c afternoon) by Tussy and Jennychen. Guesde was rather embarrassed on Jennychen's account BECAUSE HE HAD JUST [brought out] an acrimonious article against Longuet, ALTHOUGH SHE (Jennychen) DID NOT TAKE NO REGARD WHATEVER TO THAT INCIDENT. As soon as the young ladies had left, I d'abord†d went up to ma chambre†e with them, chatted there for ABOUT 1 HOUR, then DOWN — it being now time for Mesa to be off — to the restaurant where they still had leisure ENOUGH to empty a BOTTLE of Beauve with me. By 7 o'clock they'd 'all' gone. WITH ALL THAT, although I was in bed by 9 o'clock, a fiendish din of traffic without intermission until 1 o'clock, at which time (ABOUT 1 O'CLOCK) I had a vomissement,†f having again got too much engrossed in conversation.
Page me46.199
A fine day for the journey to Marseilles, and ALL RIGHT until just beyond the STATION at Lyons. First, 1 1/2 hours d'arrêt†g AT Cassis on account of the locomotive's DISTEMPER; then again the same mishap with the engine AT Valence, although this time the arrêt wasn't so long. Meanwhile it had turned bitter cold with a nasty BITING WIND. Instead of arriving some time before midnight, we did not reach [Marseilles] until after 2 o'clock in the morning; to some extent I was MORE OR LESS FREEZING, despite all my wrappings, the only antidote I found being 'alcohol' and I AGAIN AND AGAIN RESORTED TO IT. During the last quarter of an hour (if not more) in the exposed, cold and windswept gare de

Page Break me46.200
Marseille,†a there was one last épreuve†b in the shape of prolonged formalities before obtaining possession of one's LUGGAGE.
Page me46.200

Today it's sunny in Marseilles, but the wind itself not yet warm. Dr Dourlen advised me to stay at the above-named hotel, whence I shall leave for Algiers tomorrow (Saturday) at 5 in the afternoon. The office of the Paquebots á vapeur des Postes françaises†c is located here, in the very hotel at which I am staying, so that I was able to take a ticket (at 80 frs FIRST CLASS) for the paquebot†d Said straight away; one's BAGGAGE is likewise ENREGISTERED here, so that everything is as convenient as can be.
Page me46.200

Apropos. I [got] hold of a Prolétaire (L'Égalité is also SOLD here). Lafargue seems to me to be constantly fomenting further USELESS INCIDENTS — though maybe the DETAILS are far from exact. As to his characterising Fourier a 'Communist', he is now that they†e make fun of him obliged to explain in what sense he might have called Fourier as a 'Communist'. Such 'audacities' may be ignored, 'interpreted' or 'differently interpreted'; what is worse is that SUCH small FACTS BE SAVED at all. To my mind, he is far too long-winded.
Page me46.200

My best compliments to Laura; I shall write her from Algiers. There is one single man sufficient as patron; it is a long letter written by Longuet to his friend Fermé, who has successfully made his way from being an erstwhile deportee to Algeria (under Napoleon III) to the post of juge d'appel†f of Algiers. No question of passports and such like. Nothing is entered on the passengers' tickets save Christian and surnames.
Page me46.200

My compliments also to Lenchen†g AND THE OTHER FRIENDS.
Page me46.200

Addio.

OLD Moor

Page me46.200
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.201

ENGELS TO PYOTR LAVROV
IN LONDON
Page me46.201
[Postcard]

[London,] 18 February 1882
122 Regent's Park Road

My dear Mr Lavrov,

I am exceedingly sorry to have missed you this afternoon — however if, as I hope, this note reaches you tonight, I would ask you to be so good as to come to my house tomorrow, Sunday evening, at about 7 or 8 o'clock. You will find some friends there and we shall all be very pleased to see you.

Yours ever,
F. Engels

[On the side reserved for the address]

P. Lavrov, Esq.
13 Alfred Place
Tottenham Court Road
W.C.

Page me46.201
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Letopisi marksizma, Book V, Moscow-Leningrad, 1928

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.202

116
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.202
[Postcard, unsigned]

Alger,†a 21 February 1882
Hôtel d'Orient

Dear Fred,

I left Marseilles on Saturday 18 February at 5 in the afternoon aboard the Said, EXCELLENT STEAMER; the PASSAGE was a fast one, so that we had already reached Algiers by half past three in the morning on Monday (20 February).†278 However, it was a chilly crossing and, though the ship was equipped with every comfort, the 2 nights were sleepless ones for me owing to the diabolical noise of the engines, wind, etc., which were disturbing in the cabin.
Page me46.202

Here again, I found in store for me the same quid pro quo, mutatis mutandis†b as in the Isle of Wight.†234 This particular SEASON happens to be, for Algiers, exceptionally cold and wet, while Nice and Menton are presently luring away most of its visitors! I had in any case had some misgivings and more than once hinted at the possibility of starting off d'abord†c with the Riviera. However it would seem to be a fatalité.†d The good juge†e gave me a most friendly welcome yesterday; Longuet's letter had forewarned him the day before I arrived; he is calling on me today to consider future moves. Then I shall write at greater length. Kindest regards to all. Letters aren't dispatched every day to France and England.
Page me46.202

Write to me under my name, Aux soins de Monsieur Fermé, juge au tribunal civil,†f No. 37, Route Mustapha Supérieur, Alger.
Page me46.202
[On the side reserved for the address]

Fr. Engels, Esq.
122 Regent's Park Road,
Londres, N.W. Angleterre

Page me46.202
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.203

117
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†24
IN ZURICH
Page me46.203
London, 22 February 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

I am answering your letter straight away, 1. because of the increasing urgency of the pan-Slav business, and 2. because, now that Marx has left,†278 I shall have to set seriously to work again and shall no longer have time for such lengthy dissertations.

Page me46.203

The 'short-hand reports'†a will be returned today. Many thanks. Mostly rather dull, but I'm happy enough if it all passed off without any denial of principles or anything really discreditable happening. I should always be grateful if you could send me further consignments from time to time. I was much gratified to see that the shocking blunders perpetrated earlier in the Saxon Landtag had been retrieved.†118 I imagine the Sozialdemokrat is quite satisfied with the result of its intervention. Signing the statement must have been a bitter pill for Blos.†240 I am delighted that subscriptions should have passed the 4,000 mark and that the paper should find regular distribution in Germany, despite the police, etc. It is an incredible feat for a German paper that is banned. Before '48 such papers got in much more easily through having the support of the bourgeois and the booksellers, but no subscriptions were ever received. But in this case the workers actually pay — proof of their discipline and of the extent to which they live and have their being in the movement. I have no misgivings whatever about our German lads when things come to a head. They have stood the test splendidly on every occasion. And it's not they who are behaving like philistines but only their leaders who, from the start, have been prompted by the masses, not the masses by them.

Page me46.203

That my letter†b should have failed to convert you is quite understandable, since you were already in sympathy with the 'oppressed' southern Slavs. For after all, everyone of us, in so far as he has first gone through a liberal or radical phase, has emerged from it with these feelings of sympathy for all 'oppressed' nationalities, and I for one know how much time and study it took me to shake them off — but then it was for good and all.

Page Break me46.204

Page me46.204

Now, however, I must ask you not to ascribe to me opinions I have never expressed. I am in no way concerned with the official Austrian viewpoint represented for years by the Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung. Where it was right, it's out of date, and where it isn't out of date, it's wrong. I have absolutely no cause for complaint about the centrifugal movement in Austria. A 'bulwark against Russia' becomes superfluous the moment revolution breaks out in Russia, i.e. when some sort of representative assembly meets. As from that day, Russia will be busy with its own affairs, pan-Slavism will collapse like the nonentity it is and the Empire will begin to crumble. Pan-Slavism is simply an artificial product of the 'educated classes', of the towns and universities, the army and the civil service; it is unknown in the country and even the landed aristocracy is in such a fix that it would execrate any kind of war. From 1815-59, cowardly and foolish though its policy may have been, Austria was indeed a bulwark against Russia. To afford it yet another opportunity — now, on the eve of revolution in Russia — of setting itself up as a 'bulwark' would be tantamount to giving Austria a new lease of life, a new historical justification for its existence, and postponing the disintegration which inevitably awaits it. And in allowing the Slavs to come to power, Austria has, with true historical irony, itself declared that what has hitherto been its sole raison d'être has ceased to exist. Come to that, a war with Russia would, within 24 hours, put paid to Slav domination in Austria.

Page me46.204

You say that, as soon as the Slav peoples (always excepting the Poles!) have no further grounds for looking to Russia as their only liberator, pan-Slavism will be checkmated. That's easily said and it sounds plausible. But in the first place the danger of pan-Slavism, in so far as it exists, does not lie at the periphery but at the centre, not in the Balkans but in the 80 million slaves upon whom Tsarism draws for its army and its finances. Hence it is there that the greatest effort must be made and, indeed, has been made. And is it to be blighted by a war?
Page me46.204

Again, I do not propose to go into the question of how the smaller Slav nations have come to look to the Tsar as their only liberator. Let it suffice that they do so; we cannot alter the fact and it will rest at that until Tsarism has been smashed; if there's a war, all these interesting little nations will be on the side of Tsarism, the enemy of all bourgeois progress in the West. So long as this remains the case, I can take no interest in their immediate liberation here and now; they are as much our declared enemies as their ally and patron, the Tsar.

Page Break me46.205
Page me46.205

We must co-operate in the work of setting the West European proletariat free and subordinate everything else to that goal. No matter how interesting the Balkan Slavs, etc., might be, the moment their desire for liberation clashes with the interests of the proletariat they can go hang for all I care. The Alsatians, too, are oppressed, and I shall be glad when we are once more quit of them. But if, on what is patently the very eve of a revolution, they were to try and provoke a war between France and Germany, once more goading on those two countries and thereby postponing the revolution, I should tell them: Hold hard! Surely you can have as much patience as the European proletariat. When they have liberated themselves, you will automatically be free; but till then, we shan't allow you to put a spoke in the wheel of the militant proletariat. The same applies to the Slavs. The victory of the proletariat will liberate them in reality and of necessity and not, like the Tsar, apparently and temporarily. And that's why they, who have hitherto not only failed to contribute anything to Europe and European progress, but have actually retarded it, should have at least as much patience as our proletarians. To stir up a general war for the sake of a few Herzegovinians, which would cost a thousand times more lives than there are inhabitants in Herzegovina, isn't my idea of proletarian politics.
Page me46.205

And how does the Tsar 'liberate'? Ask the peasants of Little Russia whom Catherine liberated from 'Polish oppression' (pretext — religion) only to annex them later on. And what does all this Russian pan-Slav imposture amount to? The capture of Constantinople, that's all. Nothing else would act so powerfully on the religious traditions of the Russian peasant, inspire him to defend the holy city of Tsarigrad and give a new lease of life to Tsarism. And once the Russians are in Constantinople, farewell to Bulgarian and Serbian independence and liberty — the little brothers (bratanki) would soon realise how much better off they had been even under the Turks. It calls for the most colossal naïveté on the part of the said bratanki for them to believe that the Tsar is out for their good rather than his own.

Page me46.205

You say that a Greater Serbia would be as good a bulwark against Russia as Austria. As I have already said, the 'bulwark' theory generally has ceased to hold any water for me since a revolutionary movement gained strength in Russia. I have also said that I look forward with pleasure to Austria's disintegration. But this brings us to the quality of these exiguous nations which is, after all, a consideration when it comes to sympathising with them.

Page Break me46.206
Page me46.206

In 2-4 generations' time and after general European upheavals, Greater Serbia will certainly be feasible; today, having regard to the cultural level of its elements, it as certainly is not.
Page me46.206

1. The Serbs are divided into 3 denominations (the figures are taken from Šafarík, Slovanský Národopis and are applicable to 1849): Greek Orthodox 2,880,000; Catholic, including the so-called Croats who, however, speak Serbian, 2,664,000, minus the Croats, 1,884,000; Mohammedans 550,000. Where these people are concerned, religion actually counts for more than nationality, and it is the aim of each denomination to predominate. So long as there's no cultural advance such as would at any rate make toleration possible, a Greater Serbia would only spell civil war. See enclosed Standard.
Page me46.206

2. The country has 3 political centres — Belgrade, Montenegro, Agram. Neither the Croats nor the Montenegrins wish to submit to the supremacy of Belgrade. On the contrary. The Montenegrins and your friends, the aborigines in Krivosíje and Herzegovina, would uphold their 'independence' vis-á-vis Belgrade or any other central government — Serbian or otherwise — just as much as they would vis-á-vis the Turks or the Austrians. That independence consists in demonstrating their hatred of the oppressor by stealing cattle and other valuable chattels from their own 'oppressed' Serb compatriots as they have done for the past 1,000 years, and any attack on their right of rapine is regarded as an attack on their independence. I am enough of an authoritarian to regard the existence of such aborigines in the heart of Europe as an anachronism. And even if these little folk had had a standing as high as Sir Walter Scott's vaunted Highlanders, who were also really shocking cattle thieves, the most we could do is condemn the manner in which they are treated by present-day society. If we were at the helm, we too should have to put an end to the Rinaldo Rinaldini-Schinderhannes business which, by long tradition, these laddies indulge in. And so would the government of Greater Serbia. Here too, then, Greater Serbia would mean a revival of the struggle now being conducted by the Herzegovinians, and hence civil war involving all the highlanders of Montenegro, Cattaro and Herzegovina.
Page me46.206

On closer consideration, then, Greater Serbia does not appear anything like as simple and straightforward a matter as pan-Slavs and liberals á la Rasch would have us believe.

Page Break me46.207
Page me46.207

Well, go on sympathising with these aborigines as much as you like; there's certainly no denying them a sort of poetic radiance and, in fact, they do still produce folk songs that closely resemble the old Serbian ones (which are very fine); I shall even send you an article from The Standard by way of proof. But the fact remains that they are the tools of Tsardom, and there's no room in politics for poetical feelings of sympathy. And if the rebellion of these laddies threatens to unleash a general war that would make a complete hash of our revolutionary situation, they and their right of cattle stealing will have to be mercilessly sacrificed to the interests of the European proletariat.
Page me46.207

Come to that, if Greater Serbia were to materialise it would only be an enlarged version of the principality of Serbia. And what has the latter achieved? Set up an educated bureaucracy on the Austrian model, consisting of chaps from Belgrade and other towns who have been to university in the West, particularly Vienna, and, knowing nothing of the conditions governing communal ownership among the peasants, make laws after the Austrian pattern that fly in the face of those conditions so that masses of peasants are impoverished and expropriated, whereas in the days of the Turks they enjoyed full autonomy, grew rich and paid fewer taxes.
Page me46.207

The Bulgarians have depicted themselves in their folk songs, a collection of which, made by a Frenchman, has recently appeared in Paris.†a Fire plays a major role here. A house burns down, the young woman is burnt to death because, instead of his wife, her husband chooses to save his black mare. Another time a young woman saves her jewellery and leaves her child to burn. If, by way of exception, there is a noble and courageous act, it is invariably performed by a Turk. In what other part of the world would you find such a beastly lot?
Page me46.207

Incidentally, if you take a look at a passable philological map of the district (e.g. Šafarík's, in the above-mentioned book, or Kiepert's of Austria and the countries of the Lower Danube 1867†b) you will find that the liberation of these Balkan Slavs is not an altogether simple affair and that, with the exception of Serbian territory, there are pockets of Turks all over the place, and a Greek fringe along the coast, not to mention Salonika which is a Spanish Jewish town. True, the worthy Bulgarians are now rapidly dealing with the Turks in Bulgaria and East Rumelia by slaughtering them, driving them out and burning down their houses over their heads. Had the Turks adopted the same course, instead of allowing them more autonomy and fewer taxes than they have at present, the world would no longer be troubled with a Bulgarian question.

Page Break me46.208
Page me46.208

As regards war, you would seem to me to have le coeur un peu trop léger.†a If war breaks out, it will be easy for Bismarck to make it look as though Russia were the aggressor: he can wait, but the Russian pan-Slavs can't. But Germany and Austria once committed in the East, one would have to be a poor judge of Frenchmen, and particularly Parisians, not to anticipate that there would instantly arise a chauvinistic clamour for retribution which would reduce to silence the peaceful majority of the people and cause France to appear yet again as the aggressor; or that the chauvinism then prevailing would very soon demand the left bank of the Rhine. That this would soon involve Germany in a struggle for survival so that there, too, patriotic chauvinism would completely regain the upper hand, seems to me self-evident. So far, all the prospects are against us. But once a war is under way, there is no knowing what will be the outcome of this, the first such European conflict since 1813-15, and I would be the last man to wish for it. If it does come, however, then it can't be helped.
Page me46.208

But now for the other side of the coin. In Germany we have a situation that is drifting ever more rapidly towards revolution and must before long push our party to the fore. We ourselves needn't lift a finger, just let our opponents do the work for us. On top of which a new era†277 is impending with a new, liberalising, highly irresolute and wavering Emperor,†b who is exactly cut out to be a Louis XVI. All that is wanting is a timely impulse from without. This will be afforded by the situation in Russia where the onset of the revolution is only a question of months. Our people in Russia have virtually taken the Tsar prisoner,†281 have disorganised the government and shattered popular tradition. Even without any other major coup, a collapse must ensue in the very near future, and the process will go on for years, as it did between 1789 and '94. Hence it will allow ample time for repercussions in the West, more notably Germany, so that the movement will gradually gather momentum, unlike 1848, when reaction was already in full swing throughout Europe by 20 March. Never, in short, has there been so magnificent a revolutionary situation.

Page Break me46.209
Only one thing can spoil it: as Skobelev himself said in Paris, only war with another country could get Russia out of the morass into which it is sinking.†282 That war would repair all the damage our people, at the cost of their lives, have done to Tsarism. It would be enough at any rate to rescue the Tsar from his captivity, to expose the social revolutionaries to the general fury of the mob, to deprive them of the support they now get from the Liberals and undo all they have achieved by their sacrifices; everything would have to be begun all over again under less favourable circumstances. But a play of this kind scarcely admits of a second performance and even in Germany — upon that you may depend — our people will either have to join in the patriotic ululations, or draw down upon their heads a furore by comparison with which the one that followed the assassination attempts†120 was mere child's play; and Bismarck's riposte to the recent elections would be of quite a different order from the one he made then with his Anti-Socialist Law.†16
Page me46.209

If peace is maintained, the Russian pan-Slavs will be bilked and will soon have to retreat. Whereupon the Emperor†a can at most try one last throw with the old bankrupt bureaucrats and generals who have already once been on the rocks. That could last for a month or two at the outside, after which there would be no recourse save to call on the Liberals — i.e. a National Assembly of some kind and that, if I know my Russia, would mean revolution á la 1789. And then you go and suggest I want war! Not on your life, even if it means the demise of 200 noble robber nations.

Page me46.209

But enough of that. And now for Bürkli. I haven't read his pamphlet†b and have mislaid it, but shall look and see if I can find it in Marx's house or mine. So I can't say exactly what he is after.
Page me46.209
(25 February)

I have just been hunting high and low at Marx's and couldn't find it. With our division of labour, specialised questions of this kind fall to Marx's share and, because of his illness, we haven't even been able to discuss the matter.
Page me46.209

I assume that Bürkli permits every Zurich real property owner to take out a mortgage of this kind on his property, and that the relevant certificate is supposed to circulate as money. In this way the amount of money in circulation is dictated by the amount which the real property in question is worth, and not by the far smaller amount that would suffice for circulation. So even at this stage:

Page Break me46.210
Page me46.210

1. Either they are non-redeemable certificates, in which case they depreciate in accordance with the law expounded by Marx†283;
Page me46.210

2. Or they are redeemable, in which case the portion over and above what is needed for circulation returns to the bank for redemption and ceases to be money, which, of course, means that the bank must tie up capital.
Page me46.210

Now a substitute for money which is interest-bearing and of which, therefore, the value fluctuates day by day is, if only for that reason, an unsuitable means of circulation; not only does one first have to agree the price of the commodity in real money, but also the price of the paper. The people of Zurich would have to be worse businessmen than I suppose if, the certificates being redeemable, they didn't all promptly surrender them to the bank for redemption, and go back to using only the old, convenient, non-interest-bearing money. Which means that the cantonal bank would have tied up in mortgages its own capital as well as everything it could borrow and would have to cast round for new sources of working capital.
Page me46.210

But, if non-redeemable, they simply cease to be money. Metallic or good paper money is drawn from the outside world which, luckily, is a little bit larger than the Canton of Zurich, and that's what people use, for no one will accept these dreary certificates as money and in that case they are, as you rightly say, no better than Brandenburg mortgage bonds. And if the government insists on forcing the public to accept them as money, it is in for a surprise.

Page me46.210
This between ourselves; if you make use of it, please don't mention my name since, as I have said, I have not read the little pamphlet or had time to read up the subject in the classic economic texts; but if one tries to criticise such things out of one's head, just like that, there's no guaranteeing that one won't make blunders. At all events, the thing is nonsensical.
Page me46.210
Marx arrived in Algiers†278 on Monday morning, a place I and the doctors had always wanted him to go to, though he himself wasn't very keen. He has met a judge in the tribunal civil†a there, a former deportee of Bonaparte's, who has made a close study of communal ownership among the Arabs and has offered to enlighten him on the subject.

Page Break me46.211
Page me46.211
Kindest regards both to yourself and Kautsky.

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.211
First published in full, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

118
ENGELS TO PYOTR LAVROV
IN LONDON
Page me46.211
[London,] 23 February 1882
122 Regent's Park Road, N.W.

My Dear Friend,

The Financial Reform Almanach 1882 gives the following addresses:
Dilke, W. Ashton, 1 Hyde Park Gate, S.W.
Ditto Sir Charles, 76 Sloane St, S.W.
Page me46.211
When I got home from your place I found a letter from Dr Donkin (the one who treated Hartmann some time ago, and also the Marx family) in which he says:

*'I had a letter from Hartmann a few days ago (dating from 14 Huntley St, Bedford Sq.) asking me if he might come and see me. I answered his letter directly — giving him the choice of two days — but have heard nothing of him.
Page me46.211
'In case my letters have miscarried will you tell me if you know anything about him. If you see him perhaps you will tell him that I will see him any morning here (60 Upper Berkeley St., W.) between 11 and 12 o'clock.'*
Page me46.211
Would you be so kind as to pass on the preceding lines to Hartmann? Since Donkin's letter failed to arrive, I fear there may be some mistake as to the number, of which I am not sure, since I know of it only from Donkin. Hence it is impossible for me to communicate with Hartmann direct or with any certainty, and that is why I am asking you to act as intermediary, the more so since you say it is quite close to your place.

Page Break me46.212
Page me46.212
I am replying to Donkin,†284 saying that I hope to be able to tell him something more precise within the next few days; if possible, could you let me have some further information concerning this matter on Sunday evening?

Yours ever,
F. Engels

Page me46.212
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Letopisi marksizma, Book V, Moscow-Leningrad, 1928

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

Published in English for the first time

119
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.212
[Postcard]

[Algiers,] 23 February 1882

Dearest Child,

The good weather has set in; live in a most comfortable Villa, out of the fortifications of Algiers, on the hills; only thing I want now is tranquillity, hope soon to be a 'better' man again.
Page me46.212
Kisses to all the children; compliments to Longuet.

Yours most devoted
Old Nick
Page me46.212
[On the side reserved for the address]

Madame Charles Longuet
11, Boulevard Thiers, Argenteuil prés Paris (France)

Page me46.212
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.213

120
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.213
Algiers, 1 March 1882
Hôtel Pension Victoria,
Mustapha Supérieur,
Boulevard Bon Accueil

(Letters can now be sent to me direct at the above address)

DEAR FRED,

The telegram†284 I sent you anticipated my POSTCARD,†a as the latter would have caused somewhat unnecessary anxiety. The fact is that thanks to an accumulation of unfavourable circumstances of a petty nature (incl. the sea crossing), I have been frozen to the marrow, my corpus delicti†b having landed at Algiers on 20 February.
Page me46.213
December was an atrocious month in Algiers, January fine, February cold when not also damp. I struck the 3 coldest days of the said last month, the 20th, 21st and 22nd of February. No sleep, no appetite, a bad cough, somewhat perplexed, not without an occasional bout of profunda melancolia, like the great Don Quixote. AT ONCE THEN back to Europe, no go, what with the faux frais,†c on top of which the prospect of another 2 nights in one of the cabines, one's brain tortured by the racket from the engines! Or again, certain escape from the quid pro quo†d by setting off at once for Biskra, right next to the Sahara Desert? But difficult, considering the fact that the means of communication or transport demand a further journey of 7 to 8 days and, according to the advice of someone familiar with the conditions, no small undertaking for a pro nunc†e invalid in view of possible INCIDENTS before arrival in Biskra!

Page me46.213

Anyway, as the thermometer on the aprés-midi†f of 22 February indicated fair weather and I had already spied out the Hôtel-Pension Victoria on the day of my arrival in company with the good JUDGE

Page Break me46.214
Fermé, I left the Grand Hôtel d'Orient (also sleeping there THE ABOMINABLE PHILOSOPHICAL RADICAL Ashton Dilke — BY THE BY, to le Petit Colon and other petits journaux Algériens†a every Englishman IS A LORD, EVEN Bradlaugh FIGURES HERE AS LORD Bradlaugh) with bagage to une des collines en dehors de la fortification, du côté de l'Est de la ville.†b Magnificent position here, from my chambre†c the bay of the MEDITERRANEAN, the port of Algiers, villas climbing up the collines as in an amphitheatre (des ravines au dessous des collines, d'autres collines au dessus)†d; further away, des montagnes,†e among those visibles being the snowy crests derriére Matifou, sur les montagnes de Kabilie, des points culminants du Djurdjura.†f (All the aforementioned collines are of limestone.) At 8 o'clock in the morning there is nothing more magical than the panorama, the air, the vegetation, a wonderful mélange of Europe and Africa. Every morning — at 10 or 9-11 or THEREABOUTS MY PROMENADE between des ravines et les collines situées au dessus de la mienne.†g
Page me46.214

WITH ALL THAT one lives on nothing but dust. IN FIRST INSTANCE only FROM 23-26TH FEBR. REALLY EXCELLENT CHANGE; but now (and nevertheless I'm still so frozen that EVEN THEN the only difference between my clothing in the Isle of Wight†234 and my clothing in the city of Algiers is that in the villa I have up till now simply replaced the rhinoceros greatcoat with my light greatcoat, no other change having been made so far) there began (and will doubtless last for some 9 days reckoned from the 27TH Feb.) the so-called tempête, c.a.d. le tapage du vent sans de tonnerre et sans d'éclairs,†h DANGEROUS AND TREACHEROUS TIME MUCH FEARED EVEN BY THE NATIVES. So in fact only 3 really fine days up till now.
Page me46.214

Meanwhile, my cough got worse FROM DAY TO DAY, le crachement abominable,†i little sleep, above all a certain nasty feeling that my left side is once for all deteriorated by the perish, and my intellectual state most dejected. Thus I summoned Dr Stephann (best Algiers doctor). I had two interviews yesterday and to-day. What to do? I am just go[ing] to Algiers to make prepare his prescriptions given; they are, after he had very seriously examined me, 1. collodion cantharidal†j

Page Break me46.214a

Page Break me46.215
applied with a pinceau†a; 2. arseniate de soude†b in a specific quantity of water; 1 tablespoon of same at every mealtime; 3. au cas de besoin,†c especially if the cough comes on at night, a tablespoonful of a MIXTURE of codéine and julep gommeux.†d He is coming again in a week's time; as to my BODILY EXERCISES, has ordered me to keep within very moderate limits; no real intellectual work except some reading for my distraction. So in fact I shan't be back AT London A BIT (RATHER A LESS) sooner! Hence a man ought never [to] delude himself by too sanguine views!
Page me46.215
I must break off as I have to go to the chemist in Algiers. *By the by, you know that few people more averse to demonstrative pathos; still, it would be a lie [not] to confess that my thought to great part absorbed by reminiscence of my wife, such a part of my best part of life! Tell my London daughters†e to write to Old Nick†f instead of expecting him to write himself first.
Page me46.215
How is Pumps going on in that serious work of man-creating? Give her my best compliments.
Page me46.215
Give my compliments to Helen,†g ditto Moore, Schorlemmer.
Page me46.215
Now, old good fellow,

Yours,*
Moor
Page me46.215
Apropos! Dr Stephann, like my dear Dr Donkin, does not forget — the cognac.

Page me46.215
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.216

121
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.216
[Postcard]

[Algiers,] 3 March 1882

Dear FRED,

Your letter dated 25 February†284 arrived yesterday together with the Daily News CUTS (O.N.†a tragicomical secret of politics and passion in England). I trust Tussy will at last stop playing fast and loose with her health; that Cacadou, alias Laurachen, continues to flourish, for she is subjected to a great deal of physical exertion. As yet no reply from Paris.
Page me46.216
The tempête — c'est ici l'expression sacramentale†b — has been going on since 26 February though always with VARIABLE ASPECTS.
Page me46.216
On 2 March confined to the house FOR THE WHOLE DAY in common with all my fellow-lodgers; pouring rain from EARLY MORNING from a SKY of a colour reminiscent of London, grey as grey; this time however the squalls were accompanied by thunder and lightning; at 4 o'clock in the afternoon an azure sky AGAIN; later on a really lovely moonlit evening. One short spell alternating with another throughout the day, now a rise in temperature, now a drop. Meanwhile I resumed inter alia the painting of my skin; that very night A REMARKABLE IMPROVEMENT SETTING IN. — This morning, 3 March, painting first task of the day; despite wind not intimidated, from 9 o'clock to ABOUT quarter TO 11 out for a stroll in the balmy sea air which I found MOST DELIGHTFUL; got back just before the wind worked itself into a fury again. I shall be SUMMONED TO déjeuner†c IN A FEW MINUTES and am making use of this vital moment to send these FEW LINES TO YOU.

Your
Moor

Page Break me46.217
Page me46.217
[On the side reserved for the address]

Fr. Engels
122 Regent's Park Road,
London, N.W., Angleterre

Page me46.217
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

122
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET†166
IN ARGENTEUIL

Page me46.217
[Algiers,] 16 March 1882
Hôtel Victoria (Go on writing to me here, aux soins de†a Fermé)

My Dear Child,

After receiving your letter through Fermé, I sent a messenger to the Hôtel d'Orient to make inquiries there as well; he was handed a letter for me from you dated 24 February.
Page me46.217
I shall now give you a short account of the state of my health.
Page me46.217
Since my cough had become more persistent, with severe expectoration, insomnia, etc., I sent for Dr Stephann (who also looks after some of my other fellow-lodgers) and have thus been under his care since 26 February when he first examined me. He is a very shrewd and determined man. He found that, as a result of the unfortunate concatenation of events from the time I left Paris until now, my left side, which had been weakened by pleurisy, was functioning abnormally. The chief antidote consists in vésicatoires†b (the drawing off of fluid by painting the left side of my back and the lefthand side of my chest with cantharidic collodion) which works well in my case, and also a 'soothing' cough mixture; lastly, an arsenical preparation (as tasteless as water) to be taken after every meal. In so far as the weather permitted, I was to continue taking a gentle stroll each morning.
Page me46.217
Unfortunately (had the weather been more favourable, my violent coughing would [undoubtedly]†a have gone of its own accord) I began to spit blood on 6 March but, after 8 and 9 March, had a really serious [haemorrhage] with some residual pain until the 12th, and on the 13th all trace of haemorrhage had gone. So this disagreeable episode lasted a week; Dr Stephann intervened energetically, forbidding all movement (walks, needless to say); likewise ALMOST all TALK; hot footbaths, etc., along with drastic medicaments. During this time the treatment with vésicatoires, cough TONICS, etc., continued and did, in fact, reduce the coughing quite amazingly. Also, the weather has gradually begun to change although not yet ALTOGETHER comme il faut.†b From my hill-top villa (Hôtel Victoria) I have before me the prospect of the bay and, to one side, villas rising in an amphitheatre —, [finest air],†a even without a stroll, [wafting] past the little balcony in front of my own and the adjoining chambres,†c or again in the verandah, the latter giving access to the first floor. The doctor will not permit me to resume my strolls until he has again examined the corpus delicti.†d Be it noted that latterly not only have I regained my appetite, but have at last managed to snatch some sleep. (From the 16th of February, IN FACT SINCE THE NIGHT IN THE hôtel in Paris, I had suffered from insomnia unremittingly until the moment referred to above.)

Page Break me46.218
Page me46.218
*Take now all in all, the upshot is, as I too reported to London,†e that in this foolish, ill-calculated expedition, I am now just arrived again at that standard of health when I possessed it on leaving Maitland Park.†f I must, however, say that many visitors here too passed, and are passing still through the same trial. Since 10 years Alger had not such a failure of the winter season. Myself had had some doubts; there was the experience of the Isle of Wight†234 and other corners, but Engels and Donkin fired each other mutually into African furor, neither one nor the other getting any special information, considering that in regard to temperature this year was extraordinary. I had now and again by innuendo given to understand to begin at least by Mentone (or Nizza) as Lavrov had received from Russian friends very favourable news, but all this was ruled down by my sanguine good old Fred†g who, I repeat it, I say it amongst you and myself, may easily kill some one out of love.

Page me46.218

I must tell you that in this Villa-Hôtel, the two ladies, its managers, did everything in my service, no care nor attention neglecting.

Page Break me46.219
And as to the operations relating to the vésicatoires, a young pharmacien, Mr Casthelaz (with his mother he is here as a patient ever since December) is so kind as to tattoo me, then open the* blisters filled with fluid, then put linen on the somewhat rough skin, etc. He does all such things in the most genteel way, and offers these voluntary services in the most delicate manner.
Page me46.219

Nothing could be more magical than the city of Algiers, unless it be the campagne†a outside that city in summertime [and] before; it would be like the Arabian Nights, particularly — given good health — with all my dear ones (in particular not forgetting my GRANDSONS†b) about me. I have been delighted each time you have sent me news of the staunch little fellows; Tussy, too, has written saying that she can't stop thinking about the children, and longs to have them with her again. [It is] hardly likely that I shall be able to leave this place before the month is out, for I must firstly complete the full course of treatment prescribed by Dr Stephann, and not till then (always supposing that ALL THEN AS TO WEATHER ALTOGETHER SETTLED) shall I actually be able to commence the actual fresh air treatment.
Page me46.219

I have seen nothing of the Justice (polemic with Citoyen), nor indeed any of the Paris papers save for the Égalité. I was very pleased to learn from your letter that Tussy had found a tactful solution to the catastrophe.†285 If and when Lissagaray launches his Bataille, you will, I presume, send me the early numbers; I do not believe in a great result; mais qui vivra verra.†c
Page me46.219

During my very first days here (while I was still at the Hôtel d'Orient), the GOOD Fermé 'over-walked' me — I mean, set me traipsing up hill and down dale, and likewise OVERTALKED me. All this I put at once an end to this, making him understood that I was an invalid. But he meant very well, and now he knows rest, SOLITUDE and silence to be duties that are incumbent on me as a citizen.
Page me46.219

Kisses to all the children. Regards to Longuet. And many kisses to yourself, dear child,

From your OLD NICK

Page me46.219
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.220

123
MARX TO PAUL LAFARGUE†286
IN PARIS
Page me46.220
[Algiers,] Monday, 20 March [1882]

My dear Paul,

Your kind letter of 16 March was delivered to me today (20th) so that it seems to have taken far less time to get here than is usual for letters from London.
Page me46.220
First of all, my gallant Gascon, 'what does Mustapha supérieur†a refer to?' Mustapha is a proper name like John. If you leave Algiers by the rue d'Isly, you see a long street in front of you. On one side of it, in the foothills, rise Mauretanian villas surrounded by gardens (one of these villas is the Hôtel Victoria); on the other side — along the road — houses are spread out in descending terraces. All of this together is called Mustapha supérieur: Mustapha inférieur†b begins at the incline of Mustapha supérieur and stretches down to the sea. Both Mustaphas form a single commune (Mustapha) whose mayor (this gentleman bears neither an Arab nor a French name but a German one) communicates with the inhabitants from time to time by means of official notices — a very soft regime, as you see. New houses are constantly being constructed in Mustapha supérieur, old ones are being demolished, etc., but although the workers engaged in this activity are healthy people and local residents they go down with fever after the first three days. Part of their wages, therefore, consists of a daily dose of quinine supplied by the employers. The same practice can be observed in various places in South America.
Page me46.220
My dear augur. You are so well informed that you write: 'You must be consuming all the French newspapers that are sold in Algiers'; in actual fact I don't even read the few newspapers which the other hotel residents in the Victoria receive from Paris; my political reading is entirely limited to the telegraphic announcements in the Petit Colon (a small Algerian paper similar to the Parisian Petit-Journal, the Petite République Française, etc.). That's all.

Page me46.220
Jenny wrote that she was sending Longuet's articles which you mention too, but I still haven't received them. The only newspaper that I receive from London is L'Égalité, although you can't call it a newspaper.

Page Break me46.221
Page me46.221
What a strange fellow you are, St Paul! Where did you get the idea or who told you that I should 'rub my skin with iodine'? You will interrupt me and say that this is a mere trifle, but it does reveal your method of the 'material fact'. Ex ungue leonem.†a In reality, instead of 'rubbing my skin with iodine' I have to have my back painted with cantharidic collodion to draw out the fluid. The first time I saw my left side (chest and back) treated in this manner, it reminded me of a kitchen garden in miniature planted with melons. Since 16 March when I wrote to Engels†284 there has not been a single dry place either on my back or my chest (the latter is also being treated) on which the operation could be repeated; this cannot happen now before the 22nd.
Page me46.221
You say: 'A letter of invitation is enclosed which will make you laugh.' Es regular.†b But how do you expect me to laugh when the 'enclosed' letter is still in your hands? When the opportunity arises, I shall remind Mr Fermé of his former comrade — the Proudhonist Lafargue. At present, while Doctor†c forbids me to go out, I am using the time to refuse frequent visits and prolonged conversations.
Page me46.221
The rains continue as before. The climate is so capricious; the weather changes from one hour to the next, going through every phase or suddenly leaping from one extreme to the other. However, there are signs of gradual improvement, but we shall have to wait. And just to think that from the moment of my departure for Marseilles and right up to the present there has been the finest weather in both Nice and Menton! But there was this insistent idea — for which I was not responsible — of the African sun and the wonder-working air out here!
Page me46.221
Last Saturday we buried one of the residents of the Victoria, by the name of Armand Magnadére, in Mustapha supérieur; he was quite a young man sent here by Parisian doctors. He worked in a Paris bank; his employers continued to pay his salary in Algiers. To please his mother they arranged by telegraph to have his body exhumed and sent to Paris — all at their expense. Such generosity is seldom met with even among people charged with 'other people's money'.

Page Break me46.222
Page me46.222
My sleep is gradually returning; someone who has not suffered from insomnia cannot appreciate that blissful state when the terror of sleepless nights begins to give way.
Page me46.222

Greetings to my dear Cacadou†a and to all the others.

Yours,
K. Marx

Page me46.222
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Printed according to the magazine

Translated from the Russian

Published in English in full for the first time

124
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me46.222
[Postcard]

[Algiers,] 23 March, Thursday [1882]

DEAR FRED,

Just now — after BREAKFAST — MY HELP†b lanced, etc., the dense throng of greatly distended blisters produced on one side of my chest by yesterday's embrocation; after which [he told] me to idle away another hour or two in bed; so here I am scribbling a few lines on this postcard, as there's no time to be lost; for a messenger from this house is leaving for Algiers at an unusually early hour in order to take letters to the post office there, etc. (There's no post to France on Mondays and Wednesdays.)
Page me46.222
Ever since Tuesday (21 March) another storm has been raging night and day save for the usual INTERVALS — thunder, not much lightning, downpours in the evening and particularly at night, today in the morning as well. As the storm approached on Tuesday afternoon, presaged by a SKY so overcast, pitch-black and lowering, I was particularly struck by the rôle the TRULY AFRICAN SIROCCO played in the said storm. — Dr Stephann here yesterday; EXAMINATION satisfactory; progress; still peccans†a [are] a place at the very bottom of one side of my chest and a corresponding place on my back. Next week (i.e. ABOUT Wednesday or Thursday of next week), my HELP is to refrain from embrocating those spots; so Stephann is specially reserving this for himself.

Page Break me46.223
Page me46.223
Regards to all.

Your
Moor
Page me46.223
[On the side reserved for the address]

Fr. Engels
122 Regent's Park Road,
London, N.W., Angleterre

Page me46.223
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

125
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.223
[Algiers,] Monday, 27 March 1882

My Dear Child,

I received your letter to-day (27 March); you know how delighted I am always to hear of you. My reports to you did not conceal the worst from you; so you may also feel quite sure that I simply tell the truth in announcing you that since the date of my last letter to you†b my state of health is progressively improving. There is no longer insomny (the worst of all), nor want of appetite, nor any violent character of cough, the latter indeed much subdued. Of course the vésicatoires†a can, because of their intense action, only once a week be renewed; so the process of the healing of the membranes (the essential tissue of the organ has not at all suffered) on the left side wants some time. Of course the most unsteady weather, with sudden changes, storms, heats, colds, rain, in fact only a few good intervals, — the steady seasonable air warm and 'sec'†b is still the great desideratum. When we just, like yesterday, had caught the decisive turning point — it was a beautiful day, and I had a promenade, — but to-day sky grey (with a nuance noirâtre†c), rain pouring down, wind howling. People here get it quite tired, for, it must not again and again be repeated: this such weather since December (inclus.) quite anormous in Algier. The thing was to inform oneself before starting on such a chasse aux oies sauvages.†d

Page Break me46.224
Page me46.224

Entre nous†e: Though in the Isle of Wight†234 the weather was unfavourable, but still my health improved so greatly that people wondered when myself returning to London. But, then, I had tranquillity at Ventnor; at London, on the contrary, Engels' excitement (Lafargue, too, a quack, thought 'walking', free air etc. were all I did want) in fact has upset me: I felt, I could not longer stand it; hence my impatience to get from London away on any condition whatever! People may kill some one out of real most sincere love; with all that nothing more dangerous in such cases for a reconvalescent!
Page me46.224

As I told you,†f dear child, I have had the good chance of having met with well-meaning, kind and unpretending people (French-Swiss and unmixed French, no German nor English in my Villa-Hôtel). Mr Maurice Casthelaz functions as volunteer under the orders of Dr Stephann; no Nym†g more careful or attentive. Hence, my child, do not worry yourself as to my fancied helpless situation. Enough of male and female helps; and, on the other hand, it is the privilege of a 'patient' to be silent, to withdraw, etc., whenever I prefer the solitude or take no notice of the company.
Page me46.224

Generally I have altogether neglected the French, English etc. daily press; I read only the telegraphic news. What I had desired, f.i., was Longuet's articles on the gréve†h (Lafargue wrote me greatly praising those articles). As to Massard's sottise,†i I know to that moment nothing save what you have written me.

Page Break me46.225
Page me46.225

Write to Hirsch to send me his Adam-Contribution.†287 What I would like, to get durch Wünschenkappe†a on a brilliant day here over Johnny; what would my little darling wonder at Maures,†b Arabs, Berbers, Turks, niggers, in one word this Babel and costumes (most of them poetic) of this oriental world, mixed with the 'civilised' French etc. and the dull Britons. Kiss also my sweet Harry, the noble Wolf, and the grand Pa†c!
Page me46.225

And now farewell, my best child; also my compliments to Longuet.

Yours,
Old Nick
Page me46.225

As to any working, is still out of the question; not even the correction of the Capital for a new edition.†d

Page me46.225
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.225
[Algiers, 28-] 31 March 1882

DEAR FRED,

28 March: A maddeningly wet day early this morning — when I finished writing a short epistle to Tussy.†284 This had already gone off, however, when a storm developed which, for the first time, put on a good performance; not only howling wind, torrents of rain and thunder, but incessant lightning INTO THE BARGAIN. This went on until late at night, accompanied as usual by a considerable drop in temperature. Interesting, the varying colours of the waves in the lovely, almost elliptical bay; the surf snowy white, and the sea beyond changing from blue to green.

Page Break me46.226
Page me46.226
29 March (Wednesday): Maddening drizzle today; no less maddening the moaning gusts of wind; temperature, cold and damp.
Page me46.226
Today, shortly before déjeuner†a (takes place at a QUARTER PAST or perhaps half past 11) Dr Stephann arrived for the specific purpose of 'devoting' himself to the painting of those places at the very bottom of my back and chest he had specially signalled out and reserved for his own attack. Beforehand, as on every visit, a thorough examination; by far the largest part of my left side was accorded much better STATUS; the aforementioned nethermost spots, presently giving forth no more than a low murmur in place of Helmholtz's musical note, can only be put to rights by slow degrees (anything speedier being hampered by the bad weather). Today, for the first time, — no doubt because he thought me far enough on the road to recovery for him to speak his mind — Stephann told me that I had already suffered a rechute†b of a most serious kind by the time I arrived in Algiers. The épanchements†c could only be controlled by recourse to vésicatoires,†d and I had made better progress than might have been foreseen. He added, however, that I should have to treat myself very carefully for years. When I leave Algiers, he will give me a written diagnosis — intended in particular for my London doctor.†e People of my age, he said, should be careful not to experiment too often with rechutes. A few hours after déjeuner the tableau†f on my skin began to come to life in grim earnest; like someone who feels his epidermis has contracted and he himself is seeking to burst out of it; agony all night long; I had been absolutely forbidden to scratch.
Page me46.226
30 March: At 8 o'clock in the morning my ASSISTANT-DOCTOR, my helpmate,†g appeared at my bedside. It transpired that, as a result of spontaneous movements, the blisters GENERALLY had burst; a veritable flood had taken place during the night — linen, flannel, night-shirt soaked. So the painting had had the desired effect on the places under attack. My kind HELP at once proceeded to bandage me, not only so as to prevent the flannel's rubbing, but also to draw off what remained of the fluid. This morning (31 March) Mr Casthelaz discovered that the SUCTION was at last nearing its end and the process of drying-out almost complete. This being so, I shall probably be able to undergo a second application within the same week (beginning 29 March). Tant mieux.†h

Page Break me46.227
Page me46.227
30 March (yesterday), the weather turned nice and warm at about midday, for which reason I strolled out onto the balcony; later I slept a little to make up for the restless night, as I shall also do today, since the strict avoidance of scratching keeps one awake at night even though, as during the night of 30 to 31, it's not agonising.
Page me46.227
Weather today (31 March) uncertain; no rain yet, at all events; might turn relatively 'fine' towards midday, as it did yesterday.
Page me46.227
There's nothing further to add to the health bulletin; quite satisfactory on the whole.
Page me46.227
Have received [a letter] from Tussychen today.
Page me46.227
Apropos, a short while ago she sent me the enclosed letter; I can't make out the signature; you will be able to. At all events a strange phenomenon, a Quedlinburg lawyer with a Weltanschauung of his own! But one thing I can't make out: Has the copy of the chap's 'book' intended for me arrived at Maitland Park,†a or does he want to have my exact address first so as to ensure that his book gets there safely? If the first, Tussy should acknowledge receipt of his book, if the second, send him my 'safe' address.
Page me46.227
Mon cher,†b like other FAMILY MEMBERS, you, too, will have been struck by my mistakes in spelling and syntax, and bad grammar; I never recall these — my absent-mindedness being still very great — until after the event. SHOWS YOU there's something in the saying sana mens in sano corpore.†c No doubt this will mend itself BY AND BY.
Page me46.227
The tocsin pour déjeuner†d has just sounded and this little note must accordingly be got ready for the messenger to Algiers. So my love to one and all.

Your
Moor

Page me46.227
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.228

127
ENGELS TO HENRY MAYERS HYNDMAN
IN LONDON
Page me46.228
[London, circa 31 March 1882]

Dear Sir,

I thank you for the pamphlet†a you have sent me. I am very glad that glorious old Tom Spence has been brought out again.
Page me46.228
I shall be very happy to make your personal acquaintance as soon as you shall have set yourself right with my friend Marx whom I see you can now afford to quote.

Yours truly,
F.E.

Page me46.228
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1931

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

128
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me46.228
[Postcard]

[Algiers,] Tuesday, 4 April 1882

DEAR FRED,

Have received your postcard†284; Laurachen's letter dated 29 March has also arrived.
Page me46.228
My congratulations to Pumps.†288
Page me46.228
I'm progressing well on the whole but the weather is making an April fool of me.

Page Break me46.229
Page me46.229

On 31 March, Friday afternoon — a few hours before I DISPATCHED my letter to you†a — Fermé called; he told me inter alia of a secret vouchsafed to him by an Algerian meteorologist, namely that next week the weather would d'abord†b be very wild for 3 days on account of the sirocco, after which there would be 3-4 wet days but finally a normal spring would step into the breach, booted and spurred. And anyone who doesn't believe it is mistaken.
Page me46.229

Meanwhile Saturday (1 April), as well as Monday (3 April), was warm (a bit 'too' CLOSE) but the wind (no sirocco yet) confined me to my balcony on account of the swirls of dust; by contrast, the morning of 2 April (Sunday) was so fine and inviting that I went for a 2 hours' stroll.
Page me46.229

Last night a piping wind; rain at ABOUT 5 o'clock this morning; dry since 8 o'clock, sky overcast, continual squalls. Yesterday evening wonderful moonlight on the bay. I can never stop feasting my eyes on the sea in front of my balcony.
Page me46.229

Give my best regards to Jollymeyer,†c ditto the others.

Your
Moor
Page me46.229
[On the side reserved for the address]

Fr. Engels
122 Regent's Park Road,
London, N.W. (Angleterre)

Page me46.229
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.230

129
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.230
[Algiers,] 6 April 1882

My Sweet Child,

Just now judge Fermé brought me your letter d.d. March 31; I am always delighted at your letters, but whenever, my dear child, did you find the time for writing them? I think often anxiously at your little household, limited to the services of this queer fish of Emily, and the four little boys†a alone would absorb the whole working time of a superior servant.
Page me46.230

Fermé handed me also a few days ago the promised numbers of the Justice (ci-inclus†b Hirsch's elucubrations reproduced from Madame Adam's Revue†287). Longuet's articles on the 'gréves'†c are very good. En passant. He says somewhere that Lassalle did only invent the words (not the law itself developed by Ricardo, Turgot, etc.†289). In fact, however, he, Lassalle, borrowed, to German 'cultured' people well known, expression of Goethe who himself had modified Sophocles' 'ewige unwandelbare Gesetze'†d into 'ewige eherne Gesetze'.†e
Page me46.230

Fermé had to sit opposite to me in my 'chambre',†f silent, reading, until I had finished a letter to Tussy (from her I had the same day received a letter, ditto one from Engels) to be ready for the messenger to Algiers.
Page me46.230

I expect Dr Stephann to-day. If he comes, I should be able to report on his examination, before despatching these lines you tomorrow morning. Meanwhile the progress of my health goes on satisfactory, though slowly for somebody eager to be again active and to drop that invalid's, stupid métier. All this delay is due to this violent Algerian distemper, altogether quite anormous, never heard of since Fermé's 12 years long sojourn here. The weather remains fidgety, fitful, capricious; April weather, from sunny changing suddenly into rainy, from hot to cold, chilly, from a sky diaphane†g to scowling, almost black; from the dry atmosphere to being heavy with aqueous vapours; in one word, the weather far from being 'settled' or having subsided to what here may be considered the average 'normal' Algerian 'spring' character. However, if the wind blows not violently, if there be no rain, the April's early hours were pleasant, so that I could indulge my morning promenades to-day, yesterday, and the day last before yesterday; thus I enjoyed three consecutive morning promenades one or two hours long.

Page Break me46.231

Page me46.231

I am just interrupted by a noise rising from the little, in terraces mounting little garden (ein rotblühender Garten†a) that forms the avenue to our Verandah (behind it the first étage†b of our Villa), while my chambre on the second étage (and 5 other ones) opens upon the little gallery over the Verandah, both of them looking at the sea before and from all sides to a charming panorama. Well, the noise called me upon the gallery, and how he would laugh, at my side, so heartfully, so delightfully, that little Johnny, below him in the garden a real pitch dark negro, dancing, playing a small fiddle, beating his long iron castagnettes, writhing his body into plastic grimaces and folding his face into broad humorous grins. These Algerian Negroes were formerly in general slaves of Turks, Arabs, etc., but were emancipated under the French régime.
Page me46.231

Well, there looks down behind him, the negro, another figure, in a dignified manner and rather condescendingly smiling at the blackie's exhibition. This is a Maure (anglice Moor, germ. Mohr); en passant the Maures are called the Arabs in Algeria, a small minority of them, withdrawn from the desert and their communities, dwelling in the towns at the side of the Europeans. They are taller than the average French measure, oval faces, noses aquiline, eyes large and brilliant; hairs and beards black, their skin's colour running over an échelle†c from almost white to darkly bronze. Their costumes — even if in tatters — elegant and graceful, a culotte†d (or a mantle), a rather toga of thin white wool, or a capot á capuchon†e; for their cover of the head (for which the capuchon serves also in unfavourable (too hot etc.) weather) a turban or a piece of white mousseline, wound round their culottes; generally they leave their legs naked, the feet also, but more rarely they wear pantoufles†f of yellow or red maroquin.
Page me46.231

Even the poorest Maure surpasses the greatest European comedian as to the 'art de se draper' dans son capot,†g and to show natural, graceful, and dignified attitudes, whether walking or standing (if they ride on their mules, or asses, or exceptionally on horses, — always throwing their both legs on some side down, instead of a European taking his horse between his both legs — then they offer the image of indolence).

Page Break me46.232
Page me46.232

Well, the said Maure — behind the negro in our garden — cries out for sale of 'oranges' and 'cocks' (incl. hens), a strange combination of these articles vendible. Between the Maure, majestical even then, and the dancing grinning nigger there struts an animal — a most vain paon†a (belonging to one of our co-pensionnaires†b) with its wonderfully blue throat and most adorned long tail. At this trio, how my Johnny's laughter I should like to hear ring!
Page me46.232

It is now 4 o'clock p.m. (during part of the afternoon, I had of course some conversation with Fermé, having brought me your letter, then later on he removed himself to Algiers). The rain pours down: the sudden lowering of the temperature most disgusting. My best compliments to Dr Dourlen!
Page me46.232
7 April 1882

Raining through the whole night; this morning is sky covered, but no rain; pleasant air, but too saturated with watery vapours. I had an hour's promenade (9-10 a.m.), doubtful whether not surprised by rain — but none yet. As Dr Stephann came not yesterday nor the day before, I wrote him to-day morning, but at all events these lines, in order to be despatched still to-day, cannot await the Doctor's examination. He will not appear before 5 o'clock afternoon. You see, it is a good sign, that the Dr neglects me a little; in other words, he is no longer anxious to strictly repeat his visits in court intervals.
Page me46.232

How I shall feel happy when returning to my grandsons and their excellent Maman! I am not at all inclined here to prolong my sojourn longer than the Dr considers it absolutely necessary. Many kisses from your

Old Nick
Page me46.232

The inclosed cut from a German-American paper Engels sent me; it is an amusing criticism of the newest 'Teutsche Bedientenpoesie'.†c I hope Longuet tries to understand it.

Page Break me46.233
Page me46.233

Dear child, I had already sealed this letter, but was forced to reopen it. Dr Stephann came a bit earlier than expected. The fresh examination led him to conclude — and I am very pleased to be able to tell you this — that my left side has in the meantime healed almost as well as the right one.†290

Page me46.233
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

130
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.233
[Algiers,] 8 April†a (Saturday) 1882

DEAR FRED,

At 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon I was examined by Dr Stephann. Despite the changeable weather, which had again brought on a persistent cold, he was very satisfied; found that the épanchement†b low down (to the left of my chest) had almost completely disappeared; the one on my back (low down on the left) being rather more stubborn. Yesterday he gave this a special lambasting by painting it with collodion cantharidal.†c The result was most acute pain and, thanks to the 'painting', a sleepless night (from 7 to 8 April), but this morning there has also been a MOST EFFECTIVE PUMPING OF WATER from the blisters that have formed. So I have no doubt that this offending spot will also capitulate in the very near future. My ASSISTANT-DOCTOR, Mr Casthelaz, had to work away for half an hour in my flourishing watermelon plantation, after which I was made to lie in bed until déjeuner†d at half past eleven; for after bandaging the drawing off, drop by drop, of any residual fluid works best in that position.
Page me46.233

On the other hand Stephann found my cough somewhat worse (only relatively, however, for the cough had reached a nadir), a consequence of the absurd weather; for 4 days this week the mornings were fine enough for walks; since yesterday afternoon it has never stopped raining; in the night and today THE RAIN ASSUMED THE 'caractére torrentiel'; today there has been a feeble attempt at lighting the fire in the dining-room, but these fireplaces don't in fact seem to exist for that purpose, BUT ONLY FOR SHOW'S SAKE.

Page Break me46.234
Page me46.234
After déjeuner I retired for a nap AT 2 O'CLOCK to make up in part for last night, but by some infernal chance the courts are on vacation this week and next. So my plan was thwarted by the otherwise most amiable JUDGE Fermé who didn't release me until ABOUT 5 p.m. when dinner time was approaching. Fermé told me amongst other things that during his carriére on the bench a form of torture has been used (and this happens 'regularly') to extract confessions from Arabs; naturally it is done (like the English in India) by the 'police'; the judge IS SUPPOSED TO KNOW NOTHING ABOUT ALL OF IT. On the other hand, he says that when, for example, a murder is committed by an Arab gang, usually with robbery in view, and the actual miscreants are in the course of time duly apprehended, tried and executed, this is not regarded as sufficient atonement by the injured colonist family. They demand INTO THE BARGAIN the 'pulling in' of at least half a dozen innocent Arabs. But this is resisted by the French judges and particularly the cours d'appel,†a though now and again the life of an individual, isolated judge may be threatened by the colonists if he does not provisionally consent (his competence extends no further) to having a dozen innocent Arabs locked up for suspected murder, burglary, etc., and involving them in the investigation. However we are aware that when a European colonist dwells among the 'lesser breeds', either as a settler or simply on business, he generally regards himself as even more inviolable than handsome William I. Still, when it comes to barefaced arrogance and presumptuousness vis-á-vis the 'lesser breeds', to a grisly, Moloch-like obsession with atonement, the British and Dutch outdo the French.
Page me46.234
Pumps' FAMILY MISSION shows great promise,†288 as opposed to Hyndman's political mission which might be regarded as problematical. It serves the laddie right that your note†b should have annoyed him, especially since he took these liberties with me only because he was counting on my own inability, for 'considerations of propaganda', to compromise him in public.†291 He knew that well enough.

Page Break me46.235
Page me46.235
Scandalmonger Bodenstedt and Friedrich Vischer-Sewer-Aesthete are the Horace and Virgil of William I.†292
Page me46.235
Apropos. The Kölnische Zeitung's article on Skobelev you sent me is most interesting.
Page me46.235

This note won't leave today (Saturday), for there are no 'paquebots'†a at all to Marseilles on Mondays, Wednesdays or Saturdays; but by way of exception a paquebot leaves Algiers on a Sunday at 1 p.m. and letters for it must be delivered to the post office by 11 o'clock in the morning (Sunday); the Hôtel Victoria, Algiers, despatches a MESSENGER with the letters early on Sunday mornings. On the other days, when there is a paquebot from Algiers to Marseilles, departure is at 5.30 in the afternoon.
Page me46.235
But I wanted to get these lines off by tomorrow, since Dr Stephann's last examination was so especially favourable.
Page me46.235
Best wishes to everyone.

Your
Moor

Page me46.235
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

131
ENGELS TO PYOTR LAVROV
IN LONDON
Page me46.235
[London,] 10 April 1882
122 Regent's Park Road

My dear Lavrov,

I am returning the proofs,†293 for which I thank you. I should have done so earlier had I not hoped to see you last night and to say Hristos, voskres li on?†b
Page me46.235
Would you be so kind as to lend me the German manuscript of the preface for a day or two? The Sozialdemokrat has asked us to send it to them and, since the thing has appeared in the Narodnaya volya†a (to which we are proud to find ourselves contributors), there can no longer be any objection.

Page Break me46.236

Yours sincerely,
F. Engels
Page me46.236
Our ideas seem to me to have been very well rendered.

Page me46.236
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Letopisi marksizma, Book V, Moscow-Leningrad, 1928

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

Published in English for the first time

132
ENGELS TO BERTHOLD SPARR†294
IN LONDON
Page me46.236
[Draft]

[London,] 12 April 1882

Dear Sir,

I am not acquainted either with you or with the Mr K. Schmidt you refer to. If you mean Mr K. Schneidt, the anarchist, he will be able to get you into the club in Rose Street†295 and obtain assistance for you. In view of the way in which the people on the Freiheit have laid into the Social-Democratic Party in Germany,†296 I hardly feel called upon to give the adherents of that tendency a helping hand. However I do not know which tendency you belong to. The German Club, which sides with the great party in Germany, is, as anyone will tell you, at 49 Tottenham Street†297 and I find it inconceivable that both these clubs should let a fugitive party member starve to death. — In view of the great distress brought about among the members of the great Social-Democratic Party by police persecution in Germany, my resources will scarcely permit me to support, in addition, adherents of other, opposing tendencies. If, however, the Tottenham Street society is prepared to do something for you, I shall be pleased to make a contribution.

Page Break me46.237

Yours very truly

Page me46.237
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

133
ENGELS TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE
IN HOBOKEN
Page me46.237
[Postcard]

[London, 13 April 1882]

Dear Sorge,

Have posted to you today such Égalités as have so far appeared. More to follow. Marx is in Algiers; had a recurrence of pleurisy but has now almost completely got over it. Will have to take very great care of himself next winter. Trust your letter will arrive soon. What is your son†a doing? Kindest regards.

Your
F.E.
Page me46.237
[On the side reserved for the address]

F.A. Sorge, Esq.,
Hoboken, N.Y.
U.S. America

Page me46.237
First published abridged in Briefe und Auszüge aus Briefen von Joh. Phil. Becker, Jos. Dietzgen, Friedrich Engels, Karl Marx u.A. an F.A. Sorge und Andere, Stuttgart, 1906 and in full in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.238

134
MARX TO LAURA LAFARGUE†166
IN LONDON
Page me46.238
[Algiers,] Thursday, 13 April 1882

Darling Cacadou,

I reproach myself for not having written to you again until now, not that there's anything special to report from here. How often do I not think of you — at Eastbourne,†298 beside my Jenny's†a sick-bed, and during your faithful daily visits so cheering to that crosspatch, OLD NICK. But you should know, dear child, that this week and last were Fermé's Easter vacation; he lives in the rue Michelet (as part of the route Mustapha supérieur†b is called) at the foot of the hill from which the Hôtel Victoria looks down. It's only a stone's throw away for him, although he has to 'clamber' since there's no proper path leading up to it. And in fact he has latterly been visiting me assiduously, thus frustrating the best of resolutions in regard to afternoon letter-writing. — Otherwise not an unwelcome guest, MR Fermé, nor devoid of humour. After I had given him some Citoyens and Égalités to read, he arrived chuckling not a little over Guesde's 'terrorism of the future' [which is to go on] until — this anticipated in heavy type — the last bourgeois oppressor has been guillotined out of existence. Fermé is not fond of Algiers whose climate doesn't suit either him or his family (often visited by fever, etc.) although its members are all of them 'des indigénes' á commencer par Madame l'épouse.†c Above all, however, his salary as a judge is hardly sufficient for even the most modest way of life. Living in a colonial capital is always expensive. But one thing he does admit — in no town ELSEWHERE, which is at the same time the seat of the central government, is there such laisser faire, laisser passer†d; police reduced to a bare minimum; unprecedented public sans gêne†e; the Moorish element is responsible for this. For Mussulmans there is no such thing as subordination; they are neither 'subjects' nor 'administrés'†f; no authority, save in politica,†g something which Europeans have totally failed to understand. Few police in Algiers, and such as there are for the most part indigénes. And yet, with such a medley of national elements and unscrupulous characters, frequent clashes are inevitable, and it is here that the Catalonians live up to their old reputation; the white or red belts they wear, like the Moors, etc., outside their coats and not, like the French, beneath their clothing, often conceal 'bodkins' — long stilettos which these sons of Catalonia are not slow to 'employ' with equal impartiality against Italians, Frenchmen, etc., and natives alike. Incidentally, a few days ago a gang of forgers was apprehended in the province of Oran, amongst them their chief, a former Spanish officer; their European agency, it now transpires, is in the capital of Catalonia — Barcelona! Some of the laddies were not arrested and escaped to Spain. This piece of news, and others of a similar kind, derives from Fermé. The latter has received 2 advantageous offers from the French government; firstly, a transfer to New Caledonia where he would, at the same time, be responsible for introducing a new legal system, salary 10,000 frs (he and family to travel there gratis and, on arrival, be given free official accommodation); or, secondly, to Tunis, where he would likewise occupy a higher magisterial rank than here, and under far more favourable conditions. He has been given a certain period in which to make up his mind; will accept one or the other.

Page Break me46.239
Page me46.239
From Mr Fermé to the weather is a natural transition, since he freely heaps imprecations on the same. — Since Easter Monday (incl.) I have not missed a single morning stroll, although only yesterday (12th) and today have been spared the caprices of April. Yesterday, bien que nous subissions le léger siroco et, par conséquent, quelques coups de vent, ce fut le maximum du beau temps: á 9 heures le matin (le 12) le température á l'ombre fut de 19.5°, et celle au soleil, de 35°.†a In spite of having gone for a walk in the morning (12 April), I visited Algiers in the afternoon in order to take a look at the Russian ironclad, Peter the Great, which had arrived in the harbour there a few days before.

Page me46.239

The official meteorological office has forecast intense atmospheric disturbances for 15-16 April (when there'll be orage†b), 19, 21, 25, 27, 29 and 30 April; nevertheless, the weather during the remainder of April will on the whole be fine; at the same time it is feared that in May, to make up for the absence of a true Algerian spring (which did not begin till yesterday), summer will arrive all at once and with it unbearable heat. HOWEVER THAT MAY BE, I do not, as corpus vile,†a feel inclined to serve as an experimental station for the weather. In view of the altogether abnormal character of the past 4 1/2 months, God knows WHAT ALGERIA MAY HAVE IN STORE. Large numbers of shrewd folk (amongst them l'illustre†b 'Ranc') departed from the African shore day before yesterday. I shall only stay until Dr Stephann has declared my left side to be in good order again, apart, of course, from the scar well known to the doctissimi†c Drs Donkin and Hume, left by an earlier attack of pleurisy. What has been tiresome here so far is the constant recurrence of my cough, even if WITHIN MODERATE LIMITS; withal, much boredom.

Page Break me46.240

Page me46.240

Interruption of the most argeeable kind: KNOCKS AT THE DOOR; Entrez!†d Madame Rosalie (ONE OF THE SERVING SPIRITS) brings me a letter from you, dear Cacadou, and, from the good Gascon,†e a long letter of which the paper, like the envelope, already bears the official stamp: 'L'Union Nationale'.†299 This time he seems to have pulled it off! Ce n'est pas une de ces entreprises patronées par Mr Ch. Hirsch!†f On the other hand, to be sure, the prospect of my Cacadou's departure looms closer! But not just yet, I trust. Also, I regard it as some compensation that AUNTY Cacadou should represent so great a gain to Jennychen and her children†g; anyway, with Paris so close, there's no need to spend the whole year in London. — Apropos. Has Lafargue sent the next instalment of the article to Petersburg? (I don't know what became of the first consignment.)†300 It's most important not to lose the vantage point of Petersburg; it will gain in importance daily! Also for anyone who sends despatches there.

Page me46.240

Second interruption: It is 1 O'CLOCK P.M., and I have promised to visit the 'Jardin du Hamma' ou†h 'Jardin d'Essai' with Madame Casthelaz, son fils,†i and one of our other fellow pensionnaires,†j Madame Claude (of Neufchâtel). We have to be back BEFORE DINNER (6 O'CLOCK P.M.), later than which EVERY EFFORT AT WRITING NEVER AS YET DARED UPON BY ME. So no more till tomorrow. Simply by way of a supplement to the useful knowledge of Cacadou I allow myself to remark, that on that very Hamma took place the landing of 24,000 soldiers under the commandment of Charles V, emperor, (or Carlos I, according to the Spaniards) on 23 October 1541†301; 8 days later he had to ship the beaux restes de son armée détruite sur les vaisseaux échappés á la tempête du 26, et ralliés á grand' peine par Doria, á Matifou. Ce dernier lieu oú finit la baie d'Alger c.á.d. — le cap Matifou†a — OPPOSITE, ON THE EAST, TO ALGIERS, IS TO BE ESPIED, par des bonnes lunettes,†b BY MYSELF FROM Hôtel Victorias GALLERY.

Page Break me46.241
Page me46.241
Vendredi,†c 14 April

*I commence this letter at the moment when I have a few lines to be added to the foregoing, that is to say at about 1 o'clock p.m. The day ended yesterday as fine as that of the 12th. Both the evenings 12 and 13 (about 8 hours p.m.) were warm — quite exceptional this — but cool (relatively) at the same time, hence really delightful. This morning the warmth a little more 'heavy', and just since two hours the wind blows violently, probably the 'orage' predicted yesterday from 14-15.
Page me46.241
Yesterday at 1 o'clock p.m. we went down to Inferior Mustapha whence the tram brought us to Jardin Hamma or Jardin d'Essai, the which used for 'Promenade Publique' with occasional military music, as 'pépiniére'†d for the production and diffusion of the indigenous vegetables, at last for the purpose of scientific botanical experiments and as a garden of 'acclimatation'. — This all encloses a very large ground, part of which is mountainous, the other belonging to the plain. In order to see more minutely, you would want at least a whole day, and beside being somebody with you a connaisseur, f.i. like M. Fermé's friend and old Fourieriste, M. Durando, professor of botanics, who is the leader of a section of the 'Club Alpin Français' on its regular Sunday excursions. (I very much regretted that my bodily circumstances and the Dr. Stephann's strict prohibition till now did not yet allow me to share in these excursions, having 3 times [been] invited thereto.)
Page me46.241
Well, before entering the 'Jardin d'Essai' we took coffee, of course in the free air, a Mauresque 'café'. The Maure prepared it excellently, we were on a bank. On a rough table, in inclined positions, their legs crossed, half a dozen Maure visitors [...]†e were delighted in their small 'cafétiéres',†f (everyone gets one of his own) and together playing at cards (a conquest this on them of civilisation). Most striking this spectacle: Some these Maures were dressed pretentiously, even richly, others in, for once I dare call it blouses, sometime of white woollen appearance, now in rags and tatters — but in the eyes of a true Musulman such accidents, good or bad luck, do not distinguish Mahomet's children. Absolute equality in their social intercourse, not affected; on the contrary, only when demoralized, they become aware of it; as to the hatred against Christians and the hope of an ultimate victory over these infidels, their politicians justly consider this same feeling and practice of absolute equality (not of wealth or position but of personality) a guarantee of keeping up the one, of not giving up the latter.* (Nevertheless, they will go to rack and ruin WITHOUT A REVOLUTIONARY MOVEMENT.)

Page Break me46.242

Page me46.242

*In regard to the plain part of the Jardin d'Essai I remark only: It is cut by three great longitudinal 'allées'†a of a wonderful beauty; opposite to the principal entry is the 'allée' of the platenes [platanes]†b; then the 'allée des palmiers',†c ended by an oasis of immense 72 'palmiers', limited by the railway and the sea; at last the 'allée' of the magnolia and a sort of figues (ficus roxburghi). These three great 'allées' are themselves cut by many others crossing them, such as the long 'allée des bambous' astonishing, the 'allée' of 'palmiers á chanvre',†d the 'dragon[n]iers',†e the 'eucalyptus' (blue gum of Tasmania), etc., (the latter are of an extraordinarily quick vegetation).

Page me46.242

Of course, these sorts of* allées cannot be reproduced in European 'Jardins d'acclimatation'.†f

Page me46.242

During the afternoon there was a concert of military music in a large open space encircled by plane trees; the conductor, a non-commissioned officer, wore ordinary French uniform, whereas the musicians (common soldiers) wore red, baggy trousers (of oriental cut), white felt boots buttoning up to the bottom of the baggy trousers; on their heads a red fez.

Page me46.242

While on the subject of the garden, I did not mention (though some of these were very pleasing to the nose) orange trees, lemon — ditto, almond trees, olive trees, etc.; nor, for that matter, cactuses and aloes which also grow wild (as do wild olives and almonds) in the rough country where we have our abode.

Page me46.242

Much though this garden delighted me, I must observe that what is abominable about this and similar excursions is the ubiquitous chalky dust; though I felt well in the afternoon and after coming home and during the night, my cough was nonetheless rather troublesome, thanks to the irritation caused by the dust.

Page Break me46.243

Page me46.243

I am expecting Dr Stephann today, but as I cannot put off the despatch of this missive, I will send a report to Fred†a later on.

Page me46.243

Finally, as Mayer of Swabia used to say, let us take a little look at things from a higher historical perspective. Our nomadic Arabs (who have, in many respects, gone very much to seed while retaining, as a result of their struggle for existence, a number of sterling qualities) have memories of having once produced great philosophers, scholars, etc., which, they think, is why Europeans now despise them for their present ignorance. Hence the following little fable, typical of Arab folklore.

Page me46.243

A ferryman is ready and waiting, with his small boat, on the tempestuous waters of a river. A philosopher, wishing to get to the other side, climbs aboard. There ensues the following dialogue:

Philosopher: Do you know anything of history, ferryman?

Ferryman: No!

Philosopher: Then you've wasted half your life!
And again: The Philosopher: Have you studied mathematics?
Ferryman: No!
Philosopher: Then you've wasted more than half your life.
Page me46.243
Hardly were these words out of the philosopher's mouth when the wind capsized the boat, precipitating both ferryman and philosopher into the water. Whereupon, Ferryman shouts: Can you swim?
Philosopher: No!
Ferryman: Then you've wasted your whole life.
That will tickle your appetite for things Arabic.
With much love and many kisses.

OLD NICK
Page me46.243
(BEST COMPLIMENTS TO ALL)

Page me46.243
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 35, Moscow, 1964

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.244

135
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN
IN ZURICH
Page me46.244
London, 17 April 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

As soon as I heard from Lavrov that the preface†a had appeared in the Narodnaya Volya†302 I asked for a copy of the original,†b but he had left it in his desk in Paris; however, he said he would write. Then I went to Marx's and searched in vain for the brouillon.†c Finally I got Lavrov to let me have a copy of the Russian translation so that, if the worst came to the worst, I could retranslate it myself; I feared, as indeed happened, that some Russian or other would see to this. Lavrov has just sent me the enclosed copy of the original. However, I have only myself to blame for this. For I had meant to send you a postcard, but have got Schorlemmer and Adolf Beust staying with me, and there's quite a lot of gadding about with Mrs Lafargue (whose husband†d is in Paris) and Tussy Marx, so that the postcard got overlooked. But in order that you may see that good intentions were not wanting, I am belatedly sending you the thing.

Page me46.244
Congratulations on your attack upon Geiser's spineless conduct.†303
Page me46.244
Confidential: Marx has been in Algiers since 21 February. On arrival he had a fresh attack of pleurisy as a result of catching cold on the journey; he found wretched weather conditions, but is now pretty well all right again. How long he'll stay there is not yet certain. Has had distinctly bad luck with the weather.
Page me46.244
Kindest regards from

Yours,
F. Engels

Page me46.244
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.245

136
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.245
[Algiers,] Tuesday, 18 April 1882

DEAR FRED,

Got your letter yesterday,†284 likewise Tussy's, together with the 'imperial' remittance.†a
Page me46.245
In my last letter to Laurachen†b I announced the arrival of our '2 finest days'; but even before I had finished the letter, the sirocco (the official weather bulletins, like other French printed matter, spell it sometimes with one c, sometimes with 2) began to blow and the din served me as an overture to the 'mouvements atmosphériques intenses'†c which had been predicted. I admitted to Laura that I was tired of such things — if not, indeed, tired of Africa, and was determined to turn my back on Algiers the moment Dr Stephann DID NO LONGER 'WANT ME'.
Page me46.245
From the 14th April (afternoon) to the 17th April, gusts of wind, storms, heavy downpours, burning sunshine, continual ups and downs, now hot now cold (almost from one hour to the next). First thing this morning gloriously fine, but now, at 10 A.M., the wind is already piping its maddening tune. — In its report — or rather forecast — yesterday, the meteorological office announced an 'intense mouvement atmosphérique' for 3-4 May, but more especially for 7-8 May (not having pro nunc†d probed any further into the future); in addition, for the first week of this self-same May, it has promised us SO CALLED 'seismiques mouvements'†e (apparently the periodicity of these 'seismiques' coincides with latent earth tremors).

Page me46.245

Dr Stephann called on the 16th (Sunday), percussed, and declared that there was no longer any trace of 'pleurésie'†f (AS FAR AS TO 'rechute'†g); on the other hand he was, he said, less satisfied with the bronchial condition (also on the left) than when he last examined me. However, he painted away with great vigour (a vigour I damned well had time to appreciate in the course of Sunday afternoon — 16 April — and night, and right into the small hours of Monday — 17 April!). — Incidentally, Dr Stephann shares my view that bronchial trouble is inseparable from this weather and, such being the case, any prolongation of my stay here could only have unfavourable consequences. He thinks he will be able to let me leave, with a written diagnosis, at the end of April unless something unforeseen should happen — e.g. the weather here take a distinct turn for the better or, which seems unlikely, my health take a turn for the worse. All things being equal, then, I should leave on 2 May, being delivered back to Marseilles by the selfsame Said under the same Captain Mace (very nice chap) who brought me to Algiers, and from there should go and try my luck at Cannes, Nice or Menton. So don't send me either letters or anything in the way of documents or newspapers from London, unless it be JUST AFTER THE RECEIPT OF THESE LINES. But should I change my mind in the meantime, I shall at once notify you from here.

Page Break me46.246
Page me46.246

I am afraid that 'IRON' may arrive in Algiers after not only I, but also the Casthelaz FAMILY, have evacuated Africa; all the world's preparing to take flight. You must excuse the meagreness of this MISSIVE. The night of the 16th to 17th April was sleepless because of the vigour of the painting; no pain from the 17th to the 18th April because the ASSISTANT DOCTOR†a had already attended to me by 7 o'clock yesterday morning; but the itching due to the formation of new skin banished sleep for the 2nd night running. Since, in addition, I went for a stroll (2 whole hours) very early this morning, üw begrijp†b (I can no longer recall how the Dutch spell it, but I still hear the ü begreip! — what it's got to do with 'concept', God alone knows — as enunciated in the old days at Zalt-Bommel†304 by Pastor Rothhaus's†c wife, since divorced and replaced by my cousin†d), IN ONE WORD, as you can conceive, I have got to lay my head on my pillow and make up for some sleep. Meanwhile: — sleep, what would'st thou more? Only first let me tell you about the rotten trick played by the French authorities on a poor, thieving Arab, a poor, multiple assassin by profession. Only at the last minute — ON THE MOMENT, as the infamous COCKNEYS say, 'TO LAUNCH' the poor sinner 'INTO ETERNITY' did he discover that he wasn't going to be shot but guillotined! This, in defiance of prior arrangements! In defiance of promises! He was guillotined despite what had been agreed. But that wasn't all. The French having always permitted this hitherto, his relatives had expected the head and body to be handed over to them so that they could sew the former to the latter and then bury the 'whole'. Quod non!†a Howls, imprecations and gnashing of teeth; the French authorities dug their heels in, the first time they had done so! Now, when the body arrives in paradise, Mohammed will ask, 'Where have you left your head? Or, how did the head come to be parted from its body? You're not fit to enter paradise. Go and join those dogs of Christians in hell!' And that's why his relations were so upset.

Page Break me46.247

Your OLD Moor
Page me46.247
On closer inquiry — I hadn't asked him before — Stephann told me that, although he doesn't speak German, he is the son of a German. His father emigrated to Algiers from the Palatinate (Landau).

Page me46.247
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

137
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN
IN ZURICH
Page me46.247
London, 21 April 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

I am sending you a piece from the Kölner Zeitung on 'Baron Hirsch'.†305 It is significant that bourgeois papers should find it necessary to denounce such a trickster. The whole article is worth reprinting if space is available. It would make a splendid feuilleton, particularly as emanating from the Kölnische Zeitung. If you can't reprint it in its entirety, perhaps you would return it to me when you have done with it. You might also return me the ms. of the 'Preface'†b sometime.
Page me46.247
Let me elucidate: Mahmud Nedim Pasha is, like Mahmud Damat

Page Break me46.248
Pasha (the Sultan's†a brother-in-law), Russia's chief paid agent in Constantinople. When the Russian, Poliakov, who was also after the Turkish railway concessions, had failed to get them (for the Russians could not start a war against Turkey and simultaneously con the Turks), it was naturally of the utmost concern to the Russians to see to it that the terms imposed upon the Austrian, Hirsch, who was the sole competitor and, what's more, Austria's protégé, were of such a kind as to make Hirsch, and with him Austria, hated in Turkey and to prevent Turkey from getting a coherent railway network after all. Besides, anything that weakened Turkey financially was advantageous to Russia — relatively speaking. So Nedim does his deal. Hirsch pays him for selling Turkey to him and Russia pays him again just for selling Turkey. The fact is that Russian diplomacy does business in the grand manner, with none of your small shopkeeper's niggardly, envious eye to his competitors and hence, if there's no other way of doing it, it can even permit an adversary like Austria an apparent or momentary advantage and nevertheless turn this to its own account.

Page me46.248
Kindest regards to you and Kautsky.

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.248
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

138
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.248
[Algiers,] Friday, 28 April 1882

Dear FRED,

RECEIVED YOUR LETTER AND THE Kölnische Zeitungs.
Page me46.248
This note is simply to inform you that I shall be leaving Algiers on

Page Break me46.249
2 May (Tuesday) on the same Said and with the same commandant†a MR Mace, 'lieutenant de vaisseau',†b as brought me to Algiers. Last Wednesday I paid a visit to a French squadron of 6 ironclads; naturally I inspected the flagship, Le Colbert, where a petty officer, a handsome, intelligent lad, showed me around and demonstrated everything in detail. As I took my leave he told me in typically French fashion that he was sick of his boring duties and hoped to get his discharge bientôt.†c I and my companions (3 co-locataires†d from the Hôtel Victoria) were not allowed on board until after 'duties'. So we watched the manoeuvres of the flagship and the 5 other ironclads from our boat, alias skiff, as we rowed to and fro. There is to be a 'ball' on the Colbert tomorrow afternoon. I could have got hold of an invitation card for this, too, through Fermé, but there wasn't time. For on Tuesday (25 Avril) I was given my final examination by Stephann; no more tatouement†e with collodion; quo-ad†f a recurrence of pleurisy ALTOGETHER ABSOLVED; however I'm to see him tomorrow (Saturday) at 3 o'clock to get his written diagnosis and take my leave of him. The weather is now very hot on occasion, but IN FACT a hurricane — with sirocco storms coming and going — has persisted (uninterruptedly at night, in repeated gusts during the day) throughout the week (including TO-DAY). That is the reason why my cough has not responded hitherto; HENCE high time to flee Algiers.

Page me46.249

Best wishes to all.

Your OLD Moor
Page me46.249

Apropos; because of the sun, I have done away with my prophet's beard and my crowning glory but (in deference to my daughters) had myself photographed before offering up my hair on the altar of an Algerian barber. I shall receive the photographs next Sunday (30 April). Specimina will be sent to you from Marseilles. On inspection you will observe that, CONSIDERING the 8 whole weeks (during which I did not in fact have one day of complete repose) of painting with collodion (after the manner of Ludwig of Bavaria†306), j'ai fait encore bonne mine á mauvais jeu.†g

Page me46.249
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.250

139
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.250
[Algiers,] 28 April 1882

Dearest Child,

Only 2 lines: I think only seaside living can help poor Harry. You ought — if possibly — lose no time to get him and his brothers†a to Normandy. It is childish to fancy that in any case I should return to England without a previous visit to you and my grandsons, whether we meet in Normandy, at Paris, or elsewhere.

Page me46.250

As to my health, it proceeds favourably; otherwise Dr Stephann would not allow me to leave 'Africa'. I think, 2 weeks or so, will suffice for the 'transitory' stadium at the Riviera.

My best wishes, dearest child,
Old Nick

Page me46.250
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

140
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†113
IN ZURICH
Page me46.250
London, 3 May 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

Could you not send me some additional offprints of the article on early Christianity†b or further copies of the relevant issue? I should like to have them very much and they would come in useful for propaganda purposes. I should send them to people who don't otherwise see the Sozialdemokrat; 3 or 4 would suffice.

Page Break me46.251
Page me46.251

Encl. a note which is of interest in that it gives evidence of the colossal speed with which the concentration of capitals is taking place in America. UNITED STATES BONDS are Staatsschuldscheine der Vereinigten Staaten. N.Y.C. and H.R. STOCK are the shares of the NEW YORK CENTRAL and HUDSON RIVER Railroad; REAL ESTATE = Grundbesitz.
Page me46.251

A dollar is slightly more than 4 marks = roughly 4 marks = 5 frs.
Page me46.251

Delighted to see that people everywhere are supporting the Sozialdemokrat against the whines of the milksops.
Page me46.251

Darwin's letter was of course addressed to Marx and was an extremely kind one.†307 But beware of the article by Lafargue in the Citoyen of 28 April on 'La sélection darwinienne et les classes régnantes' which he concludes with the discovery of a new Amphioxus; it's too funny for words. Lafargue is in Paris and I have just written to him†284 pouring frightful scorn on his Amphioxus Lafargii.

Page me46.251
Best wishes.

Yours,
F.E.
Page me46.251
Don't let the Society here†8 mislead you about the DEMOCRATIC FEDERATION.†158 So far, the latter has been of no importance at all. Its leader is an ambitious parliamentary candidate by the name of Hyndman, a former Conservative; only with the help of the Irish and with specifically Irish aims in view can he succeed in staging a big meeting, and when he does he plays third fiddle; otherwise the Irish would tell him where to get off.
Page me46.251
Gladstone has made a dreadful ass of himself — his Irish policy has failed utterly; is having to drop Forster and the LORD LIEUTENANT of Ireland, Cowper Temple (whose father was a Palmerston on his mother's side),†a and say pater peccavi†b; the Irish Members of Parliament have been released, the Coercion Bill has not been extended, part of the farmers' rent arrears are to be cancelled, another part to be taken over by the state against fair amortisation.†308 On the other hand, the TORIES have now got to the stage of wanting to salvage whatever there is to be salvaged; thus, before the farmers take possession of the land,

Page Break me46.252
they are to discharge their rents with state assistance on the Prussian mode so that the landlords do actually get something! The Irish have really made dawdling John Bull get a move on. That's what comes of shooting!†309

Page me46.252
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

141
MARX TO LAURA LAFARGUE
IN LONDON
Page me46.252
Monte Carlo, 6 May 1882
Hôtel de Russie

My dear Cacadou,

Only a few hours since I arrived here at Monte Carlo.†310 I even doubt whether I shall find the time enough to indite a letter announced already to Engels (at all events he will but receive it a day later).
Page me46.252
For the present I am obliged to run about on different errands. I enclose one photo for you, another for Fred†a; no art can make the man look worse.

Old Nick

Page me46.252
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 35, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.253

142
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.253
Monte Carlo, 8 May 1882
Hôtel de Russie

DEAR FRED,

2 or 3 weeks before I left Algiers (at the beginning of May),†310 the meteorologists had already forecast storms at sea. In fact, during my last days in Africa, the sirocco blew itself out and very hot weather set in, spoilt, however, by gusts of wind, eddies of dust and unexpected, if temporary and often short-lived, drops in temperature. During that same time my bronchial catarrh grew worse and has not yet been properly subdued. The storm at sea (during the night of 4 to 5 May) was such that, even in the cabin, there was an appreciable draught. It was pouring when I arrived in Marseilles (on the morning of 5 May), and continued to rain all the way to Nice. I even imported one wet day (yesterday) into Monte Carlo; glorious weather today. So you see how constant I have remained, for until I arrived it hadn't rained for months in Nice or Monte Carlo. But this time it was just badinage, not real earnest as in Algiers.
Page me46.253
In Nice, where I spent the 5th and 6th, I soon discovered that the wind could be very capricious and that a uniform, even temperature was by no means to be expected. Today my brief experience was confirmed by Dr Delachaux, médecin-chirurgien†a (lives at Interlaken), who is staying at the same hotel here. He has spent his holiday touring Nice and its environs, and the most famous places on the Riviera generally, so far with an eye to business as to ascertain which places he might best recommend to sufferers of lung diseases, bronchial catarrh of a chronic character, etc. He declared decidedly against Nice, but preferred Monte Carlo even to Menton. Dr Delachaux returns to his native Switzerland today.

Page me46.253

You will know EVERYTHING about the charm exerted by the beauties of nature here, whether from your own observations,†311 or from paintings and printed descriptions. Many of its features vividly recall those of Africa.

Page Break me46.254
Page me46.254

As regards a 'warm, dry atmosphere', it will soon, generally speaking, be available everywhere. The sun-spots indicate that there will be intense activity of the rays, and a drought is feared in France.
Page me46.254

FOR CONSCIENCE SAKE I shall consult Kunemann, a German doctor, here tomorrow. I have with me Dr Stephann's written diagnosis (only on looking at his visiting card do I see that Stephann is also Professeur suppléant á l'Ecole de Médecine†a at the faculty of Algiers) which will spare me further talkee-talkee. — As soon as Stephann declared that I was rid of my pleurisy, I at once began, as prescribed by him (Stephann), to embrocate with tincture of iodine all the spots on the upper part (left) of my chest and back. Since the time I boarded the ship until TO-DAY I have discontinued these operations which would in any case be 'difficult' for me to carry out in person on my own back, despite Dr Delachaux's advice that I should attempt it with the help of a mirror. Qui vivra verra.†b At all events, I shall speak to Dr Kunemann first. I am anxious to get out and about in the open air as much as I can.
Page me46.254

Practically all the Parisian and Italian papers and periodicals are to be found in the reading room of the Monte Carlo Casino; a fair selection of German papers, very few English. I read in the Petit Marseillais of today's date about 'l'assassinat de lord Cavendish et de M. Burke'.†312 The public here, e.g. my table-d'hôte companions in the Hôtel de Russie, is, by contrast, more interested in what goes on in the Casino's salles de jeu (tables de roulette et de trente-et-quarante).†c I was particularly amused by a son of Albion, sulky, ill-tempered and bewildered, AND WHY? Because he had lost a certain number of yellow boys, whereas he had been absolutely intent on 'copping' the same. He couldn't understand that not even British boorishness is able 'TO BULLY' fortune.
Page me46.254

These lines must be my last since letters from here have first to be sent to the post office in Monaco by messenger.
Page me46.254

Kindest regards to all.

Your
Moor

Page me46.254
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.255

143
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET†72
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.255
Monte Carlo, 8 May 1882
Hôtel de Russie, Monte Carlo

Dear Jennychen,

The said Monte Carlo, whence I send you these lines, is one of the 3 places (adjoining one another) whose trinity constitutes the state of 'Monaco' (i.e. Monaco, Condamine and Monte Carlo). A really beautiful situation. Climate preferable to that of Nice or even Menton.
Page me46.255
I need hardly say that with comical consistency I imported into the region the first 2 rainy days (since January); it would seem that they were only awaiting my arrival from Algiers for this to happen. Apart from that I struck magnificent weather.
Page me46.255
As you will have learnt from my last letter,†a I am quit of my pleurisy; the bronchial catarrh can only clear up very gradually. Moreover the atmosphere will soon be warm and dry everywhere (which, however, raises fears of a water shortage); the intensity of the sun's action will be all the greater for its being strewn with large spots. So everywhere there will soon be the kind of weather I need.
Page me46.255
As I am not sure how long I shall be staying here, I should like you to let me know at once from Paris where I can find you; it would be best if you telegraphed me here, for a telegram will give me sufficient information in 3 or 4 words.
Page me46.255
Lots of kisses for the children.

Your OLD Moor

Page me46.255
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.256

144
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†113
IN ZURICH
Page me46.256
London, 10 May†313 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

My afternoon having already been broken into, I shall employ it in writing to you. As regards the Virgin Mary-Isis, that was a point upon which I could not enlarge, if only for reasons of space.†314 Like all hagiolatry, the Marian cult belongs to a much later period than the one I am considering (a time when it was clerical policy to produce in the persons of the saints a new version of the polytheistic peasantry's numerous tutelary gods), and finally it would be necessary to provide historical proof of the derivation, which would demand specialised study. The same applies to the gloria and moonlight. In the imperial days of Rome, by the way, the cult of Isis was part of the state religion.
Page me46.256
Bimetallism.†3 The main thing — particularly after many of the 'leaders' have been so frightfully cock-a-hoop about our party's superiority over the bourgeois in matters of economics, a superiority of which those gentlemen are totally innocent — the main thing is that we should beware of inviting censure in this field as is unblushingly done by the said gentlemen the moment they think it will serve to flatter a particular kind of worker, win an electoral victory or gain some other advantage. Thus, because silver is mined in Saxony, they think it in order to dabble in the bimetallist nonsense. So to catch a few more votes, our party is to go and make an immortal ass of itself in the very sphere which is supposed to be its forte!
Page me46.256
But that's our literary gents all over! Just like the bourgeois literati, they think themselves entitled to the privilege of learning nothing and laying down the law about everything. They have, for our benefit, concocted a hotch-potch of literature which, for ignorance of economics, new-fangled utopianism and arrogance, has yet to find an equal, and Bismarck did us a tremendous favour by banning it.
Page me46.256
When we speak of bimetallism today, it is not so much bimetallism generally as the specific case of bimetallism in which the ratio of gold to silver is, say, 15 1/2 : 1. A distinction must therefore be drawn here.
Page me46.256
Bimetallism is becoming daily more impracticable in that the ratio

Page Break me46.257
of the value of silver to that of gold which, at one time, was at least fairly constant and changed only gradually, is now subject to daily and violent fluctuations, the initial tendency being for the value of silver to fall as a result of the colossal increase in production, especially in North America. The exhaustion of gold is an invention of the silver barons. But whatever the cause of the change in value, it remains a fact and that is what concerns us first of all. Silver is becoming daily less capable of serving as a measure of value, whereas gold is not.

Page me46.257

The ratio of the value of the two is now about 17 1/2: 1. But the silver people want to reimpose upon the world the old ratio of 15 1/2: 1, and that is just as impossible as maintaining the price of mechanically produced yarn and cloth everywhere and for all time at that of manually produced yarn and cloth. The die does not determine the value of the coin, it is merely a guarantee, for the recipient, of weight and standard and can never confer on 15 1/2 lbs of silver the value of 17 1/2.
Page me46.257

All this is dealt with so lucidly and exhaustively in Capital, chapter on money (Chap. III, pp. 72-120)†315 that there's nothing more to add. For material relating to more recent fluctuations, cf. Soetbeer: Edelmetall — Produktion und Werthverhältnis etc. (Gotha, Perthes, 1879). Soetbeer is the leading authority in this sphere, and the father of German currency reform — even before 1840 he was advocating a 'mark' equivalent to 1/3 taler.
Page me46.257

Hence, if silver is minted at 15 1/2 lbs = 1 lb. gold, it flows back into the state treasuries, everyone wants to be rid of it. That's what the United States discovered in the case of its silver dollar minted to the old standard and worth only 90 c., as did Bismarck when he tried forcibly to put back into circulation the silver talers that had been withdrawn and replaced by gold.
Page me46.257

Mr Dechend, the chairman of the Bank, imagines that bimetallism will enable him to pay off Germany's external debts in bad silver instead of gold at full value, and thus avoid any kind of gold crisis, something that would certainly be most convenient for the Reichsbank if only it were feasible. But all that is forthcoming is the proof provided by Mr Dechend himself, that he is totally unfitted to preside over a bank and would be more at home at a school desk than a board-room table.
Page me46.257

Your Prussian Junker, too, would certainly be happy if the mortgages he contracted in silver at 15 1/2: 1 could be repaid or serviced in silver at 17 1/2: 1. And since this would necessarily occur inside the country, it would be perfectly feasible for debtors to rook their creditors by this means — provided only the aristocracy could find people to lend them silver at 17 1/2: 1 in order that they might make repayments at 15 1/2: 1. For their own means certainly do not permit them to make repayments. But they would, of course, be compelled to accept their silver at 15 1/2 and thus, so far as they were concerned, everything would remain as before.

Page Break me46.258
Page me46.258

As regards the German production of silver, its extraction from German ore dwindles yearly in importance as compared with (Rhenish) extraction from South American ore. Total production in Germany in 1876 amounted to about 280,000 lbs, of which 58,000 were from South American ore; since that time this figure has risen considerably.

Page me46.258

That the debasing of silver to the status of a fractional currency must depress the value of silver still further is obvious; the use of silver for purposes other than money is minimal, nor is it likely to show a rapid increase because demonetisation throws more silver on to the market.
Page me46.258

It is inconceivable that England should ever introduce bimetallism. No country that is on the gold standard could re-introduce bimetallism now and on a permanent basis. In any case, universal bimetallism does not admit of general application; if all men were to agree today that silver was once more to be worth 15 1/2: 1, they could not alter the fact that it is worth only 17 1/2: 1, and there's absolutely nothing to be done about it. One might just as well decide that twice two equals five.
Page me46.258

During our early days of exile Bamberger did us many a good turn; he was a decent and obliging man, secretary to Karl of Brunswick. We subsequently lost sight of him.†316
Page me46.258

Kindest regards,

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.258
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.259

145
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL
IN LEIPZIG
Page me46.259
London, 16 May 1882

Dear Bebel,

I have been long meaning to write to you. Particularly since I don't know whether Marx has answered your last letter.†317 He several times promised me that he would, but you know how it is when one is ill. So today I have at last got round to it.

Page me46.259

Marx first went to the Isle of Wight,†234 but the weather there was cold and wet. Then to Algiers via Paris. Caught cold again during the journey, encountering more wet, chilly weather in Algiers, later succeeded by rapid variations in temperature. Once again his cold assumed the form of pleurisy, less severe than his first attack here, but long drawn-out. Now he is thoroughly recovered and, since it has at last got really hot in Africa, has fled to Monte Carlo, the gaming establishment of the Prince of Monaco.†a As soon as the summer has really begun, he will leave and join Madame Longuet and her children on the Normandy coast; is unlikely to be back before the beginning of July. All he has got to do now is shake off once and for all his obstinate cough, and in this he will probably succeed. He had his photograph taken in Algiers and is looking quite his old self again.

Page me46.259

It is a great misfortune that you, of all people, should have suffered defeat in elections which otherwise went off so splendidly.†222 Your presence was doubly necessary in view of the many new, and in some cases unreliable, elements that have got in. Indeed it would seem that, at the start, a number of not very edifying blunders were perpetrated. Now things seem to be going rather better. I was therefore doubly delighted (and Marx no less so) by the courageous attitude of the Sozialdemokrat, which did not hesitate to come out unequivocally against the whining and pusillanimity of Breuel & Co., even when deputies such as Blos and Geiser came out in favour of it.†318 We, too, were appealed to, and Viereck wrote me a very pathetic letter about the paper whereat I informed him of my view in altogether amiable if no uncertain terms†284 and, since that time, have heard nothing more of him. Hepner, too, has passed this way, 'sick at heart and poor of purse'†a and terribly sorry for himself; he had written a very indifferent little pamphlet†262 from which I could see how greatly he had deteriorated morally. The chief plaint in both cases was that the Sozialdemokrat failed to take account of the laws presently in force in Germany, the contents of the paper being such that its distributors were had up by the German courts for lése majesté, high treason, etc. Yet it is perfectly evident from the paper itself and the reports of the proceedings against our people that, whatever the circumstances, and no matter how the paper was written, those swine on the bench would find some pretext for committing them. To write a paper in such a way as to afford no handle to the said judges is an art that has yet to be discovered. And, what is more, these gentlemen forget that an organ as weak-kneed as they desire would drive our people pretty well en masse into Most's camp. However, I shall none the less advise Bernstein,†b to whom we have otherwise lent our moral support whenever possible, to modulate the tone of moral indignation a bit by the use of irony and derision, for such a tone, if it is not to become boring, has to be so stepped up as ultimately to become ridiculous.

Page Break me46.260

Page me46.260

Singer came to see me the day before yesterday and from him I learned that the forwarding address is still all right, something I was not quite sure about since we haven't used it for so long. He has another drawback. He belongs to those who regard the nationalisation of anything as a semi-, or at all events pre-, socialist measure and are therefore secret devotees of protective tariffs, tobacco monopoly, nationalised railways, etc. These prevarications are the legacy of the unduly one-sided fight against Manchesterism†176 and, because they facilitate debate in a middle-class and 'eddicated' environment, enjoy a considerable following particularly among those bourgeois and academic elements who have come over to us. You in Berlin, he tells me, recently debated the point, he being luckily outvoted. We cannot, for the sake of such minor considerations, afford to discredit ourselves either politically or economically. I tried to make him see that in our view 1. protective tariffs are quite the wrong thing for Germany (not, however, for America), because our industry has expanded and become a viable exporter under free trade, but for it to be a viable exporter, competition from foreign semi-manufactures on the home market is absolutely essential; that the iron industry, which produces 4 times more than is required by the home market, uses the protective tariff only against the home market while selling abroad, as the facts go to show, at give-away prices; 2. that the tobacco monopoly is nationalisation on so minute a scale that it can't even do duty for an example in the debate nor, for that matter, do I give a damn whether or not Bismarck puts it into effect since either way it must eventually redound to our benefit; 3. that the nationalisation of railways is of benefit only to the shareholders who sell their shares above value, but of no benefit at all to us because we should be able to deal as summarily with one or two big companies as with the state, once we had the latter; that the joint-stock companies have already provided proof of the extent to which the bourgeois as such is redundant, in as much as the management is wholly in the hands of salaried officials, nor would nationalisation provide any further argument. However, he had got the thing too firmly fixed in his mind and agreed with me only to the extent of admitting that, from a political viewpoint, your dismissive attitude was the only correct one.

Page Break me46.261
Page me46.261
Time for the post. Kindest regards to yourself and Liebknecht.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.261
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

146
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.261
Monte Carlo (Monaco), 20 May 1882

Hôtel de Russie

PRIVATELY

DEAR FRED,

It would be pointless to impart all this to the children, since it would alarm them unnecessarily. But I must tell SOMEBODY AT LEAST about what I have just gone through.

Page Break me46.262
Page me46.262

In my last letter (I don't know exactly whether I wrote to you direct, or to Tussy or to Laura), I said I would let you have further details after my encounter with Dr Kunemann.†a This took place on 8th May; he is an Alsatian, a scientifically (medically) educated man; e.g. he told me about Dr Koch on the bacillus before I got your letter†284; has a large practice; 52-54 years old at the very least, since he was a student at Strasbourg university in 1848; politically, he has found the paper Le Temps to be the organ that corresponds most closely to his temperament; science, he said, had convinced him that progress could only be 'slow'; no revolutionary upheaval — for otherwise, progress would, in consequence, be forced to 'double back' almost as far as it had come (as in the Echternach procession,†319 p.e.†b); first prerequisite, education of the masses and 'non-masses', etc. IN ONE WORD, POLITICALLY, A REPUBLICAN PHILISTINE; I mention this merely to show why I didn't go into such matters with him aside from discussing the 'Machiavellian' politics of Charles III, absolute tyrant of Monaco. He regards me as an 1848 man and, apart from that date, I vouchsafed no further particulars as to the rest of my PUBLIC ACTIVITY. Now to the matter in hand. Originally he concluded from my visiting card, which has Dr on it and which I had had conveyed to him through his maid, that I was a Dr of Med., his view being further confirmed by Dr Stephann's card which I handed to him, ditto those of my new medical acquaintance†c from Interlaken, and of Dr Donkin, whom I mentioned as the friend of my friend Prof. Ray Lankester, since he wished to know who had treated me in London, etc. Then I gave him Stephann's consultation écrite†d to read.
Page me46.262

Well, since he regarded me as a medical colleague, EITHER THEORETICALLY OR PRACTICALLY, he freely spoke his mind after having ausculated and percussed me. And to my horror, the pleurisy had returned, even if not in so severe a form, being confined to one spot on the left of my back; bronchitis, on the other hand, pretty well — chronic! He thought that 1 or 2 vésicatoires†e might put paid to the thing (pleurésie); during 9 May (Mardi)†f first vésicatoire, on 13 May (Samedi)†g only my 2nd visit to Kunemann, second vésicatoire prescribed; could not be applied until 16 May (Mardi) after my skin had dried up; I visited him on 19 May (Friday); ausculation and percussion; found an improvement, the épanchement†a in particular being reduced to almost nothing; he suggested (these doctors are always afraid that their patient will grow restive, the whole of this week having been plus ou moins†b ruined and tormented) that to continue with vésicatoires was no longer essential; I need do no more than embrocate with TINCTURE OF iodine (prescribed by Stephann for bronchial trouble), this time the upper as well as the lower places on my left side, chest and back. I thereupon declared that, if the épanchement had not altogether disappeared, I would, on the contrary, prefer another vésicatoire (on 23 May, Mardi); I had, I said, been told by Dr Stephann that in cases of pleurisy tincture of iodine was an ineffectual, uncertain antidote which only served to prolong the trouble. My plumping for the heroic remedy was obviously far more agreeable to Dr Kunemann himself; I now hope that, on 26 or 27 May, he will [tell] me this 2nd rechute†c is the FINAL one (pro nunc†d).

Page Break me46.263

Page me46.263

Indeed, as regards [myself], 'fate' would seem on this occasion to have displayed an alarming consistency — almost, one might say, as in Dr Müllner's tragedies.†320 Why does Dr Kunemann declare my bronchial condition (and I already knew I would be told as much) to be thus 'chronic'? Because the weather throughout the Riviera has been so exceptionally bad, has taken such an abnormal turn; but he suggested that this might be normal to the extent that from January to the beginning of May, there had been too little rain — virtually none; the weather had been too warm and fine and a reaction to it must have set in. I explained this to him more simply by pointing out that all this must be blamed on my arrival from Algiers; I had brought rain with me to Marseilles on the 4th May and, with some reluctance, the weather in the place of my present abode had — mutatis mutandis†e — assumed the character of the 'bad weather' I had recently gone through in Algeria. Much patience is demanded, especially on the part of the recipients of my letters. Such repetitiveness is altogether too boring. A pointless, arid, not to say expensive, existence!

Page me46.263

Tomorrow I shall write to Tussy,†f since her unanswered letter dates back furthest. Today it's awkward for me since the new skin formed after the vésicatoire still tends, when I stoop, to rub painfully against my coat or shirt. Notabene: What I write and tell the children is the truth, but not the whole truth. What's the point of alarming them?

Page Break me46.264

Your
Moor

Page me46.264

Dr Kunemann's error about my being a 'medical' colleague was cleared up when, at the end of my first visit, he refused payment; was all the more honeyed when I informed him that, as a layman, I should have to 'shell out'.

Page me46.264

First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

147
MARX TO ELEANOR MARX
IN LONDON
Page me46.264
[Postcard]

Monte Carlo (Monaco), 21 May 1882
Hôtel de Russie

Dearest Child,

Your being my oldest creditor, I had in fact intended writing today (Sunday) a long letter, but l'homme propose, mais le thermométre dispose. Il y a aujourd'hui un jour parfaitement beau, mais exceptionnel: donc je veux l'exploiter en air libre, au lieu 'd'écrire', et de ne pas écrire le soir. C'est convenu avec mes conseillers de santé.†a
Page me46.264
Before leaving ami†b Fermé, I told him: On landing at the Southern coast of France, the weather at once will come out a turn-coat. And indeed — so 'fatal' a man I pride myself upon this my quality — the prophecy has been partially fulfilled. From the beginning of January the Riviera enjoyed a summer weather never so brilliant, some grumblers only complaining of an absolute lack of rain almost. The moment I arrived on the 4th May at Marseille, there set in rain, lasting sometimes a whole, more generally a half day, and mostly during the nights; a general lowering of temperature; then and there cold winds; altogether changeable, variable weather; atmosphere, even if not often, too saturated with aqueous vapours. With all that, here a relatively good warm weather, only not so dry and more constant than I want just now for my lungs. But nowhere in Italy or elsewhere you will find it a better one now: Cannes, Monte Carlo and Mentone are the three most healthsome places, of the most equable and on an average — warmer temperature than Nizza, Rome and Naples.

Page Break me46.265

Yours,
Old Nick
Page me46.265
[On the side reserved for the address]

Miss Marx
41 Maitland Park Road
Maitland Park

London (N.W.) (Angleterre)

Page me46.265
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Voinstvuyushchiy materialist, Book IV, Moscow, 1925

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

148
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.265
[Postcard]

Monte Carlo, 26 May 1882
Hôtel de Russie

Dearest Child,

I am always happy to receive a letter from you, though regretting that your Old Nick steals some time of your night's rest.
Page me46.265
My health is improving with the weather; possibly I shall perhaps at the beginning of June go to Cannes, and remain there for a week or so. Everything depends of medical advice, and the character of the summer opening in June.

Page Break me46.266
Page me46.266
[As to] Lafargue's (I mean the man's of Cuba) paper†a has committed great blunders, mostly from ignorance, and the childish aspiration 'to go as far as possible'.
Page me46.266
As to the Bataille, I have seen till now not anything brilliant. In fact I do know it only to No. 4; but I will have always the time to see that!
Page me46.266
My heart is with you and the children; I yearn for them. However, I shall, after a series of most disagreeable 'medical' experiments, precipitate nothing. With all that, I hope to be soon with them.

Your Old Nick
Page me46.266
[On the side reserved for the address]

Madame Charles Longuet
11, Boulevard Thiers, Argenteuil
prés Paris

Page me46.266
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

149
MARX TO ELEANOR MARX†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.266
Monte Carlo, 28 May 1882
Hôtel de Russie

Dear Tussychen,

There was nothing from Bebel either in Engels' letter†321 or your letter which I got yesterday evening. It must have remained in London by mistake. AT ALL EVENTS, I WASH MY HANDS OF IT.

Page Break me46.267
Page me46.267
Today 24 degrees in the shade, and summer temperatures have generally prevailed here ever since the date of my last postcard to you†a (although the sky isn't as completely cloudless as the cognoscenti of this place demand). In such circumstances, my lengthy report has come to nothing for all my 'good intentions'; not that anything of much value is lost thereby.
Page me46.267
As regards the sea-crossing from Algiers, nothing need be said save that it was made in unfavourable weather conditions; during the night of 4 to 5 May, in particular, there was a violent storm that turned my cabin (which, for good measure, I had to share with a philistine businessman from Lyons) into a veritable wind tunnel. It was cold and pouring with rain when we arrived off Marseilles in the early morning (5 May). The STEAMER didn't actually go right in, so the passengers and baggage had to be taken off by boat and, for their further delectation, spend several hours in a cold, draughty douanepurgatorio†b until the time came for them to depart for Nice. Those chilling 'moments' détraquaient plus ou moins de nouveau ma machine†c and, in Monte Carlo, once more precipitated me entre les mains d'un Esculape†d; for I have no need of such when it's merely a question of treating the 'bronchial trouble' since all I have to do is follow Dr Stephann's instructions. In a few days' time (next Tuesday, 30 May, perhaps) I expect to be given a clean bill of health by Dr Kunemann. So whatever happens I shan't be leaving this den of thieves before the beginning of June. Whether I stay on or not is for Dr Kunemann to decide. The sensitivity of people suffering from disorders of the respiratory organs (who by the same token are also more liable to a relapse) is greater in what is normally a favourable climate. In the North, for instance, a sudden draught would not instantly evoke the spectre of pleurisy, bronchitis and the like, whereas in Algiers your French philistine must always [be] on his guard against them. A Madame Fleury, here in the Hôtel de Russie, was sent to Cannes from Paris because of her bronchitis. She recovered completely during March and April, enjoyed climbing the hills, etc. By way of an after-cure and distraction, she then left Cannes for Monte Carlo, a quite short 2-hour journey during which she caught cold while in Antibes station — and is now in worse case than previously in Paris. One hears of visitors to this place who haven't come simply to gamble and enjoy themselves, and of whom 9 out of every 10 undoubtedly fall victim to 'rechutes'.†a

Page Break me46.268
Page me46.268

Goethe, when he applauds a man for 'sloughing' his old snake's skin,†b does not in all likelihood see the sloughing of artificially produced 'fausses peaux'†c as part of the rejuvenation process.
Page me46.268

Another time, when it isn't as 'sweltering' as it is today, I must really tell you something about this Principality of Gerolstein (not even Offenbach's music is wanting, or Mademoiselle Schneider,†322 or, indeed, the spruce and dapper carabiniers†d — not 100 all told). Nature here magnificent and art has actually improved on it, — I refer to the gardens, conjured out of the barren rock, which cover the steep incline from top to bottom, often going right down to the exquisitely blue sea, like the terraces of the hanging gardens of Babylon. But the economic basis of Monaco-Gerolstein is the casino; if it were to close tomorrow it would be all up with Monaco-Gerolstein — the whole of it. I dislike visiting the gaming room; it reminds me that at the table d'hôte,†e in the cafés, etc., almost the only topic that is talked or whispered about is the tables de roulette et de trente et quarante.†f Every now and again something is won, as for instance 100 frs by a young Russian lady (wife of a Russian diplomat-cum-agent) (she is one of the guests at the Hôtel de Russie) who, in return, loses 6,000 frs, while someone else can't keep enough for the journey home; others gamble away the whole of large family fortunes; very few take away a share of the plunder — few of the gamblers, I mean, and those that do are almost without exception rich. There can be no question of intelligence or calculation here; no one can count with any probability on being favoured by 'chance' unless he can venture a considerable sum. But I can understand the attraction it holds out, particularly for le beau sexe†g; les mondaines†h not less than the demi-mondaines, SCHOOL-GIRLS and bourgeoises alike ALL PUSH ON, a fact to which this place can supply eyewitnesses and to spare. Apart from Monaco-Gerolstein, which would founder along with the casino, I don't believe that Nice — the rendez-vous in the winter months of the quality and of fortune-hunters alike — could continue to subsist as a fashionable centre without the casino at Monte Carlo. And withal, how childish is the casino by comparison with the Bourse!

Page Break me46.269
Page me46.269
(This pen and this ink need replacing; they elicit from me the outburst that it requires real artistry to write with them!)
Page me46.269
To the right of the casino (where the gambling goes on), almost cheek by jowl with it, is the Café de Paris and next to that a kiosk. This is daily adorned with a placard, not printed, but handwritten and signed with the initials of the quill-pusher; for 600 frs he will provide, in black and white, the secret of the science of winning a million francs with a 1,000 at the tables de roulette et de trente-et-quarante. Nor, or so it is said, is it by any means rare for people to fall victim to this confidence trick. Indeed, most of the gamblers, both male and female, believe there is a science in what are pure games of chance; the ladies and gentlemen sit outside the said Café de Paris, IN FRONT of, or on the seats in, the wonderful garden that belongs to the casino, heads bent over little (printed) tables, scribbling and doing sums, while one of them may earnestly expound to another 'what system' he prefers, whether one should play in 'series', etc., etc. It's like watching a bunch of lunatics. However, Grimaldi of Monaco†a and his Principality of Gerolstein and the lessees of his casino are thriving and are, AFTER ALL, more 'interesting' in the Offenbachian sense than those whom they fleece.
Page me46.269
Should I change my address, I shall send it to you by telegraph. At all events the return journey, initially to Paris, will be made in stages and 'with caution'.
Page me46.269
Love to all,

OLD NICK

Page me46.269
First published, in the language of the original (German), in Annali, an. I, Milano, 1958

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.270

150
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.270
[Monte Carlo,] 30 May 1882

DEAR FRED,

After the application (the 3rd in Monte Carlo) of a vésicatoire†a on 23 May I did in fact have another appointment with Dr Kunemann before today, but only in connection with my 'bronchial trouble'. Quo-ad†b my pleurésie, however, he found today, after a lengthy final examination, that the épanchement†c was 'gone'; what remains is so-called dry pleurésie; there is no longer any moisture to retard matters; however the sound of one membrane rubbing against the other, to put it in popular if incorrect terms, still remains. He thought it would be beneficial to finish up with one more vésicatoire today and then move on to Cannes for a day or two, after which I would be able to take myself off to Paris.

Page me46.270

He thought I had contracted pleurisy quite accidentally; considering my normal, robust physique I might just as well never have got it, or, by the same token, have done so — accidentally! — as much as 40 years ago. Getting rid of it is harder because of the danger of a relapse.

Page me46.270

As I was made to parade my naked charms, front and back, he drew my attention to the fact that, previously, as a result of pleurisy, my left side had swollen by comparison with the right; now it was the other way round, for my left side (I refer to the affected spot) had contracted by contrast with the right, this being the result of my traitement.†d So as to rid myself completely of the last mementoes, as it were, of pleurisy, I am to spend some time later on in the mountains where the air is more rarified. My lungs must be 'set to rights' again by gymnastics of this kind, gymnastics imposed upon them by the locality. It was all the more difficult for me to follow the details in that he sought to bring them (the details) home to me in French frequently interspersed with Alsatian German, but also with some

Page Break me46.271

YANKEE-English. However one thing was clear, and that was what Dr Stephann had told me on the first day: Your thorax is what it is, so if spurious tissue takes up some of the space that one lung should occupy, that lung must make do with less space. The said tissue disappears in proportion as the lung re-expands. I have only just left Dr Kunemann, i.e. it's now nearly 6 o'clock in the evening which (6 o'clock) is the latest posting time FOR TO-DAY. Tomorrow — because of the final vésicatoire to be applied tonight — writing will be OUT OF THE QUESTION; day after tomorrow I shall have to recuperate and so it's 'unlikely' that you'll get any further news before the 2nd or 3rd of June (as I shall also have to pack).

Page me46.271

With best wishes.

OLD Moor

Page me46.271

First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

151
MARX TO JENNY LONGUET†72
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.271
[Postcard]

Cannes, 4 Juin†a 1882

Dearest Child,

I'll come at some of the first days of the week beginning on the 6th June. I cannot specify; it will depend on circumstance not to be exactly foreseen. Hence you oblige me greatly by not bothering about the exact day or hour of arrival. Till now, I have always found that nothing has done me more harm than people, at the station, waiting for me. Do not tell anybody else (ci-inclus le Gascon, le Russe et le Hirsch)†b that I am expected that week. I'll want some absolute quietness alone with your family, No. 11, Boulevard Thiers.

Yours,
Old Nick

Page Break me46.272
Page me46.272
By 'quietness' I mean the 'family life', 'the children's noise', that 'microscopic world' more interesting than the 'macroscopic'.
Page me46.272
[On the side reserved for the address]

Madame Charles Longuet
11, Boulevard Thiers, Argenteuil
prés Paris

Page me46.272
First published, in Russian, in the magazine Nachalo, No. 5, St Petersburg, 1899

Reproduced from the original

152
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.272
Cannes, 5 Juin†a 1882

DEAR FRED,

ON 30TH MAY (pro Monte Carlo) my back last branded; on 31ST MAY post-operative treatment confined me to the house; on 3rd June I was set free by Kunemann and left the same day. He advised me to stay in Cannes for a couple of days, whatever the circumstances,†323 this being essential if only to allow the wounds inflicted on me to 'dry out'.

Page me46.272

Thus I have spent an entire month vegetating in this repaire†b of aristocratic idlers or ADVENTURERS. Nature superb, in other respects a dreary hole; it is 'monumental' because consisting solely of hotels; no plebeian 'masses' here, apart from the garçons d'hotels, de café, etc., and domestiques,†c who belong to the Lumpenproletariat. The old robber's lair on its rocky promontory surrounded on 3 sides by the bay, i.e. Monaco, was at least an ancient, crumbling, medieval sort of Italian townlet; on the other hand, Condamine, built for the most part low down by the sea, between the 'town' of Monaco and the maison de jeu†d (i.e. Monte Carlo), and growing fast. Monaco is, IN THE STRICT SENSE, the 'polity', the 'state', the 'government'; Condamine is common-or-garden 'petty-bourgeois' society; but Monte Carlo is 'THE PLEASURE', AND, THANKS TO THE banque de jeu,†a THE FINANCIAL BASIS OF THE WHOLE TRINITY. Odd that these Grimaldis should have turned out to be what they have always been; formerly, they lived off piracy and one of them,†b F.I.,†c wrote to Lorenzo dei Medici saying their territory was very restricted and, moreover, barren; hence Nature had pointed the way to buccaneering; it would therefore be magnanimous on Lorenzo's part, since they did not 'venture' to hunt down Florentine vessels, if he were to guarantee them an annual 'gratuity'. CONSEQUENTLY Lorenzo paid them a small annual fee. — After the HOLY ALLIANCE'S†266 victory over Napoleon, Talleyrand, who, for his own diversion, had selected from amongst the émigrés that arch-blackguard, the ex-tyrant of Monaco,†d to be one of the companions — Talleyrand, then, thought it amusing to 'restore' him, the father of 'Florestan',†e 'au nom du principe de le légitimité'.†f The restoration of these 2 men, this COUPLE — him of Hesse-Cassel†g and him of Monaco — is worthy of a place in a new edition of Plutarch†h; at the same time, what a contrast between the German 'patriarch' and the Genoese (his main preoccupation, financial loot)!

Page Break me46.273

Page me46.273

A grievance nursed in private by our Dr Kunemann is that, when already functioning as physician in ordinary to His Most Serene Highness, the present Charles III (blind as a bat), he (Kunemann) became unacceptable as a result of his liberal principles and had to make way for an Englishman (Dr Pickering). THE SURVIVAL OF THE BEST — i.e. as a little duodecimo tyrant's physician in ordinary — to a Britisher, of course, warranted by the nature of the beast! And that is the worst; this same Dr Pickering, before being called by natural selection, he had dangerously fallen ill at Monaco, was treated and cured by Dr Kunemann. There are many such piteous dramas of destiny in this world of ours!

Page me46.273

Oddly enough, this hot weather has made my bronchial cough worse rather than better. All the greater 'pretext', of course, for catching cold! Kunemann, by the by, (and the fellow's a first-rate doctor, familiar with English, German and French medical literature, a specialist in diseases of the chest and lungs) is not of your opinion regarding my journey back to Paris. I ought not, he says, to make it by easy stages; the weather is now hot and not only during the day, the nights, too, being warm. The most likely place to catch cold now, he avers, is at railway stations and the more often I break the journey, the greater the probability of rechutes†a; rather, I ought, while in Cannes, to equip myself for the journey with 2 bottles of good old claret. Like Dr Stephann, he bases his view on the grounds that, in the treatment of pleurisy like that of bronchitis, etc., the stomach should be treated as the basis; eat well and amply even if it goes against the grain, and 'accustom' oneself to so doing; 'drink' 'decent stuff' and go for drives, etc., to distract oneself, if not allowed to walk, climb, etc., much; think as little as possible, etc.

Page Break me46.274
Page me46.274
So, having followed these 'directions', I am well on the way to 'idiocy', and for all that have not rid myself of the bronchial catarrh.
Page me46.274
A consoling thought for me is that it was bronchitis that sent old Garibaldi to his 'eternal rest'.†324 Of course, AT A CERTAIN AGE it becomes completely INDIFFERENT how one may be 'LAUNCHED INTO ETERNITY'.
Page me46.274
I have been here since 3 June,†b and shall be leaving this evening. In Nice and, on this occasion likewise in Cannes, where it is exceptional, a strong (if warm) wind and eddies of dust. Nature, too, can evince a certain philistine humour (after the manner, already humorously anticipated in the Old Testament, of the serpent feeding on dust, cf. the dusty diet of Darwin's worms†325). Similarly, there is a vein of natural wit that runs all through the Riviera's local press. On 24 May, for instance, there was a terrible orage,†c notably at Menton; lightning struck close auprés de la gare†d (of Menton) and tore the sole off a passing philistine's shoe while leaving the rest of the philistine intact.
Page me46.274
With love to all.

OLD Moor
Page me46.274
I shall not [let] friends know about my presence in Paris until I've been there a few days. It is still necessary for me to have as little 'intercourse with people'†326 as possible. I shall have a good doctor to consult in the person of Dr Dourlen.

Page me46.274
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 35, Moscow, 1964

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.275

153
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me46.275
[Postcard]

Argenteuil, 9 June 1882
11 Boulevard Thiers

DEAR FRED,

As you know, everywhere I go I must, like TICKETS OF LEAVE, report to the doctor nearest to the place where I first take up my abode.†327 Yesterday, therefore, EXAMINATION by Dr Dourlen. State of health exactly the same I left in which it was at Monte Carlo. As to the bronchite, I shall for a few weeks try the sulphurous waters of Enghien, about 15 minutes distance from Argenteuil; if this will not work, he wants to send me to the Pyrenées (Cauterets). (The same things had me already told by Dr Kunemann, who, in the last time, commenced to feed me with pastilles de sulphure.†a A specialist†b at Enghien is a special friend of Dr Dourlen to whom he will give me a letter. Generally Dr Dourlen found the tone and strength of my body much other than when I left; he was even astonished that I was in so good a condition after two rechutes et apres 14 vésicatoires.†c
Page me46.275
*Compliments to all.

Old* Moor
Page me46.275
Longuet brings me every evening the Standard, so useless to him. I have not yet written to the Gascon†d†328; my cough warns me to be careful before seeing friends.
Page me46.275
[On the side reserved for the address]

Frederick Engels, Esq.
122 Regent's Park Road,
London, N.W., Angleterre

Page me46.275
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.276

154
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me46.276
[Postcard]

[Argenteuil,] 15 June 1882

DEAR FRED,

I thought I should be able to report progress over the past week or so. But the temperature fell as soon as I arrived, in fact one day after my arrival. The weather, therefore, according to what I've been told by Dr Dourlen, as also by his MEDICAL FRIEND†a in Enghien, won't allow me to begin my sulphur treatment yet. In my former condition, during the happy time when I could smoke, I should have found the weather DELIGHTFUL. True, the sky is overcast more often than not, a bit of rain now and again, gusts of wind, not so much summer as late autumn, but nice weather for all that, if you're in good health!
Page me46.276
Yesterday — as a result of a note to St Paul the Gascon†b — he came to visit me.†328 I WAS GLAD TO SEE HIM. In compliance with my avis†c he will keep silent — until further orders — about my presence here.
Page me46.276
I go early to bed, get up late, spend a large part of the day with the children and Jennychen and take advantage of every favourable moment to go for a short stroll. All things considered I feel better than AT ANY TIME in Algiers, Monte Carlo or Cannes. It seems likely that the weather too will change for the better here. I shall write you a letter as soon as I've made my first trip to Enghien.
Page me46.276
Best wishes to everyone.

Your
Moor
Page me46.276
Tussychen has sent Jennychen an interesting eye-witness account of the Hyde Park meeting.†329
Page me46.276
[On the side reserved for the address]

Fr. Engels
122 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W., Angleterre

Page me46.276
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.277

155
MARX TO LAURA LAFARGUE†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.277
[Postcard]

Argenteuil, 17 June 1882
11 Boulevard Thiers

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL

Dearest Child,

I had previously arranged with Engels — as I since explained verbally to Paul†a — that, as soon as I was able to leave for Switzerland (probably in the latter half of July), you should accompany me. In fact I could hardly set forth on this hazardous journey ALONE. So, you see, it's plus ou moins votre devoir d'accompagner le vieux de la montagne.†b
Page me46.277
However, as I shall have to stay here for at least another 3 weeks on account of the sulphur treatment at Enghien, I trust that Helen†c and Tussy will make a SHORT TRIP here during that time. I have written to Helen and Tussy in that sense.
Page me46.277
Jennychen has invited Lafargue for tomorrow.
Page me46.277
Adio.

OLD NICK
Page me46.277
[On the side reserved for the address]

Madame Paul Lafargue
37 Tremlett Grove, Junction Road, London, N., Angleterre

Page me46.277

First published, in the language of the original (German), in Annali, an. I, Milano, 1958

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.278

156
ENGELS TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE†330
IN HOBOKEN
Page me46.278
London, 20 June 1882

Dear Sorge,

I shall attend to your business affairs within the next few days.†331 I am sending the money for the Égalité to Lafargue, who is in Paris, and shall extract a receipt from him, however irregular the form it may take. As regards The Labour Standard you'll lose nothing if I only arrange for the subscription to run from 1 July; the paper gets more pitiful all the time.
Page me46.278
Marx was in Algiers for approx. 2 months where, as I think I told you,†a he had a relapse of PLEURISY; having been cured of it, he went to Monte Carlo in Monaco and had another but milder one. He left there for Paris approx. 3 weeks ago and is now staying with his daughter, Madame Longuet, in Argenteuil near Paris whence he travels daily to Enghien to avail himself of the local sulphur springs for his chronic bronchial catarrh and cough. His general state of health is very good; as to his further MOVEMENTS, that depends entirely upon the doctors.
Page me46.278
The English translation of the Manifesto we have been sent is quite unpublishable without total revision. But you will realise that anything of the kind is inconceivable under present circumstances.
Page me46.278
I have not seen or heard anything of Leo†b for months. He's a peculiar cove who must be allowed to go his own way. I have not even got his address. Apropos, for some time I have been receiving communications for Leo from Dr Lilienthal in New York, which I can only deal with via Paris. Who is this Lilienthal?
Page me46.278
The Lassalleans' thrustfulness after their arrival in America was inevitable. People who carried the one true gospel in their pack could hardly have behaved with less pretentiousness towards those Americans still languishing in spiritual darkness. Moreover it was for them to find new ground in America to replace that which was being increasingly cut from under their feet in Germany. By way of return we are happily rid of them in Germany; in America, where everything proceeds ten times as quickly, they'll soon be bested.

Page Break me46.279

Page me46.279
I trust your eyes will improve through being spared. I too had something of the sort once and know what a vile business it is.
Page me46.279
In Germany things are going splendidly on the whole. It is true that the literary gentlemen in the party have tried to bring about a change of front, at once reactionary, bourgeois, tame and cultured, but it has proved a resounding failure. The infamies to which socialist workers everywhere have been subjected have everywhere made them much more revolutionary than they were even 3 years ago. You will have seen the details in the Sozialdemokrat. Of the leaders, Bebel is the man who behaved best over the affair. Liebknecht shilly-shallied somewhat, for not only did he himself welcome every 'eddicated' semi-social democrat with open arms while failing to run a careful eye over him, but his son-in-law, that obese sluggard Bruno Geiser, is one of the biggest wailers.†332 Because it makes short work of their literary earnings, these people would like to get rid of the Anti-Socialist Law†16 at any cost and to do so ignominiously by means of moderation and meekness, tameness and toadyism. As soon as the law is repealed (not even the bourgeois believe that it will be renewed either by the present or some other eventual Reichstag, since it has proved totally ineffective), the split will probably be brought out into the open, whereupon your Vierecks, Höchbergs, Geisers, Bloses & Co. will form a separate right wing, in which case we shall be able to negotiate with them as occasion arises, until they eventually come to grief for good and all. We said as much†a immediately after the promulgation of the Anti-Socialist Law when Höchberg and Schramm published in the Jahrbuch†333 what was, under the circumstances, a quite infamous assessment of the party's activities up till that date, and demanded that the party conduct itself in a more 'eddicated', decorous and presentable manner.†b

Page Break me46.280
Page me46.280
My regards to Adolph,†a have had no sign of life from him.
Page me46.280
Kindest regards.

Your
F. Engels
Page me46.280
Tell Adolph that Pumps has had a little girl.†b

Page me46.280
First published abridged in Briefe und Auszüge aus Briefen von Joh. Phil. Becker, Jos. Dietzgen, Friedrich Engels, Karl Marx u. A. an F.A. Sorge und Andere, Stuttgart, 1906 and in full in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVI, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

157
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL
IN LEIPZIG
Page me46.280
London, 21 June 1882

Dear Bebel,

I shall have to answer your letter from memory, having given it to Tussy for forwarding to Marx†c since when I have not seen it again.
Page me46.280
For the past 3 weeks or so Marx has been staying with his daughter†d at Argenteuil near Paris, is said to be looking very well, brown as a real 'Moor' (this being his nickname, as you know), and in very good humour, his only ailment now being a bronchial cough. In order to get rid of this he has at last had to do Vogt the favour of becoming a member of the Brimstone gang.†334 For he is undergoing a sulphur cure at the neighbouring town of Enghien. What further peregrinations he makes is for the doctors to decide.
Page me46.280
That there will ultimately be a show-down with the bourgeois-minded

Page Break me46.281
elements in the party and a parting of the ways between right and left wings is something about which I have long harboured no illusions and, indeed, had already declared desirable in my handwritten commentary†a on the Jahrbuch article. That you should have come to take the same view can only be most welcome to us. If I did not expressly mention the point in my last letter,†b it was because I saw no immediate necessity for a split of this kind. Were the gentlemen to decide of their own free will to form a separate right wing, everything would soon be in order. But they are hardly likely to do so; they know they would be an army consisting solely of officers without soldiers, like the 'Robert Blum column' which came over to us in the 1849 campaign and insisted on fighting only 'under the command of that brave man Willich'.†335 Upon our asking how many effectives went to make up this heroic column, we were told — and you can imagine our mirth — one colonel, eleven officers, a bugler and two men. On top of which the colonel was at great pains to look like a stalwart Schinderhannes and had a horse he was unable to ride. — Every one of these gentry wants to be a leader, but they can't even act the part of leader except within our party, and so they will take good care not to provoke a schism. On the other hand they know that, subject as we are to the Anti-Socialist Law,†16 we too have reasons for avoiding internal splits which we cannot debate in an open forum. Hence we shall have to put up with epistolatory and verbal cabalism and jeremiads from these people until we are again in a position to thrash out inside the country itself and before the workers those points on which we differ as to tactics and principles unless, of course, their antics are such that our hand is forced. Meanwhile the Anti-Socialist Law will, one way or another, shuffle off this mortal coil and, as soon as that's been got rid of, the position, or so it seems to me, must be fairly and squarely stated; what should be done next will automatically emerge from the attitude adopted by these gentry.

Page me46.281

Once they have organised a separate right wing we shall be able, as and when occasion arises and in so far as it is admissible, to come to an agreement with them as to common action, or even enter into a compact with them, etc. Although this is unlikely to be necessary: the schism itself will lay bare their impotence. They have neither adherents amongst the masses, nor talent, nor knowledge — all they have is pretensions, and those in plenty. However, we shall have to wait and see. Whatever happens, it will serve to elucidate the situation and we shall be rid of an element that in no way belongs to us.

Page Break me46.282

Page me46.282

There is no need to fear that, in such a case, we shall no longer have any presentable candidates for the Reichstag. That is a pure figment. If a working man in the Reichstag now and then says I when he ought to say me, all we need ask is how long the Hohenzollerns, let alone field marshals, have been able to distinguish between I and me. Frederick William III and his adored Louise perpetrated more howlers in the matter of I and me than did even A. Kapell. And if Bismarck isn't afraid of appointing to his economics council workers who speak ungrammatically, but vote grammatically, can we afford to jib? But I know that to many it's an abomination. To us not in the least. And it would put an end to the utterly senseless practice of our deputies, which is supposed to be 'democratic' but isn't, whereby every man must speak in turn. How could any party possess as many good parliamentary speakers as that, and what is supposed to happen when there are, say, 200 of our men in the Reichstag?

Page me46.282

But of one thing you may be sure: When it comes to a show-down with these gentry and the party's left wing declares itself, we shall go along with you whatever the circumstances, and do so actively and with our visors up. If I did not contribute to the Sozialdemokrat in my own name before,†336 this was due solely to the influence so long exerted upon the paper by these people and the prolonged absence of any guarantee that they would not regain it.

Page me46.282

As you know, there's a split in the workers' party in Paris. The Égalité people (our best, Guesde, Deville, Lafargue, etc.) were unceremoniously thrown out by those on the Prolétaire (Malon, Brousse, etc.) at the recent congress of the Centre of France. The Sozialdemokrat rightly censured this procedure in a passage which the Égalité translated. Thereupon the Prolétaire replied, saying that its own point of view concerning this matter had been put to the German party leadership with whom it had since been in complete accord.†337 Do you know anything about this? The Prolétaire people are the most egregious liars; but on the other hand I recall all too many instances of stupendous blunders perpetrated in the Leipzig Volksstaat and Vorwärts in regard to French affairs and persons. Can you tell me anything about what actually happened? I shall try and let you have the cutting from the Prolétaire. Malon, Brousse & Co. are finding their labours as workers' candidates unduly tedious and are therefore consorting with sundry radical bourgeois and literati, and inviting others of that ilk to join forces with them; they imagine that they will thereby get themselves elected more quickly. They are fighting the Égalité with the same old infamous weapons used by the Bakuninists.

Page Break me46.283

Your
F.E.

Page me46.283
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

158
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me46.283
[Argenteuil,] 22 June 1882

DEAR FRED,

Your letter†284 arrived no more than a minute or two before the post which goes damned early. Hence only a few words.
Page me46.283
I have not been able to REPORT PROGRESS until today because the sulphur operations were suspended from Sunday†a until yesterday inclusive on account of the rainy weather and did not begin again until today. AT PRESENT TIME it's devilish cold at Cauterets and the season there doesn't NORMALLY begin until the middle of JULY. So in the event Enghien has proved most opportune, although up till now the weather has not been good enough to permit UNINTERRUPTED use of the institution thermale. Other people, who need not be careful about a

Page Break me46.284
'résidu',†a wouldn't have to bother so much. Dr Dourlen says that the whole difficulty lies in avoiding anything that might cause a recurrence of pleurisy.

Page me46.284
Let the chaps in New York go ahead with their own 'reprint', though they must take care that there are no unauthorised additions.†338
Page me46.284
We shall, then, expect Helen†b on Sunday.
Page me46.284
It is still too early — for I must fight shy of all lengthy conversations just now — to advise Lavrov of my presence. He's just the man to make me prattle on for hours.
Page me46.284
Love to Jennychen.†c

Your
K.M.

Page me46.284
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

159
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me46.284
[Postcard]

[Argenteuil,] 24 June 1882

DEAR FRED,

I got the REGISTERED LETTER yesterday; today I realised it in Paris. As a result of the present changeable weather I had an attack of muscular rheumatism in the region of my hips; as a result of this and other things a sleepless night from the 22nd to the 23rd on account of severe pain. No food the next day (though absolved my sulphur inhalation at Enghien yesterday); Dourlen called in the evening and helped by embrocating me with laudanum; ALL RIGHT now as regards this INCIDENT, except that slight twinges of muscular rheumatism still persist.
Page me46.284
As regards Enghien the first question to be answered — for this depends upon the individual — is whether the local sulphur spring is strong enough. AT ALL EVENTS Reinhardt got rid of his bronchitis here, like Longuet before him. The latter was also at Cauterets at an earlier time long before his marriage. Its height above the sea level 1200-1400 métres about. I should be very glad if I should not want it for the bronchial catarrh; at all events Cauterets was out of the question for this time. Helen†a will arrive at St Lazare gare oú†b Longuet there to receive her.

Page Break me46.285

Page me46.285
Salut.

Your
Moor
Page me46.285
[On the side reserved for the address]

F. Engels. Esq.
122 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W.

Page me46.285
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

160
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†339
IN ZURICH
Page me46.285
[London, 26 June 1882]

...In Ireland there are two tendencies within the movement, the first and earliest being the agrarian. Out of organised brigandage, backed by the farmers, on the part of the clan chiefs whom the English had dispossessed, and the big Catholic landowners (in the 17th century these brigands were called Tories, a name that has descended by direct line to the Tories of today), there gradually evolved an indigenous resistance, organised according to locality and province, on the part of the farmers against the interloping English landlords. The names — RIBBONMEN, WHITEBOYS, CAPTAIN ROCK, CAPTAIN MOONLIGHT,†340

Page Break me46.286
etc. — have changed, the form the resistance has taken — the shooting, not only of hated LANDLORDS and agents (collectors in the LANDLORDS' service), but also of those farmers who take over a farm from others who have been forcibly evicted, — BOYCOTTING, threatening letters, nocturnal attacks with intimidation, etc. — all this has been going on for as long as the English have owned land in Ireland, i.e. at least since the end of the 17th century. This form of resistance is irrepressible, cannot be curbed by force and will disappear only with its causes. But by its nature it is local and sporadic, nor can it ever become a general form of political struggle.

Page me46.286

The period immediately after the Union (1800)†109 saw the beginnings of the liberal-national opposition of the urban bourgeoisie who, as in every agrarian country with small towns in process of decay (e.g. Denmark), found their natural leaders in the lawyers. The latter also need the farmers; hence they have to invent slogans to attract the farmers. Thus O'Connell lit, first, upon Catholic emancipation,†341 and then upon the Repeal of the Union. Latterly supporters of this trend have been forced by the infamies of the landowners to adopt a different course. Whereas, in the social sphere, the Land League†139 pursues more revolutionary (and in this instance attainable) aims, namely the total elimination of the interloping LANDLORDS, its political posture is, if anything, rather tame since its only demand is HOME-RULE, i.e. a local Irish parliament alongside and subject to the parliament of the Empire. This, too, is undoubtedly attainable by constitutional means. The frightened landlords are already clamouring for (and the Tories themselves proposing) the speediest possible redemption of farmland in order to save what can still be saved, while Gladstone, for his part, is declaring a greater measure of self-government for Ireland to be altogether admissible.
Page me46.286

After the American Civil War these two tendencies were infiltrated by a third — Fenianism.†312 The hundreds of thousands of Irish soldiers and officers who fought in that war did so with the ulterior motive of building up an army for the liberation of Ireland. The dissension between England and America after the war became the Fenians' principal lever. Should war supervene, Ireland would, within a few months, be either a member of the United States or a republic under the latter's protection. The sum which England so willingly undertook to pay and did pay during the Alabama negotiations with the Geneva arbitrators†342 was the price at which American intervention in Ireland was bought off.

Page Break me46.287
Page me46.287

As from that moment, the principal danger was eliminated. The police were enough to keep the Fenians in order. In this they were helped by the betrayals inseparable from any conspiracy, and yet it was only the leaders who betrayed, going on to become downright spies and falsifiers of evidence. The leaders who got away to America indulged in émigré revolutionary politics there and, for the most part, went to seed like O'Donovan Rossa. All of this — if, of course, on an exaggerated American scale — will seem very familiar to anyone who witnessed the European emigration over here between 1849 and 1852.
Page me46.287

There can be no doubt that many Fenians have now come home again and have revived the former armed organisation. They provide an important impulse within the movement and compel the liberals to adopt a more resolute posture. But otherwise they achieve nothing unless it be to frighten John Bull. True, the latter is growing perceptibly weaker on the periphery of his empire, but as close to home as this he is still in a position to suppress with ease any kind of Irish rebellion. For a start there is, in Ireland, a permanent 'CONSTABULARY' 14,000 strong, equipped with rifles and bayonets and having had a military training. Then some 30,000 line troops who could easily be reinforced by an equal number of line and English militia. In addition, the navy. And in suppressing rebellion, John Bull's brutality is without equal. In the absence of a foreign war or the threat thereof, an Irish uprising has not the remotest prospect of success; and here only two powers might constitute a threat — France and, to a far greater degree, the United States. France is out of the question. In America the parties are coquetting with the Irish vote; they make many promises but abide by none. Nor have they any intention of involving themselves in a war on Ireland's behalf. It even serves their interests that conditions in Ireland should be such as to encourage massive Irish emigration to America. And it is understandable that a country which, in 20 years' time, will be the most populous, wealthy and powerful in the world, should feel small inclination to rush headlong into adventures which could and would upset its gigantic internal development. In 20 years' time it will have completely changed its tune.

Page me46.287

But should the danger of a war with America arise, England would give the Irish anything they asked, and with both hands — saving only complete independence which, in view of that country's geographical position, is not at all desirable.
Page me46.287

Accordingly the only recourse remaining to the Irish is the constitutional method of gradual conquest, whereby one position is taken after another; and here the lurking presence of armed Fenian conspiracy can still furnish a most effective element. But these very Fenians are being increasingly impelled into a kind of Bakuninism; the only purpose to be served by the assassination of Burke and Cavendish was the frustration of the compromise between the Land League and Gladstone. In the circumstances, however, that compromise would have been the best thing for Ireland. Because of rent arrears the LANDLORDS are evicting the tenants from house and home in their tens of thousands and are doing so under the protection of the military. To check this systematic depopulation of Ireland (those who are evicted either starve to death or have to go to America) is the prime necessity just now. Gladstone is prepared to table a Bill whereby arrears will be paid on lines similar to the redemption of feudal taxes in Austria in 1848 — one-third by the farmer, one-third by the state, one-third written off by the LANDLORDS. That is the Land League's own proposal. Thus the 'heroic deed' of Phoenix Park appears to be, if not†a sheer folly, at all events a piece of pure Bakuninist, histrionic, senseless 'propagande par le fait'.†b If its consequences have not been the same as those of the similar follies perpetrated by Hödel and Nobiling,†120 this has been due solely to the fact that Ireland does not, as yet, lie within the purlieus of Prussia. Hence it must be left to the Bakuninists and Mostians to place such puerilities on a par with the execution of Alexander II, and to pose the threat of an 'Irish revolution' that never happens.

Page Break me46.288
Page me46.288

One more thing that should be noted about Ireland: never praise an Irishman — politician — unconditionally or give him your unqualified support, until he's dead. Celtic blood and the habitual exploitation of the farmers (after all, in Ireland this constitutes the sole livelihood of all the 'educated' classes, and of the lawyers in particular) make professional Irish politicians exceedingly prone to corruption. In return for his agitation, O'Connell got the farmers to pay him £30,000 a year no less. When England effected the Union at a cost of £1,000,000 in bribes, one of those who had been bribed was reproached with having sold his country. Says he: 'Aye, and damned glad I was to have a country I could sell.'

Page me46.288

The infamies perpetrated against our people by the German governments, police and judges are gradually assuming a character that makes even the strongest language employed in condemning them look insipid. But since language is not necessarily given added emphasis by forceful expressions, and the repeated use of the same expressions such as scoundrel, etc., detracts from the effect, so that one has to have recourse to ever more 'forceful' expressions and thus lapse into the style of Most-Schneidt,†343 it would be desirable to adopt a method whereby forcefulness of expression would be assured even in the absence of intemperate language. And that method exists; it consists primarily in the use of irony, derision, sarcasm, which have a more deadly effect on an opponent than the crudest expressions of indignation. I think the Sozialdemokrat would be well advised to adopt the old, predominantly derisive style whenever this is feasible, as indeed was done in the last number. An occasional application of the cudgel would then be all the more effective. Bebel is also in complete agreement with me here. And, besides, your present correspondents already-attend pretty adequately to lurid descriptions of events.

Page Break me46.289
Page me46.289

In response to the Égalité's translation of the passage in the Sozialdemokrat about the expulsion of their people from the Congrés du Centre, the Prolétaire published a pharisaical article about an échange de lettres courtoises entre le Comité extérieur du parti ouvrier socialiste allemand et le Comité national français.†a†344 Can you tell me anything about this? I was quite unaware of the existence of a Comité extérieur; might it perhaps be the much-celebrated Communications Office†345?
Page me46.289

The Bataille is on its last legs — c'est une défaite, et méritée.†b Lissagaray has proved totally unfit to be a journalist and he, like his collaborators, Malon and Brousse, appeals to the Parisians' chauvinistic Germanophobia vis-á-vis Guesde, etc., Marxistes, nébulosités allemandes,†c etc. None of which has deterred Lissagaray from informing the Citoyen's proprietor†d of his desire to join the editorial department! Needless to say the editorial department instantly turned him down (this privatim).
Page me46.289

Marx is in Argenteuil with his daughter,†e hiding away from Paris and availing himself of the sulphur springs in Enghien for his chronic bronchitis and cough; otherwise he is well and cheerful, but must still take great care of himself.

Page Break me46.290
Page me46.290

Did Adolf Beust give you Mirabeau's Secret History of the Court of Berlin which I gave him to pass on to you? The book will be very useful to the Sozialdemokrat.

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.290
First published abridged in Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 29, 13 July 1882 and in full, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the newspaper and the extant part of the original

Published in English in full for the first time

161
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.290
[Postcard, unsigned]

[Argenteuil,] 4 JULY 1882

DEAR FRED,

Summer did not actually begin until the 1ST of JULY (or RATHER THE SECOND ONLY). Up till now I've had 2 sulphur baths with douches, the 3rd will be tomorrow; never before have I encountered anything as magnificent as the shower-bath (alias douche); one climbs out of the bath on to a slightly raised board, and this en 'nature'†a; the bath attendant then manipulates the spray (about the size of a fire extinguisher) like a virtuoso his instrument, dictates the movements of the corpus and bombards all PARTS of that corpus in turn (SAVE THE HEAD, (the cranium)) for 180 seconds (alias 3 MINUTES) now with greater, now with lesser force, even unto the legs and feet incl. in an ever mounting CRESCENDO.
Page me46.290
As you will see, there is little inducement here for a man to write. I have to be at the RAILWAY by half past eight in the morning (i.e. THIS THE TIME OF LEAVING EXACTLY FOR Enghien), back to Argenteuil ABOUT 12 O'CLOCK, déjeuner†b shortly afterwards; aprés†c a great need for rest, as this sulphur is tiring in whatever form; then out and about, etc. The air in the inhalation room is murky with sulphurous vapours; 30-40 MINUTES'

Page Break me46.291
spell here; every 5 minutes, at a special table, one inhales steam laden with specially pulverised sulphur (from one of the pipes (zinc) with stopcocks); each man encased in caoutchouc†a from head to foot; after which they march in file round the table; innocent scene from Dante's inferno.

Page me46.291
Regards to Schorlemmer. I still have a photograph of me for him, taken in Algiers.
Page me46.291
Lafargue regards himself as a gros†b oracle here. Paris is for him THE ONLY PLACE OF THE WORLD WORTH MANHOOD.
Page me46.291
[On the side reserved for the address]

Fr. Engels
122 Regent's Park Road London, N.W., Angleterre

Page me46.291
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

162
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN
IN ZURICH
Page me46.291
London, 15 July 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

I am replying to your last letter straight away as there would otherwise be a 3 days' gap on account of the Sunday postal arrangements.
Page me46.291
I was shown the Mehringiad†346 by an acquaintance here and at once recognised both author and prompter. Ever since the time his plans for the Sozialdemokrat went so completely awry because of the presence of yourself and Bebel, Hirsch†c has been working himself up into a ludicrous rage against the 'Zurich people'. We have often enough given him the broadest hints to the effect that we were not in accord with him in this respect; rather, anything he did, he did on his own responsibility, but this has helped only to the extent that he doesn't pester us with his lamentations. He has, by the way, been back in Paris (on sufferance) for some considerable time, and last Saturday (8 July) married a certain Miss Lina Haschert.

Page Break me46.292
Page me46.292
As for the actual contents of the thing, there is no reason for us to intervene. Mehring has treated the world to so many lies about us that, were we to deny just one of them, it would be tantamount to an admission that all the rest were true. For years we have let all this mendacious tittle-tattle pass unheeded, unless absolute necessity compelled us to reply. Our people have the Volks-Zeitung at their disposal, so all that is needed is a communication to the effect that an article of mine, signed by me, appeared in the Sozialdemokrat of ? June.†347 That is the best way to reply. You yourself can, of course, also refer to it in the Sozialdemokrat as you intended, and say that Marx and I always agree beforehand on any public move we make. I'm very glad that the article in the Sozialdemokrat appeared at this precise moment; it will knock all these inanities on the head.

Page me46.292

On the other hand I think you would be well advised to leave Höchberg out of it. After all, he simply wants to appear as a private individual and hence will be able to conduct his own defence if he thinks it necessary. I don't know whether it would be doing him a service to rake up the old affair of the Jahrbuch article, etc.†a — should there be doubts within the party about our position, we might be compelled to revert to it, though I for one think it quite unnecessary.

Page me46.292

Since Marx leads a completely secluded existence in Argenteuil and keeps his presence there as secret as possible, he has seen nothing of Hirsch, at least so far as I know, nor is he in any way anxious to do so. Marx needs peace and quiet, and I shall not therefore bother him with all this business before it proves absolutely necessary, i.e. before Hirsch forms any further cabals.

Page me46.292

Kautsky has written me one, indeed two, long letters†348 about everything under the sun. However, as I have already told you,†b I no longer have the time for such lengthy correspondence and to be able to investigate and reply to this or that I should, what's more, actually have to embark on specialised studies. That is the whole reason for my silence.

Page Break me46.293

Page me46.293

I know absolutely nothing of value about Chartism.†159 If I could persuade our old friend Harney in Boston (ex-editor of The Northern Star) to write a history of Chartism, he would be the man.

Page me46.293

Kindest regards.

Yours,
F. Engels

Page me46.293

I myself have been so much out of touch with Hirsch that I have no occasion whatever to give him my views on this business. If occasion arose, I should of course do so.

Page me46.293

First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

163
ENGELS TO ADOLF HEPNER†349
IN NEW YORK
Page me46.293
[Draft]

London, 25 July 1882

Dear Mr Hepner,

My delay in replying has been due to Marx's illness and frequent changes of abode. It was not until recently that I was able to correspond with him about business matters. Our views†a on your projected undertaking†350 are as follows:
Page me46.293
As you are fully entitled in law to reprint anything that appears in Europe, you would, in our opinion, do best to go ahead and exercise that right without asking anybody. If you wish to reprint the Communist Manifesto we can have no objection whatever, nor would it occur to us to protest against it, provided there were no changes or omissions — in any case inadmissible in an historical document — or unless compelled to do so by unwarranted notes. We cannot write a preface, not only because we are not together, but also, and still more, because we should thereby be identifying ourselves to some extent with an undertaking which we are not in a position either to supervise or to control, nor, indeed, might we wish to do so. As it is, you will be entirely at liberty to reprint anything else you wish, without our ever having cause to complain of the company in which our works appear.

Page Break me46.294
Page me46.294
The same applies to my Condition of the Working Class. If you reprint it as it stands I can have no objection. Were I, however, to give you my special consent, I should be obliged to provide the addenda and notes needed to bring the book up to date, and that would be 6 months' work. Moreover I should require prior guarantees that the undertaking, once begun, would be brought to a conclusion.
Page me46.294
I trust I have convinced you that it would be in your best interests to go ahead on your own. We shall certainly not place any obstacle in the way of the undertaking unless compelled to do so; rather the reverse.
Page me46.294

As regards a new abridgement of Capital, Marx has had so many unpleasant experiences with this kind of thing that no further approaches should be made to him about the matter, especially not at the moment. However (this in confidence) Marx has purged the second edition of Most's abridgement†351 of its grosser errors and made a few addenda, so that this edition is not without its merits and could be reprinted.
Page me46.294

Otherwise there is little that I can recommend for reprinting. The literature produced by Leipzig consists largely in the socialism of the future and doctoral dissertations by parliamentary candidates. Jules Guesde's French stuff is good on the whole, but too closely geared to French conditions. Bracke's Nieder mit den Sozialdemokraten! is perhaps not suitable for America. Bebel's parliamentary speeches are by far the best thing that Germany has produced in our line, but they are, of course, made for the occasion. Lassalle teems with economic howlers and his whole viewpoint was superseded long ago. Bracke's Lassalle'scher Vorschlag is a pretty good piece of criticism, though not exhaustive.
Page me46.294

Well, it's for you to choose. Wishing your undertaking the best of luck,

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.294
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.295

164
ENGELS TO PYOTR LAVROV
IN PARIS
Page me46.295
[Postcard]

[London,] 31 July 1882

My dear Lavrov,

I should have thanked you long since for sending me the Russian Manifesto,†352 but I couldn't very well write to you without giving you news of Marx and he had expressly forbidden me to tell anyone in Paris, no matter whom, that he was in Argenteuil. Unfortunately the prohibition of the doctors, who have given him strict instructions to talk as little as possible, means he is still in solitary confinement.
Page me46.295

Kovalevsky called while I was out. He only saw Miss Marx†a and left no address. He must have departed a few days after his arrival, but I have absolutely no idea what route he took. It would seem that he intended to return to his own country. Miss Marx is at Argenteuil; if you wrote to Longuet, perhaps you might be able to learn more.

Yours ever,
F.E.
Page me46.295
[On the side reserved for the address]

Monsieur P. Lavroff
328 rue St Jacques Paris France

Page me46.295
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.296

165
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me46.296
Argenteuil, jeudi, 3 août†a 1882
11 Boulevard Thiers

DEAR FRED,

The difficulty over letter-writing is due to the following: at 7.30 a.m. I start off by washing and dressing myself, taking early morning coffee, etc.; at 8.30 a.m. departure for Enghien, not as a rule returning before noon, then déjeuner en famille†b at Argenteuil; from 2-4 p.m., rest, then a walk and pottering about with the children with consequences more detrimental to one's faculties of sight and hearing (let alone thought) than were ever experienced even by the Hegel of the Phänomenologie; finally, at 8 p.m., evening SUPPER, thereby concluding the day's work. So when would one find time for correspondence?
Page me46.296
Tussychen is being of enormous help to Jennychen, nor could her stay here really be considered as a rest cure if she were not so fond of the children†c and of poor

Jennychen and evincing in these particular circumstances qualities which lie dormant in London. Tussy and Laura have not seen one another yet and aren't exactly longing to do so. But for decency's sake they will have to meet at least once while I am here.
Page me46.296

Now for a health bulletin. My cure began on 17 June. The weather up till now has been so far below the average for summer (French) that the season which starts in June in Enghien is regarded as a FAILURE by the établissement thermal†d and something 'better' is looked for in August and September. Constant changes of temperature, the sky often heavily overcast, particularly in the mornings after rain and orages,†e violent winds, moisture-laden atmosphere and hence often une chaleur lourde,†f alias London's 'CLOSE' STATUS. The French have been at pains to stave off an alliance with England†353; by contrast, the English climate (I MEAN specifically the London climate) would seem to be making itself increasingly at home here, in Paris and environs. Such is the case this year at any rate. In between times, of course, we have an occasional fine day, or fragments thereof. In these circumstances my cure is having to contend with 'agreeable obstacles'. As Lenchen will recall, there was one particular day when Dr Feugier's examination, and the one undertaken a few hours later by Dr Dourlen, resulted in the same verdict: the râlements†a had disappeared and this meant the 'bronchial' character of the catarrh had been eliminated. I didn't pass on 'such matters' to you; I suspected that the said bronchial catarrh had by no means croaked its last, and, indeed, during a brief spell of bad weather, it began to croak anew. That the cough hadn't 'disappeared' (though greatly alleviated, of course), I was aware, but didn't much mind about what remained of the cough once its character had changed.

Page Break me46.297
Page me46.297

Indeed, upon auscultating me last Monday (31 July), Dr Feugier found that the râle was still there, although grown fainter; the weather, he said, was especially malign and harmful in the case of these particular complaints. As a rule, patients only continue the sulphur cure for 3 weeks; indeed, many people cannot tolerate it for a longer period without the risk of feverish attacks, etc. In view of my otherwise strong constitution and since I am still troubled by a cough, especially of a morning, he thought it best to continue the cure until the middle of August, with INHALATION, BATHS, DOUCHES and the drinking of sulphurous waters; no purpose would be served by prolonging it beyond that date. I shall, of course, follow the doctor's advice. On the other hand, however, it will by then probably be too late for the Engadine plan†354; both Feugier and Dourlen are afraid that I might otherwise expose myself to climatic ADVENTURES which a man, above all one in my condition, would do better not to invite unnecessarily. — I hope you will in any case come and spend a few days here (in which case the Lafargues would easily find you accommodation in Paris), not only so that we may confer about que faire aprés,†b but more especially, you must understand, because I long to see you again after all these DAMNED vésicatoires†c and one or two very close shaves!
Page me46.297

Laurachen wrote and told me that Deville is leaving for his home town of Tarbes on the evening of 2 August. But since I had expressed a desire to see him, Mesa proposed we should come to déjeuner†d with him on 2 August, when I should meet, besides the Lafargues, also Deville and Guesde. This was the first time that I had agreed to such a meeting. (It is always the livelier talk, and/or chatter which tells on me — after the event.) Went off well. The Citoyen people seem to me to be succeeding with their public MEETINGS on the Egyptian, etc., affaires†355; however, as far as the performance of their paper is concerned, ils laissent beaucoup á désirer.†a Incidentally, and aside from the self-styled socialist journals, a large and most influential part of the Paris press is incomparably more independent than that of London. Despite pressure from most of the PROFESSIONAL POLITICIANS, despite collusion between the République Française, the Temps and the Journal des Débats, working hand-in-glove under the immediate direction of Gambetta; despite, what is more, the attempts at bribery by the FINANCIERS (Rothschilds, etc.) who have an immediate interest in joining the English crusade against Egypt, the Paris press has quashed every attempt (even Freycinet's disguised ones†356) at joint intervention with England or with a Quadruple Alliance†357; without that press, Clemenceau would not have won his victory in parliament. But where in London is there even a modicum of an 'independent' press?

Page Break me46.298
Page me46.298

I cannot in fact remember where Loria's grandes†b opus†c is to be found in my library; nor would it seem to me worth your while taking the trouble to look for it. As you know, after reading the 'opus' (or RATHER the first half of the book, for I hadn't the patience to do more than skim through the 2nd half containing Mr Loria's fantasies about how his ideal norm, small landed property, i.e. smallholdings, could adequately be constructed), I was far from edified by the sickening covert flattery vis-á-vis myself and the overt assumption of 'superiority' not to mention falsification of certain of my views the better to refute them. Yet, though my first reaction was that I wanted to have no truck with him, I allowed myself to become further involved because he showed talent, because he had done a lot of swotting; because he was a poor devil who had written to me at length about his thirst for knowledge; because he was still very young and his admittedly far from youthful tendencies — they were, if anything, wise beyond his years — seemed understandable in view, partly of conditions in Italy, and partly of the school from which he derived; also because he sought to make his own, in so far as in him lay and not always without success, the methods of research he had found in Capital. I was 'amused' and pleased by his way of openly preening himself on having 'antiquated' Capital with his 'landed property'. For all that, I still harbour serious doubts about the young man's character.

Page Break me46.299
Page me46.299

After I had read through these 2 pamphlets,†a however, and a couple of days after Tussy's arrival here, I gave her my very categorical and final verdict — in words — I give you three guesses! — in the exactly same terms which the said Tussychen was amazed to find again, word for word, in your letter of 31 July which I showed her! Thus we, you and I, not only came to exactly the same conclusion, but formulated the same in exactly the same way! Such being the case, we can, in future, only adopt an attitude of ironical aloofness towards him, without in any way becoming further involved in the business! He is far worse than the Kauzkitten,†b who at least has the best of intentions.

Page me46.299

Apropos Hirsch. If he really has collaborated with Mehring,†346 the party will never forgive him. Should I see him, I shall ask him pointblank. Come to that, as regards the controversy over my status, it would have been better had nothing been said. What are the workers to believe, unless it be that I was, so to speak, shamming sick, and had squandered all that time and money without good reason?
Page me46.299

Next week the Lafargues are moving into their proper quarters which are said to be very pleasant, and cheap as local logements†c go.
Page me46.299

Au revoir, OLD BOY. My love also to Lenchen.

Your
Moor

Page me46.299
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

166
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER
IN GENEVA
Page me46.299
London, 9 August 1882

Dear Old Man,

I had no opportunity yesterday of taking out a money order for you. But I did so first thing today and you will be paid £5 sterling over there, which, according to the table, equals 126 frs. I was very glad to get another letter from you†358 and hear how you are getting on. I, too, would give I don't know how much if you, Marx and I could foregather once more, but this year it's unlikely I shall have any such luck. There might still be a chance of your seeing Marx this summer, but that depends on where the doctors send him. I shall have to postpone the rest of my reply for a day or two as it's nearly time for the post and I still have to write at some length to Bernstein about this and that.

Page Break me46.300
Page me46.300

In the meantime keep yourself hale and hearty as always. Kindest regards.

Your old friend
F. Engels

Page me46.300
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

167
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†359
IN ZURICH
Page me46.300
London, 9 August 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

Today just a few comments in great haste, as I shall be going to the seaside in a few days' time and my hands are absolutely full.
Page me46.300
1. A German edition of Socialisme utopique et socialisme scientifique is something I have long had in mind, particularly now that I have seen what a regular revolution the thing has wrought in the minds of many of the better people in France.†360 I am glad that we see eye to eye here. The only thing is that the German text, because more concentrated, is appreciably more difficult than the French from which quite a lot is omitted. To popularise the work without prejudice to the substance, and in such a way as to make it fit for general use as a propaganda pamphlet is a difficult task; however, I shall do the best I can at the seaside. When shall you be able to start printing and how long will the impression take? I must, of course, be sent the proofs (in duplicate, as in France, which has a number of advantages).

Page Break me46.301
Page me46.301
2. Naturally you would have thought that, in view of our old friendship, Liebknecht was really within his rights in asking you to hand over my letter†a to him, and that you were under an obligation to put it at his disposal. I can find nothing to complain about in that. Nor could you know that, of the many differences I have had with Liebknecht, four-fifths were due to similar high-handed acts on his part, to the public misuse of private letters, to notes, etc., on my articles that were either silly or ran immediately counter to the sense of the passage. On this occasion, too, he has made unjustifiable use of my letter. That letter was written with specific reference to your article.†339 Liebknecht treated it as though it were 'my' account of the Irish question as a whole. Frightfully easy and all the more so if one trots out in refutation Davitt's speeches which had not as yet been made at all at the time the letter was written and, indeed, have no bearing at all on that letter, Davitt and his state ownership of land having hitherto been no more than a straw in the wind. But Liebknecht always takes this kind of easy way out when trying to come the 'top dog'. Now, I don't begrudge him his fun, but he ought not to misuse my letters for the purpose and in this way he has compelled me to request you in future (let me try to make this sound as formally diplomatic as possible) de lui donner — tout au plus — lecture de mes lettres sans cependant lui abandonner l'original ni lui en laisser copie.†b

Page me46.301

3. I have passed on to Marx, in as humorous a form as possible, the substance of the Hirsch-Mehringiad†346 and I fear that, should little Carl†c see Marx, he will go through a not altogether agreeable quarter of an hour.

Page me46.301

4. I should say that, in the Egyptian affair,†355 you take the so-called National Party rather too much under your wing.†361 We don't know much about Arabi, but I'd wager 10 to 1 that he is a run-of-the-mill Pasha who begrudges the financial chaps their tax revenue because he would, in good oriental fashion, sooner pocket it himself. Here we have the same old story as in all agrarian countries. From Ireland to Russia, from Asia Minor to Egypt, the peasant of an agrarian country is there to be exploited. It has been the same since the time of the Assyrian and Persian empires. The satrap, alias pasha, is the eastern prototype of the exploiter, as are the business men and jurists in the west today. REPUDIATION of the Khedive's†362 debts may be all right, but the question is, what then? And we West European socialists ought not to allow ourselves to be so easily duped as the Egyptian fellaheen†363 or as — all Latins. Strange. All Latin revolutionaries lament the fact that their revolutions invariably redound to someone else's advantage — quite simply because they have always been taken in by the word 'revolution'. And yet it's hardly possible for a scrap to break out anywhere without revolutionary Latins raving about it with one voice — and quite uncritically. As I see it, we can perfectly well enter the arena on behalf of the oppressed fellaheen without sharing their current illusions (for a peasant population has to be fleeced for centuries before it learns from experience), and against the brutality of the English without, for all that, espousing the cause of those who are currently their military opponents. The utmost caution should be observed in making use of the politically emotional French and Italian party papers in all questions of international politics; we Germans, however, now we have attained superiority where theory is concerned, are duty bound to preserve it in this sphere also by the exercise of criticism.

Page Break me46.302

Page me46.302

But now, enough of criticism. Unfortunately I haven't got sufficient time left today to send you a contribution for the feuilleton.†364 I am particularly keen to prove to our good little Carl in black and white what tremendous piffle it was he fobbed off on Mehring about my relations with the Sozialdemokrat. However, you will get it before long and may then, if you like — it's all the same to me — make some direct allusion to it in a note, without, of course, actually mentioning our little Carl, who must surely by now be panting for cooling streams.†a

Page me46.302
Well, my kindest regards. If at all possible, I shall also send you a letter from the coast for ce brave†b Kautsky whose address, or such as I have, is of somewhat ancient date. The last one was that of some lassie with a French name — a genuine accommodation address, I trust.

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.302
First published in full, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.303

168
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.303
[Argenteuil,] jeudi,†a 10 August 1882

DEAR FRED,

Next Tuesday Dr Feugier will be letting me know whether I am to quit Enghien for good or carry on as I have been doing for another day or so.
Page me46.303
Unfortunately I must first — supposing I (and Laura) go from here to Switzerland (Vevey or some such place is recommended) — have an additional MONETARY SUBSIDY. For I discovered by chance that Jenny is under severe pressure from her LANDLORD (and it's no laughing matter here) for the rent, and today I had the utmost difficulty in getting her to accept enough money to settle the business.
Page me46.303
Furthermore, I am hoping that Johnny will go to London with Tussy (the only opposition comes from Longuet, who doesn't care a damn whether it's a respite for Jennychen or good for Johnny), in which case I shall have to give Tussy some extra money to take the lad for a couple of weeks to the seaside in England. Monsieur Longuet's main objection to letting us have Johnny for six months is that, for reasons of health, Johnny ought to go to the seaside in Normandy whither he would accordingly be accompanied by Longuet to stay with OLD Madame Longuet†b at Caen.
Page me46.303

In fact, Johnny is running wild here and has, in France, forgotten such rudiments of reading, writing, etc., as he had. He has grown naughty out of boredom (i.e. [for want of] occupation) and gives Jennychen more trouble than the 3 younger ones.†c Monsieur Longuet does 'nothing' for the child, but his 'love' consists in not letting him out of his sight during the brief intervals when he himself is visible, for in Argenteuil he usually spends the morning in bed and leaves for Paris again at 5 in the afternoon.
Page me46.303
In view of what lies ahead of Jennychen,†365 it will be absolutely impossible for him to restrain young Johnny. Tussy is AN EXCELLENT DISCIPLINARIAN and will bring him to heel again. So at least we can put paid to Longuet's 'objection' that Johnny cannot go to England (where Tussy would also send him to school) because he must go 'to the seaside'; he is to go 'to the seaside', but do so in England.

Page Break me46.304
Page me46.304
Aside from the aforementioned expenses, I shall not, after paying the doctor†a and buying various necessities, have very much left for the trip from here to Switzerland. I hate squeezing you like this, but am forced to do so if I am not to come straight back to London.
Page me46.304
Salut.

Moor
Page me46.304
The announcement in the French, i.e. Parisian, newspapers, starting with the Temps, that Liebknecht was on his way to Paris, 'to establish contact with the German workers and visit the socialist, Karl Marx, who is now living at Argenteuil after his return from Algiers',†b this note, I say, and the way it was couched, smacked of the 'police' and was too indiscreet even for Liebknecht. If he should still find me here, I shall tell him exactly what I think of his 'indiscretion' (it's all due to his wanting to make himself look important).

Page me46.304
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

169
ENGELS TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE
IN HOBOKEN
Page me46.304
London, 10 August 1882

Dear Sorge,

Herewith receipt from the Égalité; I haven't been able to obtain a better one for you from that remarkably businesslike office. Since Laura Lafargue moved to Paris, we over here no longer see or hear anything of that paper. The amount paid was 14/-.

Page Break me46.305
Page me46.305

The Labour Standard, 1 July-5 August, goes off today in 2 parcels. It would be madness for you to take out a separate subscription to the thing. I shall simply send you my copy instead of throwing it into the waste-paper basket.

Page me46.305

Marx still at Argenteuil,†327 undergoing a sulphur cure in Enghien for chronic bronchitis. He still has to take considerable precautions against a recurrence of pleurisy. As for the rest, only the doctors know, or again they may not.

Page me46.305

In great haste.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.305
First published abridged in Briefe und Auszüge aus Briefen von Joh. Phil. Becker, Jos. Dietzgen, Friedrich Engels, Karl Marx u. A. an F.A. Sorge und Andere, Stuttgart, 1906 and in full in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

170
ENGELS TO MARX
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.305
Great Yarmouth,†366 20 August 1882
10 Columbia Terrace

Dear Moor,

The money has been paid in so I went straight to the bank today and requested a draft for 1,200 frs. I hope to have it on Tuesday.

Page me46.305

How did last Tuesday's†a great medical examination go†b? Not a word about it so far.

Page me46.305
If there is any difficulty about the CHEQUE, just send it back and I shall then send you a draft on Paris instead. It was simply a makeshift arrangement.

Page Break me46.306
Page me46.306
Pumps and BABY†a are very lively; the little thing has already got two teeth. Schorlemmer leaves for Germany tomorrow week. The table is being laid so I've got to stop.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.306
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

171
ENGELS TO EMIL ENGELS Jun.
IN ENGELSKIRCHEN
Page me46.306
Great Yarmouth, 20 August 1882
10 Columbia Terrace

Dear Emil,

We have been here for the past 10 days,†366 Schorlemmer, Pumps, BABY†a and I, and the fact that I haven't got round to replying to you until today can be blamed on the sweet indolence of a seaside resort.
Page me46.306
First of all, I have written direct to Sam Moore recommending you to him and asking him to send you the address of his office in town (in the case of BARRISTERS these are called CHAMBERS), for I haven't got it here and during the daytime it is, of course, the only place where he can be found. You will find him an exemplary Englishman, possessing all the good qualities of his nation and none of the bad. Needless to say he is also a Social Democrat and also speaks German though it's a bit rusty. He will be happy to oblige you in any way, provided it is in his power to do so, and will be of more use to you than I could be. When one has been out of touch with the business world for nearly 13 years and with Manchester for 12,†367 one no longer has much influence over people for whom it is axiomatic that one hand washes the other. Moore, on the other hand, has only been out of touch with it for 3-4 years and still lives in their midst, so in his case it's more likely that something can be arranged. I, for example, don't even know whether the people I used to be connected with are still alive, whether they still own the same business, or whether they may not have sold up entirely. To introduce you to Ermen & Roby would be far more likely to do harm than good; those chaps certainly wouldn't show you their mill and would end up by telling all their other spinning and manufacturing acquaintances on the Exchange to be on their guard against you.

Page Break me46.307
Page me46.307

You won't get inside any mills making knitting or sewing yarns, because to my knowledge there are none in Manchester apart from Ermen & Roby. There is a variety of DOUBLERS of SEWINGS where all you will see are the old doubling machines; they sell the yarn untreated. How best to get inside a mill depends upon each particular case; on the whole I have always found that it works best if you make a clean breast of things to the people you've been otherwise recommended to and tell them who you are. To try and get what you want by trickery, as many German spinners have done, nearly always leads to your being found out and denounced to the others on the Exchange, after which you never get to see anything at all. People here compete with one another on a much grander scale than in Germany and the little dodges that are often appropriate enough over there, don't go down at all over here.
Page me46.307

Schorlemmer will also be back there at the beginning of October and he, too, will be able to help you. More useful to you than anything would be a letter of recommendation from Ermen & Engels to a big German commission house who will surely be able to give you further help and also tell you in which particular instances it might be advisable to keep quiet about what you yourself are.
Page me46.307

Well, that's enough for today. The table is about to be laid. Otherwise things are going very well here; the fine weather, Pilsener beer, sea air and sea-bathing have quite driven away the gastric catarrh I had on the Monday of your departure. Pumps and Schorlemmer send you their best wishes.

Your
F. Engels

Page me46.307
First published in the magazine Deutsche Revue, Jg. 46, Bd. 3, 1921

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.308

172
MARX TO ENGELS
IN GREAT YARMOUTH
Page me46.308
Argenteuil, Monday, 21 August 1882
11 Boulevard Thiers

DEAR FRED,

The 'conversion into silver'†a took place the day before yesterday.
Page me46.308
The week beginning last Monday†b distinguished itself by abominable weather: rain (at times cold), storms, sultriness; above all wet, while a 'water shortage' was 'officially' announced in Paris. Not even the Flood would have deterred the bureaucrats here from contriving an 'official drought' in respect of water for drinking, washing, domestic and industrial purposes, etc.
Page me46.308
Yesterday, my last perambulation in the salle d'inhalation†c and the pleasure of a bath and douche at Enghien, where I was also given my valedictory examination by Dr Feugier; result:
Page me46.308
1. The bronchial râle much reduced; would have gone completely but for my ill-luck with the weather.
Page me46.308
2. The pleuritic frottement†d noise remains in status quo; an altogether predictable circumstance. At best, and this is by no means frequent, the after-effects of pleurésie may last for years. They are sending me to Lake Geneva, whence the weather reports have so far been favourable, since both doctores†e are of the opinion that the last traces of my bronchial catarrh might well depart of their own accord there. Qui vivra verra.†f The season, they say, is too far advanced for respiratory gymnastics in the mountains, and I must, above all, avoid the cold.
Page me46.308
On this occasion I have been ordered to travel to Switzerland only by day and shall therefore have to stay overnight in Dijon and not betake myself to my destination until the morrow. They are absolutely determined, of course, to obviate any pretext for a 'rechute'.†g
Page me46.308
Tussychen left last Wednesday with Johnny; we have had a letter from her; all went well. She intended to go to Eastbourne with Johnny on 19 August (Saturday). Because her pedagogic purposes demand above all that to begin with THE YOUNG MAN should be solely under her supervision, Tussy has chosen a seaside resort where he won't find any 'friends'.

Page Break me46.309
Page me46.309

Jennychen is, alas, poorly. What is more, present 'circumstances'†365 make rest and recuperation completely impossible for her.
Page me46.309
Laura IS ALL RIGHT, leaves with me tomorrow.
Page me46.309
Lissagaray's row with the Brousse gang†368 has had one good result in that the latter no longer has a daily paper at its disposal. That diplomat Malon is keeping neutral vis-á-vis Brousse in this affair, since he (Malon) could not permit himself, vis-á-vis Rochefort, his editor-en-chef, to express sympathy for Brousse et cie in the Intransigeant (nor does he 'wish' he 'could').
Page me46.309
Guesde and his party are gaining the upper hand.
Page me46.309
Best wishes to Jollymeyer†a and Pumps.
Page me46.309
Salut.

'Moor'
Page me46.309
Mr Longuet, with his usual tact, is fetching Roy to meet me at déjeuner†b; in the course of 3 months the only day he could hit on for the purpose was today, when I have to pack, etc., etc.; in addition, I must pay a farewell visit to Dr Dourlen and, finally, would like to be on my own with Jennychen.

Page me46.309
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.310

173
MARX TO ENGELS
IN GREAT YARMOUTH
Page me46.310
Lausanne, 24 August 1882
Hôtel du Nord

DEAR [Fred],†a

Yesterday, on from Dijon to Lausanne,†369 wet and relatively cold. Nine o'clock at night arrived at Lausanne in the rain. First question I asked the waiter: 'How long has it been raining here?' Reply: 'Only been wet for 2 days' (i.e. since the day I left Paris). C'est drôle!†b

Page me46.310
Today we shall look round in Vevey, Montreux, etc., for somewhere to stay. In the meantime write to Lausanne, poste restante. I should like to have a timely supply of extra MUNITION so that some may always be available against any and every eventuality. Address letters to Dr Charles Marx, not Karl Marx.
Page me46.310
Longuet remained true to his own self till the day of my departure. For during both my previous visits to Argenteuil,†370 Longuet kept promising the translator of Capital, that poor devil Roy, to arrange a meeting with me; on neither occasion was Longuet able to find a suitable time. And on this occasion, when Longuet again started to maunder on about my meeting Roy, I told him he might arrange it at any time during the last 4 weeks. Eh bien!†c Not until the day of my departure when I had to pack, pay a farewell call on Dr Dourlen and still had a great deal to discuss with Jennychen, etc., does Longuet go off to Paris without my prior knowledge, pick up Roy and bring him back to déjeuner†d (1 o'clock) in Argenteuil. There was a chilly northeast wind and, as a result of my obligatory CONVERSATION with POOR Roy in the garden, I caught cold. THANKS TO Longuet!
Page me46.310
Apropos. A German who is Paris correspondent to a lot of bourgeois German newspapers wrote to me as my most humble and obedient servant, saying that, while honesty demanded I should know that he was not a Social Democrat, still less correspondent to newspapers of that complexion, people in all circles of German 'society' were anxious to have official news of my health; therefore requested TO INTERVIEW me at Argenteuil, etc.

Page Break me46.311
Page me46.311
OF COURSE, I DID NOT REPLY TO THAT SOFTSAWDER PENMAN.
Page me46.311
Love to all.

Moor
Page me46.311
I shall go and see OLD Becker†a and Wróblewski in Geneva as soon as my cough has eased up again.

Page me46.311
First published in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

174
ENGELS TO MARX
IN LAUSANNE
Page me46.311
Great Yarmouth, 25 August 1882
10 Columbia Terrace

Dear Moor,

Telegram just received†284; a line or two on business in the utmost haste.
Page me46.311
Your letter arrived on Monday evening,†b but by then I had sent off to Argenteuil the money order received from A. Kayser & Co. on Hirsch fils ainé,†c Paris, 1,200 frs á présentation.†d The very next day I wrote to Jenny,†284 telling her what was in the letter, and asked her to make sure it was forwarded. Paying it in from where you are will present little difficulty.
Page me46.311
We shall be staying here for another fortnight — it suits everyone marvellously, save for Jollymeyer who sometimes gets rheumatism as a result of the weather we're having. On Monday†e he's off to Germany.

Page Break me46.312
I shall accompany him to London and hope to bring Tussy and Johnny back here with me.
Page me46.312
I wish you better weather than we have been having for the past 4 days, but as much benefit as we are deriving from sea air. The infant†a is developing a ravenous appetite and visibly gaining weight.
Page me46.312
Warmest regards from all to you and Laura.

Your
F.E.
Page me46.312
What do you think of De Paepe's firing his revolver at Duverger†371? O GREEN EYED MONSTER!†b

Page me46.312
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

175
ENGELS TO MARX
IN LAUSANNE
Page me46.312
Great Yarmouth, 26 August 1882
10 Columbia Terrace

Dear Moor,

Your†c and Laura's letter arrived from Lausanne this morning, and I am using the lull momentarily prevailing in this room to write to you. This time it wasn't you who brought on the bad weather, but The New York Herald with its forecast of a depression. Whereas Tussy was able to attribute the previous bout of wet weather here to your undue proximity in Paris, we cannot but observe now that the latest change for the worse coincides precisely with your removal farther afield, and that on Wednesday evening†d we here were subjected to the same violent downpour as were you in Lausanne. This morning, too, there has been one shower after another, and there's still no sign of the 'FINER LATER ON' that was predicted.

Page Break me46.313
Page me46.313
An anathema upon Longuet and his tactlessness. But then, was it absolutely necessary, in a cold north-easter, to entertain Roy in the garden of all places?
Page me46.313
The Egyptian campaign†355 is off to a good start. The Kölnische Zeitung goes so far as to maintain that the FORTS of Alexandria were silenced in 2 1/2 hours and that the English had continued the bombardment for the remaining 5 hours simply with a view to destroying the city. — The rapid occupation of the Canal was nicely done, but as soon as I saw that upon embarking Wolseley had ostentatiously proclaimed the bombardment of Abukir to be his intention, the whole thing became clear to me and I was able to give Schorlemmer an exposé of the whole plan of campaign as presently being carried out. Since then I have seen from back numbers of the Kölnische Zeitung that the plan to march on Cairo via Ismailia had already been common knowledge in London 10 or 12 days beforehand,†a so well had the secret been kept! The plan itself is still the most rational that could have been devised in the circumstances. However its execution won't be particularly rapid. Admittedly the clever English have sent field guns there, but not horses or mules for the teams. They are presently buying up mules in southern Europe and Africa. Ballons captifs,†b essential for reconnaissance in a flat, treeless country, were rejected, but are now being sent out belatedly. Reconnaissances in force were carried out against the fortified Egyptian position before Alexandria — senseless since no one is so stupid as to deploy in strength before a fortified position. The heroism at Shafuir is ludicrous — a five-hour engagement and 2 English wounded! Wolseley, who already has 30,000 men, is now calling for his third division, but this is still in process of mobilisation. And when it does arrive he will have barely enough in hand, once he has occupied Cairo and Alexandria, to clear the Delta and occupy the coastal towns. If Arabi is clever enough to parry each main blow and withdraw to Central and/or Upper Egypt, the affair could become extremely protracted. Apart from the fact that, given a somewhat early rise in the level of the Nile, a breaching of the dams can turn everything to water for the English. However, it is more than probable that the affair will be brought to a conclusion, not by military action, but by diplomatic collusion behind the scenes.

Page Break me46.314
Page me46.314

A nice little item: the merits of RED TAPE have been brought to light by C.W. Siemens in his capacity as president of the BRITISH ASSOCIATION.†372 The metric system was, after all, legalised in England alongside the existing one some years ago. Moreover authentic copies of the original metre and original kilogram were sent for from Paris. But if anyone wants to obtain an authentic, standard copy of these units from the appropriate authority, the latter informs him that the relevant Act of Parliament neither entitles nor obliges it to provide one. If, however, you sell by metres or kgs that have not been authorised by the aforementioned authority, that is FRAUDULENT and criminal. So this prudent little omission nullifies the whole Act and basta, you're back where you started. Moreover, Siemens maintains that, since the introduction of the metric system on the Continent generally, the damage done to English industry by its adherence to the old system has been enormous; a great deal of machinery, etc., he says, is no longer exportable, because built in conformity with units other than metres and kgs.
Page me46.314

I hope that your cough has abated and that you, too, may get some better weather at last. Watch out when travelling by steamer. In the evenings it is often cold and misty on the water. You'll probably have to continue to take care of yourself until the spring and then, when you have finally got rid of your bronchitis, some respiratory gymnastics in the mountains will see us round the corner.
Page me46.314

In Vaud there is a splendid wine called Ivorne which I highly recommend, especially when it's old. Then they drink Cortaillod, a red from Neuchâtel, which has a slight sparkle; the froth forms a star in the centre of the glass; also pretty good. Lastly Veltliner (Valtellina), the best wine in Switzerland. Besides these the petit†a Burgundy, Macon and Beaujolais were pretty good in my day†373 and not dear. Take heroic draughts of all these varieties and, when bored for long spells by your peregrinations, reflect that this is, after all, the only way to restore your former verve; though it may lie dormant for a little while, the day will come when it will be only too necessary to us. My regards to Becker†b and Wróblewski if you see them.

Page Break me46.315
Page me46.315

Warmest regards from everyone here to you and Laura, who will be the recipient of my next letter.†284

Your

F.E.

Page me46.315
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

176
ENGELS TO JENNY LONGUET
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.315
Great Yarmouth, 27 August 1882
10 Columbia Terrace

My dear Jenny,

Many thanks for your letter. I should have been satisfied with a postcard. I am glad you opened my letter to Mohr and so took care of the contents.†a
Page me46.315
I had a letter from Lausanne†b and a telegram from Vevey†374 with their†c new address, Hôtel du Léman, where they seem to be inclined to settle down. As to Mohr's health I was really glad to have a cool and impartial report from you, Laura who saw him only a few hours, reported rather over favorably and Tussy on the other hand, on seeing him again at Argenteuil, was rather disappointed that no more progress had been made. I am quite of your opinion that we have every reason to be content with what progress he has made under the very unfavorable weather that has persecuted him so tenaciously, and after three pleurisies, two of which were so severe. I never expected that he would be able to pass next winter in England, and said so before he went to Algiers to Helen†d and other discreet people. So that is no surprise to me; I am only disappointed that he will scarcely be able to come over before for a few weeks. Anyhow I am glad that the doctors are so unanimous upon this point, that will make him submit all the easier. A little more Enghien or Cauterets for his remnant of bronchitis and then a climatic cure on high ground in the Alps or Pyrenees will then set him completely up again ready for work. But as you say, all this would be upset by a relapse, which, however, is now unlikely especially with the experience he has gained.

Page Break me46.316
Page me46.316
My dear Jenny, I know all the fearful troubles you have had to go through and are going through even now. My thoughts have been often with you and I was sorry I could not find any way in which to make myself useful to you. You and Mohr were almost the constant subjects of our almost daily conversation when I called in the morning at Nim's†a for my Pilsener beer. But I know my brave Jenny will not lose heart and when you are over the next trial,†b I hope and expect you will be able to arrange your household in a way that will give you some rest and peace.

Page me46.316

You have no idea what a change has come over Pumps since she is here. She occupies herself with nothing but her baby,†c dress, amusements, pleasure trips, everything seems to have gone out of her head. And she treats the little one well, with excellent temper and patience, but then it is really a very good child, and even now while cutting two teeth, almost always laughing. Let us hope mother and child will continue in the same way.
Page me46.316

Schorlemmer who sends his kindest regards leaves tomorrow for Germany, and I shall go to London with him for a day or two to look after business. We shall stay here for another fortnight unless driven away by the weather which has been exceedingly changeable since last Tuesday.†d Poor Percy†e who came last Wednesday seems to be destined to have a wet holiday, a bad lookout for a rheumatic subject. As for myself the sea air and bathing is bracing me up famously and I expect this winter I shall do some real work.
Page me46.316

Kind regards from all to Longuet and yourself and children†f and best love from your affectionately

F. Engels

Page me46.316
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 35, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.317

177
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.317
[Postcard, unsigned]

Vevey, 4 September 1882
Hôtel du Léman

DEAR FRED,

Laura will be writing to you at length about events, or rather the uneventfulness here, since we are living in the Land of Cockaigne.†374 Like others, we have been for TRIPS on the LAKE.
Page me46.317
On 31ST August I got Jennychen's letter enclosing your letter†284 and the CHEQUE which last I handed in at the local bank of Genton et Co. for encaissement†a in Paris.
Page me46.317
On 31 August, 1ST, 2ND and 3RD SEPTEMBER marvellous weather (too hot yesterday). Today wet and stormy; hope it won't degenerate into general rain. Odd that I should still be coughing; I think I'm the only person in Vevey who coughs; at all events I haven't met anyone else who does. My GENERAL STATE, however, is most satisfactory; with Laura I climbed not only to the top of the local vineyard, but also to the top of the much higher vineyard at Montreux, without feeling the slightest discomfort.
Page me46.317
I was called on at our hotel by a MR Songeon, président du conseil municipal de Paris†b; is one of the réfugiés†c whom I knew in London in 1849-1850. He presented me with the official report made to the conseil municipal of Paris by the deputation (amongst whom Mr Songeon) it had sent to Rome for Garibaldi's apotheosis†375; the thing is mainly concerned with 'Songeon's' own apotheosis, since he always acted as spokesman for the other French delegates. Also showed me a copy of Capital which is to accompany him to the sylvan retreat not far removed from here, whither he was wending his way.
Page me46.317
So far the English haven't made such rapid progress in Egypt†355 as Wolseley 'prognosticated'.
Page me46.317
Mr Virchow, or so I see from the supplément to yesterday's Journal de Genéve, has again demonstrated that he is far and away above

Page Break me46.318
Darwin, he alone, in fact, being scientific and hence also 'contemptuous' of organic chemistry.
Page me46.318
[On the side reserved for the address]

Fr. Engels, Esq.
122 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W., Angleterre

Page me46.318
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

ENGELS TO MARX
IN VEVEY
Page me46.318
London, 12 September 1882

Dear Moor,

Postcard†a and Laura's letter received. Am glad to hear you are having good weather at last and hope it will continue. We have been back here since Saturday; Tussy and Johnny spent a week at Yarmouth with us.
Page me46.318
I remember Songeon very well; I often used to wonder what destiny might lie in store for that patronising, bonhomous countenance, until I eventually found it in the paper — chairman of the municipal council! That, in fact, was what was already written all over his face in 1850.
Page me46.318
Many a bill on London from Genton & Co. has passed through my hands!
Page me46.318
If you are planning to see something more of Switzerland, you could hardly take a better or more convenient route than that from Geneva via Berne to Interlaken and Brienz, thence over the Brünig Pass (only 3,150 feet up) to Lake Lucerne and, if you feel like it, from there to Zurich. It's an easy trip for a convalescent and would take you to some of the loveliest spots in Switzerland. You could make a longish halt at Interlaken and Lucerne or some other place on the shores of that lake. Morges, on Lake Geneva, is also a pretty spot and from it you get the finest view of Mont Blanc.

Page Break me46.319
Page me46.319
It is becoming increasingly evident that the Egyptian affair†355 was contrived by Russian diplomacy. Now that Gladstone has been sufficiently soft-sawdered by sweet Olga,†a he is to be entrusted to a wilier mentor for treatment of a more drastic kind. England has got to occupy Egypt in the midst of peace so that, in self-defence, poor old Russia may thereby be compelled to occupy Armenia, likewise in the midst of peace. The Caucasian army has already moved up to the border, and there are 48 battalions at Kars alone — a constantly mobile army, this. And in order to prove that Gladstone assents to the liberation of yet another 'Christian' country from the yoke of the UNSPEAKABLE TURK, this particular moment has been chosen for the ostentatious recall of the English commissions despatched to Asia Minor after the Congress of Berlin†376 to supervise the reforms, and for the publication of their reports which show that they have been fooled by the Turks and that everything remains as before, official corruption being ineradicable. Palmerston est mort, vive Gladstone! Vive Gambetta,†b who would also have gladly put his seal to the Russian alliance in Egypt. Alas, the good old times are a thing of the past, and Russia no longer backs Russian diplomacy, but confronts it.
Page me46.319
I'd be damned glad if I could come over and see you, but were anything to happen to me, even temporarily, all our financial arrangements would be thrown out of gear.

There's not a soul here to whom I could give power of attorney or entrust what are really rather complicated cash transactions. Sam Moore would have been the only possible man, but he is away and these matters can only be attended to on the spot. Besides I had been hoping that you might come over, at any rate this summer, if only for a brief spell. It was obvious to me even before you left England and suffered your relapses that you wouldn't be able to spend next winter here, and I said as much to Lenchen. Now, having had relapses, it is absolutely essential for you to spend a winter that takes the form of spring, and I was glad when I heard that Dourlen and Feugier had said so unequivocally, and with one voice. Lonely though it is here without you, there's nowt as we can do about it, and everything must be subordinated to your making a complete recovery. But this also demands that finances be kept on an even keel, and I therefore consider it my bounden duty not to run any risks so long as this remains the case.

Page Break me46.320
Page me46.320
Hartmann†a has invented and patented an electric lamp and has sold it for £3,000 to a stingy fellow under a no less stingy contract, so that it is exceedingly doubtful when and whether he will get his money. Meanwhile he has got himself another post — but for how long? It's difficult to make head or tail of his perpetual UPS AND DOWNS.
Page me46.320
Best thanks for the Algerian presents brought back by Tussy. The dagger is genuinely oriental — no grass will grow where it's stuck into the ground. I shall have to obtain a stem for the pipe before I can try it out. Pumps is very proud of her Arabian bracelets. She is busy furnishing her new house which will probably take her another week. Her little girl†b came on remarkably at Yarmouth. Johnny has been going to infant school since yesterday (in Grafton Terrace, opposite your old home).
Page me46.320
Love from all to yourself and Laura.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.320
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

179
ENGELS TO KARL KAUTSKY†7
IN VIENNA
Page me46.320

London, 12 September 1882

Dear Mr Kautsky,

You really must forgive me for having kept you waiting so long for an answer. I have had so many interruptions of every kind that finally, in order to get any work done at all, I had to give short shrift to everything of lesser importance and put aside all such correspondence as was not absolutely necessary. And since, with your colonial question,†377 you had set me a task that was by no means easy to tackle, your letters met with the same fate, and in the process the good Walter got overlooked.

Page Break me46.321
Page me46.321

Should Walter and Dr Braun come over here, I shall be glad to see them and whatever can be done for them I will gladly do. As for the rest, it will no doubt turn out all right. But what is Walter actually expected to study over here? That's what needs clearing up first of all. Socialism as such? No need for him to come over here for that, since it's to be had everywhere save in Austria and Germany; moreover, he will quickly exhaust that field, i.e. such literature as is worth reading. Economics? History? Of these he will find an embarras de richesses†a at the British Museum — so much so, indeed, that a newcomer runs the risk of instantly losing his bearings. Natural science? That would mean lectures which are wildly expensive here. It seems to me that, before the chap is sent over here, a definite curriculum should be laid down for his studies — at least in outline — and if this were sent to me, it would be easier to judge whether it could best be carried out in this country or somewhere else. Without at least some knowledge of English, he would be completely at a loss here. It would, I think, be a good idea to get him to study French and English for 6 months beforehand, so that he could at least read a modicum of both before he went abroad. He should, besides, have some previous knowledge of history, geography and, if possible, also mathematics and natural science if he wants to study profitably. What the situation is in this respect I cannot know; but if it's at all unsatisfactory, it would certainly be better if you first got him to come to Vienna, so that he might acquire these things under the guidance of his friends and generally learn exactly how one sets about learning something thoroughly off one's own bat. Otherwise, here in London, it would, for the most part, be money down the drain. These are simply thoughts that have passed through my mind when pondering on the case and which may be completely irrelevant, but after all I know little or nothing about the young man's level of education, and that is why I considered it necessary to raise these points. If you let me know more about this, you will not be kept waiting for an answer. All things being equal I am, as you know, always in favour of getting ambitious young people to come abroad so that they may extend their horizons and rid themselves of the parochial prejudices which they must needs acquire at home.

Page Break me46.322
Page me46.322

You should not, by the way, count too much on Marx so far as Walter is concerned. He is unlikely to come home before next May, and even then he will probably have to take great care of himself if he is to get his work completed. In particular he is now strictly forbidden to talk overmuch, on top of which he has to spend his evenings quietly if he is not to have bad nights. In the daytime, however, he will, of course, be working. If one is trying to get rid of chronic bronchitis of many years' standing and ensure, after three serious bouts of pleurisy, not only that it disappears without trace, but also that it doesn't recur, and to do all this in one's sixty-fifth year, one has enough to contend with on that account alone.

Page me46.322

You ask me what the English workers think of colonial policy. Well, exactly what they think of any policy — the same as what the middle classes think. There is, after all, no labour party here, only conservatives and liberal radicals, and the workers cheerfully go snacks in England's monopoly of the world market and colonies. As I see it, the actual colonies, i.e. the countries occupied by European settlers, such as Canada, the Cape, Australia, will all become independent; on the other hand, countries that are merely ruled and are inhabited by natives, such as India, Algeria and the Dutch, Portuguese and Spanish possessions, will have to be temporarily taken over by the proletariat and guided as rapidly as possible towards independence. How this process will develop is difficult to say. India may, indeed very probably will, start a revolution and, since a proletariat that is effecting its own emancipation cannot wage a colonial war, it would have to be given its head, which would obviously entail a great deal of destruction, but after all that sort of thing is inseparable from any revolution. The same thing could also happen elsewhere, say in Algeria or Egypt, and would certainly suit us best. We shall have enough on our hands at home. Once Europe has been reorganised, and North America, the resulting power will be so colossal and the example set will be such that the semi-civilised countries will follow suit quite of their own accord; their economic needs alone will see to that. What social and political phases those countries will then have to traverse before they likewise acquire a socialist organisation is something about which I do not believe we can profitably speculate at present. Only one thing is certain, namely that a victorious proletariat cannot forcibly confer any boon whatever on another country without undermining its own victory in the process. Which does not, of course, in any way preclude defensive wars of various kinds.

Page Break me46.323

Page me46.323

This business in Egypt†355 has been contrived by Russian diplomacy. Gladstone is to take Egypt (which he is far from having or from holding, even if he had it), so that Russia may take Armenia; which would, according to Gladstone, be the liberation of another Christian country from the Mohammedan yoke. Everything else to do with the affair is pretence, humbug, prevarication. Whether the little scheme will succeed will soon become apparent.

Page me46.323

With kindest regards.

Yours,

F.E.
Page me46.323
Dr Sax has just sent me his book on Thuringia.†a Would you thank him for it on my behalf and tell him I shall reply as soon as I have read it.
Page me46.323
My forwarding address is: Mrs P.W. Rosher, 122 Regent's Park Road; no inner envelope. It's Pumps who, incidentally, has already got a baby girl.†b She doesn't actually live with me any more, but that doesn't matter.

Page me46.323
First published in full, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

180
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN
IN ZURICH
Page me46.323
London, 13 September 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

Nothing came of working at the seaside resort of Yarmouth —

Page Break me46.324
5 people in one room, including my niece†a and her 4-month-old baby,†b made it impossible to do anything, and work was dissipated in pleasure and the consumption of excellent Pilsener beer. But tomorrow I go into action, and there'll be no respite until the pamphlet is finished.†378
Page me46.324
Your suggestion re a preface on Bismarckian socialism is quite all right so far as it goes, and up to a point accords with what I myself want. But this stuff could not be dealt with in a preface; it would make it far too long. Besides, I could do with more material on accident insurance, etc., especially the proposed legislation, without which I cannot manage.
Page me46.324
I have been turning the matter over in my mind for a long time, and I can well see that something ought to be written about it. I now propose to write (for the Sozialdemokrat) a series of articles (each of which would constitute an independent whole) on the kind of bogus socialism now proliferating in Germany — a series which could subsequently be published in pamphlet form.†379 First part: Bismarckian socialism. 1. Protective tariffs. 2. Nationalisation of railways. 3. Tobacco monopoly. 4. Workmen's insurance. But for this I should have to have:

Page me46.324

ad†c 2, a stock-exchange list giving the prices of the recently nationalised railways (Berg. Märk., Berlin-Görlitz, Berlin-Stettin, Märkisch-Posen) shortly before nationalisation and, wherever possible, the price paid by the state for these railways; ad 4, the Bill as submitted to the Reichstag by Bismarck.

If you can procure these things for me, I shall have sufficient material.

Page me46.324

To this, I would, however, append a second part in which I would criticise a number of woolly ideas enfranchised by Lassalle and still echoed now and again by our people — e.g. the 'iron law of wages',†289 'the full return to the labourer' (not labourers) 'for work performed',†380 etc. To make a clean sweep here is even more necessary than it would be in respect of the first part, and if this annoys some of those Lassallean 'leaders' who have unfortunately come to be accepted,†381 so much the better. Hence I do in fact regard the second part as the more important one.

Page me46.324

On the other hand, there's no knowing whether it mightn't just suit the book of certain persons if St Ferdinand†a were to be subjected to this kind of unbiassed criticism. It might be said, should anything of the sort appear in the party organ, that it was an attempt to provoke a split in the party and a breach of the long-standing compact with the Lassalleans. In which case the whole thing might be brought out in pamphlet form as soon as it was finished, without prior publication in the Sozialdemokrat.

Page Break me46.325

Page me46.325

So either the whole thing appears in the Sozialdemokrat, and subsequently as a pamphlet, or it appears straight away as a pamphlet, or, for the time being, does not get written at all.

Page me46.325

Voilá mon cas.†b Well, you choose what you would prefer and, if necessary, consult one or two others. But once something has been settled, there must be no going back on it. I cannot expose myself to another dose of the unpleasantness occasioned by Most's protests against the Dühring.†382

Page me46.325

Incidentally, some very nice preparatory work relating to Bismarckery and attendant phenomena has already been done in two articles in the Sozialdemokrat on the possible repeal of the Anti-Socialist Law.†383 I assume they are by Bebel; if not, the party can congratulate itself upon possessing another chap who is so splendidly capable of getting to the root of the matter and disregarding all considerations of a secondary nature, and this in a style at once so straightforward and lucid. The articles are first-rate.

Page me46.325

What you say by way of an excuse for the flabbiness of various people in Germany is something I have already told myself on more than one occasion. Yet again and again we find the same old German want of character and backbone, coupled with the urge to play the role — vis-á-vis the philistine, not the worker — of a worthy, respectable citizen who is a very far cry from the dangerous ogre he is made out to be. These always turn out to be people who consider their modicum of education absolutely essential if the worker is not to emancipate himself but rather be liberated by them. In their eyes, the emancipation of the working class is attainable only through your eddicated mediocrity; how could the poor, helpless, uneddicated workers hope to achieve it on their own account?

Page me46.325
I wrote to Kautsky yesterday.†c He tells me he has found some quite passable doctores philosophiae†a there. If they really are passable, they would be most welcome.

Page Break me46.326
Page me46.326
Adolf Beust will be able to sing you the tune of 'The Vicar of Bray'.†384
Page me46.326
Kindest regards.

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.326
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

181
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me46.326
Vevey, 16 September 1882
Hôtel du Léman

DEAR FRED,

Just as I was about to write to you, the garçon†b brought me the Journal de Genéve with the news of Bebel's death.†c It's frightful — the greatest misfortune for our party! He was a unique phenomenon in the German (one might say in the 'European') working class.
Page me46.326
Your altruistic concern for me is unbelievable, and I am often secretly ashamed — but I won't pursue this theme any further for the present.
Page me46.326

My plan, before I left Paris, was AT ALL EVENTS to spend at least October in London and to be together with you. Feugier and Dourlen also thought there could be no objection to this, should October prove passable. It might yet be so, despite September being wet. The barometer rose here on the 8th, reached the top of the scale on the 9th, gradually fell right down to the bottom on the 12th, rose again on the 13th (having reached about the same level as on the 11th), then fell and has, since last night, been slowly rising again. Although GENERALLY throughout Switzerland there has been heavy rain and storms (many landslides and 'ACCIDENTS' resulting therefrom), the weather round about Vevey in particular has been relatively good (cold only by way of an exception in the mornings and early hours of the evening). This is why we have continued to stay here. The air is invigorating. Despite perpetual changes of temperature and humidity in the course of the same day, my sense of well-being is steadily mounting. My catarrh is, I think, no longer bronchial but has turned into the ordinary kind; but I shall not know this for certain until I get to Geneva where I shall consult a good German doctor, i.e. get him to auscultate me. But the trip you suggest,†a delightful though it would be, is unlikely to be feasible in present Swiss weather conditions. This year's vintage would seem to be a 'flop'. Indeed, snow can already be seen to be falling — earlier than usual — on the montagnes de la†b Dent du Midi; it's 'REGULAR' on the Jura.

Page Break me46.327
Page me46.327
The Bernese Bund has declared that as a military commander Wolseley almost surpasses the old Napoleon.
Page me46.327
There's one snag about the goings-on with the Russians†c; it's quite possible that Bismarck would allow them — the last-mentioned — to commit themselves, but what we should see next would be 'consolation prizes' for Austria and COMPENSATION for the Prussian imperium. Thus Russian intervention in Armenia might lead to general war, and that is probably what Bismarck wants.
Page me46.327
Apropos! The dagger, as you can no doubt see from the crudeness of the workmanship, is of Kabyle†385 origin. As regards the stem for the pipe, I brought 3 such — bamboo stems — with me (at the jardin d'acclimatation†d the pipes were provided with only one); I didn't want to burden Helen†e and Tussy with these stems which were too long for their malles,†f but was planning to bring them to London myself.
Page me46.327
From Jennychen's letter — just received by Laura — I see that Longuet has gone to Aubin with Wolf†g and Harry. Unfortunately Jennychen's health gives cause for concern, as I had already been told by the doctors (Feugier and Dourlen) in Paris. Jennychen anxiously awaits news of Johnny from London; she has had NO NEWS since Tussychen's trip to Yarmouth with Johnny. Indeed Laurachen is writing to Jennychen today and telling her that John is ALL RIGHT and has already started going to infant school, as we saw from your letter.†a

Page Break me46.328

Page me46.328
Love to Tussychen, Lenchen and Pumps, AND NOT TO FORGET, MY GRANDSON.†b
Page me46.328
We shall in any case write and tell you if we leave Vevey.

Your
Moor
Page me46.328
Have not the Prussian scoundrels, by imprisonment, etc., been party to Bebel's death?

Page me46.328
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

182
ENGELS TO MARX
IN VEVEY
Page me46.328
London, 18 September 1882

Dear Moor,

Your†c and Laura's letter arrived at 9 o'clock in the evening; I at once went to impart what was necessary to Tussy and Lenchen.
Page me46.328
We over here were also exceedingly perturbed by the false news of Bebel's death.†386 Since Saturday night there had been many indications that it was false, and in the Justice, just received, there's a telegram from Liebknecht saying that, while Bebel had been dangerously ill, he was now on the mend.
Page me46.328
At the same time I turned up most opportunely, the news having just been received that Jenny had had a baby girl†365 and that everything was going as well as could be expected.

Page Break me46.329
Page me46.329

When you go away from Vevey, leave an address (poste restante or something of the sort) for letters. Will write at greater length tomorrow or the day after.

Your
F.E.
Page me46.329
Love to Laura.

Page me46.329
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

183
ENGELS TO LAURA LAFARGUE
IN VEVEY
Page me46.329
London, 20 September 1882

My dear Laura,

I hope Mohr got my short note of the 18th.†a Today, though under difficulties, I must fulfil my word to you. Have worked all day till six, then dined, now it's just nine, and so I am still a little under the influence of digestion, and besides Percy†b is sitting in the room but fortunately has got hold of Joseph Andrews.†c
Page me46.329
Do I know Vevey? Why I was quartered there in September 1849†373 for about a fortnight and know all the Swiss shore of the lake from Villeneuve to Geneva, the Dent du Midi and the Mont Blanc and all the rest. If I am not much mistaken we officers were quartered in your Hotel on the Quay. On the square under the trees, facing the lake, Willich used to exercise his two horses.
Page me46.329
I am only sorry you cannot even partially follow the route I made

Page Break me46.330
out for you,†a the Bernese Oberland in many respects beats the lake of Geneva hollow. But if Mohr is to try for a visit to England in October, it will soon be time for you to leave the Alps. I do hope there will be no risk to him in trying to come. Otherwise it would be folly. But let the doctors decide, as also about his winter-resort. Only if he is to come he ought not to drive it too late. We have had fine but rather cold weather, especially night and morning; yesterday rain all day, today dry but mostly dull. By the way, Mohr's statistics of the barometer†b tally exactly with our experiences at the time at Yarmouth, only that we had a very wet day with the highest barometer, Tussy praying all the time for the stupid thing to fall again!

Page me46.330

As to the star-foaming wine, that quality is the exclusive property of Cortaillod — the other Neuchâtel wines do not possess it as far as I know, nor are they so good.
Page me46.330

I wonder who got up that foolish story about Bebel.†c The Cologne Gazette†d up to Friday last week†e (date of the Paris papers that reported it) knows or at least tells nothing about it. The thing looks as if it was a canard concocted by Mehring and worked at Paris by Hirsch. I may be on the wrong scent, but I should not be at all astonished if it was so. Who else should have so quickly put in the Bataille and in the Citoyen a necrology, in which (in the Bataille at least) an old speech of Bebel's was quoted that he was for lawful means exclusively? The fright we got was something awful. On Friday night two members of the Working Men's Society Tottenham St.†297 came and asked me, was it true? That was the first I heard. Tussy had the Bataille with the article mentioned above same night; the silence of the Justice might be explained by Longuet's absence. Hunting up German papers in the cafés was useless; the nos that could contain anything would no longer lie on the tables on Saturday. At last, Tussy (not I) got her Sozialdemokrat on Saturday night, and that was not only silent, but stated that Bebel was fit to go out again. To lose Bebel would have been irreparable. Where to find such another head not only in Germany but anywhere else? Where such theoretical clearness, such practical tact, such quiet determination among the younger generation? Well, it's not true and the relief I felt when all doubt had disappeared, I cannot describe.
Page me46.330

I am also extremely glad that Jenny has got over her crisis and that the result is the fulfilment of a wish long felt by many.†365 I believe she had a very hard time of it. No doubt Dourlen has provided her with someone to look after her, the people at 41 Maitland Park†a make no doubt he has, and in that case the absence of the 'creator'†b might perhaps be a blessing.

Page Break me46.331
Page me46.331

Little Pumpsia†c has the chicken-pox and is very restless and takes at last to crying. The whole affair will be over in a few days and would not upset her so but for two pimples having come out on her tongue which, together with the coming of two teeth, make her mouth feel rather painful. Otherwise everything all well.
Page me46.331

Love from all to yourself and Mohr and from yours affectionately,

F. Engels
Page me46.331

Bernstein writes that 'The Vicar of Bray'†384 has created a tremendous sensation.
Page me46.331

Tussy had written three times to Jenny, since her return here, up to last Sunday!

Page me46.331
First published, in the language of the original (English), in: F. Engels, P. et L. Lafargue, Correspondance, t. I, Paris, 1956

Reproduced from the original

184
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN
IN ZURICH
Page me46.331
London, 22 September 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

Herewith preface, chapters I and II. No. III has also been completed, as has a concluding note of some 7 pages on early German common ownership of land ('The Mark').†378 But I want to revise it thoroughly once again and shall keep it here for a while.
Page me46.331
The puff at the beginning is something I cannot allow. Because

Page Break me46.332
Lafargue was the editor of the French edition and Malon sent in a highly inadequate affair, Marx wrote this introduction†20 with Lafargue, which may have been suitable on that occasion. In a German edition edited by myself, that sort of thing simply wouldn't do. However, once Marx is back here I might at some time write a little pamphlet for you on the theme of German socialism from 1840 to '52.†387 It's got to be done some day. But Marx has got more than half the material, and God knows where he's tucked it away.
Page me46.332
I would, of course, have to have both drafts of the Accident Insurance Act, ditto all the new bills of a social nature submitted to the Reichstag in the autumn.
Page me46.332
The wholesale condemnation of indirect taxation had been mooted by us as far back as 1849 and '50,†388 and that's where Lassalle got it from. I have noted the other things you say about Lassalle. Certain points are open to objection, but that's neither here nor there. Lassalle as a person simply doesn't come into it, but I cannot do otherwise than demolish the illusion that Lassalle was an original thinker in the economic (or indeed any other) field.†a
Page me46.332
I am glad to hear that the articles were written by Vollmar†383; it shows how much he has come on. I quite agree with what you say about the Anti-Socialist Law.†16 We shall benefit only if the law is purement et simplement†b abrogated. And that will happen only if new life can somehow be injected into the German political puppet-show, and if something should happen immediately conducive to a revolution, a new era,†277 Russian constitution or something of the sort. In which case there can be no doubt that we shall obtain majorities everywhere where there are now strong minorities and, besides Saxony, win over all the larger towns.

Page me46.332

As for the French, your plaint is the eternal one which everybody voices. They are governed by the moment, and by personalities. I don't read the Citoyen and do not get the Égalité at all regularly, nor do I know whether it still exists, so cannot have any real idea of what the chaps have been up to of late. But of one thing you may be sure — there can be no peace with Brousse. The latter is, and will remain, a consummate anarchist, his only concession being the admissibility of participating in elections; moreover he and Malon, by throwing the others out of the Fédération du Centre,†265 have intensified the struggle in the conduct of which Brousse is employing wholly Bakuninist tactics — slander, lies and every imaginable dirty trick. The tactics the others employ may on occasion be silly and childish, may fail in their objective and make it impossible for us foreigners to intervene on their behalf (as, indeed, we have regularly refused to do), but the fact remains that it has become impossible, once and for all, to do anything whatever in concert with Brousse. He will not rest content until his clique, 'Alliance'-fashion,†67 has gained control of the entire movement. Come to that, the whole of the 'workers' party', both factions included, constitutes only a small and dwindling portion of the Parisian working-class masses. The latter still continue to follow men like Clemenceau, against whom Guesde has conducted his polemic in a way that is far too personal and also quite wrong in other respects. Besides, Clemenceau is perfectly capable of development and might, given the chance, go much further than at present, especially once he has realised that what is entailed is a class struggle; true, he won't realise this until he has to. Now, Guesde has got it firmly into his head that Gambetta's république athénienne†a is far less of a threat to socialists than Clemenceau's république spartiate,†b and hence wishes to prevent the latter, as though we or any party in the world could prevent a country from passing through its historically necessary stages of development; nor has he stopped to think that it would be difficult to attain socialism in the France of a republic á la Gambetta without having first passed through a republic á la Clemenceau. But in the absence of such an insight into the necessary historical context of things and hence into the probable course of their development, party politics cannot be pursued with success. However, I have thrown up the sponge and am leaving the chaps to their own devices. Nor will the Belgians get anywhere with their admonitions.

Page Break me46.333
Page me46.333

John Stuart Mill's niece and adoptive daughter, who contributed to the election fund, is called Helen Taylor and is not therefore the same as Ellen M. Taylor. Although both these Christian names mean Helena, they are two quite distinct persons.
Page me46.333

I know absolutely nothing about Garcia.†c From time to time someone from the club†8 comes to see me, and I shall ask about him when the occasion arises.
Page me46.333

Apropos. How did the rumour about Bebel's death get into the Citoyen and the Bataille? It came as a tremendous shock to us over here — as it did to Marx in Vevey, where he spent 3 weeks,†374 and we had no means of verifying it until we got the Justice on Monday evening, containing a telegram with Liebknecht's démenti; for the information, or lack of it, in the Sozialdemokrat could not reassure us completely because of its having been published on the Thursday. — By now Marx will probably be on his way back to Argenteuil, though he might spend a few days in Geneva. He is better but the poor summer has undone most of the good work effected by the cure.

Page Break me46.334
Page me46.334
I would ask you to briefly acknowledge receipt of the ms., and also to send me the ms. with the proofs, — in a wrapper, of course. How long can I keep the remainder†a here without causing inconvenience?
Page me46.334
Kindest regards,

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.334
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

185
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL
IN LEIPZIG
Page me46.334
London, 23 September 1882

Dear Bebel,

We have had a fine old fright on your account. A week ago yesterday, on Friday the 15th†b inst., 2 people from the Society†8 came to see me at 10 o'clock at night in order to ascertain the truth of the report, which had already appeared (with obituary) in 2 issues of the Citoyen, that you were dead. I told them that it was highly unlikely but could say nothing definite. As I had a boring visitor sitting with me, who wouldn't go although I had ceased to utter a word, it was not until after 11 that I was able to hurry round to Tussy Marx and found her still up. She had the Bataille, likewise with an obituary, but with no details as to the source of the news which was, however, considered to be beyond doubt. Hence general consternation. The greatest misfortune that could befall the German party was at least a strong probability. That there should have been no mention of it in the English papers, exulting as they were over Egypt,†355 was only too understandable. Well, on Saturday evening my Sozialdemokrat failed to arrive, which sometimes happens, but on Sunday morning I was lucky enough to discover that Tussy had got hers and, to judge by its contents, the news seemed highly improbable. To have consulted German newspapers in cafés would have been hopeless from the start, since they replace them each day. And so we remained in a state of the most excruciating uncertainty until finally, on Monday evening, the Justice arrived with an official denial.

Page Break me46.335

Page me46.335

Marx had just the same experience. He was at Vevey on Lake Geneva†374 and read the story in the reactionary Journal de Genéve which naturally retailed it as being beyond doubt. He wrote to me the same day absolutely aghast.†a His letter arrived that same Monday evening and so I was able to convey to him by the early post the happy news that the whole thing was an invention.†b
Page me46.335

No, old fellow, you won't be allowed to peg out on us at such a tender age. You're 20 years younger than I am, we have many a jolly battle ahead of us and, when we have fought them side by side, it will be your duty to stay in the firing line, even though I may have cut my last caper. And, since people alleged to be dead are supposed to live longest, you, like Marx,†389 have now doubtless been condemned to a good long life.
Page me46.335

But who in heaven's name brought this nonsense up — is that liar Mehring at the back of it again†390?
Page me46.335

Did you get my last letter — written some 2-3 months ago? The one in which I replied about the tamer elements in the party?†c
Page me46.335

Meanwhile you will have seen that your wish that I should contribute openly to the Sozialdemokrat has been met on several occasions. Moreover I yesterday sent off to Bernstein the first two of the three

Page Break me46.336
Dühring chapters which are to come out in German after the French edition†360 and which I have extensively revised and popularised. The rest is finished but I shall keep it here, provided it does not upset the printing arrangements, so that this, the most difficult section, can be thoroughly gone over again. An appendix will follow in the shape of a lengthy note on early German common ownership of land. When you go to quod I would advise you to procure from one library or another:
Page me46.336

G.L. v. Maurer, Einleitung in die Geschichte der Marken-, Hof-, Dorf- und Städteverfassung in Deutschland, also his Geschichte der Markenverfassung in Deutschland.
Page me46.336

Page me46.336

It is very necessary that someone in Germany should familiarise himself to some extent with the subject — a person capable of reading these things with an open mind and without ready-made 'cultivated' preconceptions. These are the chief works and a knowledge of them would mean that you would have extremely solid foundations to go on in any debate about landownership or agrarian questions.

Page me46.336

Judging by the few articles he has written in the Sozialdemokrat (on the possible repeal of the Anti-Socialist Law),†383 Vollmar would appear to have turned out very well. I should be glad if this also proved to be the case elsewhere; we could damned well do with some efficient chaps.
Page me46.336

Marx is slowly recovering from his three attacks of pleurisy. For his long-standing, highly troublesome, sleep-inhibiting bronchial cough he had recourse while in Argenteuil to the nearby sulphur springs at Enghien, but in view of the bad weather did not, out of consideration for his general condition, effect the complete recovery that would otherwise have been virtually certain. After that he went to Vevey for three weeks with Madame Lafargue, intending to leave there the day before yesterday, first for Geneva, then Paris and then, given passable weather, to come over here for a few weeks in October. Under no circumstances ought he to spend the winter in London, but whether in the south of England or elsewhere is for the doctors to decide. However I can tell from his letters that there has been a steady improvement, albeit hampered by the bad summer.
Page me46.336

Where exactly are you chaps at this moment? It seems as though you have all been turned by the 'Lesser'†198 into a lot of Flying Dutchmen, just as Marx has been by his illness.
Page me46.336

Give Liebknecht my kindest regards when you see him.

Page Break me46.337
Page me46.337

The whole Egyptian affair is an act of vengeance by the Jews (Rothschild, Erlanger, etc.) for their erstwhile expulsion from Egypt under Pharaoh.†391

Your
F.E.

Page me46.337
First published abridged in the newspaper Vorwärts, Nr. 44, 22 February 1910 and in full, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

186
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON

Page me46.337
Paris,†392 28 September 1882

DEAR FRED,

A letter from Laura in which I had enclosed a note†284 was accidentally left lying on the writing-desk at Laura's and so cannot be sent off before the post goes.†393 But in order that no time may be lost, I would again ask you to send me some bank notes from London as soon as possible (address as before to Argenteuil), in case Dr Dourlen, as I hope, allows me TO CROSS THE CHANNEL.
Page me46.337
Today rain is pelting down from the so-called heavens, despite the fact that Alphand continues to fear a famine d'eau.†a
Page me46.337
At the same time, drop me a couple of LINES AS TO THE state of the weather in London.

Moor

Page me46.337
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.338

187
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.338
Paris, 30 September 1882

Dear FRED,

Just as I was on the point of leaving Argenteuil for here (i.e. la Gare†a St Lazare), to wait for Laura, dine with her in Paris and return with her to Argenteuil, I was caught by the facteur†b with your letter†284 and enclosure. Laura will be arriving in ABOUT A quarter of an hour, PROBABLY with your letter to her.
Page me46.338
Today I was examined by Dr Dourlen in Jennychen's PRESENCE. The râlement muqueux†c has disappeared; SOME whistling remains but I am well on the way to ridding myself of this persistent catarrh, the character of which has already changed considerably. My GENERAL habitus†d has, it appears, improved enormously in addition to which I have grown 'fatter'.

Page me46.338

Under no circumstances does he wish me to spend more than a fortnight — 3 weeks if the weather is really fine — in London. He is less afraid of moderate cold than of a moist atmosphere. Nor, under any circumstances, am I to travel via Calais by the special night train, but go to Calais by day and not leave there till the day after, by the morning STEAMER.
Page me46.338

For the rest, la campagne de l'hiver,†e as he called it, should start early, in the Isle of Wight, Jersey, Morlaix (Brittany) or Pau. Otherwise he would sooner I didn't stay anywhere too far south except IN CASE OF NEED, which is also why he had considered Vevey a better place for me than Montreux which is warmer. He assumes that normal temperatures, etc., will not suddenly rebel again in consequence of my arrival. Finally, he will not give me definite 'permission' to leave for London until his mind has been set at rest by the meteorological bulletins for the next few days. (French doctors are strongly prejudiced against the London climate.) He is now certain the cure will be complete, provided no mistakes are made. Hence I shall not get away before Tuesday†f at the earliest.

Page Break me46.339
Page me46.339

If the French government — AS REPRESENTED BY THE SWINDLING FINANCIER Duclerc — knew of my presence here (particularly in view of the absence of the Chamber), it might, even without Dr Dourlen's permission, send me packing, the 'Marxistes' and 'Anti-Marxistes' having, at their respective socialist congresses at Roanne and St-Étienne,†394 both done their damnedest to ruin my stay in France. Nevertheless, I regard it as some compensation that the selfsame Alliance gang — the Malons, Brousses, etc. — should have seen their hopes so sadly dashed in as much as (to use our Bruno's†a favourite turn of speech) the 'unspoken' innuendo, 'Marx is a “German”, alias “Prussian”, hence French “Marxistes” too are traitors', could no longer cut any ice with anyone, nor yet dare make itself 'heard', even for a moment. C'est un progrés.†b
Page me46.339

Clemenceau has been seriously ill and has not quite recovered yet. He, too, took Capital with him from Paris to read while he was ill. It would now seem to be the fashion for FRENCH REAL OR WOULD BE 'ADVANCED' LEADERS — IF 'THE DEVIL BE SICK'.†395
Page me46.339

Love to all, not forgetting Jollymeyer.

Moor
Page me46.339

I shall write or telegraph before I leave France.

Page me46.339

First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

188
MARX TO LAURA LAFARGUE†72
IN PARIS
Page me46.339
[London,] 9 October 1882
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

Dear Cacadou,

The weather over here isn't bad, i.e. there are a few reasonably fine hours when the sun is shining brightly; for the rest a cloudy sky and occasional showers of rain; not cold generally speaking and the old, familiar fog only in the mornings and evenings.

Page Break me46.340
Page me46.340
Schorlemmer came up to London on Saturday,†a just for a friendly reunion; he has got to return to Manchester this evening, since he has to 'perpetrate' a lecture there tomorrow. He sends you his kindest regards.
Page me46.340
Engels is most annoyed at not having been sent the Égalité for many months past, nor is my copy of that paper now being despatched to London. How much is the subscription to the Citoyen, incl. postage to London? I forgot about it when I left Paris and shall send a MONEY ORDER immediately on hearing from you.
Page me46.340
Yesterday we dined with Engels; Pumps was there too, OF COURSE, with her BABY†b and Percy.†c The BABY is very cheerful and her conversation livelier than that of her maman — at all events.
Page me46.340
Yesterday evening Donkin came to see me, but won't be giving me a medical examination until later this week; he thought I was looking better. He considers the ISLE OF Wight to be the best place for me to stay during the approaching FOG TIME OF England.
Page me46.340
Johnny is cheerful and, on the whole, 'HAPPY', although it's touching how often he speaks of his maman†d and Harry. Under Tussy's guidance he has once again acquired the habit of washing himself from head to foot in 'cold water' every morning. His 'well-being' leaves nothing to be desired; going to bed regularly at an early hour (8 p.m.) also suits him. His learning has progressed as far as 'capital letters', likewise to deciphering the large Roman numerals on clocks.
Page me46.340

I am most anxious that you should send me news of Jenny's STATE, personal and domestic. Is the Longuet FAMILY†e back yet?
Page me46.340
The great agitator, St Paul,†f will, OF COURSE, again be enthroned on the heights of the Boulevard de Port-Royal.†g Write and tell me about his ADVENTURES, but above all about yourself — how you are and how things are going.
Page me46.340
My cough is still tiresome, but more as a MEMENTO that I have got to throw it off completely if I am to become ALTOGETHER fit for action again.
Page me46.340
Lenchen and Johnny send their love.

Page Break me46.341
Page me46.341
Farewell, Cacadou, my trusty and beloved travelling companion,

OLD NICK

Page me46.341
First published, in the language of the original (German), in Annali, an. I, Milano, 1958

Printed according to the original

189
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†113
IN ZURICH
Page me46.341
London, 20 October 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

I have long been intending to write to you about French affairs, but have only just got round to it. Just as well, since it means that I can kill two birds with one stone.
Page me46.341
1. St-Étienne. — Despite the well-meant advice of the Belgians, the inevitable has happened; the incompatible elements have taken themselves off.†394 And that is a good thing. In the beginning, when the parti ouvrier†a was formed, it was necessary to admit all elements who accepted the programme; if they did so with mental reservations this would be bound to emerge later on. We over here have never been under any illusion about Malon and Brousse. Both were educated in the Bakuninist school of intrigue; Malon was actually one of those responsible for the foundation of Bakunin's secret 'Alliance'†67 (one of the 17 founders). But enfin,†b they had to be given a chance to show whether, along with Bakunin's theory, they had also sloughed off his practice. Developments have shown that, if they accepted the programme (and adulterated it, Malon having introduced sundry changes for the worse), it was with the mental reservation that they would subvert it. What was begun at Rheims†223 and Paris†337 has been completed at St-Étienne. The programme's proletarian class character has been eliminated. The communist considérants†a of 1880†68 have now been replaced with the Rules of the International of 1866†b which had to be couched in such elastic terms precisely because the French Proudhonists had lagged so far behind, yet could not be left out. The positive demands of the programme have been neutralised in that every locality may, whenever it wishes, formulate an individual programme for each individual occasion. Not only is the so-called party of St-Étienne not a workers' party — it isn't a party at all because it hasn't in fact got a programme: at most it is a Malon-Brousse party. The worst these two can reproach the old programme with is that it repelled more people than it attracted. That has now been put right: neither Proudhonists nor Radicals†396 can now have any grounds for remaining aloof and, if Malon and Co. were to have their way, the 'revolutionary pap' of which Vollmar complains†397 would be the official expression of the French proletariat.

Page Break me46.342
Page me46.342

In all Latin countries (and elsewhere too, perhaps), the practice as regards congressional mandates has always been exceedingly lax. Many of these could not stand close scrutiny. So long as it wasn't taken too far, and so long as only matters of little consequence were involved, small harm was done. But the Bakuninists were the first to introduce this (initially in the Jura) as a regular thing, going in for expert mandate-rigging and attempting by this means to make their way to the top. Similarly now at St-Étienne. The preliminaries to the congress have been generally dominated by all the old Bakuninist tactics which stop at nothing — lies, slander, covert cliquism. That's the only thing Brousse is master of. These chaps forget that subterfuges and the like, which may succeed in the case of small sections and in a small territory such as the Jura, will necessarily bring about the downfall of those who try them on in the case of a genuine workers' party in a large country. The apparent victory scored at St-Étienne will not be a lasting one and Malon-Brousse will soon be done for once and for all.
Page me46.342

It would seem that any workers' party in a large country can develop only through internal struggle, as indeed has been generally established in the dialectical laws of development. The German party has come to be what it is through the struggle between the Eisenachers and Lassalleans,†269 in which, after all, the actual scuffles played a leading role. Unification only became possible when the gang of scoundrels deliberately cultivated as a tool by Lassalle had lost its efficacity and even then we were in far too great a hurry to effect that unification.†381 In France, those people who have admittedly relinquished Bakuninist theory but continue to make use of Bakuninist weapons and at the same time seek to sacrifice the class character of the movement to their own particular ends, will likewise have to lose their efficacity before unification again becomes feasible. Such being the case, it would be sheer folly to advocate unification. Moral homilies are of no avail against teething troubles which, circumstances being what they are today, are something that has got to be gone through.

Page Break me46.343

Page me46.343

Come to that, the Roanne people stand in great need of constant and searching criticism. Revolutionary hot air and futile impetuosity are things they are all too often prepared to tolerate.

Page me46.343

2. Citoyen-Bataille. As long ago as last summer, at a time when things were going badly for the Bataille, when its funds had been frittered away on advertising, etc., the capitalists had pulled out and Lissagaray had broken with Malon-Brousse, Lissagaray proposed to Guesde that the two papers be amalgamated, that they should both be editors-in-chief and each have the right to sling out three of the other paper's editors. Thus did Lissagaray think to rid himself of the hated Lafargue. This was unanimously rejected by the editors of the Citoyen. The Bataille continued to founder. Thereupon Lissagaray approached the proprietor (a Dutch FINANCIER†a) of the Citoyen, and negotiated the amalgamation behind its editors' backs in the hope that this coup de main would place them at his mercy. The reverse happened. The editors of the Citoyen continued to publish the paper without a day's interruption, and sued the proprietor for breach of contract. Lissagaray's coup was thereby foiled and he himself utterly put to shame, as he has himself admitted by having recourse to the extreme measure of challenging the 'lâche†b Lafargue', as he describes him in the Bataille, to a duel which, it is to be hoped, the latter will not accept under any circumstances. — That Lissagaray has ruined himself for good and all by this Bonapartist coup can be pretty well assumed. To go and risk the very existence of a paper at a moment when it is more necessary than ever to the party in their struggle against the St-Étienne faction and to do so in order to save one's own paper from foundering, to change (had this coup succeeded) the character of that paper, no matter what the cost, and to change it, what's more, in alliance with the bourgeois proprietor and in the teeth of the editors, the representatives of the party, — that really is a bit too thick!

Page Break me46.344

Page me46.344

Should the enclosed be unduly strong, you must tone it down.†398 What's the position as regards printing the pamphlet?†378 Marx is here (but secretly!) and will, I hope, be able to spend the winter on the English coast.

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.344

Since this letter is being sent off at 5 p.m. on 20 October, it should be in your hands by tomorrow evening or Sunday†a morning.

Page me46.344

First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

190
ENGELS TO LAURA LAFARGUE
IN PARIS
Page me46.344
London, 21 October 1882

My dear Laura,

The day before yesterday we received from Paul†b the two first nos of the transplanted Citoyen.†c From the Justice we had already seen what a Coup de Jarnac†399 the noble-hearted Prospére†d had tried to give the Parti ouvrier†e; from the above two Citoyens we saw that le coup avait manqué et†f from the stupid shot in the Citoyen et Bataille against 'le lâche†g Paul Lafargue' we saw that Prospére le savait

Page Break me46.345
parfaitment,†a and was reduced to unmask himself as what he really is, a Cassagnacquian spadassin.†400 Of course Paul will not have been such a fool as to donner dans ce panneau.†b
Page me46.345
Now for two days there have not arrived either Citoyen, or Citoyen et Bataille, and today even La Justice is not to hand. We are therefore quite at sea. Has the Citoyen been stopped for want of funds after two nos, or has it merely been owing to the génie éminemment organisateur des français†c that we have not received it? You know, in a crisis like this we ought to be regularly supplied with that information which we cannot obtain here. I have written a long letter to Bernstein yesterday†d about both Malon-Brousse and this last affair; but every day something may happen in Paris about which it would be important to communicate at once to Bernstein the correct version. How can I do so without materials? Is it really impossible for the Parisian friends to do those things which are the most important to their own interests?
Page me46.345
I heard from Mohr today that you have written to him and that Jenny is better. Mohr is very well on the whole, Donkin who examined him was almost surprised at the great improvement he found (barring the unavoidable remnants of the two later pleurisies); he thinks he can pass the winter on the English South Coast. He will have to go soon, we have a perfectly beastly wet day to-day — but warm — and when other people have fine weather we begin to have fogs.
Page me46.345
I wish you could first pop in some Sunday evening and see the change. Mohr of course cannot go out at nights, so there is nobody but the Pumpses and now and then Helen.†e The 'crimm' has entirely disappeared. The other day the great Loria called again. That evening Jollymeier happened to be here, and as we were all a little bit on, poor Loria had to undergo some chaffing, he asked Helen had she also studied political economy and told us he had tasted Moselle wine in Berlin but it tasted like sugar and water. Well, you can imagine the explosions. I appreciate, the poor pedant has enough of our 'sarcastic' company. Imagine he would not believe that you and Tussy were sisters and stared when he heard who your father was.

Page me46.345
Today Signor Alessandro Oldrini called at Mohr's while I was there, but with a consistency of which I was very glad, he was not received. If Mohr had seen him, God knows how many Zanardellis would have followed.

Page Break me46.346
Page me46.346
The Pumpses are getting on very well, they have been a fortnight or so in their new house, but it is not yet quite furnished — for want of cash. The baby†a has had an abscess on the chest but is getting better. Charley†b and Miss Bevan have been married three weeks, I have not yet seen them since the happy despatch.
Page me46.346
Now it is getting on fast for post-time and as I want you to have this letter tomorrow morning I must conclude. Kind regards to Paul and if you see them, Guesde and Mesa.

Yours affectionately,
F.E.

Page me46.346
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 35, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

191
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†401
IN ZURICH
Page me46.346
London, 27 October 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

In great haste the finale of the Paris affair,†c for I can hardly suppose the Parisians send you these things — even we over here have to extract them from the chaps by force.
Page me46.346
Well, the Citoyen continued to appear under its old editors, while Lissagaray edited Le Citoyen et la Bataille with the aid of two anarchists, Mals and Crié. On Friday evening Citoyen et Bataille made an attempt to have the Citoyen confiscated (by the police) on account of a Wanda Kryloff feuilleton, whereupon the proprietor of the old Citoyen, Blommestein, a Dutch financier and now Lissagaray's associé,†d asserted his proprietorial rights. Having been warned in good time, they removed the feuilleton, and the police inspector who came to confiscate it had to go away discomfited. On Sunday, the editors of the Citoyen et Bataille declared that, should further attempts be made to confiscate the Citoyen, they would resign en masse (all 3 of them). That same evening, Sunday, the Citoyen des deux mondes, as it had been called on legal advice, was confiscated for bearing an unauthorised title, again at Blommestein's behest. On Monday, i.e. Tuesday morning, it reappeared as the Citoyen international and called upon the editors of the Citoyen et Bataille to stand by their word and resign. Not them! Mals and Crié declared secretly that they at any rate would resign, but did not; Crié was arrested for alleged complicity at Montceau-les-Mines†402 and is now in quod.

Page Break me46.347
Page me46.347
In the meantime, since the editors of the Citoyen would have gone in daily fear of its being confiscated unless they changed its name, the paper has, for the past 4 days, been calling itself L'Égalité, alongside which the weekly Égalité is to continue appearing. Where they are getting the money from I don't know; it's 3 weeks since we had any news of the chaps. Nor did we get an Égalité today. But since your Frenchman's génie éminemment organisateur†a manifests itself, especially in our friends' case, in organising the most tremendous disorder, one cannot draw any conclusions from that.
Page me46.347
The attempt to kill the Citoyen with the help of the judiciary and police has stripped Lissagaray of the last remnants of his disguise. He has combined stupidity and baseness in rare measure.
Page me46.347
Marx asks whether you could procure for him a copy of the Swiss Factory Act.†403 We should be greatly obliged if you could let us know in which year the Factory Act now in force in Germany was passed and whether it is a separate Act or part of the Imperial Trade Regulations. We should then be able to get hold of it. Marx needs it for the 3rd edition of Volume I†b and promises in return to send you something every now and again for the Sozialdemokrat. In a few days he will be leaving for the Isle of Wight where, provided nothing untoward happens, he will spend the whole winter (5 or 6 hours' journey from here).
Page me46.347
Your MISTER Garcia is one of the many little democrats who scurry about London, and have a finger in every association. Their new central boss — or, as Stieber puts it, ringleader,†404 is a BARRISTER called

Page Break me46.348
Hyndman, a strongly democratic and ambitious man who unsuccessfully stood for parliament in the recent elections. All these little folk have no one behind them but each other. They split up into all manner of sects and into a befuddled non-sectarian tail consisting of those who hail democracy in whatever guise. They are intent on impressing the world with their own importance. Hence the catalogues of unknown celebrities in Garcia's articles. In most of them there are good intentions and to spare, but likewise the intention to cut a figure. Hence I would advise you to treat the chap's letters with considerable reserve; after all, his principal aim is to elevate to the position of an important party a small clique which has, for twenty years, remained one and the same nonentity, if under various names and in a variety of guises. But, or so it seems to me, the Sozialdemokrat is not there in order to create a continental reputation for these busy nobodies. Herewith the card of one of the little associations of which Garcia is secretary and to which he recently invited me to lecture; I, of course, refused.

Page me46.348

I anxiously await the material on Bismarck.†a If Marx goes away now, I shall set to work in earnest and, should I become engrossed in a lengthier piece of work†b which ought to have been finished long ago, I shall not be able to extricate myself at all quickly, and I should warn you in advance that in that case you will have to wait. If I had got the stuff here, I could start in on it straight away and polish off this business first of all. Bebel promised but didn't send anything and now is actually bound for prison where Liebknecht already is,†405 and there's absolutely no hope of getting anything from the others.
Page me46.348

Encl. for Kautsky.
Page me46.348

Kindest regards,

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.348
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.349

192
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL†7
IN LEIPZIG
Page me46.349
London, 28 October 1882

Dear Bebel,

I have at last got round to writing — Marx has been back here for about 3 weeks and leaves the day after tomorrow for the Isle of Wight, so I have had no respite in which to do anything.
Page me46.349

As regards Vollmar's articles,†383 I was particularly taken with the first one on account of its rightful dismissal of the wails emitted by those 'right wing' gentlemen who are clamouring for the repeal of the Anti-Socialist Law,†16 even upon conditions that would be worse for the party than the Anti-Socialist Law itself, provided this would enable them to go back to founding newspapers á la Gerichts-Zeitung and hence to the old literary fleshpots of Egypt.†406 In my view it would be perfectly in order to point out to these people — and it was exclusively against them that the article was levelled that a voluntary repeal of the Anti-Socialist Law might very easily be accompanied by conditions that aggravated the position of the party; to emphasise that the last way we shall rid ourselves of the Anti-Socialist Law is by begging and cringing.
Page me46.349

Otherwise the question is an academic one so far as I am concerned. I believe that the Law will receive its quietus from the events which will usher in the revolution and which cannot be long in coming.
Page me46.349

I read the second article pretty cursorily as there were 2 or 3 people with me who kept chatting all the time. Otherwise I should have detected, from the way he visualises revolution, the French influence and hence also, no doubt, my Vollmar. Your handling of this aspect has been absolutely right.†407 It is the longed-for, ultimate realisation of the phrase 'single reactionary mass'.†408 Here all the official parties combined in a lump, there we socialists in column; a great decisive battle, victory at one stroke all along the line. Things aren't that easy in reality. In reality, as you indeed point out, a revolution begins the other way round, in that the great majority of the people, as also of the official parties, band together against the government thus isolated and overthrow it and only after such of the official parties as still remain viable have reciprocally, collectively and successively brought about their own ruin, only then will Vollmar's great parting of the ways come about and with it our opportunity to rule. If, like Vollmar, we were to try and begin the revolution straight off with the last act; we should have a pretty rotten time of it.

Page Break me46.350
Page me46.350

I paid little attention at the time to the final passage on the new tactics — there's certainly a great deal of indictable stuff there if looked at in conjunction with the Penal Code. However no great harm can be done if someone occasionally goes a bit too far in this direction; as it is, they err all too often in the other. So if I have made too light of this passage you, or so it seems to me, have taken it too seriously; you will have seen from Viereck's jubilations in the Süddeutsche Post how the right wing is seeking to make capital out of your reply.†409 I don't believe our people in Germany would have accepted Vollmar's way of talking simply on the strength of his articles, though the proclamation he has called for, 'We are organising in secret', certainly deserves to be rejected.
Page me46.350

I am eagerly awaiting the material on Bismarck,†a but as you're both in jug,†405 no doubt I shall now have to wait some time. But if by then I have got my teeth into a different, longer work, which has also long been pending,†b I shan't be able to break off, and Bismarck will have to wait.

Page me46.350

In France the long-expected split has occurred.†394 The original association of Guesde and Lafargue with Malon and Brousse was probably inevitable when the party was founded, but Marx and I were never under any illusion that it could last. The point at issue is purely one of principle: ought the struggle of the proletariat against the bourgeoisie to be waged as a class struggle, or ought it to be conceded that, in good opportunist (or Possibilist, as the socialist translation has it) fashion, the programme and the movement's class character be dropped wherever this would enable more votes or more 'supporters' to be won? Malon and Brousse have come out in favour of the latter, thereby sacrificing the proletarian class character of the movement and making a division inevitable. Well and good. The development of the proletariat takes place everywhere to the accompaniment of internal struggles, and France, which is presently forming a workers' party for the first time, is no exception. We in Germany have passed beyond the first phase of the internal struggle (with the Lassalleans) and others still lie ahead of us. Unification is perfectly all right provided it works, but there are things which take precedence over unification. And when, like Marx and me, one has spent a lifetime fighting harder against the self-styled socialists than against anyone else (for we regarded the bourgeoisie simply as a class and hardly ever took issue with individual bourgeois), one cannot feel unduly perturbed just because the inevitable struggle has broken out.

Page Break me46.351

Page me46.351

I hope this will reach you before you go to quod. Marx and Tussy send their love. Marx is recuperating in fine style and, if there's no recurrence of his pleurisy, he'll be stronger next autumn than he has been for years. When you see Liebknecht in the 'Käfigturm',†a as they call it in Berne, give him regards from us all.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.351

First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

193

ENGELS TO PAUL LAFARGUE†19
IN PARIS

Page me46.351

London, 30 October 1882

My dear Lafargue,

I should be glad if you would send the daily Égalité regularly to the Editors of the Sozialdemokrat Zurich, Switzerland.

Page me46.351

In return, they will send you the Sozialdemokrat. The exchange — a daily for a weekly paper — may not be fair, but all the same it is you who will benefit. The idea is to keep the editors of the Sozialdemokrat in touch with what is going on in Paris and, as you yourself will realise, it is impossible for a ± proletarian editorial board to subscribe to all the sheets that keep springing up and disappearing in Paris.

Page Break me46.352
Page me46.352

Up till now, the Sozialdemokrat's chief source of Parisian news has been Vollmar, a German Reichstag deputy and ex-officer who was paralysed as a result of a wound. He is a friend of Malon's, so you can imagine the extent to which the latter has turned him against your party. To that end he has not only made use of the many mistakes with which you have unfailingly supplied him (an example being Léon Picard's absurd article about the Germans in Paris last September†410) but, as is his wont, has also told him one lie after another.
Page me46.352

For all that, Vollmar is a good chap; in Germany he issued a pamphlet so impossibilist†383 that he will no longer be able to remain a Possibilist in France. It would be worth finding an opportunity to talk to him and get him to see the other side of the coin. I haven't got his Paris address, but it shouldn't be difficult to find.
Page me46.352

In Zurich I am bringing out a German edition of Socialism: Utopian and Scientific with a great many addenda.†378 I shall send you some copies as soon as they arrive. The thing will be about twice as long as your translation.†20 Would there be any chance of publishing a new French edition based on this German one?
Page me46.352

Again I repeat that, for you, it is of the utmost importance to keep the Sozialdemokrat informed; Bernstein could not be more willing, but from over here we cannot keep him in touch with things of which we ourselves are so often left in ignorance. You would do well to seek occasion to write to him, asking for information of some sort, etc. It is by such innocent means that Malon succeeds in ingratiating himself with others, means which you persist in ignoring. You should remember from time to time that Paris is no longer the capital of the world (which no longer has a capital) and less still the world itself.
Page me46.352

Love to Laura.
Page me46.352

Yesterday Marx dined with me and in the evening we all had supper at his house, after which we sat together drinking rum until one o'clock, and today he has left for Ventnor.

Yours ever,
F.E.

Page me46.352
First published in: F. Engels, P. et L. Lafargue, Correspondance, t. I, Paris, 1956

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

Page Break me46.353

194
ENGELS TO MARX
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.353
[Postcard]

[London, 1 November 1882]

Dear Moor,

I trust all has gone well with you so far.†411 Two Égalités have gone off and 2 old Kölnische Zeitungs yesterday. This evening it's raining and blowing like fun here. Yesterday's brief debate about Maceo's extradition from Gibraltar discreditable to Gladstone & Co.†412 Johnny had 2 teeth pulled out today with a totally unexpected heroism that surprised even Dr Shyman. No other news.
Page me46.353
Wednesday evening.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.353
First published in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

195
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†413
IN ZURICH
Page me46.353
London, 2-3 November 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

Have still received no proofs†378 (just arrived 3/11). On the other hand, have had from Bebel the Accident and Health Insurance Bill of 1882, but not the earlier one†144 which represents genuine Bismarckian socialism, unclouded by parliamentary divisions. This I would much like to have, along, perhaps, with other matter relating to the Accident Insurance Bank; without it I can do nothing.†414

Page Break me46.354
Page me46.354
Many thanks for Marquis Posener.†a I do not need all the details in respect of the remaining railways. The early or mid-1879 prices (before anything was known about nationalisation) would suffice. The difference between then and now would be proof enough of the way the state has bought up the bourgeoisie.
Page me46.354
In many respects Lassalle was a good jurist and, moreover, had studied his Roman law of inheritance sufficiently to impress jurists by the extent of his knowledge. (Impress was a favourite expression of his; while contemplating the Rosetta Stone†415 in the British Museum, he said to Marx: 'Should I, do you think, set aside six months in order that I may impress the Egyptologists?') In Germany all one has to do is elaborate some point in accordance with a particular theory, and the jurists of today have forgotten that the theory elaborated by Lassalle was lifted word for word from Hegel's Philosophy of Law and History†b and, moreover, does not hold water if applied to the Roman law of inheritance; this did not evolve out of what Hegel called 'the will'; rather, it evolved out of the history of the Roman gens, the tribal kinship group about which, indeed, few jurists know very much. I only said, by the way, that I should be obliged to demolish the legend of Lassalle as an original thinker,†c and that is absolutely essential.
Page me46.354
I had not seen Lafargue's letter in the Prolétaire†d and shall certainly ask for it to be sent me from Paris, though I am unlikely to get it. If you still have it, I should be glad if you could send it me; you shall have it back. Incidentally, Malon had better be on his guard; Lafargue has a whole pile of compromising letters from him.
Page me46.354
Picard's absurd article†410 has certainly been disclaimed in the Citoyen, as Marx saw with his own eyes. Come to that, the man who sent it to you, marked in blue, does not know French; he has underlined as a chauvinistic remark of the Citoyen's a passage which Picard attributes to the exploiteurs bourgeois ... ligue des patriotes ... dont Gambetta est la tête†e! I have marked it in red. Picard enjoys pitting himself against Guesde and, by way of playing a nasty prank on the latter, smuggled the article into the paper; if a proper editorial department were a possibility over there, this nonsense wouldn't have occurred.

Page Break me46.355
Page me46.355

Now for the 'nothing short of creditable performance put up by the editors of the Citoyen in the affaire Godard'.†416 We happen to know all about this, Marx having often heard the tale when in Paris, both from those who had taken part and those who had had nothing whatever to do with it. Following an incident at a meeting Godard went to the editorial office of the Citoyen where he was accorded an amiable reception by Guesde who still has something of a soft spot — of a personal nature — for his erstwhile anarchist brothers. In the middle of a quiet conversation Godard, with no excuse whatsoever, suddenly dealt Guesde a violent blow in the face. The others sprang to their feet, whereupon Godard, like the cowardly anarchist he is, took refuge in a corner — surely they would not ill-treat him, a prisonnier†a? And, instead of beating him into pulp, the childlike Citoyen chaps conferred together and decided qu'en effet il fallait le lâcher parce qu'il — était prisonnier†b!! Godard left in a hurry, sad to say, unchastised. But the following evening, when most of the editors were known to be absent, a dozen armed (with cudgels, etc.) anarchists forced their way into the office and, with threats, demanded satisfaction of some kind or other. Massard, however, stood firm, and they had to retire empty-handed. But now the fédération du centre†265 was informed; for several evenings they placed working men on guard, and messieurs les anarchistes did not return.
Page me46.355

But now I would ask you to give me some idea of the sort of thing the 'nothing short of creditable', etc., is supposed to have consisted in.
Page me46.355

The whole gist of your letter points to the conclusion that you are not getting the Citoyen regularly and hence, apart from the Égalité and the Prolétaire, have to depend on the accounts provided by comrades in Paris who, in turn, exclusively rely on the services of Malon and Co., in regard to whom their credulity would seem to have assumed no mean proportions. In my view, however, the party organ ought in no circumstances to allow its judgment of a workers' movement in a foreign country to be unduly influenced by comrades in that country's capital who are, after all, a shifting population. German associations abroad are unquestionably the worst sources of information on the movement abroad; they seldom command a bird's eye view and generally have their own particular connections to the exclusion of any others, which means that they are unable to participate in the daily life and development of the movement around them; finally, they persist in the belief that, even today, they are still of more than passing significance to the masses actually inside Germany. What would have become of our freedom to form an opinion of the English movement or non-movement, had we paid the slightest heed to the changing majority in the London Society†8? And are not the German associations in New York equally uncritical in their attitude towards the American labour movement? Every association desires above all else to be thought important, and will therefore — in the absence of a very energetic and intelligent leadership — fall an easy prey to any foreigner who knows the ropes.

Page Break me46.356

Page me46.356

Nor have you any other source, i.e. other than Malon at second hand, for your reiterated assertion that in France 'Marxism' suffers from a marked lack of esteem. Now what is known as 'Marxism' in France is, indeed, an altogether peculiar product — so much so that Marx once said to Lafargue: 'Ce qu'il y a de certain c'est que moi, je ne suis pas Marxiste.'†a But if, last summer, the Citoyen was able to sell 25,000 copies and attain a standing such that Lissagaray hazarded his reputation in order to gain control of it,†b would not this seem somewhat incompatible with the lack of esteem you insist upon? Even more incompatible, however, is the fact that the said lack of esteem does not prevent these chaps from enjoying an esteem so great as to enable them, after being chucked out of the Citoyen, to start up an important new daily paper the selfsame day†c and, supported almost exclusively by workers and petty bourgeois (ouvriers et petits industriels†d as Lafargue puts it), to keep it going for almost a fortnight despite harassment by the proprietor†e of the old Citoyen, and find a capitalist with whom they will be negotiating the paper's†f fate — oui ou non†g — tomorrow. The facts speak so clearly for themselves that Malon will doubtless have to swallow his 'lack of esteem'. However, so great is the 'esteem' in which Mr Malon himself is held that, upon his applying to Rochefort for an increase in the fee he is paid for his Intransigeant articles, he received the reply: 'Je vous paierai plus si vous écrivez moins.'†h One of these days Malon ought to have a go at founding a daily paper in Paris without so much as a farthing in his pocket, and then he could show us just what the esteem he enjoys is capable of doing.

Page Break me46.357
Page me46.357

But enough. I have asked Lafargue to send the Égalité to the Sozialdemokrat by way of exchange,†a and today he writes to say he will do so, in return for which kindly send the Sozialdemokrat to the Égalité. Should the Égalité not arrive regularly, you need only drop a line on a postcard to P. Lafargue, 66 boulevard de Port-Royal, Paris.
Page me46.357

As regards Vollmar's articles,†383 the first in particular, levelled as it was directly against those people who, cost what it may, are clamouring for the repeal of the Anti-Socialist Law,†16 was very good and hit the nail on the head. The second I read rather cursorily before a journey, with 3 or 4 people chattering around me. Otherwise I would not have taken the lenient view I in fact did of the excessively fervent language which, in conclusion, he advocates for use by the party. Bebel is right about this point†407 which, however, I think he takes rather too seriously. The real weakness of the 2nd article (which I did note, but attached little importance to) lies in its childish idea of the coming revolution which is to begin by the whole world splitting itself 'Á Guelph! Á Waibling!',†417 into 2 armies — on one side ourselves, on the other the whole of the 'single reactionary mass'.†408 I. e. the revolution is to start with the fifth act, not with the first, in which the masses of the opposition parties stand shoulder to shoulder against the government and its blunders and thus win through, whereupon one after the other of the individual parties amongst the victors loses its efficacity and puts itself out of the running, until finally the mass of the people are thereby forced onto our side, at which juncture the decisive battle so much vaunted by Vollmar can take place. However, in this context the point was a subsidiary one; what mattered was the demonstration that, if the gentlemen of the 'right wing' were to have their way, we should indeed be able to rid ourselves of the Anti-Socialist Law on conditions which, while more detrimental to the party than the Anti-Socialist Law itself, would permit these gentlemen to publish sheets like the Hamburg Gerichts-Zeitung, etc., and pass them off as party organs. In this I agree entirely with Vollmar and have, indeed, written and told Bebel as much.†b

Page me46.357
Yesterday I took out in your name, 137 alte Landstrasse, Riesbach, a money order for 12/- = 15.10 frs in payment of Marx's and my subscription. Kindly remind me when this again falls due.

Page Break me46.358
Page me46.358
Congratulations on entering your seventh thousand.†a

Yours,
F.E.
Page me46.358
In view of your amendment in the preface,†b there is no longer any call for an allusion to the Wyden Conference,†418 and I shall therefore delete it. Kindly send me 2 fair proofs.†378 Proof will go off today or tomorrow.

Page me46.358
First published in full, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

196
ENGELS TO MARX
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.358
[London,] 3 November [1882]

Dear Moor,

Postcard received†284 — we were somewhat anxious, not having heard how you felt on the day after your journey. — ALL RIGHT! Encl. letter from Lafargue — so Brissac, Picard and Bouis did after all waver for a moment!†419
Page me46.358
You will have seen that Andrea Costa has been elected in Ravenna and that there was a republican majority in Norway.†420

Page me46.358

Herewith the Égalité and the latest DOINGS of two 'locals' in whom you have always taken an interest.

Your
F.E.
Page me46.358
First published in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.359

197
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN
IN ZURICH
Page me46.359
London, 4 November 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

'I beg to confirm mine of yesterday's date. I also have pleasure in acknowledging receipt of your favour of the 1st inst. and make haste to reply to same.' As you can see, the old counting-house style is not yet quite defunct. — In fact I am writing straight away in order to save you a great deal of unnecessary trouble. It is most kind of you to hunt out and send all those books for us but 'as of now we have no real use for them'. For in the 3rd edition†a Marx merely intends to bring the state of factory legislation up to date by making emendations and additions; to that end he needs the text of the original Acts and nothing more. Secondary matters such as the protection of labour, liability, etc., are not of importance for this purpose. And I wrote and told you yesterday what I still need for Bismarck†414: the early or mid-1879 stock market prices of the last 6 railways to be nationalised, and the first reading of Bismarck's Accident, etc., Insurance Bills. If I need the latest edition of Saling†b due to come out in the meantime (it was kind of you to advise me of this), I can get hold of it within 4-5 days.
Page me46.359

I was quite glad to have your information about Garcia; after all, one never knows when one may not run into the man. What he says about agitation on the part of certain TRADES UNION chiefs in regard to the channel tunnel is quite true. They are the very ones who were always open to purchase by the radical bourgeois (under Morley) and on this occasion they have been joined by G. Shipton, the editor of The Labour Standard. There is absolutely no doubt that these people are in the pay of the Channel Company; they are not running up travelling expenses, etc., out of sheer enthusiasm. Admittedly it is a pretty innocuous business at present, but Shipton himself has now had a taste of bourgeois money, of course, and in view of his utter spinelessness and unbounded craving for popularity, this may lead to something more. He has lost his virginity and the other 'REPRESENTATIVE WORKING MEN', those who have grown grey in the hurly-burly, will doubtless take him completely in tow before long.

Page Break me46.360
Page me46.360

That you are being bombarded from Paris with pro-Malon anti-Guesde letters I willingly believe. But after all, the correspondent you cite pronounces himself an incompetent judge in as much as he admits writing under the impression of the current anti-German campaign and reproaches you for doing your duty as editor of the party organ, namely 'taking a bird's eye view', critical and all-embracing, of the affair and, unlike himself, refusing to be swayed by transitory and local events. And if, 2 months later, the man is still harping on this one unfortunate article†410 and permits his view of a significant faction of the workers to be determined by this one incident alone, does that mean that the party organ ought to proceed in an equally blinkered fashion? If there exists in Paris a whole lot of non-socialist and semi-socialist workers who vent their chauvinism on the hated Germans, is the Citoyen at fault? Certainly no more at fault than the German socialists in Paris if, when things come to a head, a whole lot of non-socialist German workers in Paris, London, New York or any other big American city accept a lower wage, thereby depressing the wages of the natives (in America even those of the Irish!) and bringing the German workers en masse into not altogether undeserved disrepute? And, finally, if he found the article so hard to stomach, why didn't he object? A disclaimer did appear and admittedly it made pretty light of the matter, but Marx tells me that, according to the tenets of the Paris press, it was as adequate as any that is customarily issued in respect of an editor who has blundered, always assuming that no pressure has been brought to bear on the paper. But such pressure could have been brought to bear, and very simply at that. Had a letter of protest been drawn up and delivered to the office either by a single individual or a deputation, the editors would have had to take the matter seriously. Had the editor in attendance (it might even have been Picard himself) made difficulties, all that would have been required was the threat, that, if the letter failed to appear in the Citoyen on the following day, it would be sent forthwith to the Sozialdemokrat, in Zurich. If your correspondent did not know enough French, Vollmar was there; had the latter been absent, Hirsch†a would have gladly taken the thing on. If the chaps had acted in this way they would have earned themselves respect, taught the Citoyen a useful lesson and I should have been heartily glad. But to submit to it all like so many sheep and then give vent to cries of woe is typically German and has earned the Germans the contempt they deserve. If we had put up with that sort of thing from the French and English, if our people had behaved so spinelessly in Germany, where should we be today? Before the German socialists in Paris demand it is their view of the French movement that should prevail in the party organ, they must demonstrate, firstly, that they are at all capable of free and impartial criticism and, secondly, that they are able to stand their ground vis-á-vis the French. Neither of these things has happened.

Page Break me46.361

Page me46.361

As to the undesirability of a daily paper in Paris, I am unable to share your view. In Paris the influence of a weekly is confined to small circles; if one wants to influence the masses one must have a daily. We too were opposed to a daily when there was no prospect of getting hold of one and the childish emigration to Lyons took place in connection with the Émancipation.†208 Things are different now. The Citoyen and its editors have made a name for themselves in Paris, bourgeois papers of all complexions have been compelled to engage in disputations with it and been triumphantly dismasted and, were we now to lose the daily, it would be a signal defeat. The fact that it cannot be an ideal, perfect paper, that a spuriously democratic system of editing by comité often ends up with there being no editing at all, as in the case of Picard's article, in no way alters the case. Not long ago, however, Lafargue sent me the issues, some 20 of them, dealing with the split,†394 and it seemed to me that the paper was by no means so bad — apart from those aspects we have long criticised and which would be no different in a weekly. But in the view of anyone familiar with conditions in the Paris press a paper appearing twice weekly would be impracticable from the start; it would come stillborn into the world. Either a weekly or a daily. And with the latter the former editors of the Citoyen undoubtedly now have a very considerable chance of succeeding, as is evident from their rapid transition to the daily Égalité which is already selling more than 5,000 copies in Paris.
Page me46.361

Now for the Clemenceau MEETING. To assess this, like other things in Paris, by German standards, is quite impossible. When Gambetta was unable to make himself heard in his own constituency,†179 there were shouts of triumph from the entire radical and socialist press. The same thing has now happened to Clemenceau.†421 Clemenceau is a cool, calculating man, quite prepared to go further, when he sees the need for it, and even become a communist, provided he can be convinced: convainquez-moi donc!†a And the workers in his constituency are employing a highly effective means of persuasion by demonstrating to him that his seat is in danger. That may give a shove to his somewhat slothful study of socialism.

Page Break me46.362
Page me46.362

But who were the people who did it? Guesde & Co. on their own perhaps? No, the chairman was in fact Joffrin, Malon's friend and Clemenceau's future rival candidate in Montmartre! So our people were decent enough, as always hitherto in the struggle against the bourgeoisie, to vote for Malon's chairman and side with Malon's people. If we are to censure the attitude of the workers, Malon's people are far more deserving of censure than Guesde's.
Page me46.362

The passage in the Citoyen simply says that these tactics should continue to be employed against Clemenceau; if they have been successful once, why not again? It remains to be seen whether the Prolétaire would be able to pay the Égalité in the same coin at meetings. Nothing I have witnessed so far has given me cause to believe that this would be so. But even were it momentarily to be the case, it wouldn't matter, and would be unlikely to continue for long.

Page me46.362
And now a quick word or two before the post goes — otherwise this letter won't leave until Monday morning — on the campaign you have in mind with regard to the programme.†422 I consider it most untimely. The programme is a bad one, but no one discusses it any more. An amended programme requires that it should not be open to dispute. So long as delegates are not elected in public, therefore, so long as every mandate can be disputed, it would be better not to interfere with the programme unless absolutely necessary. An amended programme would give the right wing an excuse to set themselves up as the true faithful who have complete confidence in the old well-tried programme, etc. So think twice about it before sowing these seeds of discord among a party that is bound hand and foot.
Page me46.362
The greatest danger to any political émigrés lies in the urge to be up and doing; something has really got to happen; something has really got to be done! And so things happen whose import one fails to appreciate and which, as one later realises oneself, had far better never happened at all. Might you and Vollmar be suffering from the urge to be up and doing? If so beware — of yourselves.

Page Break me46.363
Page me46.363
With kindest regards.

Yours,
F.E.
Page me46.363
Marx is in Ventnor, ISLE OF Wight†411; getting on well.

Page me46.363
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

198
ENGELS TO MARX
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.363
London, 6 November 1882

Dear Moor,

Today I got a note from Laura in which she tells me that the fate of the Égalité will not be decided until tomorrow†423; prospects, however, are most favourable.
Page me46.363

Have you seen today's Standard? Telegram from Frankfurt†a to the effect that, since Ignatiev's arrival in Paris, there have been renewed attempts — initially, it would seem, of a fairly lukewarm kind — at a Russo-French compromise: if France were to do something more about the extradition of dynamiters,†424 Russia for its part would vigorously back up France in Tunis, Egypt, etc. So that explains the police campaign in France! We shall see if anything of a relevant nature is submitted to the Chambers.
Page me46.363

Lafargue has sent me the Prolétaire containing the indictment of himself, Guesde, etc., which was read out at St-Étienne.†425 A truly Bakuninist concoction, but otherwise weak: its strongest props are mutually contradictory letters, written on the spur of the moment by Lafargue to Malon, and calmly reproduced by the latter without, it would seem, any fear of the same being done to his letters by

Page Break me46.364
Lafargue. Nor is he wrong; these gentlemen have made opportune use of their material and were Lafargue then to come out with Malon's letters, it would be moutarde aprés diner.†a I shall send you the thing tomorrow. But you must let me have it back for the sake of Bernstein, against whom I may well make use of it. In place of what I asked for, or along with it, the latter has proposed to send a small library of books about factory legislation, something which I can only hope I have nipped in the bud in good time†b; I expect to get the Swiss Factory Act†403 any day now and shall order for you the latest German trade regulations which contain the provisions for factories.
Page me46.364

No other news here.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.364
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

199
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.364
[Ventnor,] 8 November 1882

DEAR FRED,

What do you think of Deprez' experiment at the Munich Electricity Exhibition?†426 It was almost a year ago that Longuet promised to procure Deprez' works for me (notably his demonstration that electricity makes it possible to convey energy over considerable distances by means of a simple telegraph wire).†427 For a close friend of Deprez', Dr D'Arsonval, is a contributor to the Justice and has published this and that about Deprez' investigations. Longuet, as is his wont, is always forgetting.
Page me46.364
I greatly enjoyed looking at the 'PAPER' you sent in which Sherbrooke and Rivers Wilson parade as 'TRUSTEES IN LONDON FOR THE BOND-HOLDERS'.†428 In yesterday's Standard, HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES, Gladstone was severely rapped over the knuckles on account of the said TRUSTEES,†a since the above-named Rivers Wilson also occupies a senior (i.e. well-paid) position in the English PUBLIC DEBTS administration. Gladstone, clearly much embarrassed, at first attempted TO POOH-POOH [the matter] but, upon notice being given of a MOTION of censure over Rivers Wilson, Gladstone mendaciously denied all knowledge of the Galveston and Eagle etc. Railway Co. OUR SAINTLY GRAND OLD MAN†b is playing a role no less glorious over the 'extradition' from Gibraltar.†412 It was not for nothing, one recalls, that this same Gladstone, together with one Graham, etc., underwent his apprenticeship in the captious official oligarchy under Sir Robert Peel.

Page Break me46.365
Page me46.365
No one could be better suited for the clumsy, lying, stupid equivocation and lame excuses that characterise the Egyptian affair than Sir Charles Dilke.†429 He has neither the pietistic casuistry of Gladstone, nor the quizzical levity of the quondam†c Palmerston. Dilke is simply an ill-mannered parvenu who imagines himself great by reason of his boorishness.
Page me46.365
Since I take The Standard here, I too discovered therein the telegram from Frankfurt to which you allude.†d
Page me46.365
Apropos. I should be glad if Bernstein could send me the Jahrbuch containing the article by Oldenburg (at least I think that's what the author is called) on my theory of value.†e Although I don't actually need it, it would nevertheless be better if I had before my eyes what was argued at the time. When I wrote to the little Dutch parson†f the whole thing was quite fresh in my mind. Since then there has been all the business of my illness and also the loss of my wife — a long period of intellectual twilight.
Page me46.365
A violent wind rages ceaselessly here, particularly of an evening and at night; first thing in the morning it's usually wet, or at any rate GLOOMY; during the day there are always fine intervals which have to be snatched; at the same time the weather is unsettled, capricious. Last Sunday,†g for instance, at 4 o'clock, I went up onto the Downs where I walked along the cart-track past Bonchurch, the topmost of whose houses, ascending in terraces, are almost on a level with the track (the lowest are right down by the sea); the track goes meandering on, sometimes up, sometimes down, between the hilly part of the Downs and where they dip down to the sea. (When I was here last time with Tussy†234 I didn't venture up as far as the track.) Here one can spend hours sauntering along, enjoying hill and sea air at one and the same time. It was as warm as summer; the sky pure blue, with only small, translucent white clouds; all at once a cold shower, SKY SUDDENLY OVERCAST. To this, no doubt, I owe the muscular rheumatism (afflicting the left side of my chest, close to the old corpus delicti†a) which on Monday night became so severe that on Tuesday, overcoming my reluctance, I sent for a doctor. In reply to my questions, my OLD SPINSTER MacLean told me that there were 2 doctors who called at her house. The greatest, the most fashionable man was 'J.G. Sinclair Coghill, Physician to the Royal Hospital for Consumption'. I asked whether he be the old fogey whose coach I had had the displeasure of meeting almost daily before the door of her house. Indeed, he was the man. For he comes to see a permanent lodger here, an old lady 'with whom nothing serious it was the matter', but 'she liked to see the doctor at least 3 times in the course of a week'. This johnny I declined. However, the 2nd doctor who was consulted by her other lodgers was, she said, a young man called Dr James M. Williamson. It was him I called in; indeed he is a nice young fellow, nothing priestly about him. In fact, he could prescribe nothing save a LINIMENT for me to rub in. (So long as this muscular rheumatism persists it will hamper me, inducing as it does a feeling of discomfort, especially when I cough.) For the rest, he is apologetic about the bad weather. As regards the cough which has, particularly of late and also while I was in London, assumed an increasingly irksome, spasmodic character, I am my own health officer and hope I shall soon rid myself of it without the aid of a DOCTOR of medicine.

Page Break me46.366
Page me46.366
In order not to be too dependent on capricious variations in wind and temperature when loitering out of doors, I am again forced to carry a RESPIRATOR with me, in CASE OF NEED.
Page me46.366
A great commotion has been caused here by a letter that appeared in The Standard†b and the Globe TO THAT EFFECT that Ventnor is a CENTRAL HEAD OF TYPHOID FEVER and that a number of persons have fallen victim to it of late. Official and unofficial replies to this 'LIBEL' have now appeared in the local press. But the funniest thing of all is that the Ventnor municipal panjandrum wants to start a LIBEL-CASE against the writer of the letter!

Page Break me46.367
Page me46.367
Salut.

Moor

Page me46.367
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

200
MARX TO PHILIP STEPHEN KING†33
IN LONDON
Page me46.367
Ventnor (Isle of Wight)
9 November 1882 1 St Boniface Gardens

Dear Sir,

I enclose Post Office Order for £4,10,10 (cf. your Fol. L. 83), your note having been sent over to me after my return from the continent. Please forward me the Reports etc. (see the other page) to my present residence at Ventnor. Please also send to the same address your monthly parliam. lists until my return to London. I do not know the title, nor the time of the publication, of a recent Report on the London Bakehouses the which, at all events, has been published in the spring or the summer of this year. You would oblige me by getting it for me.

Yours truly,
Karl Marx

P.S. King, Esq.

1) Reports of the Inspectors of Factories for the years 1877-1882.
2) Agricultural Returns of Great Britain etc. for 1881 and 1882.
3) Agricultural Statistics, Ireland, General abstracts for the year 1880-1881 and the year 1881-1882.

Page Break me46.368
4) Statistical Abstract for the United Kingdom. The numbers: 28 and 29.
5) Reports of the Commissioners of Her M's Inland Revenue for the years 1874-1882.
6) The last edition of:
Alexander Redgrave: Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, with Introduction etc. (published by Shaw and Sons).†430

Page me46.368
First published, in the language of the original (English), in Marx-Engels-Jahrbuch, Nr. 8, Berlin, 1985

Reproduced from the magazine

201
ENGELS TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE
IN HOBOKEN
Page me46.368
London, 9 November 1882

Dear Sorge,

I have paid for The Labour Standard up till 3 December, 4/5d., and advised Shipton to send all future accounts to me.†431 Should you wish to cancel the subscription, perhaps you would let me have prompt notification.
Page me46.368
Marx was here for 3 weeks, very much better; all he needs now is decent air and careful treatment. His minor ailments have been vanquished to the extent that he will certainly be rid of them next summer. The main thing is to get him through the winter without a recurrence of PLEURISY, and for that reason he has gone to Ventnor in the ISLE OF Wight†411 whence I have just received a line or two from him.†a So far as circumstances permit, the 3rd edition†b will now be taken vigorously in hand there and won't, I trust, occupy too much time. For the rest he was very cheerful and sprightly and, if all goes well until next autumn, he will be stronger than he has been for years.
Page me46.368
My thanks with regard to Lilienthal. I now know the man as well as if we had been at school together.
Page me46.368
I'm glad to hear that your Adolph†c is getting on well; I trust he will soon find a LINE that will give him the opportunity he wants of getting on quickly. His letters have arrived but, like many others, unfortunately still remain unanswered.

Page Break me46.369
Page me46.369
Hepner is a proper Schlemihl†432; moreover his campaigns, like the one he is waging against Schewitsch, are too much concerned with hair-splitting. Who, after all, is going to wax so enthusiastic about 'German culture'! He really ought to familiarise himself with American culture first. But that is typically German. Here we have someone arriving from a small town in the depths of Germany who cannot wait to enlighten America. However America will BREAK him IN all right and, since he has talent, and at one time also possessed a great deal of gumption, he may yet prove very useful.
Page me46.369
16 November

That shows you what things are like here. Having had to break off a week ago I have only today got round to continuing this and, I trust, finishing it off.
Page me46.369

Lafargue has been in Paris ever since the spring; his wife†a followed later, during the summer; she spent a month with Marx in Vevey.†374 For Marx had first been in Algiers,†278 then in Monte Carlo (Monaco)†310 and in both places had suffered a recurrence of PLEURISY. After that he stayed with the Longuets in Argenteuil†327 where he availed himself of the sulphur springs at nearby Enghien for his chronic bronchitis. Then to Vevey and finally back here.

Page me46.369

You might like to know that Lafargue (with a great deal of assistance from me, since he had absolutely no intention of learning German from his wife) has published in French 3 chapters from my Anti-Dühring (introduction and the two first chapters of Part III 'Socialism') under the title Socialisme utopique et socialisme scientifique.†20 It made a tremendous impression in France. Most people are too lazy to read stout tomes such as Capital and hence a slim little pamphlet like this has a much more rapid effect. I shall now publish the thing in German — with insertions calculated to give it a strong popular appeal; the ms. is already in Zurich and the first sheet has been printed.†378 I shall send it to you as soon as it is ready. Meanwhile you have, of course, in Dr Stiebeling a purveyor of popular knowledge to

Page Break me46.370

America in utraque lingua.†a He is a well-meaning man but no theorist and accordingly he is somewhat muddle-headed.

Page me46.370

The Égalité is now appearing daily and weekly. Whether the daily edition (in place of the Citoyen which our people were chucked out of thanks to a financial coup†b) can keep going depends upon negotiations with a man of means. The Sozialdemokrat is being much too weak-kneed in regard to the split between our people and Malon, but the smooth, cunning, rascally Malon (one of the 17 founders of Bakunin's secret 'Alliance'†67) has so ingratiated himself with the Germans in Paris and our people have made a number of such colossal blunders that the Paris people are doing their utmost to bring pressure to bear on Zurich. What's more, Liebknecht also intrigued with Malon when passing through Paris on his way home from here. If, however, Lafargue and Guesde commit some altogether too extravagant follies, I shall talk the Sozialdemokrat round, never fear.

Your
F.E.
Regards to Adolph.

Page me46.370

First published abridged in Briefe und Auszüge aus Briefen von Joh. Phil. Becker, Jos. Dietzgen, Friedrich Engels, Karl Marx u. A. an F.A. Sorge und Andere, Stuttgart, 1906 and in full in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.371

202
MARX TO ELEANOR MARX†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.371
[Ventnor,] 10 November†a 1882
1 St Boniface Gardens

*My dear Tussychen,

On the whole, I cannot at all complain of Ventnor. The weather was unsettled, tempestuous, alternately rainy, dry, sunny, chilly, etc., but with all that very seldom foggy, a good deal of pure air and, except [for] a few days, generally always a few hours fit for longer promenades. Yesterday and today the air rather cold, but from 11 to 2 o'clock on the sea shore (where children are playing, and reminding me of poor Harry†b) and on our Undercliff walk,†234 and up to the railway station, and even to the down, no want of sunshine!*
Page me46.371
You should not forget, dear child, that I was by no means quite ALL RIGHT when I arrived here. On the contrary: a spasmodic cough pretty well all the time, a great deal of sputum, increasingly unsatisfactory nights during the previous 2 weeks, no sense of well-being whatever. That couldn't change all in one day; rather a progressive change for the better.
Page me46.371
Au fond†c I was in fact glad to have had recourse to Dr Williamson for my muscular rheumatism before Donkin's PRESCRIPTION arrived from London (today). The rheumatism is really very close to the former seat of my ITERATED PLEURISY, but Dr Williamson was able to convince me by percussion and auscultation that ALL WAS STILL RIGHT — and had been since Donkin's last examination. The cough has abated, but when he called today (his second visit) Williamson persuaded me to take yet another medicine; it would, he said, shorten the transitional period leading to the stage at which all I shall need to complete my recovery will be fresh air and plenty of outdoor exercise.
Page me46.371
Under the circumstances I have not yet got down to any real work, though I have been occupying myself with one thing and another by way of preparation.
Page me46.371
Do you have William Langland's Complaint of Piers the Ploughman?

Page Break me46.372
If not, you may be able to borrow it from Furnivall for me, or alternatively, as it isn't dear, I could also buy it in the EARLY etc. series.†433
Page me46.372

Also would you see if you could find among the (old-style) Égalités (I mean the old weekly Égalité) on the table by my bed an article, or rather a report, on the encomiums of official economists in Paris with regard to cheap Chinese labour in Europe? I don't know whether this same matter of the Chinese was discussed in the copy of Malon's former Revue†434 (the copy is behind the sofa on one of the shelves of my book-case). If so you might send it to me if you cannot lay your hands on the Égalité.
Page me46.372

How is my Johnny faring? Cough gone? My love to him and Lenchen. And how is your health?
Page me46.372

Finally, I must write to poor Jennychen. It distresses me; I fear that this burden is more than she can bear.†365
Page me46.372

Salut.

OLD NICK

Page me46.372
First published, in the languages of the original (German and English), in Annali, an. I, Milano, 1958

Printed according to the original

203
ENGELS TO MARX
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.372
London, 11 November 1882

Dear Moor,

I was able to show Tussy your letter†a on the evening it arrived, for in the morning Lenchen and Johnny had gone to Percy's†b OFFICE to watch the LORD MAYOR'S SHOW and in the evening we all foregathered at Pumps's for DINNER. Johnny was very charming and Pumps's gosling very well-behaved.
Page me46.372

I am very glad you should have found a pleasant doctor†c; it is always better if a convalescent has someone like that at hand, and what good can it do if every trifle must first be referred back here? I trust the rheumatism and cough are now on the mend.

Page Break me46.373
Page me46.373

Today I am sending you 2 Égalités and one weekly ditto. The manifesto of the (Lyons) Conseil national†435 will convince you that the Lyonnais are still the typical louts they have always been. No further news about the progress of the negotiations with the Parisian capitalist,†423 so nothing would appear to have been settled yet.

Page me46.373

The rudeness with which Dilke replies to awkward questions†436 is indeed striking, but seems very much to the taste of the bunch of liberal parvenus who sit behind him. Well, they'll feel the clôture†a†437 soon enough. The business in Gibraltar†412 stinks more every day; the extradition was ordered, not only by the police, but also by a magistrate, i.e. a judge, and the Governor reads about it in the paper and doesn't lift a finger! Meanwhile the Russians are encroaching more and more on Persia and Afghanistan and building roads to Meshed in Persia and from Samarkand via Bukhara to Balkh (the Bactria of the Ancients) in Afghanistan, while their intrigues in Turkey are such that not even Aleko Pasha, their protégé in East Rumelia, can swallow them. But neither big Gladstone nor little Dilke have any eyes for this. The Russians certainly have something in mind for next spring. But the kind of credit they enjoy will be evident to you from the announcement of the Poti-Baku Railway's Preference Loan. They have to use a company as a cloak and, moreover, on what terms!
Page me46.373

Vollmar has opened his pro-Malon campaign in the Sozialdemokrat — Malon's promptings being instantly recognisable in the saccharine tone of the apologia with which the article concludes.†438 But what do you think of Wilhelm's†b panegyric of Bennigsen in the Justice? It's really laid on a bit thick, even for the worthy Wilhelm.
Page me46.373

The Swiss Factory Act†403 also goes off in today's parcel. I shall ask Bernstein for Oldenburg's article†c at the earliest opportunity. Bernstein will probably think twice before writing to me; I made such good use of his own arguments to refute his conclusions concerning the French business that he is unlikely to find very much more to say.†d
Page me46.373

Now, with the closure of the debate, the House of Commons has sunk wholly to the level of a continental Chamber which, in view of its present composition, is the position best suited to it.

Page Break me46.374
Page me46.374

I am very curious to hear more about the experiment made by Deprez at Munich.†426 However, I completely fail to understand how, in that case, laws for estimating resistance in wires hitherto regarded as valid and still applied in practice by engineers (in their calculations) can continue in force. Hitherto it has been calculated that, given the same conductive material, resistance increases in proportion as the diameter of the conducting wire decreases. I wish Longuet could be induced to cough up those things. For this means that the vast and hitherto untapped sources of hydraulic power have suddenly become exploitable.
Page me46.374

But now I must pack up the papers. All well here.

Your

F.E.

Page me46.374
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

204
MARX TO ENGELS†166
IN LONDON
Page me46.374
[Ventnor,] 11 November 1882

DEAR FRED,

I return the Prolétaire.†a Difficult to say who is the greater — Lafargue, who pours out his oracular inspiration upon the bosoms of Malon and Brousse, or these two heroes, heavenly twins who not only tell deliberate lies, but deceive themselves into thinking that the outside world has nothing better to do than to 'intrigue' against them and, indeed, that everyone has the same cranial structure as the magnanimous twain.
Page me46.374
Lafargue has the blemish customarily found in the negro tribe — no sense of shame, by which I mean shame about making a fool of oneself.
Page me46.374
But it is time, if the journal†b is not to be wilfully ruined and if they do not intend (which I can't believe) to let it go under as a result of proceedings taken by the government — it is time, I say, for Lafargue to put a stop to his childish bragging about the grisly deeds of his revolution of the future. But on this occasion he has been properly hoist with his own petard. Naturally alarmed because some denunciatory sheet or other, in defiance of police regulations, has reprinted hair-raising anarchist excerpts from the suppressed Étendard, thus making the latter seem 'more progressive' than Paul Lafargue, the licensed oracle of socialisme scientifique — alarmed at such revolutionary competition, Lafargue quotes himself (and he has, of late, acquired a pretty habit, not only of unloosing his oracles on the world, but of 'perpetuating' them by self-quotation) as proof that the Étendard, i.e. that anarchism, has merely aped the wisdom of Lafargue and Co., though merely with the intention of realising it prematurely, before the time is ripe. That's what sometimes happens to oracles; what they believe to be their own inspiration is, on the contrary and more often than not, merely a recollection that has remained stuck in their minds. And what Lafargue has written and 'quoted' from himself is, in fact, no more than the recollection of a Bakunian precept. Lafargue is, indeed, the last remaining disciple of Bakunin seriously to believe in him. He should reread the pamphlet he and you wrote about the 'Alliance',†a and then he would realise whence he has derived this, his most recent ammunition. Indeed, much time has had to pass before he HAD UNDERSTOOD Bakunin AND, INTO THE BARGAIN, HAS MISUNDERSTOOD HIM.

Page Break me46.375

Page me46.375

Longuet as the last Proudhonist and Lafargue as the last Bakuninist! Que le diable les emporte!†b
Page me46.375

It's a fine day today, and I must go out of doors (it's only half past ten in the morning).
Page me46.375

In my last letter, I told you I intended to get rid of my cough without the help of MEDICAL MEN. But Dr Williamson gave me to understand d'une maniére autoritaire†c that I must for all that be so good as to swallow my medicine. In fact, the brew has done me good; its main ingredient is quinine disulphuricum; the others — morphia, chloroform, etc., have invariably formed part of the brews I have previously had to swallow.

Page Break me46.376
Page me46.376

What's the position in regard to Hartmann's pangs qua inventor†a?
Page me46.376

Salut.

Moor
Page me46.376

You'll have seen from the PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES in yesterday's Standard†b that the 'worthy' Rivers Wilson has obliged to the extent of sorrowfully offering up on the altar of country his project, the TRUSTEESHIP he assumed in company with the magnanimous Lowe alias Sherbrooke.†428 A bitter pill for Rivers Wilson.

Page me46.376
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

205
ENGELS TO KARL KAUTSKY
IN VIENNA
Page me46.376

London, 15 November 1882

Dear Mr Kautsky,

I got your telegram at 3 p.m. today and at once replied by telegraph: 'Impossible'. Not having your home address to hand and necessarily assuming from the 'Reply paid' that the office of origin would know where to send the reply, I addressed the telegram simply 'Kautsky, Vienna'. Well, I have this moment, 9.30 p.m., received the enclosed slip. There is no possibility of tracing the letter with your home address, so all I can do is write to you at once in order not to miss the morning post.
Page me46.376
If I am not to dissipate every bit of my energy again, and I have been doing this for years, I shall have to draw a very strict line so far as my journalistic activity is concerned — confining myself to the Sozialdemokrat and even then writing only when practical need arises or when, as in the recent case of Mehring's inanities,†346 it has to be shown that there is no hostility between the Sozialdemokrat and us over here. As a result of Marx's absence and illness, party correspondence with diverse countries has devolved exclusively upon myself, and that is a heavy enough burden anyway. So if I am to devote my advancing years to the completion of my more weighty works,†439 it will be utterly impossible for me to contribute to your periodical,†a though I wish it every success.

Page Break me46.377
Page me46.377
The Darwin article in particular is an impossibility just now. I wrote to Bernstein saying he should have it as soon as I lit upon this subject in the course of my studies, and that might be months ahead; not that he is entirely blameless for he has encouraged me to work in a quite different field — one that I, too, consider to be more necessary.†b So until I have slogged my way through that, returned to natural science and then progressed to zoology, there can be no question of it. To dash off a few commonplaces on Darwin would serve neither you nor me. For the rest I must confine myself, in view of the late hour, to thanking you for the various interesting reports on the situation over there and in conclusion sending you my heartiest congratulations on your engagement.†c

Yours very sincerely,
F.E.

Page me46.377
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me46.377
[Ventnor,] 20 November 1882

DEAR FRED,

By the end of this week (i.e. next Monday, 27 November) I shall be on my uppers. As I am supposed to advise you a week beforehand,

Page Break me46.378
I am now doing so. Before leaving London I paid ABOUT £5 to the PARLIAMENTARY BOOKSELLER St. King and ABOUT £2 to Kolkmann (bookseller), but also spent £3 on sundry items.
Page me46.378
Tussy and Johnny left me at ABOUT 3 O'CLOCK today in passable weather.
Page me46.378
I am perturbed over the news from Paris; it's unpardonable that Lafargue, Guesde, etc., should permit themselves to be caught up in legal proceedings†440; it could have been foreseen; the whole thing was simply occasioned by 'anxiety' over competition from the 'anarchists'! Puerile!
Page me46.378
Salut.

Your
K.M.

Page me46.378
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

207
ENGELS TO MARX
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.378
London, 21 November 1882

Dear Moor,

I was on the point of asking you how your reserves stood when your letter†a arrived today. Encl. CHEQUE for £30 which you will be able to cash in the usual way.

That being so, you will get the money on Monday, possibly even on Saturday or, if you're prepared to lay out 1/- on a telegram, as early as Friday.
Page me46.378

Encl. 1. a mathematical experiment by Moore.†441 His conclusion, namely that THE ALGEBRAIC METHOD IS ONLY THE DIFFERENTIAL METHOD DISGUISED, relates, of course, solely to his own method of geometrical construction and to that extent is fairly correct. I have written to tell him†284 that you attach no importance whatever to the way in which one symbolises things in a geometrical construction, the application of the curves to the equations being, after all, sufficient. What's more, I went on, the basic difference between your method and the old one consists in your transforming x into x', i.e., making it a true variable, whereas the others proceed from x + h which simply represents the sum of two quantities but never the variation of a quantity. Which is why your x, even though it has passed through x' and reverted to the first x, is nevertheless different from what it was before, whereas if one simply adds h to x and then subtracts it again, x remains constant throughout. But then any graphic depiction of variations must necessarily be the depiction of a past process, of the result, i.e. of a quantity that has become constant; the line x, the portion added to that constant, is depicted as x + h, two portions of one line. From this it clearly follows that a graphic depiction of how x becomes x' and then x again is impossible.

Page Break me46.379
Page me46.379

Further, 2., a letter from Bernstein which has just arrived and which I should like to have back.†442
Page me46.379

(I was interrupted by Pumps and the baby†a so shall have to get a move on with this letter as I have persuaded myself that it must go off at 5.30.)
Page me46.379

I don't know whether I ought not to fire a broadside or two at Vollmar for his doctoring of history á la Malon.†438 His suppression of the Marseilles Congress†443 is carrying the falsification of history a bit too far. If Bernstein fails to raise this in the notes on the final article, it will have to be put right.
Page me46.379

I shall send you the Égalité as soon as I have read it. As usual, a letter Lafargue promised to write has not yet arrived. His public reply to the examining magistrate, in which he came the professor, was a childish affair.†444 These people are acting as though they were absolutely intent on being arrested. Fortunately the government is pretty rocky, so it's possible that they will still get away with it.
Page me46.379

Tussy and Johnny arrived ALL RIGHT yesterday.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.379
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.380

208
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me46.380
Ventnor, 22 November 1882
1 St Boniface Gardens

DEAR FRED,

CHEQUE most gratefully received.
Page me46.380
Sam,†a as you, too, immediately saw, criticises the analytic method as applied by me†441 in as much as he quietly sets it aside and instead turns his attention to the geometrical application, about which I said nothing at all.
Page me46.380
I might similarly dismiss the development of the actual differential method as it is called — beginning with the mystical method of Newton and Leibniz, then going on to the rationalist method of d'Alembert and Euler and concluding with Lagrange's strictly algebraic method (still, however, emanating from the selfsame original premisses of Newton and Leibniz) — I might dismiss the whole of this historical development of analysis by saying that, in practice, no essential change has been brought about in the geometrical application of differential calculus, i.e. in geometrical symbolisation.
Page me46.380
Since the sun is just coming out and this, therefore, is the moment to go for a walk, I shall not, pro nunc,†b enlarge further on the subject of mathematics but shall, on some later occasion, return to a detailed discussion of the various methods.
Page me46.380
Bernstein's information about the 'nationalisation' of the railways in Prussia is interesting.†442
Page me46.380
I do not share his views about the great size of Malon's and Brousse's organisation†445; the analysis provided at the time by Guesde of the 'numerous' (!) delegation attending the congress of St-Étienne has not been refuted, but this would be straining at gnats.†c The first decision to organise a genuine workers' party in France dates back to the Marseilles Congress†443; at the time Malon was in Switzerland;

Brousse WAS NOWHERE, and the Prolétaire — along with its trade unions — held aloof.

Page Break me46.381
Page me46.381
That jackass Amos — the mouthpiece of English officialdom in Egypt — has enormously impaired his clients' case by affording Keay, author of the pamphlet Spoiling the Egyptians, the opportunity for 'A REJOINDER' in The Contemporary Review.†446 Prominent among those whom Keay has ground ever more deeply into the MUD are Rivers Wilson, Rowsell and Goschen, and with them the British Ministry.
Page me46.381
Salut.

Moor

Page me46.381
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

209
ENGELS TO MARX†447
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.381
London, 22 November 1882

Dear Moor,

You will have received my letter of yesterday's date, with CHEQUE for £30.
Page me46.381
Hartmann†a was here on Sunday evening in a state of intense inventor's euphoria. His cell has been in action since Friday, operating a galvanometer with high resistance which at first registered more than 50° and is now steady at 46°. It would, he said, continue to run smoothly without further attention not just for three, but actually for six months or even a year. However, he had no intention of showing it to buyers because of as yet unpatented improvements. So my intervention was again required. I firmly refused and arranged for the matter — a perfectly simple one that presents no real difficulty — to be settled by Percy†b (which it has), advising him [Hartmann] in future to supply his

Page Break me46.382
English buyers with the article he had sold them and not something else, either better or worse. Whether it will do any good is another question. The chap's a fanatical worker; work and fanaticism are wearing him out; the only sleep he gets is between 3 and 5 in the morning, and he looks ghastly but is correspondingly well turned out and every time he comes here he is wearing a different suit. One of his new patent improvements is as follows: To protect the cell's caustic potash, KOH, against the carbonic acid in the air, and to prevent it turning into potassium carbonate, he poured oil onto the solution and, according to Percy, simply couldn't understand why this failed to do the trick, the combination of fat and alkali forming instead something that looked like soap and, indeed, was soap!

Page me46.382

I have recently obtained SECOND HAND what I have long been looking for — a complete bound edition of Geschichtschreiber der deutschen Vorzeit, and guess from the sale of whose library it had come? — Dr Strousberg's! I found therein a passage in Plutarch's Marius which, seen in conjunction with Caesar and Tacitus,†a explains the entire agrarian structure.

The Cimbri 'had migrated, but not, as it were, all at one go, or in a regular stream; rather, they had always pushed on, year after year, during the good season and in this way had, over a long period, fought and battled their way across the Continent'.†b

Page me46.382

This passage, seen in conjunction with the Suebi's annual move to new lands, as described 70 years later by Caesar, reveals the manner in which the Germanic migrations took place. Where they spent the winter, there they would sow in the spring and, having reaped, would move on until winter brought them to a halt again. That they regularly tilled the land in summer (if they did not engage in rapine insteed) can be assumed with some certainty in the case of peoples who had brought agriculture with them from Asia. In the case of the Cimbri, the process of migration is still in evidence; in Caesar it comes to an end, the Rhine forming an impassable frontier. Together, these two manifestations explain why, in Caesar, 'privati ac separati agri apud eos nihil est'†c: migration means that collective cultivation was only possible by kinship community, and to pace out individual fields would have been absurd. In Tacitus, the step forward — or, perhaps, back — to individual cultivation within the framework of common ownership has been made.

Page Break me46.383

Page me46.383

Tussy has sent me by hand various newspapers for onward transmission to you; with them, I enclose an Égalité. The Égalité's impertinence would really seem to have made an impression on the Parquet†a; the addresses are still written in Lafargue's hand.

Page me46.383

Kindest regards.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.383
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

210
ENGELS TO MARX
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.383
London, 23 November 1882

Dear Moor,

Encl. letter from Lafargue which you might let me have back as I only got it this morning. So he will doubtless have to wend his way to the cachot†b within the next few days. What incurable fools they are. If Guesde and Lafargue are locked up in Montluçon, the paper†c will be pretty well done for. The government dare not bring them before a court in Paris, but may well take the liberty of quietly neutralising one after the other in the provinces. Until the paper had been firmly established, they ought not to have provided any pretexts for intervention; instead of that we have these Bakuninist antics.
Page me46.383
I had asked Lafargue for information about the relative strength of the two parties and also about the Maret-Godard affair.†416 You see what he says. Obviously it was to please the Chambres Syndicales†a and none other than Malon & Co. sacrificed the programme and the movement's entire past since the time of the Marseilles Congress.†448 His apparent strength is his real weakness. If you debase your programme to the level of the most ordinary TRADES UNIONS, you will clearly have no difficulty in obtaining a 'large public'.

Page Break me46.384
Page me46.384
Electricity has enabled me to score a minor triumph. You may perhaps remember my discussing the Cartesian-Leibnizian point of dispute in regard to mv and mv2 as measures of motion.†449 What it boils down to is that mv is the measure of mechanical motion when transmitted by mechanical motion as such, whereas mv2/2 is the measure of motion when it changes its form, i.e. the measure in conformity with which it turns into heat, electricity, etc. Now, so long as the chaps in the physical laboratories had the sole say in electrical matters, the measure of electromotive force, the force regarded as representative of electrical energy, was the volt (E), the product of the intensity of the current (ampére, C) and resistance (ohm, R).

$E = C \times R$.
Page me46.384

And that is correct so long as electrical energy does not change on transmission into another form of motion. Now, however, in his presidential address at the last meeting of the British Association,†372 we have Siemens proposing an additional unit, the watt (hereafter W) which is intended to express the true energy of an electric current (i.e. as distinct from other forms of motion, vulgo energy) and whose value is volt × ampére, W = E × C.
Page me46.384
But W = E × C = C × R × C = C2R.
Page me46.384
Resistance in electricity represents the same as mass in mechanical motion. Hence it would appear that in electrical as in mechanical motion the quantitatively measurable manifestation of this motion — on the one hand velocity, on the other intensity of current — functions, in the case of simple transmission without change of form, as a simple factor of the first power, while in the case of transmission with change of form, as a factor squared. Thus what I have formulated for the first time is a universal natural law of motion. Now, however, I must really go ahead and finish my dialectics of nature.

Page Break me46.385
Page me46.385
All is well at your house, but the beer everywhere is rotten; only the German stuff in the West End is any good.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.385
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

211
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me46.385
[Ventnor,] 27 November 1882

DEAR FRED,

Enclosed Lafargue's letter. In my note to you†a I had already given vent in advance to my vexation over Lafargue's and Guesde's foolishness, and thus discounted it. Inconceivable that anyone at the head of a movement could place everything at risk in so frivolous, to put it bluntly, in so inane a way — pour le roi de Prusse†b! Lafargue's article on the spellbound Ministry of Finance was very well done.†450

Page me46.385
As regards the Paris 'syndicates', I know from impartial reports I received from Paris (while staying at Argenteuil†451) that the said syndicates are a great deal worse, if such a thing be possible, than the London TRADES UNIONS.
Page me46.385
Your verification of the role of the second power when energy is transmitted with change of form is very pretty and I congratulate you on it.†c
Page me46.385
Salut.

Moor

Page me46.385
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.386

212
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN
IN ZURICH
Page me46.386
London, 28 November 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

To begin with, my best thanks for the information about the nationalised railways. It is amply sufficient.†452 I have received from Bebel the Accident and Health Insurance Bills of 1882, but must, of course, also have those of 1881, the original wording†144 being precisely the one in which Bismarck's soul, filled with ardour for the poor, has ample space to flap its wings; in the second wording, in which the said wings have already been substantially clipped as a result of bourgeois divisions, we no longer find Bismarck in his entirety.
Page me46.386
Marx used to get the Arbeiterstimme, but as he has probably failed to renew his subscription it no longer arrives.
Page me46.386
Aside from a few minor points, Vollmar's article†438 is pure Malon at one remove. In it the history of the French workers' movement since 1871 is completely falsified, and that sort of thing simply should not happen. For instance, in the 2nd article Guesde is blamed for not having joined up with the few small cliques (later the progenitors of the Prolétaire or, in other words, the out and out coopérateurs against whom he was just then conducting a campaign)! As though the chaps who were subsequently to bring out the Prolétaire would have even considered admitting a 'non-worker'! But more falsified than anything else is what Deville has correctly depicted in the Égalité of 19 November ('Il y a cinq ans',†a history of the Égalité), namely, the fight for the 'collectivist' programme†68 at the congresses and the victory of that programme in 1879 at the Marseilles Congress.†443 This is completely suppressed in Vollmar's article. I cannot assume that Vollmar deliberately perpetrated this falsification, but nor is it any easier to explain his ignorance of the subject and the fact that he appears to know nothing at all about the French workers' movement save what Malon thought fit to tell him.

Page me46.386

Hence, by omitting the Marseilles Congress, he suppresses the vital fact that the French workers' party had accepted the collectivist programme 3 years ago, so that Malon's abandonment of it was a definitely retrograde step. Since it is now essential that our people in Germany should be told the story of the French movement, not as it ought to have happened to fit in with Malon's present requirements, but as it really did happen, this is something which must unquestionably be put right. In my view, the simplest way of doing so would be to relate it to the above-mentioned article by Deville, precisely because this is so utterly unpolemical. Should you no longer have it, I can send it you forthwith on a postcard.

Page Break me46.387
Page me46.387

Malon, by the way, had better watch out. Should we at any time wish to portray his faits et gestes†a more accurately if as minutely as he got Vollmar to depict those of Guesde, he would have a rough time of it. We still have all the documents in which, on 18 March '71, he disavowed the rising, only to join it after the event, when things were doing better than he had expected.
Page me46.387

Now as regards the strength of the two factions, I have obtained a report on the subject from Lafargue.†453 In Paris the Roanne people have 15 groups with whose help they have kept the Égalité going for a whole month now, which does at any rate say something for the quality of these chaps. In the provinces they are, so Lafargue says, very strong. The Fédération du Nord†454 is, in essence, on their side; they do not wish to prendre part aux querelles des Parisiens†b but they uphold the old collectivist programme which also features prominently in their Forçat; the Roanne people are holding their next congress at Roubaix, to which all the delegates of the North will be going, and are constantly in the closest touch with the Fédération du Nord. The other provincial workers' paper, L'Exploité de Nantes, has similarly printed the old programme together with the considérants†c†455 in a prominent position. It reprints articles from the Égalité, and Deville is a contributor. This means that the only two workers' organs in the provinces are both on their side. 'En province',†d aside from the North, 'partout oú il y a un groupement ouvrier, á Reims, Epinay, Lyon, dans tout le bassin houillier de l'Allier, á

Bordeaux, Angoulême, Rochefort, nous battons les Possibilistes qui n'ont de force qu'en Bretagne at á Marseille — et encore.'†e

Page Break me46.388
Page me46.388

That Malon should obtain a wide hearing for the empty verbiage of his considérants without a programme is not surprising. But if one founds a party without a programme in which everyone can have a say, it cannot properly be called a party. The impotence of the old sectarians, for whom Malon and Vollmar show such tender regard, has been in evidence for years and it would be best to let them wither quietly away. As for the Chambres Syndicales†a — well, if one is going to account a member of the workers' party every STRIKE association which, like the English TRADES UNIONS, fights solely for high wages and short working hours but doesn't otherwise give a damn for the movement, — then the only party one will actually form is one for the preservation of wage labour rather than its abolition. And, or so Marx tells me,†b these Parisian Chambres Syndicales are for the most part even more colourless than the English TRADES UNIONS. To abolish a party programme just to please these people is no way to spur them on. And has the like ever been seen before — a party without a programme, a party whose wishy-washy considérants (written wholly in the spirit of the communist Miquel, who likewise believed communism to be feasible in 500 years' time†456) lead up to the conclusion that each group should concoct its own private programme?
Page me46.388

Well, now, what benefit does Malon derive from the Chambres Syndicales? They pay no contributions, they send no delegates to the Federal Council, they were nominal members of the Union fédérative†265 before the split and have nominally remained so — they are, as Lafargue puts it, 'complétement platoniques'. They are there for show. As for Malon's other groups, Lafargue writes:

'Dans le XVII arrondissement nos amis ont organisé, aprés le congrés, un groupe qui immédiatement s'est trouvé composé de 29 membres. Pour nous faire piéce, les possibilistes ont subdivisé leur groupe qui, á ce que l'on me dit, ne se composait que d'une vingtaine de membres, en cinq sous-groupes réunis par un comité fédéral du quartier. Le tour est joli, mais ne trompe que les indifférents et ceux qui sont éloignés.'†c
Page me46.388

That's just what the Bakuninists used to do. On the other hand, so Lafargue says, the Possibilists are really strong only in Montmartre, where they are also well-organised.

Page Break me46.389
Page me46.389

To be momentarily in the minority — quoad†a organisation — and have the right programme is at least better than having no programme and a large, though almost entirely nominal and bogus, following. We have been in the minority all our lives and have thrived on it. And the comparative weakness (supposing it exists, which I am very much inclined to doubt — the Possibilists did not dare attend the Roanne people's conférence contradictoire†b on the two congresses†457), the comparative weakness where organisations in Paris are concerned would be outweighed two or three times over by journalistic influence.

Page me46.389

So how your Paris correspondents are able to regard the St-Étienne folk as the 'genuine workers' party' is beyond me. In the first place they are not a party at all, let alone a workers' party, any more than are the workers over here. But they are in embryo what those over here have become in full maturity, namely the tail of the radical bourgeois party. The only thing that keeps them together is bourgeois radicalism, for they have no labour programme. And as for those labour leaders who descend to manufacturing a docile labour vote for the radicals, they are, in my view, downright traitors.
Page me46.389

Your remarks also led me, just for fun, to ask about Godard.†416 The said Godard, 'qui se dit anarchiste comme son maître Maret, écrit dans un journal opportuniste de Toulouse'.†c To refuse a chap of this kind what is known as a rectification is quite in keeping with the customs of the Paris, as of any other, press.
Page me46.389

On the other hand our friends have again perpetrated a really colossal bloomer in as much as they have, by their revolutionary bragging, exposed themselves to prosecution before the paper†d had found its feet. Guesde has been arrested, as you know, and Lafargue will probably soon follow in his wake. When both are in jug, the most active — not only writing, but fighting — men will have been got out of the way. Deville is lazy, Massard quite good for his post of secrétaire de la rédaction,†e but they are hardly the people to keep a paper going in difficult circumstances. I won't mention the other 3 — Brissac and Bouis, old Communards, are so much ballast, and Picard is a common-or-garden journalist.
Page me46.389

Whatever you do, by the way, don't allow anyone to persuade you that Guesde and Lafargue intended, 'by hook or by crook, to make all organisations subject to their own directives'. It is a constantly recurring catchword in Bakuninist tactics, and in other contexts in France it may always be resorted to in lieu of other arguments.

Page Break me46.390
Page me46.390

Treatment of other countries in the Égalité! If only you knew what disorder reigns and what the standard of German is like in that office! Should Lafargue remain at large, you would do best always to address yourself to him; he does at least forward the things. Otherwise I have no advice to offer.
Page me46.390

If you want to use the resumé of the pamphlet,†378 I am quite agreeable. The concluding note will follow shortly. The affaire Schmidt†458 is very nice. Pollaky has been running a private detective's office in London for some time. In the directory, under the heading INQUIRY OFFICER (of whom 18 are listed), there is an entry: 'Pollaky, Ignatius Paul, 13 Paddington Green, W. (not at all far from where I live), Correspondent to the Foreign Police Gazette.'

Page me46.390
I trust my congratulations on your attaining your 7th thousand†a will again prove outdated. I, for my part, am 62 years old today.
Page me46.390
Kindest regards.

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.390
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

213
ENGELS TO MARX
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.390
London, 30 November 1882

Dear Moor,

Encl. a letter from Bebel†459 received today. The 'mystery' which he is unable to understand all of a sudden and which may release them from the Anti-Socialist Law,†16 is, of course, the outbreak of the crisis in Russia.†b Curious that none of these people can get used to the idea that the impulse might come from that quarter. And it is not as though I haven't explained this to him more than once. I regard his hopes for a new major crisis as premature — there could be an interim crisis as in 1842, and Germany, the most backward country industrially, which must content itself with the crumbs that fall to it from the demand of the world market, would certainly suffer worse than any other.

Page Break me46.391
Page me46.391
Guesde was released in Montluçon immediately after the first hearing, and neither Bazin nor Lafargue was arrested; on the contrary, Bazin published in the Égalité a letter to the chief of police of his arrondissement, objecting to the mouchards†a that sniffed round his house and advising him of the times at which he could be arrested at home.†b Those chaps have more luck than sense. I shan't be able to read the Égalité until after the 5.30 post has gone; so it will reach you tomorrow by the 2nd post (2 nos).
Page me46.391
I have obtained, second-hand, Vom Entstehen und Untergange der polnischen Konstitution vom 3. Mai 1791, 1793, place of publication not given. This is the book you have mentioned so often†460 in which the infamies perpetrated upon Poland by Frederick William II are described at length. Cost one whole mark!

Page me46.391
Hartmann's battery for lighting 6 Swan incandescent lamps is expected to be ready tomorrow. If the thing proves a success, i.e. provides a steady light over an extended period, hence actual proof of the constant intensity of the current, it will at once be exhibited in public and a company 'founded' to exploit it. Hartmann will also be showing sundry items at the Crystal Palace†461 where a new electrical exhibition is shortly to be held. He and his backer, whom Percy†c found for him, are highly enthusiastic about the invention.
Page me46.391
All well here.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.391
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.392

214
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.392
[Ventnor,] 4 December 1882

DEAR FRED,

Herewith Bebel's letter†459 which I found most interesting. I do not believe an industrial crisis will supervene as soon as all that.
Page me46.392
The weather in November was good on the whole, though very changeable. The first days of December alternated between bitter cold and a nasty, damp mugginess. Today it is fine, but I am nevertheless condemned to remain in my room. In the last few days I have suffered from hoarseness (certainly not due to talking) and an unpleasant sensation in my gullet; I have also been coughing more and not sleeping very well, despite my long, regular and constant walks. Hence I have again called in the doctor.†a These gentlemen cannot be shaken off so easily! It is only a tracheal catarrh, but all the same he thought I ought to keep within doors until the inflammation has gone. Besides giving me some soothing medicine to take, he has ordered me to inhale vapour of benzoin (with something else added — seems to me something like chloroform). Today he again auscultated and percussed me — for the 3rd time since my arrival — and found that everything was otherwise in order. He will drop in again in a few days' time to see if I can be released from my confinement.

Page me46.392
What is remarkable about the stuff in the Plebe concerning my theory of value is the rubbish talked by all 3, Laveleye, Cafiero and Candelari,†462 in mutual opposition l'un contre l'autre.†b In the quotation concerning my aforementioned theory of value which Candelari adduced from Malon's Histoire critique de l'économie politique, Malon's superficiality is such that it actually surpasses that of all 3 smatterers.
Page me46.392
I hope that all right in 41, Maitland Park Road.†c I was expecting a line or two from there, but I know that POOR Tussy OVER-WORKED.

Page Break me46.393
Page me46.393
Salut.

Moor

Page me46.393
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

215
MARX TO ENGELS
IN LONDON
Page me46.393
[Postcard]

[Postmarked Ventnor, 8 December 1882]

Returned herewith Prolétaire received today, containing account of Shipton & Co.†463 (whom, incidentally, Lafargue praised to the skies in the selfsame Égalité because of a collection made for a FRENCH 'STRIKE'. That's what happens when every momentary STIMULUS immediately causes him to turn in some 'predestined' direction).
Page me46.393
In your last postcard†284 delivered today, on the other hand, you mention a Prolétaire, sent me by mistake and to be returned to you, which never arrived here.†a It should have come yesterday or today, or at least within the past week, but quod non†b — perhaps it has got lost in the post?
Page me46.393

The Sozialdemokrat ought to procure some material (detailed) on the treatment of workers in Prussian state mines, etc., to help define the nature of Wagener-Bismarckian state socialism.
Page me46.393
Salut.

Moor

Page Break me46.394
Page me46.394
[On the side reserved for the address]

F. Engels, Esq.
122 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W.

Page me46.394
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

216
ENGELS TO MARX†7
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.394
London, 8 December 1882

Dear Moor,

What happened about the Prolétaire was this: when I recently sent you a parcel of Égalités and Kölnische Zeitungs, I also meant to send you the TRADES UNION Prolétaire†463 and supposed I had included it. Somebody was in the room while I was packing up the parcel and I did this rather hurriedly. Finding next day that the TRADES UNION Prolétaire was still here, but not the other containing the Saint-Étienne skulduggery,†425 I thought I must have sent it you twice over. Now, looking around by the light of day, I have found it — still in the original wrapper in which you returned it, this being undoubtedly the reason why I couldn't find the same.
Page me46.394
From your postcard to Tussy,†284 I see that you are still confined to the house — which is all to the good considering the snow we're getting and the wet slush on the ground; but no doubt we shall soon have better weather (not the very best, but better than at present). During your first winter in the north since your attack of pleurisy you will have to resign yourself to tracheal affections of a milder kind; only next summer's cure will be able to scotch those.

Page me46.394

In order to get the parallel between Tacitus' Germans†a and the American Redskins sorted out at last, I have gently been making excerpts from the first volume of your Bancroft.†b The similarity is,

Page Break me46.395
I must say, all the more surprising in that the modes of production are so utterly different — on the one hand fishermen and hunters and no stock-breeding or crop farming, on the other migratory stock-breeding overlapping with crop farming. It just goes to show how, at this stage, the method of production is less crucial than is the degree to which old blood ties and the ancient mutual community of the sexes within the tribe are being dissolved. Otherwise the Tlingits in what was once Russian America could not be the exact counterpart of the Germans — probably even to a greater extent than your Iroquois.†464 Another puzzle which is solved here is how placing the main burden of work on women is perfectly compatible with great respect for those women. In addition, I have found confirmation of my assumption that the jus primae noctis,†a originally found in Europe among the Celts and Slavs, is a survival of the ancient sexual community: in two tribes, widely separated and not of the same race, it is still exercised by the shamans as representatives of the tribe. I have learned a great deal from the book — enough for the present as regards the Germans. I shall have to save up Mexico and Peru until later. For I have returned the Bancroft and, in exchange, taken the remaining things by Maurer,†465 all of which are therefore now at my house. I had to look through them because of my concluding note on the Mark,†378 which is growing rather long and is still not to my liking although I have rewritten it 2 or 3 times. But to sum up in 8 to 10 pages what happened after rise, flowering and decline is no joke. If I have the time, I shall send it you so that you can give me your opinion. As for myself, I should be glad to be quit of the stuff and to have another go at the natural sciences.†449
Page me46.395

It's odd, the way one can see how the concept of holiness arose among the so-called aboriginal peoples. What was holy, originally, is what we took over from the animal kingdom — the bestial; as compared with that, 'human institutions' were as much of an abomination as they are in the gospels by comparison with divine law.
Page me46.395

Hartmann's installation of his battery for lighting 6 Swan lamps (incandescent bulbs á 6 candle-power) was supposed to have been ready yesterday, but I don't know whether it succeeded or not.†b
Page me46.395

I shall draw Bernstein's attention to Saarbrücken, as I have already done before. But the Anti-Socialist Law†16 will make material hard to come by there. Even prior to that, every effort was made to keep this area undefiled.

Page Break me46.396
Page me46.396

Égalité by the second post. Lafargue is still at liberty since it was he who addressed it to me.
Page me46.396
Apropos TRADES UNION DEPUTATION†463: When, at the meeting of the Possibilists, the French had sung the Marseillaise in their honour, the virtuous Shipton and his mates thought fit to retort by singing in unison 'GOD SAVE THE QUEEN!' This according to the Kölnische Zeitung which I sent to Laura.
Page me46.396
Well, I wish your throat, no less than the weather, a good recovery.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.396
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

217
ENGELS TO MARX†466
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.396
[London, 13 December 1882]

Just received this, 9.20 p.m. After appearing at Montluçon Paul†a will, of course, be released at once. In the meantime I shall send Laura THE NEEDFUL tomorrow without fail. At 41 Maitland Park†b ALL RIGHT.

Page me46.396
First published, in the language of the original (German), in: F. Engels, P. et L. Lafargue, Correspondance, t. I, Paris, 1956

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.397

218
ENGELS TO LAURA LAFARGUE
IN PARIS

Page me46.397
London, 14 December 1882

My dear Laura,

I received your letter last night at half past nine, too late even to send a line by this morning's post, as foreign letters posted up here after nine are not forwarded until next evening.
Page me46.397
I had scarcely any money in the house, and had given Percy†a a cheque to cash for me today in town. But he will not be here before six at best, also too late to send you a banknote by 5.30 mail. However as soon as I get the money I shall forward one so as to help you over the first few days. No doubt Paul†b will fare as Guesde and Bazin did and be at liberty if not to-day, at least to-morrow, as soon as the comedy of an examination before the austere Piquand shall have been gone through.†440 I forwarded both Paul's and your letter to Mohr, and told Nim†c about the affair this morning.
Page me46.397
More anon, when I shall be able to send substantial comfort.

Yours affectionately,
F. Engels

Page me46.397
First published, in the language of the original (English), in: F. Engels, P. et L. Lafargue, Correspondance, t. I, Paris, 1956

Reproduced from the original

Page Break me46.398

219
MARX TO LAURA LAFARGUE†72
IN PARIS
Page me46.398
Ventnor, Isle of Wight,
14 December 1882 1 St Boniface Gardens

Darling Cacadou,

All your letters have arrived on time and yet, miserable sinner that I am, it is only now that I write to you, having learned from the General's letter†a just received that Paul†b has been arrested. The General enclosed Paul's letter and yours, so that I am au fait. No doubt Paul will be released within a few days.
Page me46.398

Why haven't I written before? Because I had nothing particularly cheerful to report, for you will anyhow have learned from your correspondence with the General that I myself am not at all in bad shape and have only been confined to the house for the past fortnight because of a TRACHEAL CATARRH, nor have I again succumbed either to pleurisy or to bronchitis. This, then, is most encouraging, CONSIDERING THAT MOST OF MY CONTEMPORARIES, I MEAN FELLOWS OF THE SAME AGE, JUST NOW KICK THE BUCKET in gratifying numbers. There are too many young donkeys for the old ones to be kept alive.
Page me46.398

Paul has latterly been writing his best stuff†c with humour, impudence, and solidity combined with verve, whereas before that I had been troubled by certain ultra-revolutionary turns of phrase, having always regarded these as 'hot air' — a speciality our people would be well-advised to leave to the so-called anarchists who are, in fact, props of the existing order, not creators of disorder, and are, by their nature, poor, childish creatures — ce n'est pas leur faute, le chaos.†d Just now they have, as 'péril social',†e come to the aid of the 'affaires véreuses cabinet'.†467 The worst of it is that, even if there were in existence a purely impartial 'examining magistrate', he would be compelled publicly to pronounce them wholly and utterly 'innocuous'! One could forgive these anarchists anything if only they weren't too 'innocent'

Page Break me46.399
for words! Not that that means they are 'saints'. A good joke was made by a Pope†a upon his being asked by Henry VII (Richard III's victorious antagonist) to translate Henry VI to the community of saints; the Pope replied that an 'innocens'†b (alias 'IDIOT') was not, as such, eligible to be nominated a 'sanctus'.†c†468
Page me46.399

Here, my child, you would at any rate find better weather than in most other districts including, I need hardly say, France and Italy. I live the life of a hermit here, consorting with no one, SAVE when Dr Williamson's visits, costing SUCH PER MINUTE,†d bring me in contact with the latter.
Page me46.399

Well, child, as soon as your devoirs†e permit (for Paul's GALLANT FIGHT WITH THE POWERS THAT BE MAKE THE MAN SYMPATHIC [SIC], TO USE THIS, A FRENCH PENNY-A-LINER'S PHRASE) come over here and stay with me!
Page me46.399

*Some recent Russian publications, printed in Holy Russia, not abroad, show the great run of my theories in that country.†469 Nowhere my success is to me more delightful; it gives me the satisfaction that I damage a power, which, besides England, is the true bulwark of the old society.

Yours,
Nick*

First published, in the languages of the original (German and English), in Annali, an. I, Milano, 1958

Printed according to the original

220
ENGELS TO MARX†470
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.399
London, 15 December 1882

Dear Moor,

Herewith the appendix on the Mark.†f Be so kind as to return it on Sunday so that I can revise it on Monday — I didn't get the final revision done today.

Page Break me46.400
Page me46.400
I consider that the view here put forward concerning rural conditions in the Middle Ages and the second phase of serfdom from the middle of the 15th century onwards is, on the whole, incontrovertible. I have read all the passages in Maurer†465 that relate to this, finding therein almost all my propositions — and, what's more, substantiated; also, precisely the opposite, but either unsubstantiated or drawn from a period which happens not to be the one under discussion. This applies in particular to Fronhöfe, Vol. 4, conclusion. These contradictions are due in Maurer's case 1. to the habit of adducing, indiscriminately and side by side, documentary proof and examples from any and every period, 2. to a residue of legalistic prejudice which invariably trips him up when it comes to understanding a process of development, 3. to his gross underestimation of force and the role it plays, 4. to the enlightened presupposition that, since the dark Middle Ages, things must have changed steadily for the better; this prevents him from perceiving, not only the antagonistic nature of true progress, but likewise individual setbacks.
Page me46.400
As you will see, the thing isn't all of one piece, but is a proper paste-and-scissors job. The first draft was all of one piece, but unfortunately it was wrong. Only by slow degrees have I mastered the material, which is why there's so much patchwork.
Page me46.400
Incidentally, the general reintroduction of serfdom is one of the reasons why no kind of industry could develop in Germany in the 17th and 18th centuries. First, there was the division of labour in the guilds which was the reverse of that in manufacturing; instead of being divided within the workshop, labour is divided among the guilds. Here in England, there was migration to those parts of the country where there were no guilds. This was prevented in Germany by the transformation of country folk and the inhabitants of agricultural market towns into serfs. But it was also this which eventually proved the undoing of the guilds the moment they encountered competition from foreign manufactures. I shall not mention here the other reasons that contributed to the suppression of German manufactures.
Page me46.400

Today has again been all fog and gaslight. Hartmann's battery probably a FAILURE where lighting is concerned, being useful at most for telegraphy, etc.†a More about this as soon as anything definite has been established.

Page Break me46.401
Page me46.401
Look after yourself, and let's hope the weather will soon be such that you will be allowed out.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.401
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

221
ENGELS TO LAURA LAFARGUE
IN PARIS
Page me46.401
London, 15 December 1882

My dear Laura,

Only after 7 last night Percy†a came with the needful so there was nothing to be done before today, so now I enclose a five-pound Bank of England note the number of which I have kept here, and will run the risk to send it whole for once.
Page me46.401
No doubt you will by this time be quite assured about Paul's†b fate, at least for the present.†440 I have no doubt he is free again now, if not already back in Paris. But I am afraid the Bonapartist and other conservative judges of Montluçon will give them†c a couple of months each of retired life. The government evidently wishes to create a few precedents in the provinces before it dares to try repression in Paris. And thus the parquét†d at Montluçon engaged the business, which, once engaged, must be carried out by the judges to the desired end, were it only to save the credit of the magistrature. And as the case will no doubt come before the police correctionnelle,†e there can be not even that shadow of a doubt which a jury might still have rendered possible.
Page me46.401
The change to a short prison life would not in itself have anything very dreadful, indeed I think it would do Paul more good than harm.

Page Break me46.402

But very likely their time will come at a moment when they, Paul and Guesde, are both most wanted for the Égalité. And the paper had so much improved lately. Whether it is the cumulative effect of Parisian life and journalistic activity, Paul's articles lately have been very much better, since he dropped the dogmatism of the scientific oracle and took up the ligne spirituelle.†a That on the candidature [of] Bontoux was charming,†471 but I think I discover a little female hand in that here and there. So was that on the behexte ministerium†b†450 (I forgot the French title) which also pleased Mohr specially.†c Now if Paul and Guesde are locked up, the soul of the paper is gone. Deville is witty and amusing only at intervals, generally he is clear but dull and doctrinaire, Massard is the reverse of a good Christian, for that with him the flesh is willing but the spirit (esprit) is weak. And I must conclude, from what information I possess, that Paul and Guesde are also the two who will be most wanted in a financially critical moment. Thus it will be a great pity that just at this time dynamitic brag and competition with the revolutionarism of the anarchists should have brought them in this predicament.
Page me46.402

Anyhow I hope you look down upon these petites miséres du haut de votre troisiéme†d with the same calmness as the quarante siécles†e of General Bonaparte du haut de leurs pyramides†f on the French army and Bonaparte himself.
Page me46.402

How is Jenny†g getting on? is she better? I do not hear much about her at Maitland Park,†h indeed they†i do not know much themselves.

Very affectionately yours,
F.E.

Page me46.402
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 35, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.403

222
ENGELS TO MARX†7
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.403
London, 16 December 1882

Dear Moor,

Having been interrupted yesterday,†a I shall continue today. You will have noticed how hurriedly my letter was dashed off — I was being perpetually disturbed by Pumps and BABY,†b first while revising the ms.,†c then while writing the letter. The point by which I set most store — because of the dissentient view you once expressed — is the almost total recession — de jure or de facto — of serfdom in the 13th and 14th centuries. So far as the country east of the Elbe is concerned, the freedom of German peasants is an established fact by reason of colonisation; as regards Schleswig-Holstein, Maurer admits†d that at the time (somewhat later, perhaps, than the 14th century) 'all' peasants had regained their freedom. Again, as regards the South of Germany, he admits that it was in this particular period that the bondsmen were treated best. The same thing applies to a greater or lesser extent in Lower Saxony (e.g. the new 'tenant farmers', virtually copyholders). He does not, however, share Kindlinger's view†e that serfdom did not come into being until the 16th century. That it subsequently reappeared, however, in a 2nd refurbished edition, seems to me indubitable. Meitzen†f specifies the years in which allusions to serfs first recur in East Prussia, Brandenburg and Silesia: mid-16th century, ditto Hanssen in respect of Schleswig-Holstein.†g When Maurer calls this a mitigated form of serfdom he is right, if one compares it with the period between the 9th and 11th centuries which, in fact, saw the continuation of ancient Germanic slavery; right, too, if one compares it with the legal rights still exercised, as the statute books of the 13th century confirm, both then and later, by the lord over his serfs. But as compared with the de facto position of the peasants in the 13th and 14th — and in North Germany also the 15th — centuries, the new serfdom was ANYTHING BUT a mitigation. Let alone after the Thirty Years' War†472! It is also significant that, whereas in the Middle Ages there were innumerable degrees of bondage and serfdom, so that the Sachsenspiegel†473 gives up the attempt to 'make a tally', this becomes remarkably easy after the Thirty Years' War. Enfin,†a I look forward to hearing your opinion.

Page Break me46.404
Page me46.404
It was also Pumps' fault if, at the place where I mention Russian common ownership, I failed to paste on a note saying that this information came from you.
Page me46.404
The enclosed is from old Becker†474; luckily I was able to respond to his gentle nudging straight away and send him £5, as I had just sold some SHARES and the money had been paid on the same day.
Page me46.404
Herewith 2 Égalités — hope they'll be delivered tomorrow — from which you will see that Lafargue was immediately released†b and was expected back in Paris yesterday evening.†440
Page me46.404
Hartmann's battery†c: so long as he only plugged in the galvanometer, in which the resistance is represented by a very long wire so that there is only a gradual consumption of electro-mechanical power, all went well. But as soon as he plugged in the lamp in which the resistance is concentrated at one point, namely the thin, short, incandescent wire, that was that; the hydrogen immediately polarised the silver electrode, and the weak current produced only a faint red glow in the wire. Now his head is again full of all manner of innovations, each of which proves that he is looking for the difficulty in the wrong place. But whether the gents who are advancing the money will agree to any further experiments is a moot point.

Page me46.404
Do you think you might be able to book a couple of beds down there for Schorlemmer and myself in the first week of January? We would not be at all averse to nipping down for a day or two, if nothing intervenes. But that something will intervene is all too probable in view of Schorlemmer's rheumatism, etc. However, if we knew that you could arrange for us to stay either with you or close by, and exactly how much notice we should have to give you, we could make our arrangements accordingly.

Page Break me46.405

Your
F.E.

Page me46.405
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

223
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER
IN GENEVA
Page me46.405
London, 16 December 1882

Dear Old Man,

I have been waiting for some time for some money to come in so that I could send you another fiver. It eventually came in yesterday, followed that very evening by your postcard.†a I therefore immediately took out a money order for the said fiver = 126 frs, and hope the money will reach you without delay.
Page me46.405
I was very glad to hear that you have extricated yourself from the cantonal and communal mire; it's a sheer waste of time and productive of nothing but tittle-tattle and pointless vexation. Incidentally, that jackass Solari is still sending me 2 copies of the Précurseur. It must be a fine despatch department!
Page me46.405
Every year the anarchists commit suicide and every year rise anew from their ashes, and so it will go on until such time as anarchism is subjected to serious persecution. It is the only socialist sect that really can be destroyed by means of persecution. For its perpetual rebirth depends on a steady supply of would-be bigwigs who wish to play a role on the cheap. Anarchism is as if tailor-made for that. But run a risk? Not on your life! Hence the present harassment of anarchists in France will damage that gang only if it isn't sheer make-believe or hanky-panky on the part of the police. But either way its victims will be those poor devils, the miners of Montceau.†402 Incidentally, I have grown so used to the anarchist buffoons that it seems to me quite natural to have that clownish caricature tagging along like this beside the movement proper. They are dangerous only in such countries as Austria and Spain, and then only for the time being. Again the Jura, where watch-making is carried on in houses scattered all over the place, would seem a foreordained hotbed of this ballyhoo, and here your blows could prove quite beneficial.

Page Break me46.406
Page me46.406

Marx has been given permission by the doctors to spend the winter on the south coast of England and has been in the Isle of Wight for 6 weeks or so.†411 Hitherto, all has been well as regards the two main counts: no sign of any recurrence of pleurisy or bronchitis. The rotten weather we have been having here (for a week the fog has scarcely lifted at all) means that convalescents are inevitably subject to colds of all sorts and, for one in Marx's condition, these are lingering and troublesome. But if it remains at that, no matter. However, he might well be sent out to Switzerland again next summer, in which case you will certainly see one another.
Page me46.406

Madame Lafargue's address is 66 Boulevard de Port-Royal, Paris. Not long ago her husband was arrested, but has already been set free. The point at issue was certain speeches he had made in the provinces and, upon their being summoned by the examining magistrate of Montluçon, he and Guesde, instead of obeying, poured vile scorn upon him in the Égalité. Whereupon he naturally issued a warrant for their arrest but, although Lafargue went daily to the newspaper office and was at so little pains to conceal his whereabouts that he actually announced he was going to speak, and did speak, at meetings, it took the clever Parisian police three weeks to seek him out. Like Guesde before him, he was immediately released after the first hearing at Montluçon. They might still get a couple of months apiece.†440
Page me46.406

As you know, the workers' party in France has split.†394 Malon and Brousse can hardly wait for the day when they become deputies, which means that a herd of voters has to be quickly rounded up. In other words a party created without a programme (literally — for a long series of 'considérants'†a is followed by the conclusion that every locality must draw up its own programme), in which every Tom, Dick and Harry is welcome and, to carry this through, people are being admitted into the party before the congress who accept the old programme with the reservation that, come the congress, they will subvert it. Guesde, Lafargue, etc., were outvoted and those who stood by the programme went to Roanne. Our people are no tacticians and have committed hopeless blunders, but nevertheless they will win through and the 'Possibilists' won't have it all their own way for long. Our chaps have a very considerable lever in the shape of the daily Égalité and, moreover, are all of them devoted to the cause, something which cannot be said of those intriguers, Malon and Brousse.

Page Break me46.407

Page me46.407
Well, good-bye, old man, and keep your pecker up. You're unlikely to decline as fast as all that and, as you know, we're all heading the same way!

Your
F.E.

Page me46.407
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

224
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN
IN ZURICH
Page me46.407
London, 16 December 1882

Dear Mr Bernstein,

Schorlemmer complains that he has not received the Sozialdemokrat for some little while; his subscription expired and he sent me the encl. CHEQUE (which I forgot about) no less than a month ago with the request that his annual subscription be renewed and 'the balance be used for party purposes'.
Page me46.407
The ms. of the Mark has had to be completely rewritten 3 times; on top of that I again had to go through about 5 or 6 of Maurer's 10 fat volumes,†465 besides which there were other sources to compare. I have now sent it to Marx who has slogged away at the subject much more thoroughly and for much longer than I have†475; I expect it back on Monday.

Page Break me46.408
Page me46.408
Malon se moque de†a Vollmar. Otherwise he would certainly have corrected the latter's howler to the effect that the 'Alliancists' attacked by the Égalité were understood in the sense of the Bakuninist Alliance.†67 Far from it. The Possibilists were thus described because they are now wholly indistinguishable from the people in the Alliance socialiste†476 which was founded some 4 years ago by Jourde, the ex-Communard for finance, with the help of past and present Proudhonists (e.g. Longuet) and which constitutes La Justice's socialist reserve. You must certainly have seen this Alliance mentioned in connection with elections; it put up candidates for the recent general election to the Chamber and obtained nearly as many votes — in some arrondissements at any rate — as the Parti ouvrier.†b If Vollmar knew nothing of this, despite his year and a half in Paris, it was because Malon deliberately kept it from him like much else. That's what happens when you give a gang your uncritical support.

Page me46.408

I have to chuckle when Vollmar praises Malon as the party disciplinarian and accuses the others of a breach of discipline.†438 Who, I ask, is guilty of indiscipline — he who carries the old flag high or he who recruits people with the express aim of deserting the colours and exchanging the old flag for a new one? Where, I ask, would Malon have got his majority at St-Étienne from†394 if he hadn't first recruited people whose intention from the start, and this was precisely why they had been recruited, was to subvert the old programme?
Page me46.408

That was a choice row between Malon and his Clovis Hugues over Louis Blanc. And they call themselves a party!
Page me46.408

You will have seen that the Fédération du Nord†454 has declared outright for Roanne.
Page me46.408

Some of Lafargue's articles in the more recent issues of the Égalité have been truly delightful, e.g. on Bontoux's candidature.†471 Witticisms are better suited to them than doctrinaire pontifications.

Page Break me46.409
Page me46.409

Would you please be good enough to see that the issues are sent on to Schorlemmer.

Yours very sincerely,
F.E.

Page me46.409
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

225
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.409

[Ventnor,] 18 December 1882

DEAR FRED,

I return the ms.†a; very good!
Page me46.409
The doctor†b has just left; I can't say that I notice any PROGRESS, rather the reverse. Though not cold out of doors, it is damp and rainy and the doctor says he cannot allow me to go out until the next fine day; otherwise he wouldn't accept the responsibility.
Page me46.409
Au diable! il faut patienter!†c
Page me46.409
Salut.

Moor

Page me46.409
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.410

226
ENGELS TO MARX†7
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.410
London, 19 December 1882

Dear Moor,

Your letter arrived at 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon and this morning I got back the ms.†a Your opinion is most flattering though it is one I cannot share, at any rate so far as form is concerned. As it was fine and warm at midday you will doubtless be released at last for an hour or two from your confinement indoors. Here, though, the fog has grown worse again since 1 o'clock and at times it is like night.
Page me46.410
This is how I see the Podolinski business.†477 His real discovery is that human labour is capable of retaining solar energy on the earth's surface and harnessing it for a longer period than would otherwise have been the case. All the economic conclusions he draws from this are wrong. I have not got the thing to hand but read it in Italian not long ago in the Plebe. The point in question, namely how the amount of energy contained in a specific amount of foodstuffs can, through labour, yield a greater amount of energy than itself, I resolve as follows: Let us assume that the amount of food a person needs each day represents an amount of energy expressed as 10,000 cal (units of heat). These 10,000 cal will, ad infinitum, = 10,000 cal and are known in practice to lose on conversion into other forms of energy as a result of friction, etc., a portion that cannot be put to use. Significantly so in the case of the human body. Hence the physical labour performed in economic labour can never = 10,000 cal; it is invariably less.

Page me46.410

But this is by no means to imply that physical labour is economic labour. The economic labour performed by 10,000 cal in no way consists in the reproduction, complete or partial, of these same 10,000 cal in any form whatever. On the contrary, they are for the most part lost in the increased heat given off by the body, etc., and such useful residue as remains lies in the fertilising property of excretions. The economic labour performed by an individual through the expenditure of these 10,000 cal consists rather in the stabilisation over a longer or shorter period of the fresh cal he absorbs from the radiation of the sun, and this is the only connection the latter have, so far as labour is concerned, with the first 10,000 cal. Now whether the fresh cal stabilised by the expenditure of 10,000 cal of daily nourishment amount to 5,000, 10,000, 20,000 or a million is dependent solely upon the level of development of the means of production.

Page Break me46.411
Page me46.411

To demonstrate this in the form of calculations is possible only in the case of the most primitive branches of production: hunting, fishing, stock farming, agriculture. In hunting and fishing fresh solar energy is not even stabilised; rather, use is simply made of what has been stabilised already. At the same time it is clear that, assuming the individual concerned takes normal nourishment, the amount of protein and fat he obtains by hunting or fishing is independent of the amount of these substances he consumes.
Page me46.411

In stock farming energy is stabilised in as much as the vegetation, that would otherwise rapidly wither, die and decompose, is systematically converted into animal protein, fat, skin, bone, etc., hence stabilised over a longer period. Here calculations already become complicated.
Page me46.411

Even more so in agriculture where the energy value of auxiliary materials, fertilisers, etc., must also be taken into consideration.
Page me46.411

In industry all calculations come to a full stop; for the most part the labour added to a product simply does not permit of being expressed in terms of cal. This might be done at a pinch in the case of a pound of yarn by laboriously reproducing its durability and tensile strength in yet another mechanical formula, but even then it would smack of quite useless pedantry and, in the case of a piece of grey cloth, let alone one that has been bleached, dyed or printed, would actually become absurd. The energy value conforming to the production costs of a hammer, a screw, a sewing needle, is an impossible quantity.
Page me46.411

To express economic conditions in terms of physical measures is, in my view, a sheer impossibility.
Page me46.411
What Podolinski has completely forgotten is that the working individual is not only a stabiliser of present but also, and to a far greater extent, a squanderer of past, solar heat. As to what we have done in the way of squandering our reserves of energy, our coal, ore, forests, etc., you are better informed than I am. From this point of view, hunting and fishing may also be seen not as stabilisers of fresh solar heat but as exhausters and even incipient squanderers of the solar energy that has accumulated from the past.

Page Break me46.412
Page me46.412
Further: Man, by his labour, does deliberately what plants do unconsciously. Plants — and there is nothing new in this of course — are the great absorbers and repositories of solar heat in modified form. Thus man, by his labour, in so far as it stabilises solar energy (which in industry and elsewhere is by no means always the case), succeeds in combining the natural functions of the energy-consuming animal with those of the energy-gathering plant.
Page me46.412
Podolinski went astray after his very valuable discovery, because he sought to find in the field of natural science fresh evidence of the rightness of socialism and hence has confused the physical with the economic.
Page me46.412
Encl. CHEQUE for £40 so that you can cash it when you want and will have something to fall back on.
Page me46.412
As regards Tussy's coming, I shall speak to her this evening. So far as we ourselves are concerned Jollymeier at once agreed, of course; the details can only be arranged if he does come.†a More tomorrow.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.412
First published in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

227
ENGELS TO MARX†7
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.412

London, 22 December 1882

Dear Moor,

To come back to Podolinski again,†b I stand corrected: storage of energy by means of labour takes place strictly speaking only in arable farming. In stock farming the energy stored in plants is, in general, merely transferred to the animal, hence we can only speak of storage in so far as nutritive plants are put to use which would, in the absence of stock farming, go to waste. In all branches of industry, on the other hand, energy is merely expended. The most one can say is that vegetable products such as wood, straw, flax, etc., and animal products in which plant energy is stored, are made available by processing, i.e. are preserved for a longer space of time than if they had been allowed to decay naturally. Hence the time-honoured economic fact that all industrial producers are dependent for their subsistence on the products of agriculture, stock farming, hunting and fishing can, if desired, also be translated into physical terms, though this is not particularly rewarding.

Page Break me46.413
Page me46.413
Herewith letter from Laura†478; Jenny's case would not, in fact, appear to be too bad, always providing she obtains proper and regular treatment — this being necessary not because of any immediate danger, but because of the extremely unpleasant consequences that might result from neglect.
Page me46.413
Hartmann has thrown up the sponge here and tomorrow is crossing the ocean again. It's just as well. His contracts over here have involved him in such a mass of legal obligations (some of them unfulfilled) that he himself no longer knows where he stands. I shall tell you all about it when I see you and am glad he is going away. It has now transpired that, all the while he was touching me for loans, he was pocketing anything from five to six pounds a week.
Page me46.413
You are right when you say that Bernstein doesn't always allow himself adequate time for reflection. But he's not alone in that. Take a look at Lafargue's recent discoveries in 'Prêtres et commerçants' (Égalité, 20 December) and, ibid., Deville's latest reconstruction†a of Weitlingianism†479 — by no means an improvement.
Page me46.413
I am glad that 'we concur', as they say in business, on the subject of serfdom.†b Certainly, serfdom and bondage are not a form peculiar to the Middle Ages and feudalism; we find them everywhere, or almost everywhere where conquerors have the land tilled for them by the original inhabitants — e.g. at a very early date in Thessaly. Indeed, this fact has clouded my view, like that of many others, of medieval servitude; we were all too eager to see it as being simply based upon conquest; it rounded things off so neatly and tidily. Cf. Thierry, among others.†a

Page Break me46.414
Page me46.414

Again, the position of the Christians in Turkey during the heyday of ancient Turkish semi-feudalism was not dissimilar.
Page me46.414
But here is Pumps arriving for dinner, it being now 5 o'clock, and thus I am the victim of force majeure.†b I hope that this glorious weather has pulled you round again.

Your Fred

Page me46.414
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

228
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL
IN LEIPZIG
Page me46.414
London, 22 December 1882

Dear Bebel,

I hope you will be set free the day after tomorrow for 24 hours†480 and thus have no difficulty in getting hold of this note.
Page me46.414
All that was meant by the bit you found mystifying in my last letter†c was that I expected the repeal of the Exceptional Law†16 to be brought about by events either of a revolutionary nature themselves (e.g. a fresh coup or the convocation of a national assembly in Russia, whose repercussions on Germany would at once become apparent), or those which at any rate would give impetus to the movement and pave the way for revolution (change of monarch in

Page Break me46.415
Berlin, death or resignation of Bismarck), either of which would almost inevitably usher in a 'new era'.†277
Page me46.415
The crisis in America would seem to me, like the one over here and like the pressure on German industry that has not yet lifted everywhere, to be not a crisis proper, but the after-effect of overproduction dating back to the previous crisis. On the last occasion the crash in Germany came prematurely because of the milliard racket, whereas here and in America it came at the proper time, in 1877. But never, during a period of prosperity, had the productive forces been so expanded as in the years between 1871 and 1877, hence, as in 1837-42, the chronic pressure here†a and in Germany on the main branches of industry, especially cotton and iron; the markets are still not able to absorb all those products. Since American industry is, in the main, still working for the protected home market, a local interim crisis may very easily arise there, in consequence of the rapid increase in production, but ultimately it will only serve to hasten the time when America becomes capable of exporting and of entering the world market as England's most dangerous competitor. Hence I do not believe — and Marx shares my view†b — that the real crisis will come very much before it is due.

Page me46.415

I would consider a European war to be a disaster; this time it would prove frightfully serious and inflame chauvinism everywhere for years to come, since all peoples would be fighting for their own existence. All the work done by the Russian revolutionaries, who are on the eve of victory, would be ruined and set at nought; our party in Germany, temporarily overwhelmed by the tide of chauvinism, would be dispersed, while exactly the same would happen in France. The only good thing that might come of it would be the setting-up of a Little Poland — which would also and automatically ensue from revolution; a Russian constitution resulting from a disastrous war would have an import, probably of a conservative nature, quite different from one forcibly imposed by revolutionary means. Such a war would, I believe, retard the revolution by 10 years, at the end of which, however, the upheaval would doubtless be all the more drastic. Incidentally, there has again been a prospect of war. Bismarck has been flaunting the Austrian alliance just as he did the South German alliances at the time of the Luxembourg affair in 1867.†481 Whether anything will come of this in the spring remains to be seen.

Page Break me46.416
Page me46.416

We found your reports on the state of German industry most interesting, in particular the express confirmation that the cartel agreement between the ironmasters had collapsed. It could not possibly last, least of all between German industrialists for whom the pettiest fraudulence is the very breath of life.
Page me46.416

We haven't as yet seen the things by Meyer†482 and what you say is therefore news to us. That Marx would figure alongside his cardinals was only to be expected; Meyer always derived quite exceptional pleasure from proceeding direct from Cardinal Manning to Marx, nor did he ever fail to mention the fact.
Page me46.416

In his Sociale Briefe Rodbertus was hot on the scent of surplus value, but that was as close as he got. Otherwise it would have put paid to his thoughts and endeavours as to how best to help the debt-ridden country Junkers, something the good man surely could not have wished. But as you say, he is worth infinitely more than the majority of German vulgar economists, including the armchair socialists†82 who after all live solely off our leavings.
Page me46.416

The story of Carlchen's†a wooing was also new to us. The wedding, or so I have been told by eye-witnesses, was a most mournful affair, so much so that someone who was present at the civil ceremony exclaimed: 'C'est l'enterrement de A!'†b
Page me46.416
Yesterday I sent off to Zurich the final ms. for the pamphlet, namely an appendix on the constitution of the Mark and a short history of the German peasantry generally.†378 Since Maurer†465 writes very badly and confuses many things, it is difficult to track down what you want at the first reading. As soon as I get the proofs I shall send you the thing, which contains, not simply abstracts from Maurer, but indirect criticism of him, as also much else that is new. These are the first-fruits of long years of study devoted to German history, and I am delighted at being able to present it first of all to the workers rather than to schoolmasters and other 'eddicated' gents.
Page me46.416
Now I must stop, for otherwise I shall not be able to register the letter in time to catch the evening post. The Prussians would not as yet seem to have reached the stage of Stiebering†c registered letters, all of which have so far arrived in proper condition. I have by long practice acquired a pretty shrewd eye for such things.

Page Break me46.417
Page me46.417
I should be glad if your wife†a would kindly accept the enclosed Christmas card and the compliments of the season.

Your
F.E.

First published abridged in: A. Bebel, Aus meinem Leben, Teil III, Stuttgart, 1914 and in full, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

229
MARX TO ELEANOR MARX†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.417
[Postcard, unsigned]

[Ventnor, 23 December 1882]

Dear Child,

From Laura's letter (which Engels sent me for information today†b) I see that Jennychen is again afflicted by that beastly inflammation.†478 Should it be neglected, I can only fear the worst. We must really consider (and you should talk this over with Lenchen before coming to join me here) whether we ought not to relieve Jennychen at any rate of Harry, even if it should necessitate his coming here. How can Jennychen find time for the treatment of her illness WITH ALL THESE BABIES TOGETHER? And again, how neglected (as regards health) our Johnny will be should one of the others not be displaced in his stead?

Page me46.417
Harry makes a difficult position doubly difficult for poor Jennychen.
Page me46.417
All I want you to bring is Physiologie by Rank (or Ranke — I'm not sure). Also Freeman's rotten little book (History of Europe), since it serves me in lieu of a chronological table; it is in my bedroom on the shelves where the newspapers, etc., are.

Page Break me46.418
Page me46.418
[On the side reserved for the address]

Miss Marx
41 Maitland Park Road, Maitland Park,
London, N.W.

Page me46.418
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 35, Moscow, 1964

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.419

1883

230
MARX TO JAMES M. WILLIAMSON
IN VENTNOR†411
Page me46.419
Ventnor, 6 January 1883
1 St Boniface Gardens

Dear Dr Williamson,

I return with best thanks the enclosed letter.†483
Page me46.419
My intended promenade was yesterday stopped by the rain. When rising this morning about a quarter past 9 o'clock, I got suddenly into a spasmodic cough, gasping, wrestling as if it were with suffocation. Unfortunately, I had used up the morphia, nor had

I any of the 'lozenges' prescribed by you, but I took a table-spoon-(rather somewhat more)-ful of the tonic. What in point of fact surprised me was, that during the course of yesterday my cough was much less troublesome than it had been for the last weeks. Nor was my night specially disturbed. Mere moral agencies, I suppose, do not touch the movements of the mucus.
Page me46.419

Yesterday afternoon I had received from Paris a letter with bad news as to the health of Madame Longuet, my oldest daughter. I knew of course that her illness was serious, but I was not prepared to hear that it passes now through a critical phasis.

Yours very truly,
Karl Marx

Page me46.419
First published as a facsimile and in German translation in Neues Deutschland, 12./13. März 1983

Reproduced from the facsimile

Page Break me46.420

231
MARX TO ELEANOR MARX†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.420
Ventnor, 8 January 1883 1 St Boniface Gardens

Dear Tussychen,

I received a short note on Saturday from Dr Williamson enclosing a letter to Williamson from Dr F. Bayshawe dated 4 January '83, 5 Warrior Square, St Leonards on Sea, in which he says amongst other things:

'We had a week of almost continuous rain or moist air, which gave place on the 2nd to dry weather, of varying direction. Since that we have had sunshine each afternoon, tho' not much of it. I will endeavour to send you some further statistics tomorrow. I believe we may say generally that the climate of Hastings is dryer than much of the South Coast, tho' this may be at the expense of some warmth etc.'
Page me46.420

On Saturday (6 January) the weather here was fine round about midday; yesterday, too, it was dry, but colder; it is always sunniest on the esplanade. I went for a stroll yesterday and the day before, and today it promises to remain fine. It is generally coolish unless one is actually in the sun. At all events, a steady rise in temperature has now been predicted.
Page me46.420

There's always Hastings to move to if prospects here prove deceptive; besides which, there comes a moment when a change of place is of itself beneficial. This much at least we know — there is SOME SENSE in exchanging Ventnor for Hastings, but not for places on the South Coast that are closer to Ventnor and in which conditions are almost exactly the same as in the ISLE OF Wight.
Page me46.420
Every now and again I still have to tussle furiously with the accumulation of MUCUS; after getting up on Saturday morning I EVEN had a spasmodic attack [of coughing] so that for several seconds I vainly struggled for breath. I believe it was due to nervous irritation — my anxiety over Jennychen! Upon that I need not enlarge. I would have hastened to Argenteuil at once, but for the possibility of saddling the child with the extra burden of a sick visitor! For no one can guarantee that the journey WOULD [not] HAVE PUNISHED ME WITH A RELAPSE such as I have so far fortunately escaped. All the same, it's hard not being able to go and see her.

Page Break me46.421

Love from OLD NICK

Page me46.421
First published, in the languages of the original (German and English), in Annali, an. I, Milano, 1958

Printed according to the original

232
ENGELS TO MARX
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.421
London, 9 January 1883

Dear Moor,

In great haste I am sending you the following enclosures: 1. Lafargue, 2. Bebel, 3. Hepner,†484 of which I should like to have 2. and 3. back.
Page me46.421
So at last there has been a report on Jenny's condition from which one can tell how matters really stand. In my opinion the case isn't as bad as it looks; the poor child has allowed herself to grow unduly weak as a result of over-exertion and her distaste for medical treatment, but she will soon pick up again under Laura's management. I at once sent Laura £15, the last five being intended to give Laura a somewhat freer hand when she visits Jenny and buys things for her. Until Jenny is able to run her house again, Johnny ought certainly to remain over here.
Page me46.421

Bebel's information on German industry is interesting, though it strikes me that one ought to take it cum grano salis.†a What are expanding are for the most part the luxury industries and possibly mechanical weaving — though in the latter case export opportunities are restricted by the tariffs on yarn. Since the annexation of Alsace they have had more spindles than they need as also, since 1870, ironworks, so how can big industry as such expand to any great extent? Moreover the fact that beet sugar has made such an impression on him suggests a narrow view. The circumstance that the state pays for the profits of the sugar-manufacturing Junkers has already been debated in the Landtag.

Page Break me46.422
Page me46.422
Hepner. What do you make of the little Jew's proposal (obviously at the insistence of his associé†a Jonas) to hold a pistol to our heads as regards a preface to the Manifesto? In my view, either one completely ignores insolent letters like these or at most refers him to the preface of the Leipzig edition†b; if that isn't good enough for him he ought to leave the Manifesto unprinted.
Page me46.422
If you write to Sorge about Hartmann†c (supposing that you have not already done so) you might slip in a line or two about little Hepner.
Page me46.422
Time for the post — I had to go into town to see to the money and then get it off, have therefore been delayed.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.422
First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

233
MARX TO ELEANOR MARX†166
IN LONDON
Page me46.422
[Ventnor,] 9 January 1883

My Dear Good Child,

How kind of you to write to me so often and at such length; however I do not wish TO ENCROACH ON THE VERY LITTLE 'FREE' TIME YOU HAVE TO

Page Break me46.423
DISPOSE OF. I got your letter after I had sent off mine,†a after my return from an excursion by the sea. I have had no further news from Paris.
Page me46.423
Today I was on the point of 'setting forth on foot' again — DESPITE THE NOISE OF THE WIND — when my doctor†b arrived; he told me I was to stay at home as it was very cold outdoors. He examined me again. All as before, in as much as the catarrh is chronic (hence, too, the persistent hoarseness), though from a 'higher' viewpoint my condition has improved in as much as the critical spots have not been affected in any way. This semi-permanent cough would be tiresome enough, but with the daily vomissements†c it becomes loathsome. This frequently makes work impossible, though the doctor believes — he still believes AND THAT IS SOMETHING! — he can rid me of this torment (with the help of a little remedy he has just prescribed). Qui vivra, verra.†d
Page me46.423
Apropos. SOMEWHERE in my bedroom or my desk there must still be COPIES of my photograph from Algiers in a writing case or some LITTLE BOX or other. If you could find them, you might send me two photogramms. One of them I have promised to forward to Madame Williamson.†485
Page me46.423
Yesterday Mr Meissner sent me his account for 1881; it shows a very slight drop, so there is bound to be a corresponding increase for 1882 as he also wrote saying that he is rapidly running out of copies of Capital.†486 Naturally he is getting impatient about the revised sheets.†e It is an unconscionable time since he heard from me on the subject. Now he will get some definite news.
Page me46.423
Cowen's SPEECH quoad†f 'EGYPT'†487 is on the same lines as Hyndman's political music of the future, English style. These groaning bourgeois (and even Cowen is a bourgeois in this respect), these poor British bourgeois, who groan as they assume more and more 'RESPONSABILITIES'†g in the service of their historic mission, while vainly protesting against it — and can even Cowen himself help smirking over the entrancing little prospect of all those fortified offensive positions between the Atlantic and the Indian Ocean and, INTO THE BARGAIN, an 'African-British Empire' from the Delta to the Cape? Very naice! In fact there could be no more blatant example of Christian hypocrisy than the 'conquest' of Egypt — conquest in the midst of peace! Even Cowen, and he is certainly the best of the English parlementaires,†h secretly admires this 'heroic exploit'; 'THE DAZZLE OF OUR MILITARY PARADE'. POOR Cowen! He is a typical British 'BOURGEOIS' (on this point); he believes he has done a splendid 'deal', and very cheaply at that; he doesn't even see that the English 'OLD GRAND MAN'†a is simply the tool of other, non-British smart Alecs in so far as 'policy' plays a part in this event; however Goschen & Co. coolly assumed 'RESPONSABILITY' for the 'HOME' INTEREST.

Page Break me46.424
Page me46.424

Cowen has actually become such a prey to superstition that he regards Lord Dufferin as INDEED AN OVERWHELMING DIPLOMATIC GENIUS. But drat the British!
Page me46.424
*Kiss my grandson†b for me.

Farewell,
Old Nick*

Page me46.424
First published, in the language of the original (German), in Annali, an. I, Milano, 1958

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

234
MARX TO ENGELS†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.424
[Ventnor,] 10 January 1883

Dear FRED,

It was very good of you to forward me Lafargue's letter so promptly.†484 It reassured me very much, the more so since, by the same post today, I heard direct from Lafargue, according to whom a turn for the better would seem to be assured. I entirely share your view that Johnny ought under no circumstances to leave just now. There can be no question of that until Jenny has completely recovered. It would be unpardonable to add to the difficulty of the child's position. I shall write to Longuet direct this very day. I should be glad if you could drop Jennychen a few lines to the same effect. After all, it's not as though Johnny is going to be lost pour l'armée territoriale.†c

Page Break me46.425
Page me46.425
It is curious how, nowadays, any sort of nervous excitement immediately grips me by the throat, as red Wolff did his brother, the corn profiteer.†488 Alias,†a the initial shock of the bad news from Paris a few days ago induced a fit of spasmodic coughing during which I thought I was going to choke. Poor Jennychen must often have suffered from this highly DISTRESSING FEELING during the course of her asthma.
Page me46.425
As for 'little Hepner', I suggest we treat him in a 'businesslike' way, telling him that he is at liberty to reprint our preface to the Leipzig edition†b and also pointing out that the Russians published a new translation last year.†c If he doesn't consider it worth while to reprint the Manifesto without our writing another special preface, he can take it or leave it, as he thinks fit in the circumstances. 'Holding a pistol to one's head' comes as second nature to 'our people' and, where little Hepner is concerned, it's something we have to accept as a matter of course.

Page me46.425

POOR Meissner has sent me a statement of accounts for 1881,†486 saying it had been a poor year; not that this really signifies for, by his own account, he was getting 'short' of copies in 1882; so the fewer he sold in 1881, the more he must have sold in 1882. My prolonged silence must have bamboozled him. At last Mahomet will be going to him, though not, alas, what he would greatly prefer — a bundle of revised sheets.†d Since my long — and only seldom interrupted — confinement to the house first began, but especially as a result of constant nausea or, to use the more aesthetic South German expression á la Madame Karl Blind, née Cohen,†e as a result of daily 'puking' (caused by my cough), I have up till now been scarcely capable of pressing on with the revision. But I believe that, given patience and rigorous self-discipline, I shall soon get back onto the rails again.

Moor

First published abridged in Der Briefwechsel zwischen F. Engels und K. Marx, Bd. 4, Stuttgart, 1913 and in full in MEGA, Abt. III, Bd. 4, Berlin, 1931

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.426

235
MARX TO ELEANOR MARX†72
IN LONDON
Page me46.426
[Ventnor,] 10 January 1883

Dear Child,

The enclosed letter from Lafargue (be so kind as to send it back sometime) reassured me greatly on Jennychen's account, although Lafargue may have painted too rosy a picture out of consideration for me; but it does seem as though the immediate danger is over.
Page me46.426

Charming, the accounts of Wolf and Pa†a (who is now an IDOLATER OF Wolf's), etc.
Page me46.426

As things are at present (and Engels agrees with me over this) it would be a most unfavourable moment to send Johnny off to Argenteuil. He cannot go back until Jenny is again in a condition to look after her household. All one must concentrate on is the main issue, not lesser considerations, and it was those that were very nearly the death of Jenny.

What difference would a few months here or there make, quite apart from the fact that the poor boy would, from the start, be precipitated into chaos.
Page me46.426
I hope, Tussychen, that you will at once write to Jennychen telling her what I have said. I shall today drop Longuet a line on this subject, addressed to the Justice.
Page me46.426
You must let Johnnychen have news of his brothers and sister; you will, OF COURSE, also give Lenchen the main gist of Lafargue's letter.
Page me46.426
Yesterday the weather was horrible; today, too, it looks damp and far from 'glorious'. But I shall, I think, [take] my 'CONSTITUTIONAL' today [...]†b

Page me46.426
First published, in the language of the original (German), in Annali, an. I, Milano, 1958

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.427
Page me46.427

Marx's congratulation to Mrs James M. Williamson on the reverse of his photograph of 1875

Page Break me46.428
Page me46.428

Page Break me46.429

236
MARX TO Mrs JAMES M. WILLIAMSON†489
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.429
Ventnor, 11 January 1883

Madame James M. Williamson with the wishes for a happy New Year.

Karl Marx

Page me46.429
Published for the first time

Reproduced from a photocopy of the original

237
MARX TO JAMES M. WILLIAMSON
IN VENTNOR
Page me46.429
Ventnor, 13 January 1883
1 St Boniface Gardens

Dear Dr Williamson,

The fatal news of the death of my oldest daughter†490 forced me to at once return to London.†411
Page me46.429
Please, dear Doctor, send your bill to 41 Maitland Park, London, N.W. I regret that I had not the time of taking leave from you. — Indeed I find some relief in a grim headache. Physical pain is the only 'stunner' of mental pain.

Yours very truly,
Karl Marx

Page me46.429
First published as a facsimile and in German translation in Neues Deutschland, 12./13. März, 1983

Reproduced from the copy of original

Page Break me46.430

238
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†113
IN ZURICH
Page me46.430
London, 18 January 1883

Dear Mr Bernstein,

Days of festivity, followed by days of mourning,†490 constant obstructions. At present I have scarcely a moment to call my own, as you will understand when I tell you that Marx is back here from Ventnor,†411 confined to the house with bronchitis — so far, luckily, only a mild attack — and forbidden to talk much, while all the family business devolves on me. (But not a word of all this in the paper†a; Marx would be furious if he were to see the worthy Viereck's indiscreet and, what's more, not altogether veracious comments in today's Süddeutsche Post.)
Page me46.430

Enfin,†b I still have an hour or so to spare for you. As for Gumbel, returned herewith, he resembles Heine's Gumpelino†c in as much as he too is interested in stocks and shares. For that matter, he's an outstanding example of the German socialist abroad, having obviously been in Paris. Because we have provided these chaps with a theory of which they are entirely innocent, seldom bothering, moreover, to acquire a rudimentary — if indeed any — understanding of it, every provincial nincompoop among them considers himself superior to all other foreigners. Arriving from Heilbronn, or whatever the potty little place may be called, in London or Paris, he is appalled when he finds that his particular brand of provincialism does not hold good there. Instead of broadening his horizons and learning something, he deliberately makes himself more blinkered than before, for this serves to render all the more glaring the contrast between himself and the bad, stupid foreigners — i.e. his supposed superiority over them. Yet this is the kind of person who predominates in German associations abroad, and if you are now under pressure from them, just ask yourself who it was, after the promulgation of the Anti-Socialist Law,†16 that sought to give undeserved prominence to these associations by means of centralisation, etc. If you had known the chaps then as well as you do now, you would have been unlikely to go to so much trouble.

Page Break me46.431
Page me46.431

'The party with clean hands' — meaning what? The hands, perhaps, of Hasselmann or Fritzsche and of so many others, about whom everyone arriving here as an exile or something of the kind had a tale to tell?
Page me46.431

Gumpelino is at his best when he comes to his stocks and shares. When some such provincial champion of moral virtue tilts thus pharisaically at practices, unpleasant enough in themselves, but from which the party none the less derives a real advantage that far outweighs any possible damage, there must be a catch somewhere. The workers do not have stocks and shares, nor do they give a damn for the financial page. Hence — the little bourgeois, who also wants to dabble in stocks and shares, proceeds to demand that his party paper carry a benevolent, honest, moral, financial page. In the first place, it is not the business of a socialist paper to indicate how best the workers can be exploited — income from stocks and shares is, however, also the product of unpaid labour. If, then, in the second place Gumpelino nevertheless demands that the socialist press should do this, it says little for his socialism and even less for his flair as a businessman. I, too, have stocks and shares, buying and selling from time to time. But I am not so simple as to look to the socialist press for advice on these operations. Anyone who does so will burn his fingers, and serve him right! Get yourself baptised, Abraham Gumpelino!
Page me46.431

We were delighted by the way Grillenberger and the Sozialdemokrat replied to Puttkamer's piece of hypocrisy.†491 That's the way to do it. Not to twist and turn beneath the opponent's blows, or whine and whimper and stammer out excuses about no harm's being meant, as is still done by so many. Hit back — that's what one should do — for every blow dealt by the enemy, pay him back two or three. These have always been our tactics and up till now we have, I believe, always pretty well got the better of our opponents. 'Moreover, the genius of our soldiers lies in attacking, as is perfectly right,' says old Fritz in his orders to his generals†492 and that, indeed, is what our workers do in Germany. But when, in the debate on exceptional laws generally, — given that 's†a abstract is right — Kayser, for instance, retracts whining that we are revolutionaries only in the Pickwickian sense,†a what then? What he should have said was that neither the entire Reichstag nor the Federal Council would be sitting had it not been for a revolution; that old William, when he gobbled up three crowns and a free city,†493 was likewise a revolutionary; that legitimacy itself, and the very foundations of the so-called constitution, are no more than the product of innumerable revolutions effected against the will of the people and directed against the people. Oh, this damned German slackness of thought and will, introduced at such pains into the party with the 'eddicated' men, — if only we could rid ourselves of it again!

Page Break me46.432
Page me46.432
Time for the post. I shall reply as soon as possible to whatever points in your letter I may have overlooked. Thanks for the photograph. Proofs†b when?

Regards, yours,
F.E.

Page me46.432
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

239
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†24
IN ZURICH
Page me46.432
London, 8 February 1883

Dear Mr Bernstein,

1. I trust you have received the final ms. (The Mark) which was sent off from here registered on 20 December. But the printing delays are now getting really too outrageous. If it goes on like this you had better reset the title and put 1884 on it. When, exactly, will there be another sheet?

Page Break me46.433
Page me46.433
2. I have received — neither the first Accident Bill, nor Bebel's speech on the subject. Meanwhile it has struck me that a specific attack on Bismarckian socialism has become outdated.†a Viereck's little paper†b has lost all inclination for it. Singer, who had been suffering badly from nationalisation mania on the last occasion but one, was, on the last occasion, completely free of it and genuinely revolutionary,†494 while as for those weaklings in the Reichstag, Blos, Geiser & Co., their courage, if not their enthusiasm, would appear to have evaporated. So why crack a nut with a sledgehammer? I think we should let Bismarckian socialism dig its own grave. After which all that remains is a criticism of the rotten Lassallean remnants. But if the pamphlet†378 is printed so slowly, this attack, too, may have ceased to be topical by the time the thing comes out.

Page me46.433

3. You are mistaken about Malon. The man is not as stupid, or rather as naive, as he makes himself out to be. C'est un faux bonhomme†c who has learnt from the Bakuninists how to manipulate people on the sly while making out that it is he himself who is being manipulated. One of these days you will see that I am right.
Page me46.433

4. Stock exchange tax. Has long existed here in England in the form of a simple, everyday stamp on the transfer document — 1/2% of the amount paid and 5/- transfer fee (securities au porteur†d are rare over here; they are free). The only consequence is that the real speculation on the stock exchange is in margin dealings where no actual transfer takes place. Hence only affects the so-called 'solid capital investment'. Nor has anything ever been devised that the stock market speculators cannot circumvent.
Page me46.433

I am against it, 1. because we, after all, demand only direct taxation, rejecting any that is indirect, so that the people may know and sense what they are paying, and also so that capital can be got at in this way, 2. because we certainly cannot vote one penny to this government.
Page me46.433

You are right in describing the outcry against the stock exchange as petty-bourgeois. The stock exchange simply adjusts the distribution of the surplus value already stolen from the workers, and how that is done may at first be a matter of indifference to the workers as such. However the stock exchange adjusts this distribution in the direction of centralisation, vastly accelerates the concentration of capitals and is therefore as revolutionary as the steam engine.

Page Break me46.434
Page me46.434

Equally petty-bourgeois, though perhaps just excusable, are taxes with a moral purpose — beer, spirits. In this context they are quite ludicrous and altogether reactionary. Had the stock exchange in America not created colossal fortunes, how would large-scale industry and a social movement have been possible in that land of farmers?
Page me46.434

It would be quite a good idea if you were to lash out here. But with circumspection. There must be no gap in one's defences where your Stoeckers are concerned.
Page me46.434

5. 3rd edition of Capital.†227 Will doubtless take some time yet as Marx is still ailing. His stay in Ventnor, where it rained continuously, did him no good. On top of that there has been the loss of his daughter.†490 He has been back here for the past 3 weeks and is so hoarse that he can barely speak, so not much could be discussed (only don't mention this in the paper,†a of course).
Page me46.434
6. We should be grateful for the Rodbertus-Meyer book.†b At one time the man was almost on the point of discovering surplus value, but his estate in Pomerania prevented him from doing so.
Page me46.434
Very many thanks for the photograph.
Page me46.434
Kautsky has sent me his pamphlet on American grain. Choice irony: 3 years ago the population was to be reduced because it would otherwise have nothing to eat; now the population does not even suffice to eat what America produces!†495 That's what happens when you study so-called 'questions' one by one without linking them together. In so doing you naturally fall victim to that dialectic which 'is objectively present', Dühring notwithstanding, 'in things themselves'.†496
Page me46.434
I am delighted to hear that the Hohenzollern family again boasts a professing pederast. It would not be complete without one. Admittedly Prince Karl, like Frederick William II, also 'operated' in that line, but he also included women. That reminds me, did Adolf Beust give you Mirabeau's Secret History of the Court of Berlin†c which I gave him to pass on to you? If not, get hold of it. The book is inimitable on the subject of Frederick William II; the best bits have been dog's-eared.

Page Break me46.435
Page me46.435
Kindest regards.

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.435
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

240
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†24
IN ZURICH
Page me46.435
London, 10 February 1883

Dear Mr Bernstein,

I respectfully confirm mine of yesterday's date†a and herewith enclose a letter for Kautsky†b whose old address may no longer be any good.
Page me46.435
To come back to the stock exchange tax, there is absolutely no need for us to deny the 'immorality' and rascality of that exchange; we can even paint a really lurid picture of it as the spearhead of capitalist gain where ownership becomes directly synonymous with theft, but then go on to conclude that it is by no means in the interests of the proletariat to destroy this immaculate spearhead of the present economy; rather it should be allowed to deploy perfectly freely, so that even the most stupid can see where the present economy is taking them. We shall leave moral indignation to those who are avaricious enough to have recourse to the stock exchange without themselves being stock exchange men and who, as is only right, are cleaned out. And then if the stock exchange and 'solid business' come to blows and if the country Junkers, who also seek to dabble in securities and are inevitably fleeced, make a third in the three-sided battle between the main elements of the exploiting class, then we, the fourth, shall be the ones to laugh.

Page Break me46.436
Page me46.436
The request for an exact address with number and street applies to you as well. Otherwise I cannot send any money, which I must certainly do, inter alia, for 6 copies of the Schmidt pamphlet†458 which Schorlemmer and I wish to send to Germany and which I ask for.
Page me46.436
But now I must close.

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.436
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

241
ENGELS TO KARL KAUTSKY
IN VIENNA
Page me46.436
London, 10 February 1883

Dear Mr Kautsky,

At long last I can get round to answering you and thanking you for the various things you have sent. You have no idea of the way impediments of all kinds have prevented me, not only from working, but also from attending to the most urgent correspondence. Since Marx has been ill the burden has fallen upon myself alone and, on top of that, the number of inquiries, etc., has doubled. Moreover, I cannot very well write in the evenings because it tires my eyes and interferes with my sleep. Thus all written work is dependent on the few — in wintertime here, all too short — hours of daylight and, in view of the distances one has to cover here, a single trip into town will, as often as not, disrupt one's entire working day. And some fine to-ing and froing I have had to do of late!

Page Break me46.437
Page me46.437

Enough of that. I have not yet seen Die Neue Zeit. But I shall write to Dietz today. I must have street and house number if I am to send the subscription per money order; that's the rule here.

Page me46.437

Your treatise on American food production is most timely. The fact that you make such use of the information supplied by Mr Meyer must have made him very proud.†497 Is he still in Vienna, and do you still see him from time to time?

Page me46.437

But what irony of history! 3 or 4 years ago you, a neonato†a Malthusian, were advocating the necessity of restricting the population by artificial means, because otherwise the time would soon come when we should none of us have enough to eat. And now you prove that the population is not even large enough to consume America's surplus food production as well as what Europe herself produces. Solve, I pray, Count Oerindur, this conundrum posed by nature!†b Presumably, then, it won't be rations that are withheld, but rather that much-vaunted little sponge! Which is not to say, of course, that this same or some other method might not be of great practical use in middle-class families to keep the number of children proportionate to income, and prevent the wife's health being ruined by too frequent confinements, etc. But I still maintain that this is a private matter between husband and wife, or at most the family doctor (in one such case I myself recommended what you call the 'Raciborski method'), and that our proletarians will continue as before to live up to their name by producing numerous proles.†c

Page me46.437

It will not surprise you to learn that my standpoint in regard to your article on hetaerism†498 still remains the same, namely that community of wives (and of men for women) was the basis for sexual relations within the tribe. The psychological argument against this, deriving from jealousy, interpolates more recent views, and is disproved by countless facts (some of which below). Darwin is no more of an authority in this field than in that of political economy, whence he imported his Malthusianism. We know practically nothing about apes in this respect, since observations in a menagerie prove nothing and are difficult to make in the case of a troop of wild apes, while such as are alleged to have been made cannot claim to be accurate, conclusive or even universally valid. Gorillas and orang-outangs must in any case be excluded, since they do not live in troops. Those primitive tribes you adduce, with a loose form of monogamy, are, in my view, degenerate, as Bancroft has shown of the Californians of the peninsula.†a Proof of primitivity is provided, not by barbarism, but by the degree of integrity of ancient tribal blood ties. These, therefore, must first be established in each individual instance before conclusions can be drawn from individual manifestations in this tribe or that. For instance, in the case of the peninsular Californians, these ancient ties have become very much looser, nor has any other organisation come to take their place; a sure sign of degeneracy. But even these argue against you. For amongst them, too, the women periodically revert to concubinage. And this is a crucial point though you do not so much as mention it. Just as it may be confidently inferred that, wherever, — e.g. with the Hutzwang†499 — the land periodically reverts to common ownership, there will once have been complete common ownership of land, so too, I believe, one may confidently conclude that there has originally been community of wives wherever women — symbolically or in reality — periodically revert to concubinage. And this happens, not only amongst your peninsular Californians, but also amongst many other Indian tribes, not to mention the Phoenicians, Babylonians, Indians, Slavs and Celts, either symbolically or in reality; hence it is very ancient and widespread and entirely refutes the psychological argument based on jealousy. I am curious to see how, in due course, you will contrive to overcome this obstacle, for you cannot after all omit all mention of it.

Page Break me46.438
Page me46.438
Here comes Pumps with her husband and child†b and that means no more writing. This is always happening.
Page me46.438
With kindest regards,

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.438
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.439

242
ENGELS TO LAURA LAFARGUE
IN PARIS
Page me46.439
London, 16th February 1883

My dear Laura,

I begin this letter — 4 p.m. — uncertain when I may be able to finish it, the constant interruptions I have lately been subjected to leave me no quiet time except at night and then I dare not write much, as that affects my eyes.
Page me46.439
Your Salas y Gomez†a is on the whole a masterpiece. There is the same roughness of language as in the original — roughness as we like it in young good red wine, gesunde Herbigkeit,†b and which makes Chamisso's terzine come nearer to Dante's than those of any other poet. I compared it with the original line for line and am astonished at the fidelity of the reproduction. Still I would wish you to try and alter a few passages so as to make it perfect. The end, you say yourself, is hurried and so indeed it is. But for details.
Page me46.439
Introduction. Terz. 3. Thus towered it — it could not 'tower' while it could only be descried from the mast-head. — From the Ruric: impossible, because Chamisso himself was on board the Ruric.
Page me46.439
Terz. 5. I think wants re-moulding. Den Versuch zu wagen†c applies merely to the risk of getting the boats safely through the breakers caused by coral reefs which encircle all islands in those latitudes.
Page me46.439
Terz. 7, 3. One syllable short, our cannot be used bisyllabic.
Page me46.439
Terz. 15. The translation: albeit ... that might obliterate, is open to misleading. The original says clearly that it is the men's own steps that have obliterated the writing.
Page me46.439
Terz. 31, 1. This cold rock will never do while it burns his feet through his soles.
Page me46.439
1st Tablet. Terz. 1. Ich sah bereits im Geiste†d — that cannot be suppressed in the beginning. The reader, from the translation, must believe that the man was already in full possession of all these fancied treasures, and only at the end, Terz. 8, there is an indication, and that, after the previous omission, not strong enough, that all this was a mere fancy-dream. The character of the adventurous seafarer in quest of wealth forms the basis of the whole piece, and ought therefore to come out strong from the beginning of the story.

Page Break me46.440
Page me46.440
Terz. 4, 1: and for myself too were content and gain, is not to be understood without reference to the original.†a
Page me46.440
Terz. 9, 3: the cabins gives a syllable too much in the verse, and is not literal. Der untre Raum is in ship's language the hold, and moreover monosyllabic.
Page me46.440

2nd Tablet. Not a fault to find except one and that is one in copying. Terz. 16, 1: For they (have) sighted me, the have is omitted.
Page me46.440
3rd Tablet. Terz. 7. 'Worser far' I prefer, but will the philistine public? And will you turn philistine enough to say 'worse by far'?
Page me46.440
Terz. 15-20: your own variations indicate that you are not quite satisfied with your work. I do believe that here a fresh attempt might be made with advantage. The conclusion again is very good.
Page me46.440
As usual the beginning, when one is not yet recht im Zug,†b and the end when one gets tired a little, are the weak points, but I think after you have had it laid aside for a time, you will be able to go at it again with fresh vigour and make it what indeed you can make it.
Page me46.440
Mohr wants to read it too, but not yet. Latterly he has had very bad sleepless nights which have broken down his intellectual appetite, so that he began to read, instead of novels, publisher's catalogues. However the night before last was good and he was quite another man yesterday; another good symptom: his feet, previously ice-cold in the evening and only to be warmed by hot mustard-baths, for the last two nights were quite warm and no baths required. The chronic inflammation of the larynx and bronchiae is slowly becoming subdued, but swallowing still painful and the voice very hoarse. I shall continue to-night after I have seen him. His appetite was very good yesterday, Nim†c surpasses herself in inventing new dishes for his case.
Page me46.440
17th February. It was 1 o'clock when I came back last night from Maitland Park,†d so I could not finish this letter. Mohr was going on pretty much as usual, but he had given up the catalogues and returned to Frédéric Soulié, anyhow a good sign. What do you say to this, that he drinks a pint of milk a day, he who could not bear milk to be on the table! Anyhow it does him good. Besides rum now and then (in the milk especially) he takes a bottle of brandy about every four days.

Page Break me46.441
Page me46.441
The worst is that his case is so complicated that while the most pressing things, the breathing organs, have to be attended to, and now and then a sleeping draft is to be given, other things have to be neglected, for instance the stomach which is as you know none of the most perfect organs of digestion. But still his appetite keeps up pretty well, and we do our best to supply him such food chiefly as contains much nourishment in a small compass.
Page me46.441
I think our friends have been in too great a hurry with the new Égalité. What is to become of the paper if Paul†a and Guesde get 'time to serve' at Moulins, and that is after all not quite impossible?†440 Guesde's opening article†b is not at all what it should be. What he says of judges elected by universal suffrage, is quite as applicable to universal suffrage itself, to the Republic, to any political institution. If Messieurs les français do not know how to use this universal suffrage tant pis pour eux.†c Give our people in Germany the right to elect the judges and they will carry the election in all large towns and make Berlin too hot a shop for old William and Bismarck, unless they have recourse to a coup d'état. But to say: white because my adversary says: black, is simply subir la loi de son adversaire, et une politique de bébés.†d I am afraid Guesde's old anarchist rodomontades are cropping up again rather fast, and in that case he will lose himself. Paul's deux embêtés†e†500 are charming. That is just his line.†f

Page me46.441
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 35, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.442

243
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†501
IN ZURICH
Page me46.442
London, 27 February 1883

Dear Mr Bernstein,

I recently had a little dispute with Viereck which has forced me to break with him. As he might possibly come to Zurich for the congress†502 and make use of the occasion to mention the matter in private conversation, I am concerned lest in that event his version be the only one to go the rounds. I therefore authorise you to read this letter to anyone Viereck may discuss the matter with, but at all events to Bebel and Liebknecht.
Page me46.442
Some little while before Christmas Viereck, or rather his wife,†a sent me the visiting card of one Deinhardt, a Munich engineer, with three questions of a chemico-physico-industrial nature and asked me to get hold of the information if possible. I sent the card to Schorlemmer in Manchester who rightly suspected from the questions a pushful and importunate inventor and for good measure appended a 'motto' to his extremely terse reply. Here is the card as returned to Viereck:

'1. Has ozone come into use alongside chlorine and chloride of lime for bleaching rags in English paper mills? — No.
Page me46.442
'2. Compared with other bleaching agents, does ozone offer a manufacturing concern any noteworthy advantages in a technical or financial sense? — No.
Page me46.442

'3. Is the production and use of ozone in an industrial concern attended by considerable difficulties? — Yes.
Page me46.442
'C. Deinhardt, Engineer (printed on card).
Page me46.442
'Motto: Apage inventor!'†b
Page me46.442
In this form the card went back. So if Viereck did not wish to show Deinhardt the motto, all he had to do was copy questions and answers onto a sheet of paper or a postcard, and that would have been that.
Page me46.442
Next I received No. 7 (17 January) of the Süddeutsche Post (which Viereck sent me in exchange for The Labour Standard) and, in the 'Letter Box', saw the following:

'To Mr Deinhardt, engineer of this city. The author of the 'electrotechnical revolution' writes to tell us that, despite information to the contrary supplied by Prof. Schorlemmer, of Manchester, he must stand by his contention that the production of ozone would be effected by means of a dynamo, etc.'

Page Break me46.443
Page me46.443
What was the meaning of this? How was it that this purely private piece of information found its way into the paper rather than into a proper letter box? And how could Viereck have had the impudence to make public use in his paper of private information supplied by Schorlemmer for Deinhardt — on Viereck's own evidence an extremely importunate man — purely to oblige Viereck? Either Viereck didn't know what he was doing or he did it out of revenge for the 'motto'.
Page me46.443
But there is nothing whatever in the 3 questions and answers that turns on whether the production of ozone is effected by means of a dynamo; a dynamo is not mentioned at all. Thus, by indirectly attributing to Schorlemmer a statement actually denying that the production of ozone is effected with a dynamo, Viereck is guilty of outright falsification; he is attributing to Schorlemmer things he has never said. But obviously it cannot be a matter of indifference to a chemist whose reputation extends beyond Europe if someone attributes to him things about chemico-physical questions he has never said, and does so publicly in the university city of Munich where, after all, there are also chemists and physicists who might possibly read it.
Page me46.443
So I sent the paper, as was only my duty, to Schorlemmer who sent me the following letter for Viereck:

'If anyone' (I am quoting from memory) 'publishes a private communication without permission, then it is improper. But if in addition he goes on to distort the said communication, then it is barely ethical.'
Page me46.443

Accordingly Schorlemmer called for the publication of the card as it stood, with questions, answers and motto, in order that the matter might be clarified.
Page me46.443

Whereupon a long letter arrived from Viereck addressed to me. Deinhardt, he said, had bombarded him with three letters on the subject of ozone (so the Apage inventor was wholly appropriate!). By sending him [Viereck] the above-mentioned letter I was now holding a pistol to his head (which is untrue, let him show it to you; all I did was demand in polite terms full satisfaction for Schorlemmer), while Schorlemmer's letter and the demands made therein were even more intemperate. He could not, he added, publish the motto (needless to say this request was not intended seriously) and the remainder only if Schorlemmer withdrew the insulting expressions contained in his letter; for the time being he could not admit having made a mistake, but must refuse to accede to our peremptory demands in 'this entirely unqualifiable form'.

Page Break me46.444

'I did not even know,' his letter goes on, 'that Prof. Schorlemmer read the Süddeutsche Post and surely cannot in any circumstances assume that you had sent him this issue ad hoc†a! For I regard it ... as out of the question that you could inform against me and I should have been only too pleased had you suggested what steps ought to have been taken to pacify the much agitated professor.' ... 11/12 of his readers consisted of party members ... nothing ought to be imputed to him that was 'inconsistent with the conduct of a man of honour', etc.
Page me46.444

So they make improper use of Schorlemmer's name and, on their own admission, distort what he says because they hope he won't find out. And when I, the sole cause of his involvement in the affair, tell him about it, then I am 'informing' against Viereck. Not Schorlemmer but Viereck is the injured party, because Schorlemmer characterises Viereck's conduct, and with great restraint at that. Not a word about the falsification of which Schorlemmer was the victim.
Page me46.444

Well, Viereck may read our reply to anyone he chooses. We sent him a statement, addressed not to him but to the editorial board, i.e. a statement intended for publication, together with a request that at the same time they print questions and answers. What does Viereck do? First, a polite apology in the 'Letter Box', to wit:

'We profoundly regret this tiresome misunderstanding' and promise to put the matter right.
Page me46.444

And then? In No. 17, 9 February:

'In regard to the electrotechnical revolution. On being consulted, Prof. Schorlemmer of Manchester supplied the following information which we herewith print in order to clear up a (!) misunderstanding (!)': (the questions and answers follow).
Page me46.444

The clarification of this 'misunderstanding' is tantamount to the total obfuscation of the affair, as is satisfaction for Schorlemmer to attempted mockery and to further misuse of his name. Thereafter I returned the Süddeutsche Post unopened. Yet another postcard from Viereck, asking what he had done to deserve being rebuffed in this insulting (everything is insulting!) way, etc. What I said in my reply — also per postcard — he can read to you himself if he likes. 'One must make a complete break with a swine like that,' Schorlemmer writes to me. And that has been done.

Page Break me46.445

Yours,
F. Engels

Page me46.445
First published in Die Briefe von Friedrich Engels an Eduard Bernstein, Berlin, 1925

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

244
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†7
IN ZURICH
Page me46.445
London, 27 February 1883

Dear Mr Bernstein,

Your letter received yesterday evening.†503 The Égalité has gone phut again and I would ask you to publish the following facts (see enclosed slip of paper) in the Sozialdemokrat.†504 Let us hope that the chaps will finally learn some sense and not go founding daily papers on the strength of contracts of this kind. Taking legal action is a mug's game and costs money, and any French court of law would revel in non-suiting socialists and losing them their case, while the paper would still remain defunct.
Page me46.445
Guesde and Lafargue, amongst others, were arraigned†440 under Article 91 of the Code pénal†167 — conspiracy and incitement to civil war — death penalty. What a farce!
Page me46.445
At any rate, it's a good thing that they can no longer publicly declare their solidarity with the anarchists, the latter being now behind bars — mere children who play with fire and, when given a hiding, try and make out they're the most innocent fellows in the world. And now some fool in Brussels sets off a bomb in his own trousers pocket! In due course dynamite will come to seem plain ridiculous.

Page me46.445

Now for a different tableau. Because of a dirty trick Viereck played on Schorlemmer in the Süddeutsche Post, I have broken with him. Further details are contained in a letter I have sent to Schorlemmer†a and which he, if he is agreeable, will send on to you tomorrow direct from Manchester (I have got it here, returned because I had forgotten to sign it).†a I need hardly tell you that, when Viereck and Fritzsche were over here, they would have been given a very cool reception by us had they not come as the official emissaries of the party. As it was, however, and since Marx was exempted by his indisposition, I had to some extent to do them the honours.†505 Moreover, a certain intimacy grew up between his (Viereck's) present wife†b and my niece†c (both of whom were then secretly engaged), etc., etc. At the same time I told him pretty plainly what I thought of his proclivity for vulgar democracy. In short, I became involved with him, but now it is all over.

Page Break me46.446

Page me46.446

The veriest boot-black could not have tolerated the treatment meted out to Schorlemmer by Viereck. Yet Schorlemmer is, after Marx, undoubtedly the most eminent man in the European socialist party. When I got to know him 20 years ago he was already a communist. At that time an impoverished private assistant to English professors, he is now a member of the ROYAL SOCIETY (the equivalent over here of the Akademie der Wissenschaften), and the world's leading authority in his own speciality, the chemistry of the simpler hydrocarbons (paraffin and its derivatives). His great Treatise on Chemistry, brought out jointly with Roscoe,†d but written almost entirely by Schorlemmer (as all chemists know), is now without a rival in England and Germany. And this position he has carved out for himself abroad, in competition with men who exploited him for as long as they could, and he has done so entirely on the strength of genuinely scientific work, without ever making any concession to humbug. Moreover, he never hesitates to proclaim himself a socialist as, for instance, when he reads jokes aloud from the Sozialdemokrat for the benefit of the other lecturers with whom he is lunching; but he also demands, and justly so, that he should not have unwanted publicity, in whatever guise, thrust upon him, as was done by Viereck. But now, good-bye until tomorrow. It is almost midnight and I have broken my rule of not writing at night.

Page me46.446

28 February. There is, however, one favour I would ask of you, and that is not to keep chucking the word 'comrade' at me in the paper.†e

Page Break me46.447

To begin with, I detest anything that smacks of title-mongering and since, in all the German literature that counts for anything, people are called simply by their names and are not given titles unless under attack, we too should conform to this unless the designation 'comrade' is really intended to inform the reader that the person concerned belongs to the party. What is in place and normal on the platform and in verbal debate can look pretty awful in print. And then again, we here are not in fact 'comrades' in the narrower sense of the term. We can hardly be said to belong to the German party any more than to the French, American or Russian, nor can we regard ourselves as any more bound by the German programme†506 than by the minimum programme.†68 We set no little store by this, our special position as representatives of international socialism. But it also precludes us from belonging to one particular national party — so long, that is, as we are unable to return to Germany and participate immediately in the struggle there. Just now it would be pointless.

Page me46.447

What you say about Liebknecht's complicity in importing philistine elements has long been our view. For all his excellent qualities, Liebknecht has one fault, namely the desire to attract 'educated' elements to the party by hook or by crook, and to him, a former teacher, the worst thing that can happen is for a working man in the Reichstag to say 'me' for 'I'. A man like Viereck ought never to have been put up as a candidate. He would have exposed us in the Reichstag to far more deadly ridicule than would a hundred wrong 'mes' of which, after all, the Hohenzollerns and field marshals are likewise guilty. Unless the newcomers — the educated ones and those from bourgeois circles generally — adopt the proletarian standpoint unreservedly, they can do nothing but harm. But if they have genuinely adopted that standpoint, then they are exceedingly useful and welcome. Another of Liebknecht's characteristics is that, for the sake of a momentary success, he will unhesitatingly sacrifice subsequent, more important successes. Thus Viereck and Fritzsche's highly dubious mission to America.†119 It went off reasonably well, but is there any knowing to what ridicule Fritzsche may not expose us later on in America? And then people will say: 'And there you have the representative of German Social Democracy in America, sent over officially!' And the caution one has to observe vis-á-vis this type of person when it comes to candidatures is evident from the Oppenheimer case.†507
Page me46.447

Yet another interruption!

Page Break me46.448
Page me46.448

1 March. We have always done our utmost to combat the narrow, petty-bourgeois philistine mentality within the party because, having developed since the Thirty Years' War,†472 it has infected all classes in Germany, and has become a German hereditary ill, sister to servility and humble submissiveness and every German hereditary vice! This it is that has made us ridiculous and contemptible abroad. It is the chief cause of the slackness and weakness of character so prevalent in our midst. It prevails on the throne no less frequently than in a cobbler's lodging. Only since the time a modern proletariat took shape in Germany, only since then has a class developed there that is virtually untainted by this hereditary German scourge, a class which has given proof of clear-sightedness, energy, humour and tenacity in the fray. And can we be expected not to combat every attempt at artificially inoculating that healthy — in Germany, the only healthy — class with the old hereditary germ of philistine narrow-mindedness and philistine slackness? But during the first period of shock after the assassination attempts†120 and the Anti-Socialist Law,†16 the leaders fell prey to an anxiety which in itself is proof of their having lived far too much amongst philistines and been subject to pressure from philistine opinion. The idea at the time was that the party should, if not actually become philistine, at any rate appear to be so. That, I am glad to say, has now been overcome, but the philistine elements — these being particularly prevalent among university men, most of them incapable of passing their examinations — introduced in pre-Anti-Socialist Law days are still there, and a close watch must be kept upon them. We are glad to have your assistance here and, being on the Sozialdemokrat, you are in a key position.

Page me46.448

But for goodness sake don't go raking up that wretched Jahrbuch article.†a It was an apologia for the stock exchange men. But one can perfectly well be at one and the same time a stock exchange man and a socialist and therefore detest and despise the class of stock exchange men. Would it ever occur to me to apologise for the fact that I myself was once a partner in a firm of manufacturers? There's a fine reception waiting for anyone who tries to throw that in my teeth! And if I could be certain of making a million on the stock exchange tomorrow, and thus put an ample supply of funds at the disposal of the party in Europe and America, to the stock exchange I should promptly go.

Page Break me46.449
Page me46.449

What you say about courting the enemy's praise is perfectly right. We have often been infuriated by the glee with which the slightest sign, be it only a fart, of recognition from the armchair socialists†82 was recorded in the Volksstaat and the Vorwärts. It was the phrase, 'We must exact recognition from the bourgeoisie in every sphere', that marked the beginning of Miquel's betrayal.†456 And however much Rudolf Meyer may butter us up,†482 all the recognition he is likely to get in return is for his really meritorious Politische Gründer.†a We never, of course, discussed serious topics with him, but confined ourselves almost entirely to Bismarck and the like. But Meyer is at least a decent fellow and one who is also quite capable of defying the aristos, nor is he ambitious like all the rest of the armchair socialists, who are now also flourishing in Italy; one specimen, Achille Loria, was over here recently but two calls on me were enough for him.
Page me46.449

In the case of Viereck, who knows absolutely nothing about the matter, the to-do over the electrotechnical revolution is merely an advertisement for the pamphlet he has published.†b In fact, however, it's a tremendously revolutionary affair. The steam engine taught us to transform heat into mechanical motion, but the exploitation of electricity has opened up the way to transforming all forms of energy — heat, mechanical motion, electricity, magnetism, light — one into the other and back again, and to their industrial exploitation. The circle is complete. And Deprez's latest discovery, namely that electric currents of very high voltage can, with a comparatively small loss of energy, be conveyed by simple telegraph wire over hitherto undreamed-of distances and be harnessed at the place of destination†426 — the thing is still in embryo — this discovery frees industry for good from virtually all local limitations, makes possible the harnessing of even the most remote hydraulic power and, though it may benefit the towns at the outset, will in the end inevitably prove the most powerful of levers in eliminating the antithesis between town and country. Again, it is obvious that the productive forces will thereby acquire a range such that they will, with increasing rapidity, outstrip the control of the bourgeoisie. All Viereck sees in it, short-sighted as he is, is a fresh argument in favour of his beloved nationalisation. What the bourgeoisie cannot do must be done by Bismarck.

Page Break me46.450
Page me46.450
I'm sorry about the Schumacher business. Let's hope it's just a passing phase; he used to be such a lively, resolute chap. But, as you say, it's that damned German imperial atmosphere!†508
Page me46.450
There are a great many reasons why I should not consider coming to the congress.†502 Things being what they are just now on the Continent, I would sooner remain here.
Page me46.450
Kautsky has sent me his second piece on marriage†498 in which he again tries to sneak in community of wives as a secondary manifestation. But that won't do. Indeed, I shall write to him about it†a and enclose the letter in one to you. It is Kautsky's misfortune that, in his hands, complex questions do not resolve themselves into simple ones — rather, simple questions become complex. And then, it's impossible to achieve anything if one is so prolific. He ought to write popular stuff for the sake of the fee, and take his time over scientific matters, thus dealing with them in a considered and exhaustive way, which alone can be rewarding.
Page me46.450
The pederast, who made us laugh a great deal, has already been posted on to Manchester where he will be widely disseminated.
Page me46.450
Marx is still incapable of work, keeps to his room (he returned here immediately after his daughter's death†490), and reads French novels. His case seems to be a very complicated one. My hopes are high, now that a better season is on its way.

Yours,
F. Engels
Page me46.450
Whatever you do, don't put anything about Marx's state of health into the paper†b; Viereck shamefully exploited in the Süddeutsche Post the information I sent his wife†c from time to time (he hardly ever wrote to me himself!), but naturally I was able to keep this from Marx, otherwise he would have hauled me over the coals. Here again Viereck had failed to ask my permission.

Page me46.450
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Book I, Moscow, 1924

Printed according to the original

Published in English in full for the first time

Page Break me46.451

245
ENGELS TO KARL KAUTSKY
IN VIENNA
Page me46.451
London, 2 March 1883

Dear Mr Kautsky,

I have received your second article on marriage†498 and, since this contains your answer to my criticism of the first one,†a I shall continue where I left off; I happen to have an hour to spare which will not be the case tomorrow.
Page me46.451
To begin with I consider it absolutely inadmissible that, having contested community of wives as a primary manifestation, you should seek to reintroduce it as a secondary one. Wherever common ownership exists, be it of land, women or anything else, it will necessarily be primitive, a legacy of the animal kingdom. The subsequent process of development consists entirely in the gradual dissolution of this primeval common ownership; in no case do we find an instance of secondary common ownership evolving out of primitive private ownership. So irrefutable and universally valid do I consider this proposition to be that, even were you to produce what appeared to be exceptions — and however striking these might be at first sight — I would not regard them as an argument to the contrary, but only as a question yet to be solved.
Page me46.451
Moreover, having made jealousy the one decisive factor in the first article, you ought not to discard it entirely in the second. Article I presupposes a loose form of monogamy, and this very largely on the strength of jealousy for, as I have said, your other reasons carry very little weight with me. But if jealousy is able to overcome natural community of sexes — and you do after all indirectly concede the existence of the latter when you say: `Within the tribe complete sexual licence prevailed' — if jealousy can relegate that natural licence to the confines of temporary monogamy, how much more easily must it be able to overcome lesser obstacles. The tribe's common ownership of captives is, however, an obstacle of much less magnitude. A woman remains a woman, whether she is free or a slave; true, in the case of female slaves, a man's jealousy is able to impose sole possession much more easily than in the case of free women who have a right to adultery! But the moment there is any question of marriage with captives, the jealousy of the husbands suddenly evaporates; the community of sexes which so appalled them in the primitive state, becomes acceptable and pleasing and, even after monogamy or polygamy has already been introduced, even in the case of Semitic peoples where harems are the rule, husbands do not object to their wives coupling with every Tom, Dick and Harry, either in the temple or at special seasons. No, my dear fellow, you can't dismiss the thing as easily as all that. For you are duty-bound to stick to the point even when it becomes awkward for you to do so. If primary community of sexes was inhibited by jealousy, then community of sexes is excluded once and for all, right down to and including capitalist society. Either your second article refutes the first or vice versa.

Page Break me46.452

Page me46.452

Incidentally, I would contest your statement that the freedom of women, at your first stage, contributed to monogamy because there could be no question of repression. The argument that community of sexes is dependent on repression is itself false and a modern distortion arising out of the idea that common ownership in the sexual sphere was only of women by men and at the latter's pleasure. This is totally foreign to the primitive state. Common ownership in this sphere was available to both sexes. To refute the false assumption, however, is not the same thing as refuting the correct facts on which the distortion is based.
Page me46.452

Again, by reducing all community of sexes and traces thereof to marriage by rapine with foreign women, you attribute to that form of marriage, qua predominant form, a really vast range. Yet you adduce not the slightest proof of this.
Page me46.452

What follows is lost in a welter of hypotheses [among them much]†a that is undoubtedly correct [in regard to specific times and]†a places. But you generalise at the speed of an express train, whereas questions of this kind do not lend themselves to such rapid despatch. And while the Celtic clan, the Roman gens and the German Geschlecht are, it is true, all sub-divisions of the tribe, they all have very marked differences and also, surely, different origins. As do the various kinds of clan amongst non-Celtic peoples.
Page me46.452

I am convinced that, should you pursue these studies or resume

Page Break me46.453
them after a lapse of time, you will arrive at quite different conclusions and, perhaps, regret your premature endeavours in this difficult field. You have done some hard slogging, but you have leapt too rapidly to conclusions, at the same time laying too much weight on the opinions of self-styled anthropologists, all of whom have what I might call a certain obliquity reminiscent of your armchair socialist.†82 While you may refute Bachofen's deification and mystification of community of sexes,†a this is not to say that community of sexes does not and will not continue to exist.
Page me46.453

Well, the dinner-bell is being rung — no offence meant, and so I still remain,

Your old friend,
F. Engels

Page me46.453
First published, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

246
ENGELS TO AUGUST BEBEL
IN LEIPZIG
Page me46.453
London, 7 March 1883

Dear Bebel,

I shall have to reply to you from memory today as I must have left your letter with Marx, but first of all I should like to congratulate you on your release the day after tomorrow.†405
Page me46.453
The rapid advances in German industry you have described please me enormously. What we are now experiencing is the second Bonapartist empire in all its aspects: the stock exchange is mobilising all capitals that are still wholly or partially idle by attracting them and rapidly concentrating them in a few hands; the capitals thus made available to industry are ushering in an industrial boom (which is by no means necessarily the same thing as a high level of business activity) and, once the affair gets going, it will continue to accelerate. Only two things distinguish the era of Bismarck from the era of Bonaparte III: The latter owed its prosperity to what was relatively free trade; the former is making headway despite protective tariffs that are wholly uncalled for, particularly in Germany. And, secondly, the Bismarckian era is putting far more people out of work. This is partly because the increase in population is much greater in our case than in that of France where two children are the rule, partly because Bonaparte, thanks to his building operations in Paris, generated an artificial demand for labour, whereas in our case the milliard era†169 came to an early end; but again it must partly be due to other causes about which I am not clear. At all events philistine Germany is at last becoming a modern country, and that is absolutely vital if we are to make rapid progress.

Page Break me46.454
Page me46.454
When one reads the German bourgeois papers and the speeches in the Chamber one might imagine that one was living in the England of Henry VII and VIII; the same complaints about danger from vagrants, the same outcry for the forcible suppression of vagrancy — the cachot†a and the lash. Here is the best proof of how rapidly the producers are losing touch with their means of production, of how rapidly the smaller enterprises are being supplanted by the machine and the perfecting of the machine. But what could be more ludicrous and despicable than those bourgeois who hope that moral sermons and penal methods sermons will enable them to do away with the inevitable consequences of their own actions. It is a crying shame that you are not in the Reichstag†222; this is a theme that would be right up your street.
Page me46.454

The precedent you set in the Saxon Landtag by calmly taking the oath†509 has had its imitators. The Italians have unanimously declared that the oath need not be a stumbling-block and Costa took the oath without demur.†420 And, after all, these are people who declare themselves to be `anarchists', even though they vote and are elected by vote!

Page me46.454

There has been a scandalous delay over my pamphlet†378 in Zurich, but the printing ought to be done by now; whether the binding will take as long in tin-pot Zurich, I don't know. At all events I am still awaiting copies, having as yet had none. The part on the `Mark' will clarify much of Maurer for you; the man's writing is atrociously slipshod but the content is excellent. I have read the book 5 or 6 times and shall reread it next week after I have again been through the relevant material in the remainder of his collected works.†465

Page Break me46.455

Page me46.455

We were most delighted at the way the virtuously religious Puttkamer was dealt with, first by Grillenberger in the Reichstag and then several times in the Sozialdemokrat.†491 He will be on his guard now!

Page me46.455

Little Hepner has reprinted Unsere Ziele†510 in New York, allegedly improved and with a little picture that is said to represent your portrait but in fact represents an honest to God YANKEE. As I only have the 1st edition, I can't say whether or what changes have been made by him for the worse/better. If you haven't got his edition I can send you one; after all, you had better see what the Americans think you ought to look like.

Page me46.455

Now I must close, for I must go and see Marx whose health is still not really making the progress it should. If it were two months from now, the warmth and air would do their work but as it is there's a north-east wind, a storm almost, with flurries of snow, so how can a man expect to cure himself of a long-standing case of bronchitis!

Page me46.455

Regards to Liebknecht.

Your
F.E.

Page me46.455

First published abridged in: A. Bebel, Aus meinem Leben, Teil III, Stuttgart, 1914 and in full, in Russian, in Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. I (VI), Moscow, 1932

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.456

247
ENGELS TO LAURA LAFARGUE
IN PARIS
Page me46.456
London, 10 March 1883

My dear Laura,

Not having received a letter from Paul†a this morning, I conclude that in this frosty and snowy weather with east wind, you will not be in too great a hurry to come to London. Anyhow, if you should make up your mind to come, everything is prepared for you.
Page me46.456
Donkin saw Mohr yesterday evening and I am glad to say gave a far more favorable account of his health than a fortnight ago. He said Mohr was decidedly not worse, but better, if anything, than then; and if we could keep him up for the next two months, there would be a good chance of bringing him round again. Of course he is still getting weaker, on account of the difficulty of swallowing, but we must force him to eat and drink. This is what Tussy wrote me on a postcard last night and what Nim†b told me today; I shall see Tussy tonight and if any more details are to be had shall write again at once. The abscess in the lungs he considers to be going on very favorably at present. The nocturnal sweats have now ceased the last 4 nights (or 5) but instead of that there is a certain feverishness in the day-time which of course is also weakening.
Page me46.456
He gave me the Prolétaire and the reply of Guesde's Committee, as well as the `vil'†c number of the Citoyen and Bataille which I am to keep for him. The copy sent by Paul can therefore with the rest be used for Zurich.†d So this time the business part of the affair can be attended to, fortunately, but with Mohr's present state of health, that cannot always be reckoned upon if he be in exclusive possession of the materials.
Page me46.456
These ex-Bakounists Malon and Brousse are a beastly dirty lot. Such barefaced forgery would be enough, anywhere out of Paris, to kill them for ever. But with the immense hold of la phrase upon the Parisians, who knows how many thousand votes the `ouvrier manuel'†e will not concentrate upon himself? Enfin espérons le mieux.†f

Page Break me46.456a
Page me46.456a

Page Break me46.457
Page me46.457
Kind regards to Paul.

Very affectionately yours,

F. Engels

Page me46.457
First published, in the language of the original (English), in: F. Engels, P. et L. Lafargue, Correspondance, t. I, Paris, 1956

Reproduced from the original

248
ENGELS TO CHARLES LONGUET
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.457
[Telegram]

London, 14 March, 4:32 afternoon [1883]

Marx expired suddenly at three this afternoon letter follows

Engels London

Page me46.457
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 35, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

249
ENGELS TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE†511
IN HOBOKEN
Page me46.457
[Telegram]

London, 14 March 1883

Marx died today

Engels London

Page me46.457
First published, in the language of the original (English), in New Yorker Volkszeitung, No. 64, 15 March 1883

Reproduced from the original

Page Break me46.458

250
ENGELS TO WILHELM LIEBKNECHT†512
IN LEIPZIG
Page me46.458
London, 14 March 1883

Dear Liebknecht,

You will all have learned from my telegram to Mrs Bebel†284 — the only address I have got — of the terrible loss suffered by the European socialist revolutionary party. Only last Friday the doctor†a — one of the leading medical men in London — had told us that there was every prospect of getting him as well as he had ever been, provided only he sustained his strength by taking food. And from that very moment he began eating with a better appetite again. Then, just after two o'clock this afternoon, I found the household in tears and was told he was terribly weak; Lenchen called out to me to come upstairs, saying he was half asleep, and, when I got there — she had been out of the room for barely two minutes — he was sound asleep, but it was for ever. The greatest intellect of the second half of this century had ceased to think. What the immediate cause of death was, I would not venture to guess without medical advice, the whole case being so complex as to require pages if it were to be described adequately, even by a doctor. And, indeed, it is no longer of any real importance. I have suffered anxiety enough over the past six weeks, and all I can say is that, in my opinion, the death, first of his wife,†513 and then, in a most critical period, of Jenny,†490 helped to bring on the final crisis.
Page me46.458
Although I have seen him this evening laid out on his bed, his features rigid in death, I simply cannot conceive that this man of genius has ceased to fructify the proletarian movement of both worlds with his stupendous ideas. We all of us are what we are because of him; and the movement is what it is today because of his theoretical and practical activities; but for him we should still be in a welter of confusion.

Your
F. Engels

Page me46.458
First published, as a facsimile, in: W. Liebknecht, Karl Marx zum Gedächtnis, Nürnberg, 1896

Printed according to the facsimile in the book

Page Break me46.459

251
ENGELS TO EDUARD BERNSTEIN†512
IN ZURICH
Page me46.459
London, 14 March 1883

Dear Bernstein,

You will have got my telegram.†284 The thing happened frightfully quickly. Our hopes were at their highest when, this morning, his strength suddenly failed him, after which he simply fell asleep. Within two minutes this intellect of genius had ceased to think, and at precisely the moment when we had been encouraged by the doctors to entertain the highest hopes. Only someone who constantly kept company with him could have any idea of how valuable this man was to us in regard to theory and also, at every critical moment, in regard to practice. Along with him, his great breadth of vision will also disappear from the stage for years to come. These are things we others are not equal to. The movement will continue on its way but it will miss the calm, timely, considered interventions which have hitherto saved it many a weary digression.
Page me46.459
More shortly. It is now midnight and I have had to spend the entire afternoon and evening writing letters and seeing to all manner of things.

Yours,
F.E.

Page me46.459
First published in the magazine Der Wahre Jacob, Nr. 565 (6), 17. März 1908

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.460

252
ENGELS TO JOHANN PHILIPP BECKER†512
IN GENEVA
Page me46.460
London, 15 March 1883

Dear Old Man,

Rejoice that you saw Marx once more last autumn,†514 you will never see him again. Yesterday afternoon, at 2.45, when he had been left on his own for barely two minutes, we found him peacefully asleep in his chair. The most powerful intellect our party possessed had ceased to think, the stoutest heart I have ever known was beating no more. An internal haemorrhage would seem to be indicated.

Page me46.460
We two are now pretty well all that is left of the old guard of the days before `48. Well, we shall continue to man the breach. Though bullets may whistle and friends fall, it won't be the first time we two have seen that happen. And if one of us is hit by a bullet — well and good, provided only it is properly lodged so that one isn't left writhing for too long.

Your old comrade in arms,
F. Engels

Page me46.460
First published in: F. Engels, Vergessene Briefe (Briefe Friedrich Engels' an Johann Philipp Becker), Berlin, 1920

Printed according to the original

253
ENGELS TO FRIEDRICH ADOLPH SORGE†512
IN HOBOKEN
Page me46.460
London, 15 March 1883
11.45 p.m.

Dear Sorge,

Your telegram arrived this evening. Many thanks.
Page me46.460
To keep you regularly informed about Marx's state of health was impossible because of his perpetual ups and downs. But here, briefly, are the main facts.

Page Break me46.461
Page me46.461
In October `81, shortly before the death of his wife,†513 he went down with PLEURISY. Having recovered from that, he was sent to Algiers in February `82 and, the weather during the journey being wet and cold, arrived there suffering from another bout of PLEURISY. The execrable weather persisted; he had only just recovered when, because of the approach of hot summer weather, he was sent to Monte Carlo (Monaco). Arrived there suffering from another, though milder, bout of PLEURISY. Further execrable weather. Cured again at last, he went to Argenteuil near Paris, to stay with his daughter, Madame Longuet. There he availed himself of the nearby sulphur springs at Enghien for the treatment of his long-standing bronchitis. And there, too, the weather continued to be really appalling, but the cure did some good. Next, 6 weeks in Vevey, whence he came back here in September, apparently almost restored to health. He had been authorised to spend the winter on the south coast of England. And he himself was so sick of a wandering and idle life that renewed exile in southern Europe would probably have damaged his morale as much as it would have benefited his physique. With the onset of London's foggy season he was sent to the Isle of Wight where it rained continuously and he again caught cold. Schorlemmer and I had intended to visit him early in the New Year, but then reports reached us which necessitated Tussy's going there at once. Immediately afterwards came the news of Jenny's death†490 — whereupon he came back here, again suffering from bronchitis. After all that had happened and at his age this spelt danger. On top of that there was a host of complications, in particular an abcess of the lung and a tremendously rapid loss of strength. Nevertheless, the illness as a whole was taking a favourable course, and only last Friday the doctor en chef†a in whose hands he was — one of the leading younger doctors in London who had been specially recommended to him by Ray Lankester — held out the rosiest hopes. But anyone who has ever examined lung tissue under a microscope knows how great is the danger, when a lung is festering, of the wall of a blood vessel becoming perforated. And that is why, every morning for the past 6 weeks, as I turned the corner, I was mortally afraid that the blinds might have been lowered. Yesterday, at half past two in the afternoon, his best time for receiving visitors, I arrived to find the household in tears; it seemed as if he was nearing his end. I asked for news, tried to get to the bottom of the matter and to offer consolation. There had been a slight haemorrhage, followed, however, by a sudden collapse. Our good, old Lenchen,†a who has looked after him better than a mother would after her child, went upstairs, came down again: he was half asleep, she said, and invited me to come up with her. When we went in, he lay there sleeping, never to wake again. His pulse and breathing had stopped. In the space of two minutes he had passed away painlessly and peacefully.

Page Break me46.462
Page me46.462
All events, however terrible they may be, that come about with natural inevitability, bear within them their own consolation. So it was here. The art of medicine might, perhaps, have been able to secure for him a few years of vegetable-like existence, the life of a helpless creature, not dying suddenly but inch by inch, a triumphant testimony to the skill of the doctors. But that is something our Marx could never have stood. To live with so many uncompleted works before him, with the tantalising desire to complete them and the impossibility of doing so — that would have been a thousand times more bitter for him than the gentle death that overtook him. `Death is not a misfortune for the one that dies but for the one that survives',†b as he used to say with Epicurus. And to see this powerful man of genius continue to vegetate, a total wreck, for the greater glory of medicine and as a laughing-stock for the philistines whom, at the height of his powers, he had so often felled to the ground — no! A thousand times better that it should be as it is, a thousand times better that we should bear him the day after tomorrow to the grave in which his wife lies sleeping.
Page me46.462
And after all that had gone before, with which not even the doctors are as familiar as I am, there could, in my view, have been only one choice.
Page me46.462

Be that as it may. Mankind is the poorer for the loss of this intellect — the most important intellect, indeed, which it could boast today. The movement of the proletariat will continue on its course but it has lost its focal point, the point to which Frenchmen, Russians, Americans and Germans would automatically turn at moments of crisis, on every occasion receiving clear, indisputable advice such as only genius and consummate expertise can give. Local bigwigs and lesser luminaries, if not imposters, will be given a free hand. Ultimate victory remains assured, but the digressions, the temporary and local aberrations — already so inevitable — will now proliferate as never before. Well, we have got to see it through — what else are we here for? But we're not going to lose heart, for all that — not by a long chalk.

Page Break me46.463

Your
F. Engels

Page me46.463
First published in full in Briefe und Auszüge aus Briefen von Joh. Phil. Becker, Jos. Dietzgen, Friedrich Engels, Karl Marx u. A. an F.A. Sorge und Andere, Stuttgart, 1906

Printed according to the original

254
ENGELS TO FRIEDRICH LESSNER†515
IN LONDON
Page me46.463
London, 15 March 1883

Dear Lessner,

At three o'clock yesterday our old friend Marx went gently and peacefully to his eternal rest; the immediate cause of death was, or so we presume, an internal haemorrhage.
Page me46.463
The funeral will take place on Saturday†a at 12 noon, and Tussy asks you to attend.
Page me46.463
In great haste,

Your
F. Engels

Page me46.463

First published in Deutsche Worte, Jg. XVIII, Nr. 5, Wien, 1898

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.464

255
ENGELS TO PYOTR LAVROV
IN PARIS
Page me46.464
London, 24 March 1883

My dear Lavrov,

I have received a long telegram from Moscow asking me to lay a wreath on Marx's grave on behalf of the students of the Petrovsky Academy of Agriculture†516; not having my address, they telegraphed the editorial department of The Daily News. Now they are asking me to let them know the price of the wreath and my address. But it is not signed with a name — merely: Students of the Petrovsky Academy in Moscow.
Page me46.464
To whom should I reply? Perhaps you could advise me. As the telegram arrived after the burial, and the grave has today been reopened for the burial of Longuet's little boy†a who died last Tuesday,†b I shall not be able to lay the wreath on it till next week. But then I should like to let the worthy young men know that I have received their telegram and carried out the task they entrusted to me.

Yours ever, in haste,
F. Engels

Page me46.464
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, First Russian Edition, Vol. XXVII, Moscow, 1935

Printed according to the original

Translated from the French

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.465

256
ENGELS TO LAURA LAFARGUE
IN PARIS
Page me46.465

London, 25 March 1883

My dear Laura,

Enclosed a letter from Meyer which was directed to Maitland Park†a — Tussy opened it without looking at the address, but when she saw from whom it was, she gave it at once to Nim†b who handed it to me.
Page me46.465
To-day Nim found among Mohr's manuscripts a large parcel containing the best part if not the whole of the second volume of the Capital†227 — above 500 pages in folio. As we do not yet know in what state of preparation for the press it is, nor either what else we may find, it will be better to keep this piece of good news out of the press for the present.
Page me46.465
Pumps is expecting No. 2 daily and nightly if indeed it has not arrived to-day — since Friday no news from her. No. 1†c is a year old to-day. Jollymeier sends his love to you. Kind regards from both of us to Paul.†d Tell him that the last No. of the Sozialdemokrat contains but the report of the funeral†e — the same essentially which was in the Justice.†f
Page me46.465
The English and German press have been inexact and badly informed but upon the whole decent. Even Malon was not so bad.
Page me46.465
Latest news. In walks Pumps and Percy†g! So there the full 12 months is happily passed.

Most affectionately yours,
F. Engels

Page me46.465
First published, in the language of the original (English), in F. Engels, P. et L. Lafargue, Correspondance, t. I, Paris, 1956

Reproduced from the original

Page Break me46.466

257
ENGELS TO FRIEDRICH THEODOR CUNO†349
IN NEW YORK
Page me46.466
London, 29 March 1883

Dear Cuno,

Your letter evoked roars of laughter over here.†517 Anyone who knew Moor as he was at home and within his intimate circle, is aware that he was never called Marx there, or even Karl, but only Moor, just as each of us had his own nickname; indeed, at the point where nicknames ceased so too did the closest intimacy. Moor had been his nickname since his university days and on the Neue Rheinische Zeitung he was always called Moor. If I had addressed him in any other way he would have thought something was amiss that needed putting right.

Your
F. Engels

Page me46.466
First published in the journal Die Gesellschaft, Jg. 11, Nr. 11, Berlin, 1925

Printed according to the original

Page Break me46.467

APPENDICES

Page Break me46.468
Page Break me46.469

1
JENNY LONGUET TO CHARLES LONGUET
IN PARIS
Page me46.469
[London,] 1 October 1880

My dear Charles,

I was well rewarded yesterday for spending without murmuring a most dreary evening — the evenings are getting so long and chill — by the arrival of your article. It gave me much pleasure for it is wittily written, and I rejoice to think that it will give much satisfaction to Liebknecht. Liebknecht is a great enthusiast with regard to revolutionary France — so great an optimist indeed in this respect, that during the Franco-Prussian war etc. he even lost all discrimination in judging of Trouchu and Co. — therefore your praise of him in the Justice will sound like sweetest music to his ear and make him forget for a moment the troubles that lie so heavily upon him. He seems to me to be quite broken down by the last two years. With tears in his eyes he spoke to me of the struggles he and his family had passed through and which were yet in store for them. From all his sons he must part if he does not wish them to be shot or crippled, they must emigrate to America. `My happiest time,' he said, `was that spent in England' — and yet heaven knows, he did not lie on a bed of roses here! `I often think of it with regret. But there was a fate that drove me to Germany, that has driven me on ever since and will shape my destiny to the end. — When I heard of the Amnesty,†518 my first thoughts were with you all — I already saw you hopelessly restlessly tossed on a small skiff on the wild ocean of Paris. But what must be must be.' To which I said Amen. There is a Providence (or rather a fate) that shapes our ends, rough-hew them as we will! — I quite agree with you in thinking that the men of the Commune should never forget how boldly the German socialists fought for the cause of the vanquished, and that therefore by writing your article you have paid a debt of gratitude, and I think now that if Bebel and Liebknecht have evinced less sympathy for the Nihilists†242 of Russia, it is because they have had altogether false notions on the subject and have had the misfortune of meeting with a quantity of Russian humbugs calling themselves Nihilists, with which the Continent swarms.

Page Break me46.470
Page me46.470

Fortunately for Liebknecht he has had his eyes opened now by Papa and Hartmann, who has interested him deeply and has shown him the importance of the Russian movement and the unparalleled grandeur of the true Nihilist heroes. The soi-disant†a Nihilists that infest the Continent, Hartmann said, are nearly always fellows whose only reason for leaving Russia is that they will not work, and that they can find ways and means to live without working elsewhere — numbers of them are not refugees.
Page me46.470

Pardon this endless letter in which I have not yet found time to mention that which lies nearest your heart. My object is to make it last until I shall hear the welcome sound of the postman's knock — shall get a letter from you, or read an article written by you. It is only since you are gone, my dear Charles, that I feel how dear you are to me and how lonely life would be without you! I was not quite well this morning and yesterday, having horrid fits of sickness — but when they are over I am all right again — my misgivings will come but too true!!! The children are blooming like roses and I can see that Harry†b is daily gaining strength. He begins to grow wonderfully fond of and interested in all that the Wolf†c does, and follows him about from room to room, calling for him when away. Little Edgar is a very sunbeam of brightness, in his delightful joyousness he constantly reminds me of our poor little Caro†d and I tremble lest anything should happen to this lovely child — you alarmed me by telling me of your neuralgia — I hope Tussy's cordial has spelled it away.

Your Jenny
Page me46.470

How is it I only receive one copy of the Justice when your articles are in it? Do not forget to send two.

Page me46.470
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 34, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.471

2
From JENNY LONGUET'S LETTER TO CHARLES LONGUET
IN PARIS
Page me46.471
[London,] 27 October 1880

... I was very glad to see that the notes on Eastern affairs are bearing such good fruit. Pelletan of late has written the most childish trash on the subject, every line giving evidence of the darkest ignorance. Your article is written in the simple, clear, elegant style for which French prose is famous, and which makes the stuff of treaties go down quite pleasantly. But how is it you are so stingy? Why not send me four copies of your own articles always — or at least three. Now again, I have no number to send my correspondent Collet, who would send more matter, if he saw that some use was made of the information given. From Papa it is impossible to get a paper returned, besides if returned, I could not send it to anyone, as it would be marked all over with blue pencil marks. That is the reason why I could not at once send your last article to Parnell. If he were to take an interest in the Justice — a great end would be gained. Notes direct from him would be invaluable at this crisis.†519 Your article on the Treaty of Berlin,†376 Papa has not seen yet, therefore I cannot give you his opinion. He told me last Sunday, shocked at the ignorance displayed by Pelletan on Eastern affairs, that he would order the `blue books'†89 and write to you himself on the subject. Good-bye.

Your loving Jenny

Page me46.471
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 34, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.472

3
From JENNY LONGUET'S LETTER TO CHARLES LONGUET
IN PARIS
Page me46.472

[London,] 31 October 1880

... I had the Justice with your two articles in it last night, and feel quite elated to see what excellent use you have made of the matter I sent you. Your article on the frontier must create a sensation, what you disclose is quite new in France, and even little known in England, because intentionally suppressed. And then the form you give to heavy stuff is so amusing and sarcastic, that even the French reader will not consider the matter too dry. The pity is, that you always send me one copy, and that I am not able to send a paper to Collet, which would keep my correspondence with that short-armed but long-sighted individual alive and procure for you an abstract of the intrigues now going on, and save you the trouble of reading blue books†89 yourself: I also want the first article†a on the Berlin Treaty†376 for Collet. Papa was greatly pleased with your article — he had often grumbled at childish notes in the Justice on the delays caused by the Turks etc. — delays in reality skilfully brought about by the Russians! Papa also liked your article on Girardin and relished the quotation sur le mâle et l'âne†b from Proudhon. — But I am sure you relished still more the pleasure of quoting the name of your master than the quotation itself!!! Am I right?
Page me46.472

I am sorry to think you should have taken the trouble to translate what I sent you on Ireland. I never intended you to do that, fancying that you would take parts here and there and scribble down in an hour at most some sort of correspondence. As you make such a serious matter of it, I shall not send any more of my productions. They would only waste your time. My intention had been to save your time by reading much matter referring to Ireland for you. It is so long ago since I sent you my letter, that I do not remember what I wrote, but fancy the news will be too stale now.
Page me46.472

I have not read Roy's articles. Papa considers the second one to be superior to anything that has hitherto been published on Littré.

Page Break me46.473
Page me46.473

Love and kisses from all.

Your Jenny

Page me46.473
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 34, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

JENNY LONGUET TO CHARLES LONGUET
IN PARIS
Page me46.473
[London,] 23 November 1880

My dear Charles,

I was just going to write to Papa to ask him to send you a copy of the Capital, when I heard from Mama that a volume had already been sent you.†a To-day, being Sunday, Johnny and I paid our usual visit at Maitland Park†b (I have only time to go there once a week) and so I had at length an opportunity of asking Papa's opinion of your latest productions. He seemed very pleased at the publication of Bright's opinion on the Irish question, considering it most opportune and wondering how you had got hold of that interesting document. Liebknecht's letter he thinks will do really good service. You have made Liebknecht's style sound quite elegant, which is not its general characteristic. As to your own article in answer to Massard, Papa also much approved of it, though I must add that his praise is rather more qualified than was mine. — First, he does not agree with you as to the greatness of the fact of the 4 août,†520 declaring that a careful study of the history of that event diminishes it wonderfully in importance and shows that only minor points were conceded. As to the revolutionary side of the struggle for the limitation of the working day, he thinks you have passed it over without notice in your answer to those revolutionists of the fire and sword. — From the Capital you will see that the fight of the English working class assumed more than once the character of a revolution, and that the governing classes only granted what they dared not refuse. If Massard and Co. thirst for fight, they will derive much satisfaction by a perusal of the history in England of the limitation of the working day! Apropos, as to the question of the fixation of a minimum salary, it may perhaps interest you to know that Papa did all he could to persuade Guesde to omit it from their programme,†68 explaining to him that such a measure, if adopted, would, according to economical laws, produce the result of making of this fixed minimum a maximum. But Guesde stuck to it, on the plea that it would give them a hold on the working classes if it did nothing else. Guesde, you see, is opportunist like the rest of them.†a

Page Break me46.474
Page me46.474
Papa is much surprised to see the want of judgment the French radical press is evincing in its treatment of General Farre who, he considers, acts like a man who knows that judged by his compéres,†b Cissey would be saved, qu'ils s'entendraient comme larrons en foire.†c If the Press by its foolish noise gets Farre revoked, Papa thinks they will have lost the best man in the Gambettist camp.
Page me46.474
I have not yet received the promised series of your articles. As I suppose I shall have to wait for some time before you carry out that good intention of yours, will you in the meantime, nay by return of post, send me your last article containing Bright's letter, ...†d

Page me46.474
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 34, Moscow, 1964

Reproduced from the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.475

5
JENNY MARX TO JENNY LONGUET
IN ARGENTEUIL
Page me46.475
London, 20 August 1881
41 Maitland Park Road, N.W.

My darling little Jenny,

Our trip went off wonderfully well, thanks to Helen's†a energy and circumspection. I still don't know how she managed to drag all the BAGS AND BAGGAGES about or to cart this old bundle of bones from place to place. At Folkestone she actually contrived to get hold of a SLEEPING COUPÉ in which we lay and slept like in our own beds. At Boulogne I sent you and Moor a telegram. Moor never got his. What is more, the ship only sailed at 6 o'clock so we didn't arrive here until 11. I came upon Moor and Tussy COSY in the PARLOUR. Tussy propped up with cushions on the sofa. Her crazy mode of life has left her in such a weak and feverish state that she can walk no better than I do. Radford has proved a faithful friend. He brought her JELLIES and DAINTIES every day, took her out in CABS, rushed in despair to Mrs Anderson who, in her stead, sent another lady WHO DID HER NOT MUCH GOOD. I trust the modern young Aesculapus [sic] will make an impression on her. Although I never ceased grieving for one moment at Argenteuil and left you IN TEARS AND SORROWS, the memory of you and your love and kindness remains nevertheless as the richest treasure of my heart, on which and I shall feed like a MISER. No more, *as I am poor even in thanks.
Page me46.475
Poor Longuet! He frightened me quite. He looked so ill and stared at me with such big eyes.
Page me46.475
The darling Harry and my poor Johnny. He will not much regret old granny.* I was so unjust to the dear child when he rushed about screeching — a peculiarity of childhood and part of its happiness.
Page me46.475
Adio.

Page Break me46.476
Page me46.476
Apropos: I only gave you 110 frs and the TICKETS are marked 70 per TICKET, so you had to make up the amount. THANKS AND KISSES TO ALL OF YOU FROM OLD GRANNY.

Page me46.476
First published in: Marx and Engels, Works, Second Russian Edition, Vol. 50, Moscow, 1981

Printed according to the original

Published in English for the first time

Page Break me46.477

NOTES AND INDEXES

Page Break me46.478
Page Break me46.479

NOTES
Page me46.479
†1 On 18 August 1879, in Ramsgate, Marx's daughter Jenny Longuet gave birth to a son, Edgar. — 3
Page me46.479
†2 The reference is to two trade unionists, Alexander Macdonald and Thomas Burt, who were elected to the House of Commons in 1874. — 3
Page me46.479
†3 Bimetallism, the practice of using both gold and silver as a monetary standard by specifying that both constitute legal tender at a fixed ratio to each other.
Page me46.479
This practice existed in a number of countries in the 18th and 19th centuries but did not meet the needs of developed commodity economy and went against the very nature of money as the only commodity which was to be a universal equivalent.
Page me46.479
Liebknecht quoted from this letter by Engels in his speech in the Saxon Landtag on 16 January 1880, opposing a return to bimetallism.
Page me46.479
Engels analysed the issue of bimetallism in some detail also in his letter to Eduard Bernstein of 10 May 1882 (see this volume, pp. 256-58). — 3, 256
Page me46.479
†4 A reference to Bismarck's visit to Austria in September 1879 and the Austro-German alliance concluded in Vienna on 7 October of that year. Art. 1 of the treaty stipulated that, should one of the contracting parties be attacked by Russia, the other was obliged to come to its aid. Art. 2 stated that, should one of the signatories be attacked by any other country, the other was to maintain benevolent neutrality. Should the aggressor have Russian support, Art. I was to apply. Concluded for a term of five years and later repeatedly extended, this treaty was the first in a series of agreements that ultimately led to the establishment of a military bloc headed by Germany and to a division of the European countries into two hostile camps that subsequently clashed in the First World War. — 4

Page me46.479

†5 The originals of this letter and that of 13 December 1879 (present edition, Vol. 45, p. 427) are kept in the family archive of Lord Walstone, who presented photocopies of them to the Institute of Marxism-Leninism in 1968. The addressee was Lord

Page Break me46.480

Walstone's father, the English archaeologist Charles Walstone, who held his father's surname, Waldstein, at the time. — 5

Page me46.480

†6 This letter is printed according to a handwritten copy made by an unknown person. Failing to decipher Marx's handwriting, he put `Kranz?' in square brackets after the addressee's name, Kraus. Also in square brackets and with a question mark is the word `proceeded'. The copy contains further notes made by the same person. — 6

Page me46.480

†7 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, Correspondence. 1846-1895. A Selection with Commentary and Notes, Martin Lawrence Ltd., London [1934]. — 7, 60, 320, 349, 394, 403, 410, 412, 445

Page me46.480

†8 A reference to the German Workers' Educational Society in London, which was founded in February 1840 by Karl Schapper, Joseph Moll and other leaders of the League of the Just. In 1847 and 1849-50 Marx and Engels took an active part in the Society's work, but on 17 September 1850 they and a number of their followers withdrew from it because the Willich-Schapper sectarian and adventurist faction had temporarily increased its influence in the Society. The subsequent weakening of the sectarians' influence made it possible for Marx and Engels to resume their work in the Educational Society late in 1850. When the International Working Men's Association was set up, the Society, with Friedrich Lessner as one of its leaders, became the German Section of the International in London.

Page me46.480

This letter deals with the differences of opinion associated with the need to work out a new tactics for the German Social-Democrats after the introduction of the Anti-Socialist Law in October 1878 (see Note 16). — 7, 72, 252, 333, 334, 356

Page me46.480

†9 At the Reichstag elections on 30 July 1878, shortly before the promulgation of the Anti-Socialist Law (see Note 16), the Social-Democrats won 437,158 votes. — 8

Page me46.480

†10 Despite the Anti-Socialist Law, most of the primary organisations continued to function, using every available legal opportunity to make known the proletariat's feelings and sentiments (e.g., a meeting held at the funeral of Wilhelm Bracke, one of the party leaders). The obstacles put up by the authorities, failed to stop the socialists from carrying out a major campaign to collect funds for the persons deported from Berlin, renewing the contacts lost in the initial confusion, and setting up illegal organisations. — 9

Page me46.480
†11 On behalf of the German Workers' Educational Society in London (see Note 8), H. Meyer invited Engels to its meeting of 27 March 1880, which was to discuss the Society's reorganisation. — 9
Page me46.480
†12 The real date of the letter, erroneously indicated by Bebel as 27 March 1880 in his letter to Engels of 22 September 1880, has been ascertained by the event mentioned in it, the Hamburg Reichstag elections on 27 April. In the second Russian edition of Marx's and Engels' Works and in Werke, the letter is dated early May 1880. — 10
Page me46.480
†13 In March-May 1880, the Reichstag debated the extension of the Anti-Socialist Law (see Note 16) until 1886. At the third reading of the Bill on 4 May, an ultra-'revolutionary' speech was made by the Social-Democratic deputy and former Lassallean Wilhelm Hasselmann, who sided with the Russian terrorists and the French anarchists and openly opposed the Social-Democrats' line. Der Sozialdemokrat (No.

Page Break me46.481
20, 16 May 1880) declared that Hasselmann had placed himself outside the party. By Bebel's `speech on the persecutions', Engels means the latter's speech in the Reichstag on 6 March, which was carried, in a slightly abridged form, by Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 11, 14 March 1880, under the heading `Polizei-Orgien in Berlin unter dem Belagerungszustand'. — 10
Page me46.481
†14 Engels is referring to the victory of the Social-Democratic candidate Georg Wilhelm Hartmann at the Reichstag elections in Hamburg on 27 April 1880. He obtained 13,155 votes out of the 23,231 cast. — 11
Page me46.481
†15 The National Liberals (die Nationalliberale Partei) was the party of the German, mostly Prussian, bourgeoisie, which emerged in the autumn of 1866 as a result of the split in the Party of Progress (see Note 256). The policy of National Liberals showed that a considerable section of the liberal bourgeoisie renounced claims to broader political rights and capitulated before Bismarck's Junker government. After the unification of Germany, the National Liberal Party acquired its final shape as a party of the big bourgeoisie, notably the industrial tycoons. — 11
Page me46.481
†16 The Exceptional Law against the Socialists (Gesetz gegen die gemeingefährlichen Bestrebungen der Sozialdemokratie — the Law against the Harmful and Dangerous Aspirations of Social-Democracy) was introduced by the Bismarck government, supported by the majority in the Reichstag, on 21 October 1878 to counter the socialist and workers' movement. Better known as the Anti-Socialist Law, it made the Social-Democratic Party of Germany illegal, banned all party and mass workers' organisations and suppressed the socialist and workers' press. Socialist literature was confiscated and the Social-Democrats subjected to reprisals. However, during its operation, the Social-

Democratic Party assisted by Marx and Engels uprooted both opportunist and `ultra-Left' elements and substantially strengthened its influence among the people. Under pressure from the mass workers' movement, the Anti-Socialist Law was abrogated on 1 October 1890. For Engels' assessment of the Law, see his article `Bismarck and the German Working Men's Party' (present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 407-09). — 11, 38, 40, 50, 127, 152, 153, 192, 209, 279, 281, 332, 349, 390, 395, 414, 430, 448
Page me46.481
†17 The British general elections, held between late March and mid-April 1880, produced a victory for the Liberals. They obtained 349 seats in the new Parliament as against 243 received by the Conservatives. Leadership of the Cabinet was assumed by Gladstone, who opposed the policy of rapprochement with Germany. — 11
Page me46.481
†18 Engels is referring to the events of the Danish War of 1864, in which Prussia and Austria were allies. After their victory over Denmark, Austria established its government in Holstein, and Prussia in Schleswig. But as a result of its defeat in the Austro-Prussian War which Bismarck unleashed in 1866 and the establishment of the North German Confederation, Austria lost all rights to Holstein, and Schleswig-Holstein became a Prussian province. — 12
Page me46.481
†19 This letter was published in English for the first time in: Frederick Engels, Paul and Laura Lafargue, Correspondence, Vol. I: 1868-1886, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1959. — 12, 27, 351
Page me46.481
†20 A reference to the introduction to the French edition of Engels' work Socialism: Utopian and Scientific, which appeared in Paris in 1880 in Paul Lafargue's translation under the title Socialisme utopique et socialisme scientifique. Engels produced the pamphlet

Page Break me46.482
at Lafargue's request, having rewritten three chapters of Anti-Dühring (Chapter I of the Introduction and chapters I and II of Part III) to form a popular work in its own right. It was first printed by the French socialist magazine La Revue socialiste, Nos. 3, 4 and 5, 1880, and then published, also in 1880, as a pamphlet. The French socialist Benoît Malon embarked on an introduction to it, but his effort was deemed unacceptable, and the introduction as it appeared was written by Marx, who had first consulted Engels (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 335-39). In the pamphlet, the introduction carried the signature of Lafargue, whom Marx requested to `polish the phrases, leaving the gist intact' (see this volume, p. 16). — 12, 332, 352, 369
Page me46.482
†21 Lassalle was Countess Sophie von Hatzfeldt's lawyer in her divorce case in 1846-54. — 15
Page me46.482
†22 On the reasons for Marx's and Engels' refusal in January 1861 to collaborate with Lassalle in the publication of a newspaper, see present edition, Vol. 41, pp. 252, 261 and 281-82. — 15
Page me46.482

†23 Marx wrote this on the last page of his introduction to the French edition of Engels' pamphlet (see Note 20). — 15
Page me46.482
†24 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Letters on `Capital', New Park Publications, London, 1983. — 16, 203, 432, 435
Page me46.482
†25 In a letter of 19 June 1880, the Dutch socialist Ferdinand Domela Nieuwenhuis requested Marx to look through a popular outline of Volume One of Capital he had written in Dutch. Nieuwenhuis' work, entitled Karl Marx. Kapitaal en Arbeid, appeared in The Hague in 1881. — 16
Page me46.482
†26 The book review column of the Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik (Erster Jahrgang. Zweite Hälfte, Zürich-Oberstrass, 1880) featured two reviews by Nieuwenhuis, one of Eduard von Hartmann's Die Phänomenologie des sittlichen Bewusstseins (Berlin, 1879), and the other, of Dr J.A. Levy's Engelsch Kathedersocialisme (Belinfanto, s' Gravenhage, 1879). — 16
Page me46.482
†27 The reference is to one of the notes to Chapter V of Volume One of Capital (see present edition, Vol. 35). In it, Marx replaced the term `price of production' with its synonym, `average price'. — 16
Page me46.482
†28 As Marx's principal economic work advanced, the plan and structure of Capital repeatedly changed. As of 1867, when Volume One appeared in print, Marx proposed to publish the work in three volumes of four books, with the second and third books making up the second volume (see present edition, Vol. 35). After Marx's death, Engels prepared for the press and published the manuscripts of the second and third books as volumes Two and Three. He died before he was able to publish the fourth and last book, Theories of Surplus Value (Volume Four of Capital). — 16
Page me46.482
†29 The reference is to Minna Gorbunova's letter to Engels written in the first half of July 1880. She said she wanted to use in Russia the already available experience, and asked Engels to recommend her books on vocational training in England. — 17
Page me46.482
†30 Between mid-August and 18 September 1880, Engels was on holiday in Ramsgate and Bridlington Quay. — 17, 23, 34, 35, 39
Page me46.482
†31 The reference is to the World Exhibition of 1878 in Paris. — 17

Page Break me46.483
Page me46.483
†32 Rue de Richelieu in Paris is the address of Bibliothéque nationale. — 17
Page me46.483
†33 The London-based book trading firm of Philip Stephen King specialised in the sale of government and parliamentary publications, statistical material, etc. Marx used its services between 1867 and 1882. He probably needed the book ordered in this letter for his work on Volume Two of Capital. — 19, 367

Page me46.483
†34 This letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Selected Correspondence, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1955. — 20
Page me46.483
†35 In her letter to Engels of 25 July 1880, Minna Gorbunova mentioned the Acts of Parliament on primary education of 1870, 1873 and 1876, as well as the Report of the Committee of the Council on Education 1878-1879. — 20
Page me46.483
†36 In her letter of 25 July 1880, Gorbunova wrote that she was shortly to return to Moscow and gave Engels her address: Toporov's House, Bolshaya Molchanovka St., Moscow. — 20
Page me46.483
†37 Zemstvos — local self-government bodies set up in a number of gubernias (gouvernements in the text) of European Russia under the Zemstvo Reform of 1864. It was an attempt to adapt the Russian autocratic system to the needs of capitalist development. — 20, 175
Page me46.483
†38 Marx and his family were on holiday in Ramsgate from early August to 13 September 1880. — 21, 24, 35, 46, 60
Page me46.483
†39 Gorbunova asked Engels for advice concerning vocational training in Russia. She asked him, in particular, about the ways `to avoid, while promoting vocational training in those industrial branches that are most adapted to big production, the advancement of factory production with its workers totally alienated from the land'. — 21
Page me46.483
†40 Obshchina (Commune) — a pre-capitalist spontaneously evolved social group of agricultural producers, who own or control their means of production. — 22
Page me46.483
†41 Artel — an association of small producers in pre-revolutionary Russia engaged in joint economic activity (carpentry, fishing, masonry, wood-cutting, agriculture, etc.). — 22
Page me46.483
†42 The Editors are not in possession of John Swinton's letter to which Marx is replying. — 22
Page me46.483
†43 Marx met John Swinton, then responsible editor of the New York Sun, in Ramsgate in August 1880. Swinton published an account of the interview Marx granted him in The Sun on 6 September 1880 (see Vol. 24, pp. 583-85), and in the collection Current Views and Notes of Forty Days in France and England, New York, 1880. — 23, 40, 77
Page me46.483

†44 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx, F. Engels, V.I. Lenin, The Communist View on Morality, Novosti Press Agency Publishing House, Moscow, 1974. — 23
Page me46.483
†45 On 18 March 1876, the German socialist Ferdinand Lingenau, who had emigrated to the United States, bequeathed about $7,000, half of his fortune, to the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany. He appointed August Bebel, Johann Philipp Becker, Wilhelm Bracke, August Geib, Wilhelm Liebknecht and Karl Marx his executors. After Lingenau's death on 4 August 1877 in St Louis (Missouri) they tried to have the money bequeathed to the party transferred to its funds, and gave Sorge power of attorney. Sorge wrote to Marx on 13 August 1880 that he would have to drop the matter if he did not get hold of some money to continue with it. Bismarck ultimately managed to prevent Lingenau's legacy being credited to the Social-Democratic Party's funds. — 24, 99

Page Break me46.484
Page me46.484
†46 The reference is to the suspension, in August 1880, owing to the shortage of funds, of the publication of the French newspaper L'Égalité, to which Paul Lafargue had been contributing. — 24, 27
Page me46.484
†47 The reference is to the piece on Marx's activities and works written by Hazeltine, a staff member on The Sun. — 24
Page me46.484
†48 Marx's ironic reference to Douai's article in the New Yorker Volkszeitung sent to Engels by Sorge on 13 August 1880. — 25
Page me46.484
†49 This letter was published in English for the first time in: Friedrich Engels, Paul et Laura Lafargue, Correspondance, Vol. I, Ed. Sociales, Paris, 1956. — 25
Page me46.484
†50 Engels wrote this letter on the same sheet of paper as one to Laura Lafargue of the same date.
Page me46.484
This letter was published in English for the first time in: Frederick Engels, Paul and Laura Lafargue, Correspondence, Vol. I: 1868-1886, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1959. — 26
Page me46.484
†51 This probably refers to the Lafargues' plan to set up a commercial business to earn their living (see this volume, pp. 27-29). — 26
Page me46.484
†52 The Editors are not in possession of Engels' letter to Paul Lafargue of 7 September 1880. — 27
Page me46.484
†53 Part of this letter was quoted by Nikolai Danielson in the preface to the first Russian edition of Volume Two of Capital, St Petersburg, 1885. — 30
Page me46.484

†54 The address on the envelope containing this letter was written in Eleanor Marx's hand: N. Danielson. Société du Crédit mutuel, Pont de Kazan, maison Lessnikoff, St Petersburg, Russia. — 30
Page me46.484
†55 On 21 August (2 September) 1880, Danielson requested Marx to write an article on Russia's post-reform economy for a Russian magazine. — 30
Page me46.484
†56 This refers to the article `Ocherki nawego poreformennago obshchestvennago hozyajstva' (`Sketches of Our Post-Reform Social Economy') Danielson published in the Slovo in October 1880 under the pen-name Nikolai — on. — 31, 61
Page me46.484
†57 A reference to the world economic crisis which began in 1873 and particularly affected the United States and Germany. In the late 1870s, it spread to Britain. — 31
Page me46.484
†58 Almost all of this letter is in English, with the exception of the few paragraphs in French. It was published in English in full for the first time in: Frederick Engels, Paul and Laura Lafargue, Correspondence, Vol. I: 1868-1886, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1959. — 32
Page me46.484
†59 The reference is to the draft rules of Grant's firm in which Paul Lafargue planned to be a partner (see Note 51). — 32
Page me46.484
†60 Liebknecht visited Marx and Engels in London in the last ten days of September 1880. (Bebel was unable to come.) They discussed the stance of the party's printed organ Der Sozialdemokrat (Zurich) during the operation of the Anti-Socialist Law.

Page Break me46.485
Page me46.485
The Institute of Marxism-Leninism does not have Engels' letter to Liebknecht mentioned here. — 35, 38, 42, 50
Page me46.485
†61 This is a reply to an undated letter of Dr Ferdinand Fleckles who had enclosed a medical form to be filled in by Jenny Marx. Marx wrote it on the front of the form. Jenny's description of her illness is on the back. — 36
Page me46.485
†62 The letter to Eugen Oswald is in German, and that to the unknown correspondent, in English. The latter is the response to Kaulitz's request for a letter of recommendation for a teaching post. — 36
Page me46.485
†63 The French translation of Volume One of Capital was prepared by Joseph Roy. Marx made substantial changes in and additions to the manuscript. For this reason, he maintained that, like the German original, the French edition had a scientific significance of its own. In conformity with the French edition, changes were introduced into the subsequent editions of Capital in German, Russian and other languages.
Page me46.485

The publication was undertaken by Maurice Lachâtre, a French journalist and publisher. The book was printed by the Lahure press in Paris. Under the contract signed by Marx and Lachâtre, Capital was to come out in instalments, 44 in all, 16 printed pages each. The work was printed in two instalments at a time, but was sold in series of five instalments each, which made nine series in all. Publication was begun in September 1872 and completed in November 1875.
Page me46.485

Having received a copy of Capital from Marx, Swinton wrote to him on 7 December 1880: `A thousand thanks for the great work Capital which I shall have bound handsomely, and keep as a treasure through life.' — 40, 42
Page me46.485
†64 Marx is probably referring to the outcome of the second Anglo-Afghan War of 1878-80. The staunch resistence of the Afghans forced Britain to abandon its plans to conquer and partition the country, and made it reach a compromise with Khan Abdur Rahman. The period also witnessed an aggravation of the situation in British-annexed Transvaal, where a Boer uprising flared up in mid-December 1880. — 40
Page me46.485
†65 A reference to the so-called local state of siege declared by Bismarck in Berlin and its environs on 28 November 1878 on the strength of Para. 28 of the Anti-Socialist Law (see Note 16) and extended to Hamburg, its environs and the adjacent Prussian territories (see also Note 198) on 29 October 1880. Under it, meetings could be held only with police permission, distribution of printed matter in public places was prohibited, persons considered politically unreliable were deported, and the right to own, carry, import and pass on arms was withdrawn or restricted. — 41, 43, 152
Page me46.485
†66 This letter was first published in English in: Science and Society, Vol. II, No. 2, New York, 1938. — 40
Page me46.485
†67 The Alliance of Socialist Democracy was founded by Mikhail Bakunin in Geneva in October 1868 as an international anarchist organisation. In 1869 the Alliance approached the General Council of the International Working Men's Association with a request to be admitted to the International. The General Council agreed to admit individual sections of the Alliance provided the latter dissolved as an independent organisation. On entering the International, Bakunin did not actually comply with this decision and incorporated the Alliance into it under the guise of a section (called `the Alliance of Socialist Democracy. Central Section'). Marx, Engels and the General Council fought the Alliance, exposing it as a sect hostile to the working-class movement (for details, see present edition, Vol. 23). The Hague Congress of the International (1872) dealt a severe blow at the anarchists and expelled the Alliance's leaders Mikhail Bakunin and James Guillaume from the International. — 43, 181, 190, 333, 341, 370, 408

Page Break me46.486

Page me46.486
†68 A reference to the Programme électoral des travailleurs socialistes, the preamble to which was dictated by Marx to Jules Guesde (see present edition, Vol. 24, p. 340). The theoretical part was followed by a minimum programme incorporating an economic and a political section. The election programme was widely discussed at workers' meetings and adopted as the official programme of the French Workers' Party (see Note 195) at its national congress in Le Havre in November 1880. — 43, 148, 342, 386, 447, 474

Page me46.486
†69 From 1874, Charles Longuet taught French at King's College, and Jenny Longuet, German at the Clement Dun school. — 45, 61
Page me46.486
†70 A reference to the Executive Committee of the Narodnaya Volya (People's Will) group, a revolutionary Narodnik (Populist) organisation formed in August 1879, when the secret revolutionary society Zemlya i Volya (Land and Freedom) split into Narodnaya Volya and Chorny Peredel (the Black or General Redistribution). The founders of the Narodnaya Volya were professional revolutionaries, advocates of a political campaign against the autocracy. — 44, 83
Page me46.486
†71 Marx means the Programme of the Executive Committee of the Narodnaya Volya (St Petersburg, 22 March 1880). Marx had a copy of this edition. — 45
Page me46.486
†72 This letter was published in English for the first time in: The Letters of Karl Marx, selected and translated with explanatory notes and an introduction by Saul K. Padover, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979. — 48, 107, 118, 159, 164, 169, 184, 198, 202, 213, 216, 225, 233, 245, 248, 253, 255, 261, 266, 270, 271, 272, 277, 290, 303, 317, 338, 339, 364, 371, 392, 398, 409, 417, 420, 424, 426
Page me46.486
†73 In a letter of 14 September 1880 from Mantua, Achille Loria asked Marx to find him a job as a writer or journalist in London, and inquired whether Marx would take him on as secretary. — 48
Page me46.486
†74 In late November 1879, Achille Loria sent Marx an advance copy of his book La rendita fondiaria e la sua elisione naturale, Milan, 1880. — 48
Page me46.486
†75 The Editors are not in possession of the original of this letter, which is reprinted from Hyndman's book The Record of an Adventurous Life. — 49
Page me46.486
†76 The controversy between the General Council and the bourgeois radical Charles Bradlaugh arose after the latter's attacks on Marx in a public lecture in London on 11 December 1871, and in his letter to The Eastern Post (16 December). At the General Council meeting of 19 December, Marx drew attention to the close connection between Bradlaugh's statements and the campaign of persecution unleashed against the International by the ruling quarters and the bourgeois press, which became especially fierce after the International issued the address `The Civil War in France' in June 1871. Marx replied to Bradlaugh in a series of statements featured by The Eastern Post (see present edition, Vol. 23, pp. 71-73). — 52

Page Break me46.487
Page me46.487

†77 Bradlaugh nominated himself as a candidate at the elections, contributed to the press under the pen-name Iconoclast and hoped to be elected to the House of Commons in 1874 (St Stephen's in Westminster had been the seat of the House of Commons since 1547). — 53
Page me46.487
†78 This letter was probably sent by Marx to the London bookseller Philip Stephen King (see Note 33). — 55
Page me46.487
†79 A fragment of this letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx, F. Engels, On Malthus, People's Publishing House, Delhi, 1956. — 56
Page me46.487
†80 In his letter of 4 December 1880, Kautsky asked Engels to comment on his book Der Einfluss der Volksvermehrung auf den Fortschritt der Gesellschaft, Vienna, 1880. He sent a copy to Engels in December 1880 through Bernstein. Kautsky wrote that he was coming to London for a few months in order to meet Engels and Marx personally. He arrived in London in March 1881 and met Engels on several occasions. — 56
Page me46.487
†81 Engels is referring to the first separate German edition of Anti-Dühring, which appeared in Leipzig in 1878 (see present edition, Vol. 25, pp. 196-97). — 56
Page me46.487
†82 Armchair socialists (Kathedersozialisten) — followers of a trend in bourgeois socialism that emerged in Germany in the 1860s-70s. In 1873, its champions (Gustav Schmoller, Adolph Wagner and Lujo Brentano) set up a society called Verein für Sozialpolitik which had its own printed organ, Schriften des Vereins für Sozialpolitik. Armchair socialists supported Bismarck's social policy, advocated class harmony and opposed the workers' revolutionary action. — 56, 65, 416, 449, 453
Page me46.487
†83 By 1881, A.E.F. Schäffle had the following works printed: Das gesellschaftliche System der menschlichen Wirtschaft, Tübingen, 1873, in two volumes; Die Quintessenz des Socialismus, Gotha, 1875; Bau und Leben des socialen Körpers, Tübingen, 1875-78, in four volumes; Enzyklopädie der Staatslehre, Tübingen, 1878; Grundsätze der Steuerpolitik, Tübingen, 1880. — 57
Page me46.487
†84 On page 169 of his book, Kautsky refers to Leonhard Euler's calculation, according to which the doubling of the Earth's population may theoretically occur in less than 12 years. — 57
Page me46.487
†85 A reference to the state of siege declared on 26 September 1848 in Cologne by the Prussian authorities. Its consequence was the suppression of the Neue Rheinische Zeitung until 12 October 1848. — 59
Page me46.487
†86 On Engels' advice, this poem by Georg Weerth was reprinted by Der Sozialdemokrat on 11 August 1881. The title, `Ein Sozialistenfresser aus dem Jahre 1848', was to mirror that of Ludwig Börne's well-known lampoon `Menzel der Franzosenfresser', Paris, 1837. — 59
Page me46.487

†87 Engels is referring to the first of the two essays entitled `Die zehn Gebote' carried by Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 5, 30 January 1881, which exposed the Prussian kings' policy of robbing the people, and to Eduard Bernstein's article `Ein Gedenktag', printed under the pen-name Leo in Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 4, 23 January 1881, on the 88th anniversary of the execution of Louis XVI. — 59
Page me46.487
†88 This is Marx's reply to the letter by the young English mathematician Carl Pearson of 9 February 1881. Pearson, who was at that time a supporter of the working-class movement, believed that the situation in England favoured the dissemination of socialist ideas, and asked Marx to entrust him with the translation of Volume One of Capital.

Page Break me46.488
Page me46.488
The meeting scheduled for 17 February did not take place. The day before, Pearson let Marx know that the appointed time was inconvenient for him.
Page me46.488
There is another letter from Pearson to Marx, dated 11 April 1881, from which it emerges that Marx and Pearson failed to reach an agreement concerning the translation.
Page me46.488
Volume One of Capital was translated into English by Samuel Moore and Edward Aveling and appeared in print in 1887. — 60
Page me46.488
†89 A reference to the publications of official documents by the governments of various countries, which Marx called the Blue Books after the publications of the British Parliament. — 61, 471, 472
Page me46.488
†90 Marx is referring to the manuscript of Paul Lafargue's essay the Russian translation of which `Dvizhenie pozemel'noj sobstvennosti vo Frantsii' (`The Movement of Land Property in France') was published in the monthly Ustoi (Principles), Nos. 3-4 and 6, 1882. — 61
Page me46.488
†91 Marx is referring to the promise of the Slovo (Slovo) editors `to return to the subject of the article' (on Danielson's article, see Note 56) `in one of the magazine's later issues' (Slovo, October 1880, p. 142, editorial note). However, Danielson's article was never mentioned again. — 62
Page me46.488
†92 Degeneration. A Chapter in Darwinism (London, 1880), a work by Edwin Ray Lankester, appeared in Russian translation in St Petersburg in 1883 under the title Vyrozhdenie. Glava iz teorii razvitiya (darvinisma). — 64
Page me46.488
†93 A copy of Janson's book was sent to Marx by Danielson, as is clear from his letter of 24 February (8 March) 1881.
Page me46.488

The notebooks with excerpts and synopses from Russian books and other sources on Russia filled in by Marx in January-February and May-June 1881 contain excerpts from this book. — 64
Page me46.488
†94 The address on the envelope containing this letter was written in Eleanor Marx's hand: N. Danielson, Société du Crédit mutuel, Pont de Kazan, maison Lessnikoff, St Petersburg, Russia. — 64
Page me46.488
†95 This letter was published in English for the first time in: International Press Correspondence, Berlin, 1931, No. 13, II-III, Special Number. — 65
Page me46.488
†96 This refers to Ferdinand Domela Nieuwenhuis' work Karl Marx. Kapitaal en Arbeid (see Note 25). The second edition of the book appeared in 1889. — 65
Page me46.488
†97 The dedication read: `To Karl Marx, the bold thinker, the noble fighter for the rights of the proletariat, this book is dedicated by the author as a token of respectful esteem.' — 65
Page me46.488
†98 Mannen van beteekenis in onze dagen (The Outstanding Men of Our Day) — a book series published in Haarlem in 1870-82. The tenth volume of the series, edited by N.C. Balsem, contained a biography of Marx written by Arnold Kerdijk. — 65
Page me46.488
†99 Marx's polemic with Lujo Brentano was set off by the latter's article in the Berlin magazine Concordia, No. 10, 7 March 1872. Brentano, who had the article published anonymously, tried to discredit Marx as a scholar by accusing him of scientific incompetence and deliberate misquotation of the sources he used. When on 1 June 1872 Der Volksstaat carried Marx's reply (see present edition, Vol. 23, pp. 164-67), Concordia (No. 27, 4 July) responded with another article by Brentano (also anonymous) to which Marx replied in Der Volksstaat, No. 63, 7 August 1872 (see present edition, Vol. 23, pp. 190-97). After Marx's death, the campaign of slander launched by Brentano was taken up by the British bourgeois economist Sedley Taylor, who was exposed by Engels in June 1890 in the preface to the fourth German edition of Volume One of Capital and in 1891 in the pamphlet `In the Case of Brentano versus Marx' (see present edition, Vol. 27, pp. 95-176). In the section of the pamphlet called `Documents' Engels reproduced both of Marx's letters to Der Volksstaat. — 65

Page Break me46.489
Page me46.489
†100 This refers to the International Socialist Congress to be convened in Switzerland on the initiative of Belgian socialists to discuss the establishment of a new International. The congress took place not in Zurich (the Zurich cantonal council forbade it), but in Chur between 2 and 4 October 1881. It was attended by delegates of socialist parties from 12 countries. The congress decided against forming a new International.
Page me46.489
In his letter to Marx of 6 January 1881 Nieuwenhuis expressed the intention of the Dutch Social Democrats to discuss at the congress the laws to be passed immediately in the political and economic fields by the socialists should they come to power. — 66

Page me46.489
†101 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: Marx and Engels, Ireland and the Irish Question, Progress Publishers, Moscow, 1971. The end of the letter is not extant. — 67
Page me46.489
†102 Albert Regnard, a French writer and historian, wrote to Marx's daughter Jenny Longuet in connection with his articles on Irish history (they have not been found) because her contributions on Ireland to the French newspaper La Marseillaise in 1870 (see present edition, Vol. 21, pp. 414-41) had found recognition among the readers. — 67
Page me46.489
†103 Scotch Covenanters — the signers and adherents of the National Covenant, a religious and political alliance proclaimed in Scotland in 1638 after the successful uprising of 1637 against Charles I's absolutist government. Rallying round the banner of the Presbyterian (Calvinist) Church against `Popedom', the signatories of the Covenant fought for Scotland's national autonomy. The Covenanters' war against Charles I brought forward the outbreak of the bourgeois revolution in England. — 68
Page me46.489
†104 Ireland — English Vendée; Vendée — a department in Western France, the centre of a largely peasant-based royalist uprising during the French Revolution. The word Vendée came to denote counter-revolution. — 68
Page me46.489
†105 Adventurers — in the 16th and 17th centuries, a name for members of the English commercial and financial bourgeoisie, partners in colonial and merchant companies, profiteers and bankers, who financed risky but potentially very lucrative colonial and other ventures. The name derived from the Merchant Adventurers, a trading company. — 69

Page Break me46.490
Page me46.490
†106 The Long Parliament (1640-53) — the English Parliament which was convened by Charles I and became the constituent body of the English Revolution. — 69
Page me46.490
†107 The Penal Laws (or Code) were introduced by the English colonialists in Ireland in the late 17th and the first half of the 18th century under the pretext of a need to combat Catholic conspiracies and the enemies of the Anglican Church. To all practical purposes, the laws deprived the Irish, who were mostly Catholic, of all political and civil rights: restricted the right of inheritance, and of acquisition and alienation of property; introduced the practice of confiscating property; established onerous terms of lease for Catholic peasants, which aggravated their bondage to English landlords and land agents; banned Irish national schools; imposed harsh penalties on teachers, Irish Catholic priests, etc. It was not until the late 18th century that the growing national liberation movement in Ireland forced the authorities to abrogate a significant part of the penal laws. — 69
Page me46.490

†108 A reference to the subsidies granted to the Irish Catholic College opened in the town of Maynooth in 1795. Pitt's government tried to use the foundation of the College to win over the Catholic clergy and the leading stratum of the Irish bourgeoisie in order to split the Irish national movement. — 69
Page me46.490
†109 The Anglo-Irish Union came into force on 1 January 1801 and deprived Ireland of the last remnants of parliamentary autonomy (the Irish Parliament was disbanded and Irish M.P.s received a number of seats in the British Parliament, where they were in the minority). — 69, 286
Page me46.490
†110 The system of national schools — a reference to the school reform of 1831 introduced by the then Chief Secretary for Ireland Stanley (Lord Derby). Henceforth, joint schools were set up for Catholic and Protestant children and only religious subjects were taught separately. — 70
Page me46.490
†111 Marx's letter to Zasulich, which became known to many Russian revolutionary Marxists, including Georgi Plekhanov, was preceded by several drafts, which are included in Volume 24 of the present edition.
Page me46.490
The letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Selected Correspondence, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1955. — 71
Page me46.490
†112 Marx is probably referring to the request that he write a book on the Russian village commune made by the revolutionary Narodnik Nikolai Morozov in December 1880 on behalf of the Executive Committee of Narodnaya Volya (see Note 70). — 71
Page me46.490
†113 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Selected Correspondence, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1955. — 73, 196, 250, 256, 341, 430
Page me46.490
†114 A reference to Engels' article `Du sollst nicht ehebrechen' which remained unpublished. See MEGA2, Bd. 1/25, S. 213-14. — 73
Page me46.490
†115 Engels is rewording a well-known phrase that belongs to Jeanne Antoinette Poisson, Marquise de Pompadour, usually ascribed to Louis XV, `aprés nous le déluge'. — 73
Page me46.490
†116 Engels proceeds to critically analyse the views of A.E.F. Schäffle, which the latter set forth in the book here mentioned. — 74

Page Break me46.491
Page me46.491
†117 The Overseas Trade Society (Seehandlung) — a merchant and credit company founded in Prussia in 1772. It enjoyed a number of major state privileges and granted large loans to the government, acting, in fact, as its banker and broker. In 1904, it was officially transformed into the Prussian State Bank. — 74

Page me46.491
†118 An allusion to the indecision displayed in tactical issues by the Social-Democratic leaders in Germany after the introduction of the Anti-Socialist Law (see Note 16). Their wavering was reflected in Liebknecht's speech in the Reichstag on 17 March 1879 on the introduction of the so-called local state of siege in Berlin and its environs (see Note 65), and that in the Saxon Landtag on 17 February 1880 on the elections in Chemnitz's No. 1 constituency. Liebknecht stated in the Reichstag that the Social-Democratic Party would abide by the Anti-Socialist Law, being a party of reform in the proper sense of the word, and opposed a `violent' revolution as nonsense. In the Provincial Diet, he said that since the Social-Democratic Party of Germany was taking part in the elections to the legislative bodies, it was not a party advocating the overthrow of the government. — 75, 203
Page me46.491
†119 In February-March 1881, by decision of the Wyden Congress (see Note 418) of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany, Friedrich Wilhelm Fritzsche and Louis Viereck visited the United States. Engels, who disapproved of the trip, wrote: `...this much is certain — no amount of American money will make good the damage that will infallibly be done if, after the manner of Fritzsche and Viereck, the emissaries again water down the party's viewpoint into a semblance of vulgar democracy and homespun philistinism' (see present edition, Vol. 47, letter to August Bebel of 18 January 1884). — 75, 99, 447
Page me46.491
†120 An attempt on William I's life was made on 2 June 1878 by the German anarchist Karl Eduard Nobiling, who fired from a sporting rifle loaded with small shot. This attempted assassination, as well as that by apprentice E.M. Hödel on 11 May 1878, served as a convenient excuse for Bismarck to demand that the Reichstag pass the Exceptional Law against the Socialists (see Note 16). — 75, 175, 209, 288, 448
Page me46.491
†121 In December 1880, the British Prime Minister Gladstone declared that he intended to submit to Parliament a new bill on the state of emergency in Ireland (see Note 123). This prompted the Left wing of the Irish Land League (see Note 139) to urge the peasants to refuse payment of land rent. The more resolute section of the revolutionary democrats believed this would be a prologue to a long-expected armed uprising. — 75
Page me46.491
†122 This may refer to the resolution passed by the House of Commons on 3 February 1881 introducing a new procedure in the British Parliament. Seeking to combat the obstructionist tactics of the Irish opposition in the House of Commons, which made it impossible to get a coercion bill for Ireland (see Note 123) passed by Parliament, Gladstone proposed a resolution granting the Speaker the right to interrupt any M.P. at any point and to expel him from the House. — 75, 84
Page me46.491
†123 The Coercion Bills were passed by the British Parliament several times throughout the 19th century in order to suppress the revolutionary and national liberation movement in Ireland. In early 1881, the House of Commons passed two bills introducing exceptional laws in Ireland. They declared a state of emergency there and assigned troops to evict tenants refusing to pay rent. — 75, 84, 172

Page Break me46.492
Page me46.492
†124 The Irish Land Bill was debated in Parliament from late 1880, but did not become law until 22 August 1881 (an Act to further amend the law relating to the occupation and ownership of land in Ireland and for other purposes relating thereto). The new Act somewhat restricted the high-handed practices of the English landlords with respect to their tenant farmers. Landlords lost the right to evict tenants provided the latter paid the rent on time, and the amount of rent payable was fixed for 15 years. Although the Land Bill gave the landlords a chance to sell land to the state at a profit, and the fixed rent remained very high, the English landlords opposed the Bill, seeking to maintain their undivided rule. — 75, 84, 86
Page me46.492
†125 Engels is replying to Johann Philipp Becker's letter of 24 March 1881 in which the latter thanked him for the help he had received in October 1880. — 76
Page me46.492
†126 The reference is to a meeting in the United States at the time of Fritzsche's and Viereck's stay there (see Note 119).
Page me46.492
A report on the meeting held in Boston on 6 March 1881 was printed by Der Sozialdemokrat, Nos. 13 and 16, 27 March and 17 April 1881. — 77
Page me46.492
†127 German democratic emigrants, including members of the German gymnastic clubs, took an active part in the American Civil War of 1861-65 on the side of the North. In 1861, German emigrants residing not far from St Louis joined the Northerners' detachments and prevented Governor D. Jackson from handing the town over to the South.
Page me46.492
German gymnastic clubs — organisations of German democratic emigrants, including workers, set up in the USA by participants in the 1848-49 revolution. At a congress in Philadelphia on 5 October 1850, the gymnastic clubs joined together to form a Socialist Gymnastic Association (Sozialistischer Turnverein), which maintained contacts with German workers' organisations in America. — 77
Page me46.492
†128 A reference to the assassination of Emperor Alexander II of Russia on 1 (13) March 1881 by decision of the Executive Committee of Narodnaya Volya. On this organisation, see Note 70. — 78, 127
Page me46.492
†129 Most's article `Endlich!' on the assassination of Alexander II was carried by Die Freiheit, No. 12, 19 March 1881. On 30 March, Most was arrested in London, tried on 4 May and sentenced in June to 16 months' imprisonment and forced labour for the written defence, in a foreign language, of a political assassination. — 78, 80, 81, 83
Page me46.492
†130 On behalf of the board of the German Workers' Educational Society in London (see Note 8) Gottlieb Lemcke invited Engels to the opening ceremony of the Society's new club-house at 49 Tottenham Street, Tottenham Court Road, London, W. — 79

Page me46.492
†131 This is Engels' reply to Johann Philipp Becker's letter of 30 March 1881. — 80
Page me46.492
†132 On 30 and 31 March 1881 the German Reichstag debated the report of the Prussian government and the Hamburg Senate on the introduction of the `local state of siege' in Berlin and Hamburg-Altona (see Note 65). — 80
Page me46.492
†133 This letter was published in English for the first time in: The Labour Monthly, London, 1931, Vol. 13, No. 7. — 81
Page me46.492
†134 The Dogberry club (after a character in Shakespeare's Much Ado about Nothing) was a jocular name for the gatherings at the Marxs' of the family members, Engels and other friends — devotees of Shakespeare's work. — 82

Page Break me46.493
Page me46.493
†135 In 1874, Henri Rochefort, a French journalist, writer and politician exiled from France after the defeat of the Paris Commune, found himself in Geneva, where he contacted Russian political refugees. The Executive Committee of the Narodnaya Volya (see Note 70) sent him a letter requesting him to assist the Committee's agent Lev Hartmann in organising a propaganda campaign against the tsarist government. Judging by Marx's letter, it was this letter that Rochefort reprinted in his newspaper (the Institute of Marxism-Leninism does not have the copy of Intransigeant at its disposal). The publication caused Russian refugees in Geneva to voice their protest at an open meeting. The statement that they were breaking off all contacts with Rochefort appeared in Die Freiheit on 26 March 1881. — 82
Page me46.493
†136 The trial of the Narodnaya Volya (see Note 70) members, notably Andrei Zhelyabov, Sofia Perovskaya, Nikolai Rysakov, Timofei Mikhailov, Nikolai Kibalchich and Gesya Gelfman, who took part in the assassination of Alexander II on 1 (13) March 1881, was held on 26-29 March (7-10 April) 1881. All of them, except Gelfman, were sentenced on 29 March to death by hanging and executed on 3 (15) April. In Gelfman's case, on account of her pregnancy the sentence was commuted to penal labour for life; she died in prison on 1 February 1882. — 83
Page me46.493
†137 Over 3,000 people perished and more than 1,000 were injured in the earthquake on the island of Chios on 3-11 April 1881. The town of Chios and the neighbouring villages were almost totally destroyed. — 83
Page me46.493
†138 The Arms Act (Peace Preservation Act) declared bearing arms without a permit to be a breach of the peace liable to punishment by the courts. On 18 March 1881, the operation of the Act was extended to Ireland. — 84
Page me46.493
†139 The Irish Land League — a mass organisation set up in October 1879 by the revolutionary democrat Michael Davitt. It embraced mostly peasants and urban poor and enjoyed the support of the progressive elements of the Irish bourgeoisie. The League's agrarian programme expressed the spontaneous protest of the Irish people against the landlords' rule and national oppression. However, some of its leaders attempted to reduce its activities to the campaign for Home Rule, that is, limited autonomy of Ireland within the framework of the British Empire, and did not go so far as to demand the abolition of the English landlords' rule. In 1881, the Land League was banned by the British government but, to all practical purposes, continued to exist up to the late 1880s. — 84, 286

Page me46.493

†140 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: Marx and Engels, Ireland and the Irish Question, Progress Publishers, Moscow, 1971. — 85, 156, 171, 191

Page me46.493

†141 Engels is referring to the Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Reichstags that included the speeches made by Ignaz Auer and August Bebel on 30 and 31 March 1881 on the subject of the `local state of siege' in Berlin and Hamburg, and Bebel's speech on the Workers' Accident Insurance Bill delivered on 4 April 1881 (see notes 65 and 144). The shorthand report was sent by Bernstein to London before 28 April. — 85

Page me46.493

†142 From mid-November 1880, Wilhelm Liebknecht served six months in the Leipzig prison for the speech he had made at a workers' meeting in Chemnitz. — 86

Page Break me46.494

Page me46.494

†143 This probably refers to the Act to Consolidate and Amend the Statute Law of England and Ireland relating to Offences against the Person passed by the British Parliament in 1861.

Page me46.494

On Most's conviction, see Note 129. — 86

Page me46.494

†144 The reference is to the Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Reichstags. 4. Legislaturperiode. IV. Session 1881, Vol. I, Berlin, 1881 (see Note 141). The Workers' Accident Insurance Bill was part of Bismarck's so-called labour legislation. It provided for the establishment of an Imperial Accident Insurance Bank. Two-thirds of the insurance expenses were to be incurred by the employers, and one-third, by the workers; those who earned 750 marks a year or less were to have their contributions paid by the Treasury. Bebel subjected the Bill to well-substantiated and sharp criticism and demanded that the workers' accident insurance be wholly financed by the employers. The Bill was passed by the Reichstag on 27 June 1884. Bebel's speeches were also printed by Der Sozialdemokrat, Nos. 16-22, 17 April-29 May 1881.

Page me46.494

On the state of siege, see Note 65. — 87, 353, 386

Page me46.494

†145 Engels is alluding to Robert Victor von Puttkamer's speech in the Reichstag on 30 March 1881 in which he accused the Social-Democrats of preparing to stage acts of terrorism and referred to Most's article (see Note 129), where the address `brothers' was used on repeated occasions. — 88

Page me46.494
†146 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: Le Monde moderne et la femme d'aujourd'hui, Vol. I, Paris, 1908. — 89
Page me46.494
†147 Marx and his family lived not far from Maitland Park, at 41 Maitland Park Road. The street was crossed by Southampton Road, named probably after Lord Southampton. — 89
Page me46.494
†148 A reference to one of the terms of the Irish Land Bill of 1881, which became law on 22 August 1881 (see Note 124). — 90
Page me46.494
†149 The radical leader Georges Clemenceau criticised the government of J. Ferry when France launched a military expedition against Tunisia in April-May 1881. Clemenceau accused the government of wasting money on military ventures that only weakened France. He explained his accusations by the fact that the conquest of `uncivilised' nations was undermining the moral prestige of the French. — 92
Page me46.494
†150 This note, and Engels' letter to Sorge that follows, were printed in The New-York Herald as part of the interview given by Sorge to the newspaper correspondent at the request of the editors on the occasion of the Russian revolutionary Narodnik Lev Hartmann's arrival in New York from London in June 1881. — 94
Page me46.494
†151 Bank Holidays in Great Britain — the six public holidays on which banks are closed. — 95
Page me46.494
†152 The protest meeting against the Coercion Bills for Ireland (see Note 123), which took place in Hyde Park on 5 June 1881, passed a resolution which held the British government responsible for the difficult position of the Irish people, demanded that the eviction of tenants who had failed to pay their rent be stopped, the arrested leaders of the Land League (see Note 139) be released, and that the Secretary of State for Ireland William Forster, who ruthlessly suppressed the national liberation movement there, resign. A long speech at the meeting was made by Charles Stewart Parnell, who censured Forster's activities in Ireland. — 95

Page Break me46.495
Page me46.495
†153 This rumour was based on an episode in the Narodnaya Volya organisation's fight against the autocracy.
Page me46.495
Sofia Perovskaya and Lev Hartmann, posing as husband and wife, took a flat in the house from which a tunnel was dug to the Moscow-Kursk railway line as part of a plan to blow up the tsar's train. The attempt, undertaken on 19 November 1879, was abortive. Perovskaya also helped with the preparations for the assassination of Alexander II, which was carried out on 1 March 1881, and was arrested shortly afterwards.

Page me46.495

On Perovskaya's execution, see Note 136. — 96

Page me46.495

†154 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: Justice (London), No. 441, 25 June 1892. — 98

Page me46.495

†155 Napoléon le petit — a nickname given by Victor Hugo to Louis Bonaparte in his speech at the meeting of the French Legislative Assembly in 1851; gained wide currency after Hugo's lampoon Napoléon le Petit appeared in print in 1852. — 100

Page me46.495

†156 Anti-Renters — in the 1830s and 1840s, land tenants in the State of New York who refused to pay rent to the big landowners and demanded that the farms be sold to them. The Anti-Renters offered armed resistance to the rent collectors. The greatest unrest took place between 1839 and 1845. The campaign against the landowners ended in a compromise: from 1846, they gradually began to sell land to tenants. — 101

Page me46.495

†157 Marx is probably referring to Henry George's article `The Kearney Agitation in California' carried by The Popular Science Monthly in August 1880. Marx wrote out excerpts from it, which are still extant.

Page me46.495

The Editors are not in possession of a copy of the Atlantic Monthly. — 101

Page me46.495

†158 The reference is to the Democratic Federation, an English socialist association set up in June 1881 and headed by Henry Mayers Hyndman. Its programme closely resembled that of the Chartists (see Note 159).

Page me46.495

At the inaugural conference of the Democratic Federation, each participant received a copy of Hyndman's pamphlet England for All in which (Chapter II — `Labour' and Chapter III — `Capital') the author presented whole sections of Volume One of Capital as the programme of the Federation, distorting many of Marx's ideas and making no reference to either the work or its author.

Page me46.495

In 1884, the Democratic Federation was transformed into the Social Democratic Federation. — 102, 162, 251

Page me46.495

†159 Chartism — a political movement of British workers in the 1830s-50s advocating the People's Charter, which contained the demand for universal suffrage and specified the terms that would guarantee this right to the workers. Arising from the consequences of the industrial revolution, Chartism was a revolutionary form of workers' protest against capitalist exploitation, their lack of political rights and the landlords' and big bourgeoisie's monopoly of power. The Chartist movement was a major stage in the working-class struggle at the time preceding the emergence of Marxism. — 102, 293

Page me46.495

†160 Between late June and around 20 July 1881, Marx and his ailing wife rested in Eastbourne. — 104, 110, 185

Page Break me46.496
Page me46.496
†161 Between 28 July and 22 August 1881, Engels was on holiday in Bridlington Quay (Yorkshire). — 104, 108, 126
Page me46.496
†162 In a letter of 10 June 1881, Theodor Friedrich Cuno asked Engels to help Norris A. Clowes, the New-York Star correspondent for Ireland. — 105
Page me46.496
†163 In May-August 1881 Engels contributed to the printed organ of the British trade unions The Labour Standard, which appeared in London and was edited by George Shipton. Engels's contributions were printed anonymously nearly every week as leaders (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 376-418). All in all, Engels wrote 11 articles. The last one, `Social Classes — Necessary and Superfluous', appeared in The Labour Standard on 6 August 1881, after which Engels terminated his work for the paper due to the mounting opportunist tendencies among its editors. — 105, 119, 197
Page me46.496
†164 Between 26 July and 16 August 1881, Marx and his wife stayed with their daughter Jenny Longuet in Argenteuil not far from Paris. — 107, 115, 185
Page me46.496
†165 On 26 July 1881, the French government issued a decree scheduling the elections to the Chamber of Deputies for 21 August, earlier than the date originally fixed. — 108
Page me46.496
†166 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: The Letters of Karl Marx, selected and translated with explanatory notes and an introduction by Saul K. Padover, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979. — 110, 176, 217, 238, 374, 422
Page me46.496
†167 Code pénal — the penal code adopted in France in 1810 and introduced in 1881 into the regions of Western and South-Western Germany conquered by the French. — 111, 445
Page me46.496
†168 In the 1870s, the French journalist Victor Tissot protested at the military indemnity to Germany under the terms of the Versailles Peace of 1871 in his repeatedly reprinted books Voyage au pays des milliards, Les Prussiens en Allemagne. Suite du Voyage au pays des milliards and Voyage aux pays annexés. Suite et fin du Voyage au pays des milliards. Max Simon Nordau attacked Tissot's stand in his books Aus dem wahren Milliardenlande. Pariser Studien und Bilder (1st ed., Leipzig, 1878, 2nd ed., under the title Paris. Studien und Bilder aus dem wahren Milliardenlande, Leipzig, 1881), Paris unter der dritten Republik. Neue Bilder aus dem wahren Milliardenlande (1st and 2nd editions, Leipzig, 1880 and 1881). — 112
Page me46.496
†169 The reference is to the 5 milliard francs which France paid to Germany as indemnity under the terms of the peace treaty after its defeat in its war with Prussia in 1870-71. — 112, 454
Page me46.496

†170 The Editors are not in possession of Engels' letter to Laura Lafargue of 6 August 1881. Laura Lafargue's letter to Engels of 13 August 1881 makes it clear that she was unable to take up his invitation. — 114
Page me46.496
†171 Marx met Hirsch in Paris on 7 August 1881. — 115
Page me46.496
†172 In his speech at the election meeting in Batignolles (see Note 165), Albert Adrien Regnard denounced the domination of Church congregations over primary and secondary schools and advocated compulsory free secular primary schooling. Marx ironically calls him a champion of anti-clericalism (`Kulturkämpfer' in the original) drawing a parallel wlith the Kulturkampf policy pursued by the Bismarck government in the 1870s. To suppress the clergy and weaken the Party of the Centre (see Note 225), laws were introduced that banned political agitation by clergymen, withdrew their right of supervision over the schools, etc. Bismarck's campaign was a failure. In the late 1870s-early 1880s, seeking to unite the forces of reaction, Bismarck effected a reconciliation with the Catholic clergy. Nearly all the laws passed against it at the time of the Kulturkampf were abrogated (see also Note 255). — 117

Page Break me46.497
Page me46.497
†173 The Labour Standard, No. 14, 6 August 1881, anonymously printed the article by Johann Georg Eccarius `A German Opinion of English Trade Unionism'. Eccarius regarded highly the German trade unions founded in 1868 by Max Hirsch and Franz Duncker (the so-called Hirsch-Duncker trade unions). For Engels' opinion of the article, see this volume, p. 119. — 118, 121, 123
Page me46.497
†174 The reference is to Karl Kautsky's article `International Labour Laws' published anonymously in The Labour Standard, No. 15, 13 August 1881. — 119, 120, 122, 126
Page me46.497
†175 The fourteenth annual British trades union congress took place in London on 12-17 September 1881. — 119, 121, 123
Page me46.497
†176 The Manchester School — a trend in economic thinking which reflected the interests of the industrial bourgeoisie. Its supporters, known as Free Traders (the centre of their agitation was Manchester), advocated free trade and non-interference by the government in the economy. In the 1840s and 1850s, the Free Traders formed a separate political group, which later constituted the Left wing of the Liberal Party. — 122, 260
Page me46.497
†177 Factories and workshops' acts — laws regulating labour conditions in British industry. The emergence and advancement of factory legislation was a consequence of the workers' economic and political struggle against capitalist exploitation. The first laws adopted regulated the children's, adolescents', and women's labour conditions in the textile industry (early 19th century). Step by step, the operation of the factories and workshops' acts was extended to the other industries. — 122, 140
Page me46.497

†178 The Geneva Convention of the Red Cross of 1864 — an international document signed at the conference of 16 European states in Geneva. The Geneva Convention established principles for belligerents' treatment of the wounded and the sick, and granted the right of neutrality to the medical personnel taking care of the wounded men. — 122, 140
Page me46.497
†179 On 16 August 1881, Gambetta was to speak in Charonne (a Paris district) at the meeting of his constituents, but the assembly refused to let him take the floor. — 126, 133, 361
Page me46.497
†180 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx and F. Engels, On Literature and Art. A selection of writings, International General, New York, 1974. — 126
Page me46.497
†181 As instructed by Eduard Bernstein, on 23 July 1881 Karl Kautsky despatched to Engels several anti-Semitic articles from German newspapers. — 126
Page me46.497
†182 Engels is referring to articles printed by the newspaper in the winter (9, 23 and 30 January and 6 February) and summer (30 June and 28 July) of 1881. On 30 June and 7 July, the `Feuilleton' column of the newspaper also carried excerpts from

Page Break me46.498
Marx's work `On the Jewish Question' (see present edition, Vol. 3, pp. 146-74). — 126
Page me46.498
†183 Below, Engels quotes Hirsch's letter to him of 11 August 1881. — 126
Page me46.498
†184 Engels is referring to two of Bernstein's articles with the same title, `Es fehlt uns an Intelligenzen', published under the pen-name Leo in Der Sozialdemokrat, Nos. 31 and 33, 28 July and 11 August 1881. — 127, 137
Page me46.498
†185 On 11 August 1881, Der Sozialdemokrat (the `Sozialpolitische Rundschau' column) referred to Jules Vallés as a `brave and highly esteemed member of the Commune'. The editors mentioned Vallés' letter printed by Le Citoyen de Paris, in which he refused to stand for election to the French Chamber of Deputies (to which he had been nominated by two Paris districts), saying that he preferred to enter parliament not through the door but on the shoulders of the insurgent people. — 127
Page me46.498
†186 Jules Vallés' open letter to the President of the French Republic Grévy was published in early February 1879 in the newspaper La Révolution Française. — 127
Page me46.498
†187 The New Madrid Federation was formed on 8 July 1872 by the members of La Emancipacion editorial board expelled by the anarchist majority from the Madrid Federation after the newspaper had exposed the activities of the secret Alliance in Spain. An active part in the organisation and work of the New Madrid Federation was taken by Paul Lafargue. The new Madrid Federation fought against the spread of anarchism in Spain, popularised the ideas of scientific socialism, and campaigned for the foundation of an independent proletarian party there. Its printed organ, La Emancipacion, had Engels as one of the contributors. — 128

Page me46.498
†188 A reference to the International Anarchist Congress, which took place in London on 14-19 July 1881. Engels' report of the congress was quoted verbatim by Bernstein in the `Sozialpolitische Rundschau' column of Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 35, 25 August 1881. — 128
Page me46.498
†189 The speakers at the Anarchist Congress used numbers rather than names (see reports on the congress printed by Die Freiheit, Nos. 31, 32 and 33, 30 July, 6 and 13 August 1881). The Freiheit report of 23 July stated that 45 delegates holding 80 mandates represented 59 federations and 320 sections. — 129
Page me46.498
†190 Der Sozialdemokrat of 25 August 1881 carried this information almost verbatim in the `Sozialpolitische Rundschau' column. — 129
Page me46.498
†191 The reference is to the Anarchist Congress in Saint-Imier (Switzerland) convened after the Hague Congress of the First International had expelled Mikhail Bakunin and James Guillaume. — 129
Page me46.498
†192 Engels is probably referring to his study of Marx's manuscript on the history of differential calculus, on which Marx worked in 1878-82. Marx did his first research in mathematics back in the 1860s. The extant manuscripts were published for the first time in: K. Marx, Matematicheskiye rukopisi (Mathematical Manuscripts), Moscow, 1968. They will be included in full in MEGA I/28. — 130
Page me46.498
†193 The American physician Henry S. Tanner set a peculiar record in New York in 1880: having decided to find out how long the human organism could go without food, he fasted over a month (from 28 June to 7 August). — 133

Page Break me46.499
Page me46.499
†194 This refers to the election meeting held in the Paris district of Belleville on 12 August 1881, at which Léon Gambetta outlined his programme. — 133
Page me46.499
†195 Collectivists in the French socialist movement of the 1870s-80s were the followers of Marxism who advocated collectivisation of the means of production and workers' involvement in the political struggle. Their leaders were Jules Guesde and Paul Lafargue (hence Guesdists, another and more common name for the French Marxists). Right from its formation in 1879, the Workers' Party was torn apart by fierce ideological dissent, which in 1882 led to its split (see Note 394).
Page me46.499
On the party programme, see Note 68. — 134
Page me46.499

†196 Marx added these lines to his wife's letter to their daughter Jenny Longuet of 20 August 1881 (see this volume, pp. 475). — 136
Page me46.499
†197 August Bebel's letter to Engels of 13 May 1881 has not been found. Engels may be referring to Bebel's letter of 13 June 1881, written in reply to Engels' letter of 28 April. — 137
Page me46.499
†198 After a `local state of siege' (see Note 65) was introduced in Leipzig in June 1881, many active socialists, Bebel and Liebknecht among them, were deported from the city. On 2 July 1881, they left Leipzig and settled down in Borsdorf close by. — 137, 336
Page me46.499
†199 Engels' letter to Liebknecht and the latter's reply have not been found. — 138
Page me46.499
†200 On 4 April 1881, August Bebel criticised in the Reichstag the Workers' Accident Insurance Bill (see also notes 141 and 144). — 138
Page me46.499
†201 Engels is referring to Liebknecht's speech in the Reichstag on 31 May 1881 on the Workers' Accident Insurance Bill (see Note 144): `The historical process of evolution is infinitely stronger than the most powerful ruler. Prince Bismarck has himself experienced some interesting transformations, he honestly confessed ... that for a while he was bringing up the rear of the Free Traders, then of the Protectionist movement, and now of socialism' (see Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Reichstags. 4. Legislaturperiode. IV. Session 1881, Vol. II, Berlin, 1881, p. 1455). — 138
Page me46.499
†202 A reference to the speech on the Workers' Accident Insurance Bill (see Note 144) made by the German Social Democrat Georg Wilhelm Hartmann in the Reichstag on 15 June 1881, of which Die Freiheit (No. 26, 25 June 1881) wrote: `Hartmann crawled on his belly before Bismarck and the Reichstag when the Bill was debated.' Die Freiheit quoted from Hartmann's speech referring to the Frankfurter Zeitung; some of the fragments deviate from the text of the official shorthand report (see Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Reichstags. 4. Legislaturperiode. IV. Session 1881, Vol. II, Berlin, 1881, pp. 1757-59). Judging by the shorthand report, Hartmann stated that `the Social Democrats gladly welcome the Bill submitted by the Imperial Chancellor' and that `the main principle' of Social-Democracy was `the aspiration to humanity' and `the moral feeling of assistance to those in need'. — 138
Page me46.499
†203 The reference is to the results of the elections to the French Chamber of Deputies held on 21 August 1881, at which candidates from the French Workers' Party were standing for the first time (see Note 208). — 138
Page me46.499
†204 At the 1877 elections, the German Social-Democrats received about half a million votes. — 139

Page Break me46.500
Page me46.500

†205 The Seventh International Medical Congress was held in London between 3 and 9 August 1881. — 140
Page me46.500
†206 The Privy Council — a special body under the King of England, first formed in the 13th century, consisting of secretaries of state and other officials, as well as top clergy. For a long time, it had the right to initiate legislation on behalf of the king, bypassing Parliament. In the 18th and 19th centuries, the Privy Council lost a great deal of its power. It retained only the right to accept and consider appeals concerning the colonial, ecclesiastical and administrative matters. The Privy Council comprises a number of committees, including those on scientific research, industry, medicine and agriculture. At present, the Privy Council has virtually no say in the administration of the country. — 140
Page me46.500
†207 On 22 September 1881, Der Sozialdemokrat carried a leader headed `Die Vivisektion des Proletariats'. — 141
Page me46.500
†208 In October 1880, Malon, Guesde and Brousse started the newspaper L'Émancipation in Lyons and, on Brousse's suggestion, made a written commitment not to stand for election. In November 1880, L'Émancipation ceased to exist, and the editors' commitment was no longer valid. This enabled Guesde to stand at the elections of 21 August 1881 to the French Chamber of Deputies from the town of Roubaix, for which Malon and Brousse fiercely attacked him. — 142, 145, 361
Page me46.500
†209 Marx wrote this letter in reply to Kautsky's letter of 28 September 1881, in which he asked Marx to introduce his mother Minna Kautsky, who arrived in Paris in the autumn of 1881, to Marx's daughter Jenny Longuet, who lived in Argenteuil near Paris. — 142
Page me46.500
†210 The Editors are not in possession of Marx's note to Jenny Longuet. — 142, 143
Page me46.500
†211 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx, Selected Works, Vol. II, Moscow-Leningrad, 1936, New York, 1936. — 144
Page me46.500
†212 In a letter of 14 October 1881 posted on 20 October, Bernstein informed Engels that Lafargue had requested him in early October to hold a collection among his friends to help finance a new edition of L'Égalité. Bernstein asked Engels' advice on the way to treat Lafargue's request, since he felt he was not competent enough to correctly appraise the situation in the French working-class movement. — 144
Page me46.500
†213 The International Socialist Congress, originally to be held in Zurich, met in Chur between 2 and 4 October 1881 (see also Note 100). — 150
Page me46.500
†214 27 October 1881 was the day fixed for the elections to the German Reichstag (see Note 216). — 150
Page me46.500

†215 In a postcard dated 13 October 1881 Johann Philipp Becker wrote to Engels about the Chur Congress (see Note 100), in which he had taken part as a representative of the German workers in Switzerland. — 151
Page me46.500
†216 At the elections to the German Reichstag on 27 October 1881 the Social Democrats won 312,000 votes and 12 seats. — 152
Page me46.500
†217 This letter was published in English for the first time in an abridged form in: K. Marx, Selected Works, Vol. II, Moscow-Leningrad, 1936, New York, 1936. — 152
Page me46.500
†218 Engels is referring to the mass demonstration in London, called by the Chartists

Page Break me46.501
for 10 April 1848. It was to present a petition to Parliament for the adoption of the People's Charter. The Government prohibited the demonstration, and troops and police were brought to London to prevent it. The Chartist leaders, many of whom vacillated, called off the demonstration and persuaded the masses to disperse. The failure of the demonstration was used by the Government for an attack on the workers and repression of the Chartists. — 152
Page me46.501
†219 This refers to Louis Bonaparte's coup d'état on 2 December 1851. — 153
Page me46.501
†220 On 17 May 1879, with the approval of the whole Social-Democratic group in the Reichstag, the Social-Democratic deputy Max Kayser defended the government project for protective customs tariffs. Marx and Engels sharply criticised Kayser because the proposal promoted the interests of big industrialists and landowners, and further condemned some of the German Social-Democratic leaders' stand vis-á-vis Kayser (see present edition, Vol. 45, pp. 259-62). — 153
Page me46.501
†221 This refers to August Bebel's letter to Engels of 18 November 1879. — 154
Page me46.501
†222 The following Social-Democrats won seats in the Reichstag at the elections of 27 October 1881: Wilhelm Blos, Johann Heinrich Wilhelm Dietz, Karl Frohme, Bruno Geiser, Karl Grillenberger, Wilhelm Hasenclever, Max Kayser, Julius Kräcker, Wilhelm Liebknecht, Moritz Rittinghausen, Karl Wilhelm Stolle and Georg Heinrich von Vollmar. August Bebel was not elected in either of the three constituencies where he had been nominated. Neither did he win at the second ballot in the Mainz constituency on 15 December. — 154, 188, 259, 454
Page me46.501
†223 The Rheims Congress of the French Workers' Party took place between 30 October and 6 November 1881. It was attended by 44 delegates. The Congress endorsed the National Committee (Comité national) of the French Workers' Party, set up on Malon's and Brousse's initiative in mid-October 1881 (see Note 250).
Page me46.501
At the Rheims Congress, Malon and Brousse managed to get a decision passed recognising that the minimum programme (see Note 68) did `not quite' live up to

`the working people's aspirations'. The Congress resolved to leave the programme in force until a new one had been adopted. This decision was spearheaded against the Marxist groups that united around L'Égalité edited by Jules Guesde. — 154, 173, 341
Page me46.501
†224 At the International Socialist Congress held in Chur (see Note 100), serious differences surfaced between the Polish socialist groups. Kautsky, who wrote to Engels about the matter on 8 November 1881, asked for his opinion concerning the stand Der Sozialdemokrat ought to take in this affair. Engels set forth his views in a letter to Kautsky of 7 February 1882 (see this volume, pp. 191-95). — 155, 166, 190, 191, 195
Page me46.501
†225 The Centre (Zentrum) — a political party of German Catholics formed in 1870-71 as a result of the unification of the Catholic groups in the Prussian Provincial Diet and the German Reichstag (its seats were in the centre of the assembly halls). It united, under the banner of Catholicism, the Catholic clergy of various social ranks, landowners, bourgeoisie and certain sections of the peasants, especially in the petty and medium-sized states of Western and South-Western Germany, and supported their separatist and anti-Prussian tendencies. Engels gave a detailed description of the Party of the Centre in his work The Role of Force in History (see present edition, Vol. 26, pp. 509-10). — 157

Page Break me46.502
Page me46.502
†226 An allusion to Jenny Marx's reviews of the London theatrical scene in the Frankfurter Zeitung, specifically, the acting of Henry Irving: `Aus der Londoner Theaterwelt' (21 November 1875); `Londoner Saison' (4 April 1876); `Englische Shakespeare-Studien' (3 January 1877); `Shakespeares Richard III in Londoner Lyceum-Theater' (8 February 1877), and `Vom Londoner Theater' (25 May 1877). All the reviews appeared anonymously. — 158
Page me46.502
†227 The third German edition of Volume One of Capital, which appeared in print after Marx's death (in 1883), was edited by Engels. By the 2nd volume Marx means here the part of his work that later made up the second and the third volumes of Capital. — 158, 161, 162, 434, 465
Page me46.502
†228 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: The Socialist Review, III-VIII, London, 1908. It appeared in English in full in The Labour Monthly, No. 3, London, 1933. The first half of the letter is in German, and the second, in English. — 161
Page me46.502
†229 Sibylle Hess' letter to Marx of 11 December 1881. — 164
Page me46.502
†230 Liebknecht's letter to Marx of 12 December 1881. After the 1848-49 revolution in Germany, Liebknecht was in exile first in Switzerland and then in London. He returned to Prussia in 1862 after an amnesty. — 164
Page me46.502
†231 The first issue of the third series of L'Égalité appeared on 11 December 1881. Among others, it carried Guesde's programmatic article, Lafargue's article on the successes of the German Social-Democrats at the latest Reichstag elections, Guesde's report of the Rheims Congress, and Engels' speech at Jenny Marx's graveside. — 166

Page me46.502
†232 The dedication and the letter to Roland Daniels Jun. were written by Marx on the back of his photograph taken in August 1875. The original is kept in the Karl-Marx-Haus in Trier. — 167
Page me46.502
†233 On 31 December 1881, Marx replied to the letters from Amalia and Roland Daniels Jun. of 11 December 1881, in which they offered him their condolences on the death of his wife Jenny on 2 December. Marx's letters have not been found and probably did not reach their addressees. — 167, 180
Page me46.502
†234 Marx was taking a cure in Ventnor, on the Isle of Wight (the south of England), between 29 December 1881 and 16 January 1882. He was accompanied by his youngest daughter Eleanor. — 169, 171, 202, 214, 218, 224, 259, 366, 371
Page me46.502
†235 The Lafargue family had property in New Orleans. — 170
Page me46.502
†236 The reference is to the traditional annual voters' meeting in Birmingham convened by the Birmingham Liberal Association on 3 January 1882. John Bright, leader of the British bourgeois radicals and M.P. for Birmingham, and Joseph Chamberlain, a public figure in the city, who spoke at the meeting, fully supported the Irish policies of Gladstone's Liberal government. Specifically, they vindicated his actions aimed at implementing the so-called Land Act of 1881 for Ireland (see Note 124). — 171
Page me46.502
†237 Probably an ironic reference to Jacob Bright, John Bright's younger brother. — 171
Page me46.502
†238 A reference to the meeting held on 3 January 1882. The official pretext for it was a discussion of the functions of the assistant commissioners, appointed to carry out the Land Act of 1881 for Ireland (see Note 124). It was stated at the meeting that their decision to introduce a rent reduction was not objective. The landlords demanded that the government immediately consider their complaints and promulgate the law on compensation for losses they could sustain should the government sanction the rent reduction. — 172

Page Break me46.503
Page me46.503
†239 Joseph Dietzgen wrote to Marx on 3 January 1882 that he was studying Hegel's works, in particular, his Phänomenologie des Geistes. — 172
Page me46.503
†240 When the Reichstag debated the observance of the Anti-Socialist Law in December 1881, deputies Wilhelm Blos and Wilhelm Hasenclever adopted a conciliatory stand. In its leader, Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 51, 15 December 1881 strongly protested that the Social-Democratic deputies in the Reichstag `should neither wail nor complain, but brand and expose ... not enter into negotiations, but protest'. The protest was supported by the party majority outside the Reichstag and by the Social-Democratic group within it. At a special meeting at which Bebel was also present, although he was not a Reichstag deputy at the time, the members of the parliamentary group unanimously issued a declaration endorsing the general line of Der Sozialdemokrat as the party's printed organ. The declaration was printed by the newspaper on 16 February 1882. Both Blos and Hasenclever had signed it. — 173, 203

Page me46.503
†241 This refers to William I's rescript signed by him and Bismarck (Erlass vom 4. Januar 1882. Deutscher Reichs-Anzeiger und Königlich Preussischer Staats-Anzeiger, 7 January 1882). William demanded that, in future, all government acts be regarded as a constitutional expression of the King's own opinion. Referring to Art. 49 of the Prussian Constitution, which granted the King of Prussia the right to personally direct government policies, William laid down that his ministers and officials should curb any `doubt' about the Prussian King's `constitutional right'. — 175, 178
Page me46.503
†242 Nihilists — Russian intellectuals of humble origin (the 1860s). They flatly refused to accept the ruling ideology, morality and way of life. Nihilism was not a comprehensive philosophy; the only thing its proponents shared was their rejection of things as they stood. The term `nihilism' was later applied by the reactionary press to all revolutionaries at the moments when the class struggle began to mount. — 175, 470
Page me46.503
†243 Demagogues in Germany were members of the opposition movement after the liberation of the country from Napoleonic rule. The name became current after the Karlsbad Conference of Ministers of the German States in August 1819, which adopted a special decision on the persecution of the demagogues. — 175
Page me46.503
†244 In June and September 1881 Count Nikolai Ignatiev, the Russian Minister of the Interior, assembled `knowledgeable' Zemstvo representatives of his own choosing to discuss some of the practical issues of domestic policy: resettlement, consumption of alcohol, etc. In this connection, 12 Zemstvo assemblies requested that Zemstvo representatives be involved in the legislative activities not on isolated occasions but on a permanent basis, and that they be selected not by the government but by the Zemstvos themselves. — 175
Page me46.503
†245 Sorge wrote to Marx on 27 December 1881: `Come over to us, old friend, and become one of us! We will offer you as good a home as we can, and new surroundings and old work will in time alleviate your sorrow and sustain you.' — 177

Page Break me46.504
Page me46.504
†246 An ironic allusion to William I's flight to England at the time of the March 1848 revolution in Germany (up to 1861, William was heir to the Prussian throne and held the title of Prince of Prussia). In England, he maintained close contacts with the country's leading politicians. — 178
Page me46.504

†247 Marx is referring to Theodor Mommsen's, Eugen Richter's and Albert Hänel's assurances of their loyalty to the crown voiced at the German Reichstag sessions in November-December 1881. — 178
Page me46.504
†248 Engels first came to England in the latter half of November 1842 to study commerce at a cotton mill in Manchester belonging to the firm of Ermen & Engels. Engels' visit lasted until 26 August 1844. — 178
Page me46.504
†249 Marx sent a photograph of himself to Cologne for the second time probably in late January 1882, having received Amalia Daniels' letter of 19 January. On 5 February, Roland Daniels Jun. acknowledged receipt of the photograph and explained the confusion with the post by the fact that several persons of the same name resided in Cologne. — 180
Page me46.504
†250 The Comité national (National Committee) of the French Workers' Party was set up on the initiative of its Right-wing leaders Malon and Brousse in mid-October 1881, just before the Rheims Congress of the party (see Note 223), which endorsed it. The National Committee was formed on the principle of equal representation of all six federations (five persons from each) which constituted the French Workers' Party at the time: the Federative Union of the Centre (see Note 265), the Eastern Federative Union, the Northern Federation, the Federative Union of the South, the Federative Union of the West, and the Algerian Federation. To all practical purposes, only the first three federations were in existence at the time, whereas the other three existed only on paper and their representatives, who were under Malon's and Brousse's influence, did not have legal powers. Thus, with the exception of the five Collectivists (Guesdists), who represented the Northern Federation, the remaining 25 members of the National Committee were Malon's and Brousse's followers, which placed the party leadership into the hands of Right-wing elements. — 181
Page me46.504
†251 On the minimum programme, see Note 68. Jules Joffrin, nominated as the party candidate at the elections to the Paris City Council, set forth his election programme in a speech made in the Monmartre district of Paris. In it, he totally ignored the theoretical part of the programme drawn up by Marx and replaced a number of important and quite concrete points (the issue of the 8-hour day, collective property, etc.) in its practical part by vague phrases. On 8 January 1882, using its advantage in the National Committee (see Note 250), Malon's and Brousse's group managed to get Joffrin's opportunistic election programme approved. — 181
Page me46.504
†252 This may refer to the note `Russland' carried by the Kölnische Zeitung on 25 July 1881. The note refuted the opinion of certain European newspapers that General Mikhail Skobelev, who visited Paris in the summer of 1881, had been instructed by the Russian government to pave the way for a Franco-Russian alliance, open negotiations on the abolition of political émigrés' right of asylum, etc. The Kölnische Zeitung stated that Skobelev's visit was a private one. — 182

Page Break me46.505

Page me46.505
†253 The Sonvillier Circular (Circulaire á toutes les fédérations de l'Association Internationale des Travailleurs. Sonvillier, 1871) was passed by the Bakuninist Jura Federation at the congress in Sonvillier on 12 November 1871. It was spearheaded against the decisions of the London Conference of the International (1871) and attacked the activities of its General Council. It demanded the immediate convocation of a general congress to revise the Rules of the International along anarchist lines. The General Council responded by issuing a private circular `Fictitious Splits in the International' written by Marx and Engels, which exposed the Bakuninists' efforts to split the organisation (see present edition, Vol. 23). — 182
Page me46.505
†254 The mounting peasant movement in Russia in the 1860s-70s caused by the peasants' desperate condition forced the tsarist government to agree to slightly reduce the redemption payments. The law of 28 December 1881 reduced peasants' redemption payments by one ruble for a plot per person in Russia, and by 16 per cent in the Ukraine. — 182
Page me46.505
†255 The phrase `to go to Canossa' goes back to the humiliating pilgrimage undertaken to Pope Gregory VII at Canossa Castle (Northern Italy) in 1077 by the German Emperor Henry IV in the course of the protracted struggle between the emperors and the popes for the investiture.
Page me46.505
In May 1872, Bismarck, who had launched a campaign against the Catholic Church that supported the separatist and anti-Prussian sentiments in Germany, stated: `We shall not go to Canossa.' During the campaign (the Kulturkampf), a law was promulgated on 4 May 1874 which restricted the powers of the consistory (ecclesiastical court). However, in the late 1870s, when Bismarck needed the support of the Catholic Party of the Centre to combat the workers' movement and the growing influence of the German Social-Democratic Party, he abrogated nearly all the laws passed during the Kulturkampf campaign, had the principal advocates of the anti-Catholic policy resign, and made his peace with the new Pope Leo XIII. By `the pilgrimage to Canossa' Engels is ironically referring to the abrogation of the law of 4 May 1874 effected by 233 votes to 115 in the Reichstag on 12 January 1882. — 182
Page me46.505
†256 By referring to ultramontanes Engels meant the Centre (see Note 225).
Page me46.505
Particularists — members of a political movement in Germany which emerged after the establishment of the German Empire and opposed the policies of the Prussian government. The movement spread among the ruling classes of the petty and medium-sized South-Western German states. The top Catholic clergy, landowners and the bourgeoisie of these states resented Germany's unification under Prussian supremacy believing it to be an encroachment on their rights. As a result they cherished separatist aspirations, expressed their discontent with Bismarck's policy of Prussianisation of Germany, demanded autonomy from central power and immutability of local private rights and privileges. In the Reichstag the Particularists, who represented the states with a predominantly Roman Catholic population, supported the Party of the Centre.

Page me46.505

The Poles, Danes and Alsatians formed independent groups in the Reichstag. They also supported the Catholic Party of the Centre. Their presence in the Reichstag was accounted for by the existence in the German Empire of national minorities discontented with the policy of enforced Germanisation. It was pursued with particular ruthlessness by Bismarck in the Polish provinces annexed by Germany in 1814-15 and in Alsace and Lorraine, which Germany received as a result of the Franco-Prussian War of 1870-71. The Danish deputies in the Reichstag represented Schleswig and Holstein, annexed by Prussia in 1867. The Poles and the Alsatians were the most powerful among the national parliamentary groups.

Page Break me46.506

Page me46.506

The men of Progress were members of a Prussian bourgeois party founded in June 1861. The Party of Progress demanded Germany's unification under Prussian supremacy, the convocation of an all-Germany parliament and the establishment of a strong liberal ministry accountable to the Chamber of Deputies. In 1866, a Right wing split off from the Party of Progress, a section that capitulated before Bismarck and set up a National Liberal Party (see Note 15). The vacillations in the policies pursued by the Party of Progress mirrored the instability of the merchant bourgeoisie, small industrialists, and a section of the craftsmen, on whom it relied. In 1884, the Party of Progress united with the Left wing of the National Liberal Party that had split off from it to form the German Party of Free Thinkers (Deutsche Freisinnige Partei). — 182

Page me46.506

†257 At the Reichstag meeting of 9 January 1852, Bismarck was forced to admit that the working masses were distrustful of the government's attempts to improve their condition. — 183

Page me46.506

†258 This refers to the letters Leo Frankel (18 December 1881) and Walery Wróblewski (7 December 1881) sent to Marx on the occasion of his wife's death.

Page me46.506

At the time, Frankel was detained in the prison in Vác (Austria-Hungary), where he was placed in June 1881 on the charge of breach of the press law.

Page me46.506

By Wróblewski's `Polish party' in Geneva Marx had in mind a group of Polish Marxist refugees with whom Wróblewski became close in the late 1870s. — 183

Page me46.506

†259 In July 1878, George Howell, a former member of the General Council of the International, published a libellous article, `The History of the International Association', in The Nineteenth Century monthly review. The author calumniated the history of the First International and Marx's role in it. In August of the same year, Marx published an article called `Mr. George Howell's History of the International Working-Men's Association' in The Secular Chronicle, and Record of Free-thought Progress, Vol. X, No. 5 (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 234-39).

Page me46.506

In 1881, Howell stood for election to the House of Commons in Stafford but was voted down at the elections. — 185
Page me46.506
†260 Engels wrote this letter at two sittings, on 25 and 31 January 1882.
Page me46.506
Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Selected Correspondence, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1955. — 186
Page me46.506
†261 An allusion to the introduction of the Anti-Socialist Law (see Note 16). — 187
Page me46.506
†262 It has not been established which pamphlet of Hepner's is meant. — 188, 260
Page me46.506
†263 The new imperial judicial code came into force on 1 October 1879. Engels described it in his work The Role of Force in History (see present edition, Vol. 26, pp. 506-08). — 188
Page me46.506
†264 Code Napoléon — a system of bourgeois law incorporating five codes (civil, civil procedural, commercial, criminal, and criminal procedural) adopted under Napoleon in 1804-10. — 188

Page Break me46.507
Page me46.507
†265 The Federative Union (full name, Union fédérative du Centre, the Federative Union of the Centre), one of the six associations constituting the French Workers' Party, had been formed by April 1880. An association of the party's organisations in Paris, it consisted of 80 groups. The Union's leadership was in the hands of the party's Right opportunist wing, the Possibilists — Brousse, Malon and Joffrin (editors of the Prolétaire). At the meetings of the Federative Union of the Centre on 17 and 24 January 1882, the Égalité editorial board and all party groups siding with the Guesdists were expelled from the Federative Union. Only 28 groups voted in favour, that is, slightly more than one-third of the groups making up the Federative Union (48 groups out of the 80 were present at the meetings mentioned above). After their expulsion from the Federative Union of the Centre, the Guesdists founded a revolutionary federation and called it the Federation of the Centre (Fédération du Centre). — 190, 332, 355, 388
Page me46.507
†266 The Holy Alliance — an association of European monarchs founded in September 1815 on the initiative of the Russian Tsar Alexander I and the Austrian Chancellor Metternich to suppress the revolutionary movement. — 191, 273
Page me46.507
†267 The national liberation movement for the unification of Italy ended in 1861 with the establishment of a single Italian state (only Rome, which was incorporated into the Italian state after the abolition of the Pope's secular authority in 1870, remained outside it at the time). The event paved the way for the expansion of the independent workers' movement. — 191
Page me46.507

†268 Little Germany — a plan for the unification of Germany under the Prussian aegis minus Austria.
Page me46.507
Engels is referring here to the Austro-Prussian War of 1866, which gave birth to the North German Confederation (Norddeutscher Bund), a federative state formed in 1867 to replace the disintegrated German Confederation. The establishment of the North German Confederation was a major step towards the national unification of Germany. The Confederation ceased to exist in January 1871, when the German Empire was founded. — 191
Page me46.507
†269 By the Lassallean party Engels implies the General Association of German Workers, the first national German workers' organisation founded on 23 May 1863 at the congress of workers' associations in Leipzig. The main organisational documents and the programme were drawn up by Ferdinand Lassalle, who became the organisation's first president. The errors in Lassalle's propaganda strategy and in his tactics, as well as the anti-democratic structure of the Association gave rise to a strong opposition, the bulk of which joined the Eisenachers.
Page me46.507
The Eisenach Party — the Social-Democratic Workers' Party of Germany set up at the General Congress of German, Swiss and Austrian Social-Democrats held in Eisenach on 7-9 August 1869. The party programme declared support for the principles of the First International, although Lassallean ideas still wielded a considerable influence in it. At the Congress in Gotha in 1875, the Eisenachers and the Lassalleans formed a single party of the working class, which called itself the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany up to 1890. — 191, 342
Page me46.507
†270 The Federal Diet (Bundestag) — the central organ of the German Confederation set up by the Vienna Congress in 1815. It comprised representatives of the German states and sat in Frankfurt-am-Main under the chairmanship of the Austrian representative.

Page Break me46.508
The Federal Diet ceased to exist together with the German Confederation at the time of the Austro-Prussian War of 1866. — 191
Page me46.508
†271 A reference to the constitution of 1860 (the so-called October diploma — Oktoberdiplom). It gave Hungary, which formed part of the Austrian monarchy, certain rights (the convocation of a Hungarian parliament, the use of the Hungarian language in administration, etc.) The crisis of the Austrian Empire and mounting popular discontent led to its transformation in 1867 into the dual Austro-Hungarian monarchy. Hungary was recognised as a sovereign part of the state. Political consolidation promoted the development of capitalism there. In 1868, the first workers' organisations emerged in the country, the Budapest Workers' Union and the General Workers' Union (subsequently the latter became the leading organisation of the socialist workers' movement). — 191
Page me46.508
†272 A reference to the events of 1873-75, when the Bismarck government tried to provoke a war with France. The Russian government resolutely sided with France.

Thanks to the pressure being put on the German government by Russia, Austria and Britain, Bismarck's attempt failed. — 192
Page me46.508
†273 In January 1882, Bosnia and Herzegovina, which had been occupied by Austria in 1878 under the terms of the Berlin Congress, witnessed an uprising provoked by the Austro-Hungarian government's law of 1881 on military conscription to be introduced in the occupied territories. The uprising reached its peak in the first half of February 1882. The Tsarist government tried to use it to promote its own ends. — 192
Page me46.508
†274 This refers to the national liberation insurrection of 1863-64 in the Polish territories belonging to Tsarist Russia. The insurrection was suppressed by the Russian government.
Page me46.508
The anonymous book, Berlin und St. Petersburg. Preussische Beiträge zur Geschichte der Russisch-deutschen Beziehungen, Leipzig, 1880, was the work of the German political writer Julius Eckardt. Appendix 2, to which Engels refers here, deals with the Polish insurrection of 1863-64. — 193
Page me46.508
†275 This refers, above all, to Walery Wróblewski and Jaroslaw Dombrowski. Wróblewski, appointed general, commanded one of the Commune's three armies. General Dombrowski, who first headed the defence operations at one of the key sectors of the front, later commanded the 1st Army of the Commune and in early May 1871 was appointed commander-in-chief of its armed forces. — 193
Page me46.508
†276 The reference is to the programme advanced in the days of the Cracow uprising (February 1846) by Dembowski, who voiced the interests of the peasantry and the urban poor (to give land to those who had none, radically to improve the workers' condition by setting up national, or `social', workshops). The National Government formed in Cracow on 22 February issued a manifesto announcing the abolition of feudal duties and taxes. The Cracow uprising was suppressed early in March 1846. In November, Austria, Prussia and Russia signed a treaty on the annexation of the city to the Austrian empire. — 193
Page me46.508
†277 Engels is referring to the `liberal course' proclaimed by William, Prince (King from 1861) of Prussia, in October 1858, when he assumed the regency. In actual fact, not one of the reforms expected by the bourgeoisie was carried out. William's policy aimed at consolidating the Prussian monarchy and Junkerdom. — 194, 208, 332, 415

Page Break me46.509
Page me46.509
†278 In early February 1882, following medical advice, Marx took a trip to Algiers, where he stayed from 20 February to 2 May. On the way there, he stopped over in Argenteuil (a Paris suburb) to visit his daughter Jenny Longuet (9-16 February). — 196, 199, 202, 203, 210, 369
Page me46.509

†279 In his letter to Engels of 1 February 1882, Johann Philipp Becker proposed setting up a new international workers' organisation along the lines of the International Working Men's Association. — 196
Page me46.509
†280 Under the law proposed by the Minister of Justice Dufaure, and passed by the French National Assembly on 14 March 1872, membership of the International was punished by imprisonment. — 196
Page me46.509
†281 The reference is to the situation that emerged after the assassination of Emperor Alexander II on 1 March 1881, when Alexander III sat it out in Gatchina (the Tsar's summer residence near St Petersburg) fearing fresh terrorist acts by the secret Executive Committee of the Narodnaya Volya (People's Will) organisation. — 208
Page me46.509
†282 In the course of his visit to France in the winter of 1882, General Skobelev had a meeting with Serbian students in Paris (17 February) at which he talked about the need to emancipate the Slav peoples of Europe. As in his subsequent statements, which gave rise to a great deal of anxiety and commotion in Europe, Skobelev lashed out at Germany, describing a war with it as inevitable and urging a Russo-French alliance. — 209
Page me46.509
†283 See present edition, Vol. 35, Chapter Three, `Money, or the Circulation of Commodities'. — 210
Page me46.509
†284 The Editors are not in possession of this letter (telegram, note). — 212, 213, 216, 221, 225, 228, 245, 251, 259, 262, 283, 311, 315, 317, 337, 338, 358, 379, 393, 394, 458, 459
Page me46.509
†285 In a letter of 24 February 1882, Jenny Longuet wrote to Marx that her sister Eleanor had turned down Prosper Lissagaray's proposal of marriage. — 219
Page me46.509
†286 This letter was first published in Russian among Marx's 16 letters from the Longuet family archive by the magazine Nachalo (Beginning), No. 5, 1899. Its translation into German was printed by the Neue Deutsche Rundschau, Vol. 2 (October 1899). The Editors are not in possession of the original letter. It was published in English for the first time in an abridged form in: The Letters of Karl Marx, selected and translated with explanatory notes and an introduction by Saul K. Padover, Prentice-Hall, Inc., Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey, 1979. — 220
Page me46.509
†287 This refers to Carl Hirsch's article `Le Socialisme en Allemagne' in Volume 15 of La Nouvelle Revue (founded by Juliette Adam), March-April 1882, and signed `Un socialiste allemand'. — 225, 230
Page me46.509
†288 On 25 March 1882, Engels' niece Mary Ellen Rosher gave birth to a daughter, Lilian. — 228, 234
Page me46.509
†289 Marx has in mind the `iron law of wages', which Lassalle tried to substantiate by reference to scientific authorities in his pamphlet Offnes Antwortschreiben an das Central-Comité zur Berufung eines Allgemeinen Deutschen Arbeitercongresses zu Leipzig, Zurich, 1863, pp. 15-16.

Page Break me46.510
Page me46.510
For Marx's and Engels' criticism of the Lassallean law, see present edition, Vol. 24, p. 69.
Page me46.510
By Ricardo's and Turgot's statements on the law of minimum wages, Marx means Ricardo's On the Principles of Political Economy, and Taxation, 3rd ed., London, 1821, pp. 73-499, and Turgot's Réflexions sur la formation et la distribution des richesses (1766) in Œuvres de Turgot, new ed., by E. Daire, Vol. 1, Paris, 1844, p. 10. Marx's critique of Ricardo's and Turgot's ideas on this issue is contained, in particular, in Theories of Surplus Value (Volume Four of Capital) (see present edition, Vol. 30, pp. 362-67, and Vol. 32, pp. 35-54). — 230, 324
Page me46.510
†290 In the extant English original, the last paragraph is missing. In this edition, it is retranslated from the Russian publication in Nachalo, No. 5, 1899. — 233
Page me46.510
†291 On Marx's relations with Hyndman see Marx's letter to Hyndman of 2 July 1881 (this volume, pp. 102-03). — 234
Page me46.510
†292 An ironic reference to the sycophantic statements by the German poets Friedrich Bodenstedt and Friedrich Theodor Vischer, a Hegelian, author of a four-volume work on aesthetics. Comparing them to Horace and Virgil, Marx is alluding to the fact that those Roman poets wrote panegyrics and odes to Emperor Augustus (Octavianus). — 235
Page me46.510
†293 The reference is to the proofs of the Russian translation of Marx's and Engels' preface to the second Russian edition of the Manifesto of the Communist Party, a project initiated by Georgi Plekhanov, who had also done the translation. The request for the preface was made through Pyotr Lavrov. Marx and Engels wrote it on 21 January 1882, and despatched it to Lavrov on 23 January. It appeared for the first time in the magazine Narodnaya Volya on 5 February. The Manifesto of the Communist Party with this preface appeared in print in 1882 in Geneva in the Russian Socio-Revolutionary Library series.
Page me46.510
Engels failed to obtain the German original of the preface from Lavrov, as the latter had left it among his papers in Paris (at the time, Lavrov was expelled from Paris on the insistence of the Russian government, and moved to London). Lavrov did not send Engels a copy of the German original until about 17 April, but earlier, on 13 April, Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 16, featured the preface in translation from the Russian text printed by Narodnaya Volya. Engels did not like the translation (see this volume, p. 244). The German original of the preface was published in MEGA I/25, pp. 295-96. — 235
Page me46.510
†294 Engels replies to Berthold Sparr's letter of 12 April 1882. — 236
Page me46.510

†295 6 Rose Street, Soho Square, London, W. was the address of the Social-Democratic Workers' Club, which in the 1880s had a German and an English section. The German section was the first branch of the German Workers' Educational Society in London (see Note 8) and had close contacts with Die Freiheit, Most's newspaper. — 236
Page me46.510
†296 Engels is referring to Die Freiheit's propaganda campaign against the policies and tactics of the Social-Democratic Party of Germany and the stand taken by the Social-Democratic deputies in the German Reichstag. On the eve of the Reichstag elections of 1881, Most urged his followers in Germany to do their best to prevent Bebel's and Liebknecht's election to the Reichstag (for criticism of Most's and Die Freiheit's position, see this volume, p. 7). — 236

Page Break me46.511
Page me46.511
†297 The reference is to the German Workers' Educational Society in London (see Note 8), which in the 1880s had its offices at 49 Tottenham Street, Tottenham Court Road, London, W. — 236, 330
Page me46.511
†298 Laura Lafargue visited Eastbourne during Marx's and his wife's stay there between late June and 20 July 1881. — 238
Page me46.511
†299 L'Union Nationale, a French insurance company where Paul Lafargue was employed at the time. — 240
Page me46.511
†300 This refers to the sequel to Paul Lafargue's article `Dvizhenie pozemel'noj sobstvennosti vo Frantsii' (`The Movement of Land Property in France'). It was published in full in Russian in the Ustoi (Principles) magazine, Nos. 3-4 and 6, 1882. — 240
Page me46.511
†301 The reference is to Charles V's abortive campaign of 1541 in Algeria (which at the time formed part of the Ottoman Empire) under the pretext of suppressing the pirates who had made it their base. Having suffered a crushing defeat at the hands of the Turkish troops near the town of Algiers, the Spanish troops were driven from the country's other strongholds. — 241
Page me46.511
†302 Engels learned about this from Lavrov's note of 6 April 1882. — 244
Page me46.511
†303 In early April 1882, the Social-Democratic deputy Bruno Geiser received a provocative anonymous letter from New York about preparations for an insurrection in Germany. Geiser informed the police about the letter and made a statement to the effect that the German Social-Democrats had never aimed at a revolution. The leader `Bekennt Farbe!' in Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 16, 13 April 1882, sharply criticised Geiser's statement and contained a reminder that the party was indeed trying to bring forward a revolution in Germany. — 244
Page me46.511

†304 Probably a reference to one of Marx's visits to his uncle Lion Philips in Zalt-Bommel (Holland). Marx visited him between 28 February and 16 March 1861, late August-early September 1862, 21 December 1863-19 February 1864 and 19 March-8 April 1865. — 246
Page me46.511
†305 On 20 April 1882, the Kölnische Zeitung, No. 109, carried a report marked `Konstantinopel' which exposed the machinations of Baron Moritz Hirsch, a notorious Austrian railway speculator to whom Turkey had granted a railway concession. — 247
Page me46.511
†306 An allusion to the poetic efforts of King Ludwig I of Bavaria, whose trivial verses, later completely forgotten, diverged from proper German grammar and provoked a great deal of ridicule. — 249
Page me46.511
†307 The Editors do not have Darwin's letter to Marx; Longuet mentioned it in Darwin's obituary carried by La Justice and reprinted by Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 18, 27 April 1882 (the note `Darwin'). — 251
Page me46.511
†308 The mounting discontent of the Irish people forced Gladstone's government to make certain concessions, notably to repeal the emergency measures introduced in 1881 (see Note 123). On 2 May 1882, the leaders of the Irish national movement were released from prison. The Viceroy of Ireland Francis Thomas Cowper and Secretary for Ireland William Forster, both advocates of emergency measures, resigned. — 251

Page Break me46.512
Page me46.512
†309 Engels alludes to the numerous terrorist acts in Ireland in 1882 provoked by the intolerable position of the tenants there: twice as many landlords, their agents, British government officials, and others were assassinated as compared with the previous years. — 252
Page me46.512
†310 Having left Algiers on 2 May 1882 on his doctor's advice, Marx travelled to Monte Carlo via Marseilles and Nice, and lived there for a month, up to 3 June. — 252, 253, 369
Page me46.512
†311 Engels stopped over in Genoa on 5-6 October 1849 on his way from Switzerland (he had emigrated there after the defeat of the Baden-Palatinate uprising) to England. He had to travel via Italy since he was liable to be arrested if he entered Germany or France. — 253
Page me46.512
†312 The newly appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland, Lord Cavendish, and the deputy of the previous secretary, Thomas Henry Burke, were assassinated on 6 May 1882 in Phoenix Park, Dublin, by members of the terrorist organisation called The Invincible, which included former Fenians (the Fenians were a secret Irish revolutionary, or republican, brotherhood, which fought for Irish independence and the establishment of an Irish republic in the 1850s-60s). Marx and Engels disapproved of the terrorist and anarchist tactics of the Fenians' epigones (see this volume, p. 247). — 254, 286

Page me46.512
†313 In the manuscript the letter is dated 10 March. This is a slip of the pen, since Engels is replying here to the question Eduard Bernstein asked about Mary-Isis in his letter of 4 May. — 256
Page me46.512
†314 The reference is to the exchange of opinions between Engels and Bernstein concerning Engels' article `Bruno Bauer and Early Christianity' written in the second half of April 1882. It was published in Der Sozialdemokrat, 4 and 11 May. — 256
Page me46.512
†315 See present edition, Vol. 35, Chapter III. — 257
Page me46.512
†316 In his letter to Engels of 4 October 1882, Bernstein made inquiries about the Zurich businessman Louis Bamberger, who had claimed he knew Marx, Engels and Freiligrath. — 258
Page me46.512
†317 Engels is referring to Bebel's letter to Marx of 12 December 1881 in which he offered Marx his condolences on the death of his wife, Jenny. He also wrote about the difficulties being encountered by Der Sozialdemokrat and the results of the Reichstag elections of 1881, in which the Social-Democrats had done quite well. — 259
Page me46.512
†318 Engels is referring to the materials carried by Der Sozialdemokrat, Nos. 4, 5 and 9 on 19, 26 January and 23 February 1882. They gave a rebuff to Ernst Breuel's two open letters (Nos. 4 and 9, 19 January and 23 February) in which he accused the editors of bias, anarchist leanings, etc., in connection with their criticism of Wilhelm Hasenclever's and Wilhelm Blos' opportunist stand (see Note 240). — 259
Page me46.512
†319 The Echternach procession — an annual festival held on Trinity Sunday ever since the

Page Break me46.513
Middle Ages in the town of Echternach (Luxembourg) as a token of gratitude for the subsidence of the St Vitus' dance, epidemic that raged there in 1374. The members of the procession do not just move forward but make more complicated forward and backward steps. — 262
Page me46.513
†320 The German playwright and literary critic Amadeus Gottfried Adolf Müllner gave pride of place in his plays to fate and predestination. Necessary romantic attributes of the so-called tragedies of fate were unlucky days, ill omens, fatal weapons, etc.; the plot usually had a tragic end. — 263
Page me46.513
†321 Presumably this refers to Engels' letter received by Marx before 20 May 1882. — 266
Page me46.513
†322 Here and below, Marx ironically alludes to Offenbach's comic opera The Duchess of Gerolstein; in the latter half of the 19th century, the leading part in it was played by the famous French actress and singer Hortense Schneider. — 268

Page me46.513
†323 On his way from Monte Carlo to Argenteuil Marx stopped over in Cannes between 3 and 5 June 1882. — 272
Page me46.513
†324 Garibaldi died on 2 June 1882 of bronchial catarrh. — 274
Page me46.513
†325 A joking allusion to the Old Testament dictums about dust being the serpent's meat (Genesis 3:14, and Isaiah 65:25), as well as to Darwin's book The Formation of Vegetable Mould, through the Action of Worms, with Observations on Their Habits, London, 1881. According to Darwin, worms help in the formation of humus by digging up the earth and passing it through their bowels. — 274
Page me46.513
†326 An ironic allusion to Adolph von Knigge's work Ueber den Umgang mit Menschen (Hanover, 1804) laying down the rules of human behaviour in contacts with other people. Knigge's opus abounded in superficial discourse and truisms. — 274
Page me46.513
†327 Between 6 June and 22 August, Marx stayed with his daughter Jenny Longuet in Argenteuil. — 275, 305, 369
Page me46.513
†328 After more than nine years of emigration in London Paul Lafargue returned to Paris in early April 1882. — 275, 276
Page me46.513
†329 This meeting held by the Democratic Federation (see Note 158) on 11 June 1882, in which about 40,000 people took part, was in protest at the introduction of new Coercion Bills in Ireland (see Note 123). — 276
Page me46.513
†330 The letter was published in English for the first time in the magazine Science and Society, Vol. II, No. 2, New York, 1938 (the first paragraph of the letter was omitted). — 278
Page me46.513
†331 In a letter of 5 May 1882, Sorge asked Engels to pay for his subscription to several newspapers (promising to send him the money later) and to look through the English translation of the Manifesto of the Communist Party which Engels had received previously and which Sorge intended to publish in the United States. He also asked Engels for a preface or an afterword for this publication. — 278
Page me46.513
†332 Engels ironically compares the opportunist-minded Social-Democratic deputies in the Reichstag with the bourgeois constitutionalists at the time of the 1848-49 revolution in Germany, whom democratic republicans had nicknamed `wailers' (`Heuler'). — 279

Page Break me46.514
Page me46.514
†333 This article outlined the programme of the opportunist trend in the German Social-Democratic Party after the promulgation of the Anti-Socialist Law in Germany in October 1878. Marx and Engels subjected the article to a detailed analysis and crushing critique in their `Circular Letter to August Bebel, Wilhelm Liebknecht, Wilhelm Bracke and Others', III. The Manifesto of the Zurich Trio (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 262-69). — 280

Page me46.514
†334 The Brimstone Gang (Schwefelbande) — the name of a students' association at Jena University in the 1770s, whose members were notorious for their brawls. Subsequently, the phrase became widespread. In 1849-50, a group of German petty-bourgeois refugees in Geneva were known by this name. In 1859, the Bonapartist agent Karl Vogt slanderously linked the activities of this `Brimstone gang' with Marx and his followers. Marx dealt with the matter in his pamphlet Herr Vogt (present edition, Vol. 17, pp. 28-37). — 281
Page me46.514
†335 The event described by Engels took place during the Baden-Palatinate uprising in May-July 1849, in which he was involved (see his work `The Campaign for the German Imperial Constitution', present edition, Vol. 10, pp. 149-239). — 281
Page me46.514
†336 The first article which appeared in Der Sozialdemokrat under Engels' name was the obituary `Jenny Marx, née von Westphalen' (No. 50, 8 December 1881; see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 422-24). But he considered his first official contribution to the newspaper to be the article `Bruno Bauer and Early Christianity' (No. 19, 4 May 1882). — 283
Page me46.514
†337 The reference is to the Congress of the Federative Union of the Centre held on 14-21 May 1882 in Paris, which confirmed the decisions to expel the editors of L'Égalité passed by the meetings of the Federative Union of the Centre held on 17 and 24 January (see Note 265). The note entitled `Frankreich' in Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 23, 1 June 1882 denounced the congress decision on the expulsion of the Égalité group. The passage mentioned in this letter appeared, in translation, in L'Égalité, No. 27, 3rd series, 11 June 1882. The Editors do not have the issue of the Prolétaire with the reply to this. — 283, 341
Page me46.514
†338 Adolf Hepner, a German Social-Democrat who had emigrated to the United States, wrote to Engels on 3 May 1882 asking for permission to reprint Marx's and Engels' works in the USA. (For Engels' reply to Hepner on his own and Marx's behalf, see this volume, pp. 294-95). — 284
Page me46.514
†339 On 18 May 1882, Der Sozialdemokrat (No. 21) featured a leader `Die Situation in Irland' written by Bernstein under the pen-name Leo. Engels considered it necessary to explain his stand in a letter to Bernstein. The latter passed it on to Liebknecht, who included a major part of it, without the author's permission and with editorial comments, in the article `Zur irischen Frage' printed by Der Sozialdemokrat No. 29 on 13 July 1882. Liebknecht supplied the letter with a polemical conclusion and the following editorial introduction: `A friend of Ireland, familiar with the country and the people as few people are, writes to us from London about his disagreement on individual points with the opinion set forth in Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 21.' Engels voiced his protest at the unauthorised publication in a letter to Bernstein of 9 August 1882 (see this volume, pp. 300-01).

Page me46.514
Part of the original has been lost, which is why the letter is printed according to

Page Break me46.515
Der Sozialdemokrat and partly to the extant original manuscript. The letter was published in English for the first time, in part, in: Marx and Engels, On Colonialism, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1959. — 285, 301
Page me46.515
†340 Ribbonmen — participants in the peasant movement that arose in Northern Ireland in the late 18th century. They were united in secret groups, whose emblem was a strip of green cloth.
Page me46.515
Whiteboys — participants in the Irish peasant movement, which in the 1760s grew into a large-scale rebellion against the rule of English landlords. To make themselves unrecognisable, these men, who usually acted at night, painted their faces black and wore white shirts. In the 19th century, many of their societies merged with those of the Ribbonmen, but some continued to operate under their old name up to the end of the century.
Page me46.515
Captain Rock — the name of the members of the various secret peasant societies that emerged and operated in Ireland between the second half of the 18th and the mid-19th century.
Page me46.515
Captain Moonlight — the usual signature under warnings sent by the Ribbonmen's secret society to landlords. — 285
Page me46.515
†341 Catholic Emancipation — the abolition of restrictions on the political rights of Catholics in Ireland by the British Parliament in 1829 as a result of a mass movement. Catholics were granted the right to stand for election to Parliament and to hold certain government offices. Simultaneously, the property qualification was raised fivefold. The British ruling classes hoped this manoeuvre would bring the élite of the Irish bourgeoisie and Catholic landowners over to their side and cause a split in the Irish national movement. — 286
Page me46.515
†342 A reference to the conflict between the USA and Great Britain caused by the latter's aid to the Southern states during the American Civil War of 1861-65. The British government built and equipped warships for the Southerners, which greatly undermined the Northerners' trade by their actions. Among the vessels was the Alabama, a privateering ship that sank 70 Northerners' vessels. After the war, the US government demanded that the British government make full reparations for the damage inflicted by the Alabama and other privateering vessels to the property of American citizens. Under the decision of an arbitration court passed in Geneva on 14 September 1872, Britain was to pay $15.5 mln to the United States, which it indeed did. — 287
Page me46.515

†343 An allusion to the weekly newspaper Die Freiheit published in London by Johann Most, a German anarchist refugee, and edited by Karl Schneidt. The newspaper was obsessed with ultra-revolutionary rhetoric and notorious for its rude attacks against the policies and tactics of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany and its activists. — 289
Page me46.515
†344 The reference is to the events that occurred at the congress of the Federative Union of the Centre held on 14-21 May 1882 (see Note 337).
Page me46.515
On the National Committee, see Note 250. — 289
Page me46.515
†345 The Wyden Conference of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany (August 1880) instructed the party leadership to set up a communication office that would establish and maintain contacts with the German Social-Democrats and the socialist parties and organisations in other countries. — 290

Page Break me46.516
Page me46.516
†346 This refers to Franz Mehring's article in the bourgeois newspaper Weser-Zeitung of 2 July 1882. An opponent of the Social-Democratic movement at the time, Mehring lashed out against Der Sozialdemokrat. He referred to Marx's and Engels' disagreement with the editorial board and stressed the paper's `lack of tact', for which, he alleged, German workers were being constantly persecuted. By way of conclusion, Mehring promised further exposures of the newspaper. He also wrote about Marx's poor health and predicted he might be unable to complete his work on Capital. The Sozialdemokrat's editors used the advice by Engels given here in an article against Mehring written in quite harsh terms and printed under the heading `In eigener Sache' in No. 31, 27 July 1882. — 291, 299, 301, 377
Page me46.516
†347 Engels is referring to his article `Bruno Bauer and Early Christianity' published in Der Sozialdemokrat, Nos. 19 and 20 on 4 and 11 May 1882 (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 427-35). — 292
Page me46.516
†348 In a letter of 11 May 1882, Kautsky asked for Engels' opinion on the future of the colonies, notably those in Asia, after the victory of the European proletariat. Kautsky's second letter on this subject is dated 31 May 1882. — 292
Page me46.516
†349 This letter was published in English for the first time in: Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Letters to Americans. 1848-1895. A Selection, International Publishers, New York, 1953. — 293, 466
Page me46.516
†350 In his letter of 3 May 1882, Adolf Hepner, a German Social-Democrat who had emigrated to the United States, asked Engels for permission to publish his and Marx's works in the Arbeiter-Library series. — 293
Page me46.516
†351 A reference to Johann Most's pamphlet Kapital und Arbeit. Ein populärer Auszug aus `Das Kapital' von Karl Marx. 2nd edition, Chemnitz [1876]. The first edition appeared in Chemnitz in 1873. On Liebknecht's request, Marx, with Engels' help, made changes in and additions to the second edition. For Marx's appraisal of this publication, see Engels' letter to Philip Van Patten of 18 April 1883, present edition, Vol. 47. — 294

Page me46.516
†352 A reference to the second Russian edition of Marx's and Engels' Manifesto of the Communist Party (see Note 293). — 295
Page me46.516
†353 The growth of the Egyptian national movement in the early 1880s (see Note 355) led to a provisional alliance between Britain and France. On the eve of the conflict with Egypt provoked by Britain in July 1882, there were differences of opinion among French politicians: the former Prime Minister Gambetta and Freycinet, who replaced him in January 1882 (see Note 356), favoured intervention. The radical leader Clemenceau, who sought revenge on Germany, opposed the idea of an invasion, insisting that it would further aggravate the Anglo-French contradictions and thus consolidate the position of Germany. — 296
Page me46.516
†354 Engadine — a Swiss mountain watering place famous for its extremely healthy climate. — 297
Page me46.516
†355 In 1879-82, Egypt witnessed an upsurge of the national liberation movement against British and French capital which had established direct financial control over the country (in 1878, representatives of Britain and France were made ministers of the Egyptian government and given the right of veto). The insurrection of the Cairo garrison forced the Khedive of Egypt (see Note 362) to issue a constitution in September 1881. In December, Egypt acquired a parliament led by the National Party which had been founded that same year and represented a bloc of liberal landowners and merchants with the patriotically minded officers and intellectuals supported by the peasantry and petty bourgeoisie. The National Party set the country's independence as its target (`Egypt for Egyptians'). However, in the summer of 1882, having provoked a conflict with Egypt, Britain opened hostilities, which, despite the resistance of the Egyptian troops headed by Colonel Arabi, ended in a British victory. In September, they captured Cairo, and Egypt became their colony to all intents and purposes.

Page Break me46.517
Page me46.517
The public meetings of protest against the British aggression and the bombardment of Alexandria mentioned by Marx were organised in Paris by the Federation of the Centre (see Note 230) in late July 1882 with the participation of the Citoyen editors Henri Brissac, Jules Guesde and Paul Lafargue. The Guesdists' resolution on Egypt hailed Arabi Pasha and the National Party as worthy of the great mission they had assumed. — 298, 301, 313, 317, 319, 323, 335
Page me46.517
†356 Freycinet agreed to cooperation with Britain only in the Suez Canal zone. His proposal was turned down by the Chamber of Deputies on 29 July 1882, and his cabinet resigned. — 298

Page me46.517
†357 Marx is referring to the Quadruple Alliance, the convention of the four powers, Britain, Russia, Austria and Prussia, signed on 15 July 1840 in London. Its objective was to render military aid to the Sultan of Turkey against the Egyptian ruler Mohammed Ali to settle the Egyptian crisis of 1839-41, which arose from the rivalry of the European powers over hegemony in Egypt and the Middle East. — 298
Page me46.517
†358 Engels is referring to Johann Philipp Becker's letter of 2 August 1882, in reply to his own letter of 10 February 1882 (see this volume, pp. 196-98). — 300
Page me46.517
†359 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: Marx and Engels, On Colonialism, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1959. — 300
Page me46.517
†360 The reference is to the French edition of Engels' work Socialism: Utopian and Scientific (see Note 20) and the plans for a German edition. Bernstein wrote to Engels about the need for such an edition on 7 July 1882 (see Note 378) and asked for a short afterword on Bismarck's state socialism. — 300, 336
Page me46.517
†361 Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 32, 3 August 1882, published the article `Die Socialdemokratie und die egyptische Frage', which approved of the resolution passed by the meeting convened in Paris by the Guesdists. They protested against the bombardment of Alexandria by the British and hailed Arabi Pasha and the National Party. — 301
Page me46.517
†362 Khedive — the title (1867-1914) of the viceroy of Egypt. — 302
Page me46.517
†363 Fellah — a peasant or agricultural labourer in Egypt. The fellaheen constituted the lowest exploited class of the rural population. — 302
Page me46.517
†364 The contribution Engels had promised for the feuilleton was the old English folk song `The Vicar of Bray', which he translated into German in early September 1882; the translation, with Engels' comments on the political significance it had for Germany, was published under his name by Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 37, 7 September 1882 (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 436-38). — 302
Page me46.517
†365 On 16 September 1882, Jenny Longuet gave birth to a daughter named Jenny after her grandmother. — 303, 309, 329, 331, 372

Page Break me46.518
Page me46.518
†366 Engels spent his holiday in Great Yarmouth on the east coast of England from 11 August to 8 September 1882. — 305, 306
Page me46.518
†367 Engels terminated his employment at the Manchester trade firm on 1 July 1869 and moved to London on 20 September 1870. — 306
Page me46.518

†368 On 2 August 1882 Paul Brousse, S. Deynaud, Victor Marouck and Louis Mouttet resigned from the Bataille editorial board. The reason they gave for their split with its editor-in-chief Prosper Lissagaray was secretary J. Labusquiére's announcement that he was resigning from the paper because Lissagaray was restricting his initiative, controlling his actions and keeping a check on the contributions of the above-mentioned editors, Labusquiére's friends. — 309
Page me46.518
†369 Marx and his daughter Laura stayed in Lausanne from 23 to 27 August 1882. — 310
Page me46.518
†370 Marx stayed in Argenteuil between 26 July and 16 August 1881 and 9 and 16 February 1882. — 310
Page me46.518
†371 On 2 August 1882, the Belgian socialist César De Paepe, suspecting Arthur Duverger, secretary of the magazine L'Europe, where he himself was also employed at the time, of having an affair with his wife, gravely wounded him. The jury acquitted De Paepe. — 312
Page me46.518
†372 This refers to the speech made on 23 August 1882 by Carl Wilhelm Siemens, President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, at the Association's 52nd congress in Southampton. It was published in Nature, No. 669, 24 August 1882.
Page me46.518
The British Association for the Advancement of Science was founded in 1831 and still exists; the materials of its annual meetings are published as reports. — 314, 384
Page me46.518
†373 Engels lived in Switzerland (Geneva, Lausanne, Neuchâtel and Berne) from the second half of October 1848 to mid-January 1849 and from 12 July to early October 1849. In 1849, he also visited Vevey (Canton Vaud), where he stayed from 24 July to about 20 August. — 314, 329
Page me46.518
†374 Marx and his daughter Laura Lafargue stayed in Vevey (Canton Vaud, Switzerland) from 27 August to 25 September 1882. — 315, 317, 334, 335, 369
Page me46.518
†375 A reference to the ceremonies held in Rome and throughout Italy on 11 June 1882 to commemorate Giuseppe Garibaldi, who died on 2 June. — 317
Page me46.518
†376 The international congress attended by representatives of Russia, Germany, Austria-Hungary, France, Great Britain, Italy and Turkey and chaired by Bismarck was held in Berlin between 13 June and 13 July 1878. The congress ended with the signing of the Berlin Treaty revising the terms of the San Stefano preliminary treaty of 1878 that terminated the Russo-Turkish War of 1877-78 to the detriment of Russia and the Slav peoples of the Balkans. The territory of self-governing Bulgaria defined by the San Stefano Treaty was more than halved; the Bulgarian districts south of the Balkans were to form an autonomous province called Eastern Rumelia and remain under the Sultan; and the territory of Montenegro was significantly curtailed. The Berlin Treaty confirmed the article of the San Stefano Treaty that returned to Russia the part of Bessarabia lost in 1856 but it also sanctioned the occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary. — 319, 471, 472

Page Break me46.519
Page me46.519
†377 In a letter of 11 May 1882 Kautsky asked Engels to give his opinion of the future of the colonies in Asia after the victory of the European proletariat. As for Kautsky himself, he asserted that the British proletariat and India would both benefit if India remained under Britain. — 321
Page me46.519
†378 A reference to the preparation of the German edition of Engels' work Socialism: Utopian and Scientific (see Note 360). As he had promised, Engels prepared the German text by making additions to and changes in it, and wrote a preface (present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 457-59). He also supplemented it by his essay `The Mark' (ibid., pp. 439-56) on the emergence and development of landed property in Germany. The work was finished in September 1882, and the pamphlet was printed in Hottingen-Zurich at the end of the year and was on sale in early 1883 under the title Die Entwicklung des Sozialismus von der Utopie zur Wissenschaft. — 324, 331, 344, 352, 353, 358, 369, 390, 395, 416, 433, 454
Page me46.519
†379 The plan for a series of articles or a pamphlet about Bismarck and Lassalle was not carried out by Engels. — 324
Page me46.519
†380 Engels touches here on the Lassallean tenet about `a fair distribution of the proceeds of labour', which found expression in the Gotha Programme. Marx analysed it in his work Critique of the Gotha Programme (present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 83-88). — 324
Page me46.519
†381 This refers to the merger of the two German workers' parties, the Eisenachers and the Lassalleans (see Note 269), which took place at the Gotha Unity Congress held between 22 and 27 May 1875. — 324, 343
Page me46.519
†382 At the 29 May meeting of the Gotha Congress of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany (27-29 May 1877), Johann Most proposed that the party's central printed organ should no longer feature articles like Engels' pieces criticising Dühring. He was supported by Carl Julius Vahlteich. August Bebel suggested a compromise: Vorwärts was to terminate publication of Engels' articles against Dühring, which were to appear as a separate pamphlet put out by Vorwärts publishers. Wilhelm Liebknecht resolutely opposed Most's and Vahlteich's proposal, reminding the audience that the decision to have Engels' works published had been passed by the previous congress, that, in significance, they were second only to Marx's Capital, and that they were essential to promote the interests of the party. Liebknecht made an amendment to Bebel's proposal: to publish such articles in the Vorwärts theoretical supplement or in Die Zukunft magazine, or as separate pamphlets. The congress approved Bebel's proposal with Liebknecht's amendment. Parts II and III of Anti-Dühring were published in the supplement to the Vorwärts. — 325

Page me46.519
†383 A reference to two articles by Georg Heinrich Vollmar published anonymously in Der Sozialdemokrat, Nos. 34 and 35, 17 and 24 August 1882 under the heading `Aufhebung des Ausnahmegesetzes?'. In the same year, they appeared in Hottingen-Zurich as a separate pamphlet entitled Aufhebung des Sozialistengesetzes? Ein Wort zur Taktik der deutschen Sozialdemokratie (signed `Surtur'). — 325, 332, 336, 349, 352, 357
Page me46.519
†384 Engels is referring to his translation of the English song `The Vicar of Bray' (see Note 364), sung to a folk tune. — 326, 331
Page me46.519
†385 Kabyles, a branch of the great Berber people living in Northern Algeria. — 327

Page Break me46.520
Page me46.520
†386 On 15 September 1882, La Bataille and Le Citoyen carried notices of Bebel's death. On 16 September, the Journal de Genéve reported that Bebel died in Zwickau. — 328
Page me46.520
†387 Engels did not carry this plan through. — 332
Page me46.520
†388 Marx and Engels repeatedly wrote about taxation in the Neue Rheinische Zeitung in 1848-49 (see, e.g., `No More Taxes!!!', `Appeal', `The Trial of the Rhenish District Committee of Democrats', present edition, Vol. 8, pp. 36, 41 and 323-39). In 1850, Marx took up the issue of taxes in his work The Class Struggles in France. 1848 to 1850; it was also dealt with in Marx's and Engels' `Address of the Central Authority to the League, March 1850' and some other works (see present edition, Vol. 10, pp. 45-145, 277-87). — 332
Page me46.520
†389 An allusion to the notices of Marx's death printed by some German bourgeois papers in late 1881. — 335
Page me46.520
†390 See also Note 346. — 335
Page me46.520
†391 An allusion to the Biblical legend about the Jews' flight from Egyptian captivity.
Page me46.520
In 1875, assisted by the Rothschild banking house in Britain and in France (Erlanger was the Rothschilds' representative in Egypt), the British Prime Minister Disraeli bought for the British government the Suez Canal shares belonging to the Egyptian Khedive. — 337
Page me46.520
†392 On his way back from Switzerland to London, from 28 September to the first days of October Marx stayed with his daughter Jenny Longuet in Argenteuil, whence he made several trips to Paris. — 337
Page me46.520

†393 In a letter to Engels of 28 September 1882, Laura Lafargue wrote that on 26 September, on their way from Vevey to France, she and Marx had met Johann Philipp Becker in Geneva. Bad weather drove them away the next day. — 337
Page me46.520
†394 The reference is to the two congresses of French socialists held simultaneously in the autumn of 1882: that of the Possibilists in St-Étienne and that of the Guesdists (Marxists) in Roanne.
Page me46.520
At the regular Congress of the French Workers' Party convened in St-Étienne on 25 September 1882, a split took place. The Marxist (Guesdist) deputies left the Congress and assembled in Roanne on 26 September, declaring themselves the Sixth Congress of the French Workers' Party. The Possibilists, who stayed in St-Étienne, rejected, both formally and essentially, the programme drawn up with Marx's participation and approved at the Congress in Le Havre in November 1880 (see Note 68), and granted the districts the right to produce their own election manifestos. In Engels' words, in the programme, approved by the St-Étienne Congress after a revision of its preamble, its `proletarian class character has been eliminated' (see this volume, pp. 341-42). The congress expelled from the party the leaders and activists of its Marxist wing: Jules Guesde, Paul Lafargue, Émile Massard, Gabriel Deville, Fréjac and Gustave Bazin, and approved a new name for the party, Fédération française des travailleurs socialistes révolutionnaires.
Page me46.520
The Marxist congress in Roanne, which sat up to 1 October, confirmed its commitment to the Marxist programme and retained the old name, the French Workers' Party. It had its stronghold among workers in the major industrial centres and certain groups of the Paris proletariat, mainly at big factories. The Possibilists were followed by Parisian artisans, as well as by workers in the south (Marseilles) and west (Brittany), who were still under the influence of petty-bourgeois ideas. — 339, 341, 350, 361, 406, 408

Page Break me46.521
Page me46.521
†395 Marx paraphrases the beginning of a saying popular in the early Middle Ages in the European countries: `The devil was sick, the devil a monk would be; the devil was well, the devil a monk was he'. — 339
Page me46.521
†396 Radicals (the 1880s and 1890s) — a French parliamentary group that had split off from the bourgeois party of moderate republicans (`opportunists'). Their leader was Clemenceau. The radicals put forward a bourgeois-democratic programme virtually abandoned by the `parent' party: abolition of the Senate, separation of the Church from the state, introduction of progressive income taxes. In order to win voters over to its side, the group also demanded shorter working hours, disability pensions, and some other social and economic steps. — 342
Page me46.521
†397 An allusion to Vollmar's second article, `Aufhebung des Ausnahmegesetzes?' (see Note 383). — 342

Page me46.521
†398 It has not been established just what material Engels enclosed with the letter. It may be the article `Aus Frankreich' featured by Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 45, 2 November 1882. — 344
Page me46.521
†399 Coup de Jarnac — a treacherous blow. The expression originated with the name of one of the fighters in a duel that took place on 10 July 1547, Guy Chabot de Jarnac, who dealt his adversary a cunningly aimed surprise blow, which proved lethal. — 344
Page me46.521
†400 The reference is to the challenge to a duel sent by Prosper Lissagaray to Paul Lafargue; likening Lissagaray to the French politician and journalist Paul Adolph Granier de Cassagnac, Engels is ironically hinting at Cassagnac's scandalous press publications, which led to a number of duels and trials for libel. — 345
Page me46.521
†401 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in The Labour Monthly, London, 1933, Vol. 15, No. 9. — 346
Page me46.521
†402 In August 1882, during a miners' strike at Montceau-les-Mines the anarchists staged a number of provocations, laying the blame on the strikers. The arrested men were brought to court in October. — 347, 406
Page me46.521
†403 A reference to the first Factory Act passed by the Swiss government on 23 March 1877, which came into force on 1 March 1878 as the Union Law on the Labour Conditions at Factories (das Bundesgesetz betreffend die Arbeit in den Fabriken). — 347, 364, 373
Page me46.521
†404 Ringleader (Haupt-Chef) — at the Cologne Communist trial in 1852, a Prussian police official, Stieber, thus called agent provocateur Cherval, seeking to ascribe to him the leading role in the Communist League and create an impression that he had contacts with Marx and the accused in the trial (see Marx's pamphlet Revelations Concerning the Communist Trial in Cologne, present edition, Vol. 11, pp. 407-19). — 347
Page me46.521
†405 Liebknecht was in prison from 15 October 1882; Bebel received a jail sentence to begin on 1 November 1882 and served it in the Leipzig prison until 9 March 1883. — 348, 350, 453

Page Break me46.522
Page me46.522
†406 According to the Bible, during the Jews' flight from Egyptian captivity, the weakspirited among them, driven by hunger and privation, began to yearn for the days spent in captivity, when they were at least well fed. — 349
Page me46.522
†407 Engels is referring to August Bebel's article `Aufhebung des Sozialistengesetzes?' in Der Sozialdemokrat, No. 42, 12 October 1882, directed against two Vollmar's articles printed in Der Sozialdemokrat and as a separate pamphlet (see Note 383). Bebel's critique was spearheaded mostly against Vollmar's second article, in which the author advocated putsch tactics and a secret organisation of the party. Bebel denounced these tactics as unacceptable and even fatal for the party. In a letter to Engels of 1 October 1882, he explained that the imprudent language and tone of the articles like those by Vollmar could well entail unnecessary losses in the party. — 349, 357

Page me46.522
†408 Lassalle's tenet that, with respect to the proletariat, all the other classes were `one reactionary mass' was incorporated in the programme of the Social-Democratic Party of Germany approved at the Gotha Congress (see Note 381). For a criticism of this tenet, see Marx's work `Critique of the Gotha Programme' (present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 88-89). In this letter, Engels uses the phrase `single reactionary mass'. — 349, 357
Page me46.522
†409 After Bebel's critique of Vollmar's articles published as a separate pamphlet under the pen-name `Surtur' (see Note 383), the Right-wing Social Democrat Louis Viereck stated in his newspaper Süddeutsche Post that the pamphlet did not express the opinion of the party. Der Sozialdemokrat (No. 44, 26 October 1882) protested at Viereck's statement, stressing that the articles comprising the pamphlet were written by a party member and originally published by the party's printed organ. — 350
Page me46.522
†410 Léon Picard's article mentioned here appeared in Le Citoyen on 3 September 1882 under the heading `L'affaire de la rue Saint-Marc'. Chauvinistic in spirit, it was disclaimed by the editorial board. The article set the German refugees against the Guesdists (for details, see Engels' letter to Bernstein of 4 November 1882, this volume, pp. 359-60). — 352, 354, 360
Page me46.522
†411 Marx stayed in the south of England in Ventnor (the Isle of Wight) between 30 October 1882 and 13 January 1883. — 353, 363, 368, 406, 419, 429, 430
Page me46.522
†412 The Cuban revolutionaries General Antonio Maceo and two of his fellow-officers arrested by the Spanish government escaped from prison in Cadiz in August 1882 and sought political asylum in the Gibraltar fortress on British territory. On 20 August they arrived at the fortress but were instantly arrested and handed over to the Spanish police. At the House of Commons sittings of 31 October and 7 November, members of Gladstone's Liberal government (Ashley, Charles Dilke et al.) attempted to justify the Gibraltar authorities. At the same time, they denied that the government in London had anything to do with the matter. — 353, 365, 373
Page me46.522
†413 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: K. Marx, F. Engels, V.I. Lenin, On Scientific Communism, Progress Publishers, Moscow, 1967. — 353
Page me46.522
†414 Engels planned to write a pamphlet about Bismarck and Lassalle (see this volume, pp. 324-25, 433). — 353, 359
Page me46.522
†415 The Rosetta Stone, a basalt slab found in Egypt near the town of Rosetta by an officer of Napoleon's expeditionary corps in August 1799. It had a text carved out on it in the Egyptian hieroglyphic, Egyptian demotic and Greek languages. In 1822, the hieroglyphic text was deciphered by the French scholar J.F. Champollion. The slab is kept at the British Museum in London. — 354

Page Break me46.523
Page me46.523
†416 The reference is to the conflict between Guesde's followers and anarchist Godard, whom they accused of taking a bribe from the French gas company. In a letter to Engels that has not survived, Bernstein probably voiced his disapproval of the Guesdists' stand in the Godard affair.
Page me46.523
On the comparative prestige of the parties that were formed after the split of the French Workers' Party at the St-Étienne Congress, see Engels' letter to Bernstein of 28 November 1882 (this volume, pp. 386-90) in which Engels used the information contained in Lafargue's letter of 24 November. — 355, 383, 389
Page me46.523
†417 Engels uses the old battle cry, `Hie Welf, Hie Waibling!', of the two rival medieval political parties, of which one supported the Welf, and the other, the Hohenstaufen (or Waibling, from the name of their family residence and the town), dynasty. The cry sounded for the first time, or so the legend has it, during the battle at Weinsberg in 1140. Later, at the time of the struggle between the Popes and the German emperors in Italy in the 12th-15th centuries, the rivalry was between the Guelphs and the Ghibellines (the German names changed Italian-fashion). — 357
Page me46.523
†418 The Wyden Conference — the first congress of the German Social Democrats after the promulgation of the Anti-Socialist Law (see Note 16) held on 20-23 August 1880 in Wyden Castle, Canton of Zurich (Switzerland). — 358
Page me46.523
†419 The Editors are not in possession of Lafargue's letter to which Engels is referring. What is meant here is probably Brissac's and Bouis' resignation from the Égalité editorial board, and the political vacillations of Picard, an editor of L'Égalité and Le Citoyen. — 358
Page me46.523
†420 At the general elections in Italy in October 1882, socialist Andrea Costa was elected to parliament from the city of Ravenna thus becoming the first socialist deputy in the country's history.
Page me46.523
The elections to the Norwegian parliament (Storting), in which the republicans scored an impressive victory, were held in September-November 1882. — 358, 454
Page me46.523
†421 At the meeting held on 29 October 1882 in Constituency No. 18 in Montmartre, where Clemenceau was deputy, the working-class voters shouted him down. — 361
Page me46.523
†422 In late 1882, Eduard Bernstein and Georg Heinrich von Vollmar planned to open a discussion in Der Sozialdemokrat with a view to introducing changes into the party programme. The Editors followed Engels' advice and confined themselves to indirect criticism of the opportunist demands contained in the Gotha programme. — 362

Page me46.523
†423 A reference to the negotiations between the Égalité editorial board and the Banque populaire in Paris concerning the financing of L'Égalité, 4th series (it appeared between 24 October and 28 December 1882). — 363, 373
Page me46.523
†424 The term `dynamiters' gained wide currency in European conservative quarters in the 1870s-80s and was applied to the revolutionary terrorists and persons who manufactured and stored explosives. L'Égalité, 4th series, No. 19, 11 November

Page Break me46.524
1882, which reprinted the telegram from The Standard of 6 November, explained the recent political reprisals in France by the negotiations about the extradition of the `dynamiters' (Russian political refugees). — 363
Page me46.524
†425 This probably refers to the account of the National Committee report at the St-Étienne Congress (see Note 394) printed in Le Prolétaire. The report was spearheaded, almost in toto, against Guesde, Lafargue and other leaders of the revolutionary section of the Workers' Party of France and included a one-sided selection of fragments from Lafargue's letters to Benoit Malon. The Editors are not in possession of a copy of the issue of Le Prolétaire mentioned here. — 363, 394
Page me46.524
†426 At an Electricity Exhibition in Munich (1882), the French physicist Marcel Deprez demonstrated the first experimental electric transmission line he had installed between Miesbach and Munich. — 364, 374, 449
Page me46.524
†427 Marcel Deprez published the results of his research into electricity mostly in the journal La Lumiére Electrique for 1881 and 1882. His works on electric power transmission appeared in the journal Électricité for 1881. — 364
Page me46.524
†428 Marx is referring to the sensational news concerning the participation of Rivers Wilson, managing director of the English Public Debts Administration, and of Lord Sherbrooke as proxies and trustees of the Texas Galveston and Eagle railway joint-stock company. As a result of the M.P.s' interpellations in the House of Commons on 6 November 1882 pertaining to the incompatibility of British officials holding responsible jobs in the finances with their participation as trustees in speculative ventures, Rivers Wilson and Lord Sherbrooke were forced to divest themselves of the powers of company trustees. — 365, 376
Page me46.524
†429 Marx alludes to the debate on events in Egypt (see Note 355) in the House of Commons on 6 and 7 November 1882. — 365
Page me46.524
†430 The second edition of Alexander Redgrave's book The Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, with introduction, copious notes, and an elaborate index (London, 1879) was received by Marx from King's company. The copy, with Marx's notes, is extant. — 368

Page me46.524
†431 In a letter of 22 August 1882, Sorge asked Engels to deal with the matter of subscription fees for The Labour Standard. — 368
Page me46.524
†432 Peter Schlemihl — a character in Chamisso's story Peter Schlemihls wundersame Geschichte, who exchanged his shadow for a magic purse. — 369
Page me46.524
†433 Marx probably referred to William Langland's allegoric poem The Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman, together with Vita de Do-wel, Do-bet, et Do-best, secundum Wit et Resoun. There are three versions of the poem. A volume containing them all was published by the Early English Text Society in 1867-85. (The Society was founded by Frederick James Furnivall in 1864.) — 372
Page me46.524
†434 On 9 June 1880, L'Égalité (No. 21, 2nd series) carried a report (`Le patriotisme de la bourgeoisie et les Chinois') on the meeting held on 5 May 1880 by the Paris Society of Political Economists in connection with the Chinese emigration to California. Participants in the meeting praised the cheap Chinese labour. This event was also covered by Le Revue socialiste (No. 9, 5 July 1880) in the article `La Question chinoise devant les économistes', signed `B.M.'. Its author was probably Benoît Malon. — 372

Page Break me46.525
Page me46.525
†435 The manifesto of the National Council, set up as a counterbalance to the Possibilist National Committee by decision of the Roanne Congress (see note 394) on the basis of the Lyons party groups with a seat in Lyons, was printed on 5 November 1882 by L'Égalité (3rd series, No. 47) under the heading `Parti ouvrier. Conseil national'. — 373
Page me46.525
†436 Engels is referring to the House of Commons' debate on the Egyptian events (see Note 355) in early November 1882. — 373
Page me46.525
†437 Clôture — the parliamentary procedure whereby debate is closed and the measure under discussion is brought up for an immediate vote. The clôture was announced on 11 November 1882. The voting was to be on the changes in parliament procedure. — 373
Page me46.525
†438 The reference is to the first of the three articles by the German Social-Democratic refugee Georg Heinrich von Vollmar carried by Der Sozialdemokrat, Nos. 46, 47 and 49 on 9, 16 and 30 November 1882 under the heading `Zur Spaltung der französischen Arbeiterpartei' and signed `V.'. The articles were a response to the piece called `St. Étienne oder Roanne?', which appeared in Der Sozialdemokrat, Nos. 41, 42 and 44 on 5, 12 and 26 October 1882. The last one was signed `Leo' (Bernstein's pen-name). — 373, 379, 386, 408
Page me46.525
†439 Engels is referring, above all, to Dialectics of Nature (see Note 449). — 377
Page me46.525
†440 The reference is to the legal proceedings instituted against Guesde, Lafargue and other activists of the French Workers' Party for the speeches they had made in Lyons,

Roanne, Montluçon, Bézenet, and Saint-Chamond, among other places, after the Roanne Congress (see Note 394). Guesde and Bazin were summoned by the examining magistrate Édouard Piquand to the court of the first instance in Montluçon for 14 November, and Lafargue, for 21 November on the charge of instigation to civil war, assassination, burglary and arson (see Note 444), but the suspects publicly refused to appear before the jury. Lafargue, who had been staying in Paris since 7 October, was arrested by the Paris police on 12 December. In late April 1883, the jury of the town of Moulins sentenced Lafargue, Guesde and Dormoy to six months' imprisonment and a fine. Guesde and Lafargue served their sentences in the Ste Pélagie prison in Paris from 21 May 1883. — 378, 397, 401, 404, 406, 441, 445

Page me46.525

†441 Samuel Moore's mathematical research mentioned here made up a few pages of notes concerning the method of substantiating the differential calculus independently worked out by Marx (see also Engels' letter to Marx of 18 August 1881, this volume, pp. 130-32). Marx commented on Moore's notes in his letter to Engels of 22 November 1882 (see this volume, p. 380). See also Note 192. — 378, 380

Page me46.525

†442 Replying on 17 November 1882 to Engels' letters of 2-3 and 4 November, Bernstein listed the market value of the shares of the principal state-owned Prussian railways. — 379, 380

Page me46.525

†443 The Marseilles Congress, the first congress of the French Workers' Party, was held between 20 and 31 October 1879. In the sharp controversy that arose between the Marxists (collectivists), on the one hand, and the petty-bourgeois anarchists and Proudhonists, on the other, the Marxists headed by Jules Guesde got the upper hand. The congress passed a number of decisions of fundamental significance: on the nationalisation of the industries and landed property; on the seizure of political power by the workers, on the establishment of a party that assumed the official name Fédération de parti des travailleurs socialistes en France (in practice called the Workers' Party). The congress approved party rules and set the task of drawing up a programme. — 379, 380, 386

Page Break me46.526

Page me46.526

†444 A reference to Paul Lafargue's open letter to Édouard Piquand, the Montluçon examining magistrate, entitled `L'affaire de Montluçon' (L'Égalité, 4th series, No. 26, 18 November 1882) written as a reply to the summons of 15 November to appear before the jury on 21 November (see Note 440). In it, Lafargue refused to stand for trial. — 379

Page me46.526

†445 Marx is referring to the Possibilists' party established at the St-Étienne Congress and headed by Brousse and Malon (Fédération française des travailleurs socialistes révolutionnaires) (see Note 394). — 380

Page me46.526

†446 A reference to Sheldon Amos' review of John Seymour Keay's pamphlet `Spoiling the Egyptians' reprinted in London in 1882. The review appeared in The Contemporary Review, Vol. XLII, October 1882, under the heading `“Spoiling the Egyptians”: Revised Version'. Keay responded with the article `“Spoiling the Egyptians”. A Rejoinder' featured by The Contemporary Review, Vol. XLII, November 1882. — 381

Page me46.526
†447 Part of this letter was published in English for the first time in: Marx, Engels, Pre-Capitalist Socio-Economic Formations. A Collection, Progress Publishers, Moscow, 1979. — 381
Page me46.526
†448 The reference is to the split in the French workers' movement at the St-Étienne Congress in September 1882 (see Note 394). On the Marseilles Congress, see Note 443. — 384
Page me46.526
†449 Engels is referring to his manuscript Dialectics of Nature, specifically the article entitled `The Measure of Motion. — Work'.
Page me46.526
Dialectics of Nature (present edition, Vol. 25, pp. 313-588) was the culmination of profound studies carried out by Engels over a number of years. Engels wrote the items included in Dialectics of Nature from 1873 to 1882 with intervals, during which time he studied a vast amount of source material on major problems of the natural sciences and more or less completed ten articles and chapters and many notes and fragments, all in all, almost 200 sketches. After Marx's death, he became engrossed in work to complete and publish Capital and in the affairs of the international working-class movement, and had no choice but to stop work on Dialectics of Nature, which remained unfinished and unpublished in his lifetime (for more details about the work on and publication of the book, see present edition, Vol. 25, pp. XIX-XXV and 660-63). — 384, 395
Page me46.526
†450 Lafargue's article `Le Ministére enchanté' was printed by L'Égalité, 4th series, No. 32, 24 November 1882; it sharply criticised the activities of former Finance Minister Jean Batiste Léon Say. — 385, 402
Page me46.526
†451 In 1882, Marx stayed with his daughter Jenny Longuet in Argenteuil between 6 June and 22 August and from 28 September and into the first days of October. — 385

Page Break me46.527
Page me46.527
†452 Engels intended to use these materials for a pamphlet about Bismarck and Lassalle (this volume, pp. 324-25). He did not carry out his plan. — 386
Page me46.527
†453 The information and quotations concerning the balance of power between the Possibilists and the Guesdists after the split in the French Workers' Party (see Note 394) were contained in Lafargue's letter to Engels of 24 November 1882. — 387
Page me46.527
†454 Fédération du Nord (Northern Federation), which was formed in the spring of 1880, was one of the six federations into which the French Workers' Party had been organisationally divided prior to its split (see Note 394). The Northern Federation united the party branches in Lille and Roubaix. After the split at the St-Étienne Congress, it sided with the Marxists. — 387, 408

Page me46.527
†455 The reference is to the Preamble to the Programme of the French Workers' Party drawn up by Marx (see present edition, Vol. 24, p. 340). — 387
Page me46.527
†456 Engels alludes to the stand taken by Johannes Miquel, a former member of the Communist League and later a National Liberal and minister in the Prussian government. Miquel's departure from the revolutionary stand was apparent even in his letters to Marx of 6 April and 15 August 1856. Miquel maintained that a revolution in Germany was not `all that near' and that during it the proletariat should form a firm alliance not only with the petty but with the liberal bourgeoisie as well, and after its victory adopt tactics that would not alienate the bourgeoisie. — 388, 449
Page me46.527
†457 This refers to the St-Étienne and Roanne congresses (see Note 394). — 389
Page me46.527
†458 A reference to the exposure of the German agent provocateur Johann Karl Friedrich Elias Schmidt in Zurich. The Sozialdemokrat editors brought forth a pamphlet Die deutsche Geheimpolizei im Kampfe mit der Sozialdemokratie. Aktenstücke und Enthüllungen auf Grund authentischen Materials dargestellt (Hottingen-Zurich, 1882) that described the machinations of Schmidt and his superiors. It was reprinted there in the same year with the same subtitle under the heading Deutsche Polizeischuftereien. — 390, 436

Page me46.527
†459 Engels is referring to Bebel's letter of 14 November 1882 written in the Leipzig prison in reply to Engels' letter of 28 October 1882 (see this volume, pp. 349-51). — 390, 392
Page me46.527
†460 Engels is referring, above all, to Marx's unfinished work on Polish history which he was writing in 1863 and which involved the use of the book Vom Entstehen und Untergange der polnischen Konstitution vom 3-ten May 1791, Parts I-II, 1793 (it was published anonymously in Leipzig; its authors were J. Potocki, H. Kollantaj and F.K. Dmochowski). The extant sketches for the work, which Marx planned to entitle Deutschland und Polen. Politisch-militärische Betrachtungen bei Gelegenheit des Polnischen Aufstands von 1863, and the notes he had made for it were published in: K. Marx, Manuskripte über die polnische Frage (1863-1864), Amsterdam, 1961, and, in Russian and German, in: Marx-Engels Archives, Vol. XIV, Moscow, 1973. The mistakes that occurred in the original publication when deciphering the manuscripts were corrected in the latter. — 391
Page me46.527
†461 The Crystal Palace — a glass-and-steel building erected for the first World Exhibition in London in 1851. — 391
Page me46.527
†462 The polemic around Marx's theory of value was launched in La Plebe, No. 13, 8 October 1882, by Romeo Candelari's article `La critica dell'economia radicale moderna'. Candelari had several more polemical articles printed by the newspaper, among them `De Laveleye e Rodbertus' (No. 14, 15 October 1882), which contained Laveleye's pronouncements concerning Marx's theory of value.

Page Break me46.528
Page me46.528
Candelari's articles also appeared in Nos. 15, 16, 17 and 18 of La Plebe of 22 and 29 October and 5 and 12 November 1882. Issue No. 17 also carried Carlo Cafiero's letter to the editors called `Polemica'. — 392
Page me46.528
†463 The reference is to the British trade union delegation headed by the editor of The Labour Standard George Shipton which visited France in late 1882. (On the purpose of the visit, see this volume, pp. 359-60.) — 393, 394, 396
Page me46.528
†464 Tlingits — a group of Indian tribes inhabiting south-eastern Alaska.
Page me46.528
By `once Russian America' Engels is referring to Russia's possessions in North America (Alaska), which, under the treaty of 30 March 1867, the Russian government sold to the United States for $7.2 mln.
Page me46.528
In 1880-81, Marx wrote down a detailed synopsis of Lewis H. Morgan's book Ancient Society or Researches in the Lines of Human Progress from Savagery, through Barbarism into Civilization, London, 1877. It was published as `Marx's Excerpts from Lewis Henry Morgan's Ancient History', in The Ethnological Notebooks of Karl Marx, Assen, 1972, pp. 95-241.
Page me46.528
Morgan built his research of primitive society on studies into the gentile communities of North American Indians, including the Iroquois, a group of tribes living in the north-east of the USA. — 395
Page me46.528
†465 Georg Ludwig von Maurer's works on the agrarian, urban and state system in medieval Germany are: Einleitung zur Geschichte der Mark-, Hof-, Dorf- und Stadt-Verfassung und der öffentlichen Gewalt, Munich, 1854; Geschichte der Markenverfassung in Deutschland, Erlangen, 1856; Geschichte der Fronhöfe, der Bauernhöfe und der Hofverfassung in Deutschland, vols I-IV, Erlangen, 1862-63; Geschichte der Dorfverfassung in Deutschland, vols I-II, Erlangen, 1865-66; Geschichte der Städteverfassung in Deutschland, vols I-IV, Erlangen, 1869-71. — 395, 400, 408, 416, 455
Page me46.528
†466 Engels wrote these lines to Marx on Laura Lafargue's letter of 12 December 1882. Laura informed him that Paul Lafargue had just been arrested by the Paris police and, under its orders, was to be sent to Montluçon to stand for trial there. — 396
Page me46.528
†467 Affaires véreuses cabinet (cabinet of black affairs, or black cabinet) — a secret establishment at the postal departments of France, Prussia, Austria and some other states that opened and inspected correspondence; had existed since the time of the absolutist monarchies in Europe. — 398

Page me46.528
†468 A reference to the events in the period when the Tudors' absolutist monarchy was being established in England following the War of the Roses (1455-85). The war was caused by the conflict between the feudal lords that grouped around two rival royal dynasties, the Lancasters and the Yorks. The founder of the dynasty, Henry VII Tudor, who had defeated King Richard III of York, made an attempt to sanctify the dynasty, seeking to consolidate the monarchy and his claim to the throne, which he based on his kinship with the Lancasters. With this end in view, in 1506 he requested Pope Julius II to canonise one of the Lancasters, King Henry VI, who had been dethroned by the Yorks at the time of the War of the Roses. — 399
Page me46.528
†469 Marx probably arrived at this conclusion after reading the book by V.V.

Page Break me46.529
(V.P. Vorontsov) Sudby kapitalizma v Rossii (The Destiny of Capitalism in Russia), St Petersburg, 1882. In the preface to the book, the author, a noted Russian writer and economist, leader of Liberal Narodism (Populism), mentioned Russian `socialists of the Marxian school' who maintained that Russia was to follow the route of capitalist development. — 399
Page me46.529
†470 This letter was published in English for the first time in part in: Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, Correspondence. 1846-1895. A Selection with Commentary and Notes, Martin Lawrence Ltd., London, [1934] and in full in: Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Selected Correspondence, Foreign Languages Publishing House, Moscow, 1955. — 399
Page me46.529
†471 A reference to Lafargue's article `Notre candidat' in L'Égalité, 4th series, No. 47, 9 December 1882. — 402, 408
Page me46.529
†472 The Thirty Years' War (1618-48) — a European war in which the Pope, the Spanish and the Austrian Habsburgs and the German Catholic princes rallied under the banner of Catholicism and fought against the Protestant countries, Bohemia, Denmark, Sweden, the Republic of the Netherlands and a number of German states. The rulers of Catholic France — rivals of the Habsburgs — supported the Protestant camp. Germany was the principal battleground and the chief object of plunder and the belligerents' aggressive claims. The war ended with the signing of the Westphalian Peace Treaty, which fixed Germany's political fragmentation. — 404, 448
Page me46.529
†473 The Sachsenspiegel (Saxonian mirror) — a medieval German law code explaining the local (Saxonian) common law. — 404
Page me46.529
†474 A reference to a postcard from Johann Philipp Becker to Engels of 13 December 1882. For Engels' reply, see this volume, pp. 405-07. — 404
Page me46.529

†475 Engels is referring to Marx's lengthy studies of writings on the commune and forms of communal property, and the Russian village commune in particular, as part of his research into land rent and agrarian relations in general. Specifically, somewhat earlier Marx had made a thorough study of Kovalevsky's book Communal Land Ownership: the Causes, Course and Consequences of Its Disintegration (1879), from which he copied out passages on the character of the commune and its place and socio-economic role at different times and among different peoples. — 408
Page me46.529
†476 This refers to the Socialist Republican Alliance founded in Paris in October 1880 by a group of amnestied Communards. Among them were noted and influential figures in the working-class and democratic movement, former members of the International Working Men's Association and its General Council. The members of the Alliance declared themselves socialists, but refused to be committed to any doctrine whatsoever. In early 1881, the Alliance fell apart. — 408
Page me46.529
†477 The reference is to Sergei Podolinski's article `Il socialismo e l'unitá delle forze fisiche', which was first published in 1881 in La Plebe, Anno XIV, Nuova serie, No. 3, pp. 13-16, and No. 4, pp. 5-15, and then reprinted by the German journal Die Neue Zeit, Jg. 1, 1883, pp. 413-24, and 449-57, under the heading `Menschliche Arbeit und Einheit der Kraft'. — 410
Page me46.529
†478 In a letter to Engels of 21 December 1882 Laura Lafargue wrote that she was uneasy

Page Break me46.530
about Jenny Longuet's health and that the latter should consult a doctor. — 413, 417
Page me46.530
†479 Weillingianism — the doctrine of utopian egalitarian communism advocated by Wilhelm Weitling that gained some currency among German craftsmen. In the early 1840s, it had had a certain progressive role, but later, since it rejected the need for active political struggle on the part of the proletariat and advocated sectarian, conspiratorial methods, it began to act as a brake on the evolution of the German workers' class awareness. The reactionary features of Weitling's doctrine, which gradually acquired a religious, Christian colouring, became more and more apparent with the passage of time. Neglect of the laws of history and dogmatism typical of the doctrine led to scientific methods and the need for a bourgeois-democratic stage in the revolution in Germany being ignored, and to excessive stress on the role of personality in history. — 413
Page me46.530
†480 At that time, Bebel was doing a 4-month jail sentence in the Leipzig prison (he was allowed to go and stay at home on 2-9 January 1883). — 414
Page me46.530
†481 On the eve of the Austro-Prussian War of 1866, Bismarck made it understood to Napoleon III that, in exchange for France's neutrality, he would not hinder expansion of its territory at the expense of Belgium, Luxembourg and the German lands lying between the Rhine and the Moselle. On 6 August 1866, the French government demanded that Bismarck pay the promised compensation, insisting that the frontiers be changed back to those of 1814, the Prussian garrison withdrawn from Luxembourg, and the latter's annexation by France be ensured. But Bismarck resolutely rejected these demands and responded to them on 19 March 1867 by making public the Prussian secret alliance with the South German states of Baden and Bavaria concluded back in 1866.

Page me46.530
Referring to Bismarck's behaviour at that time, Engels implies his negotiations of 19 November 1882 with the Russian Foreign Minister Girs, who was asking for Germany's assistance for Russian policies in the East. After the negotiations, the German press featured notes and official articles on the alliance concluded by Germany and Austria-Hungary back in 1879. — 415
Page me46.530
†482 This refers to Rodbertus' Briefe und Socialpolitische Aufsätze, published by Dr. Rudolf Meyer (vols I-II, Berlin [1882]). In a letter to Engels of 14 November 1882, Bebel jokingly noted that Meyer was full of praise for Marx and Engels, flattered probably by his `good reception' in London in 1879-80, but that they had to share the `glory' with `the five cardinals who had honoured him in the same manner'. — 416, 449
Page me46.530
†483 A reference to Dr F. Bayshawe's letter to James M. Williamson dated 4 January 1883, 5 Warrior Square, St Leonards on Sea (see this volume, p. 420). — 419
Page me46.530
†484 A reference to Paul Lafargue's letter to Engels of 6 January describing the state of Jenny Longuet's health, August Bebel's letter of the same date, in which he set forth his ideas about the impending crisis in the German economy, and Adolph Hepner's letter with the request for a new preface to the Manifesto of the Communist Party. — 421, 424
Page me46.530
†485 By all indications, Eleanor Marx failed to find a copy of Marx's Algerian photo, and he had to send Mrs Williamson a photo taken in 1875 (see this volume, pp. 166-67). — 423

Page Break me46.531
Page me46.531
†486 The reference is to the sales of the second German edition of Volume One of Capital published in 1872 by Otto Meissner in Hamburg. — 423, 425
Page me46.531
†487 Liberal M.P. and former Chartist Joseph Cowen justified the British invasion in Egypt (see Note 355) in his speech in Newcastle on 8 January 1883. — 423
Page me46.531
†488 Marx is probably referring to the events of 1847. On 28 March 1847, the Deutsche-Brüsseler Zeitung, No. 25, carried an article about corn speculation written, presumably, by Ferdinand Wolff, a member of the Communist League whose brother was a corn profiteer. — 425
Page me46.531
†489 Marx's New Year wishes to Mrs Williamson were written on the back of a photo of his taken in 1875 (see this volume, pp. 166-67). — 429
Page me46.531

†490 Jenny Longuet died on 11 January 1883. — 429, 430, 434, 450, 458, 461
Page me46.531
†491 Engels is referring to the speech made by the Social-Democratic deputy Karl Grillenberger at the Reichstag meeting on 14 December 1882. It was spearheaded against Minister of the Interior Robert Victor von Puttkamer, who tried to justify the need for the introduction of a state of siege in several regions of Germany in connection with the Anti-Socialist Law (see Note 16), insisting that Social Democracy was undermining the sanctity of the family and advocating free love. The reference is also to the Sozialdemokrat articles dealing with Grillenberger's speech, `Aus Grillenberger's Rede über die Handhabung des Sozialistengesetzes' (Nos. 1 and 2, 1 and 4 January); `Zum Kapitel von der freien Liebe. Etwas für Herrn von Puttkamer zum Vorlesen im Reichstage' (No. 2, 4 January); `Puttkamer und die “Heiligkeit” der Familie' (No. 3, 11 January); `Zum Kapitel von der freien Liebe. Den Herren v. Puttkamer und v. Nostiz Wallwitz gewidmet' and `Von der patentierten Ehre' (No. 9, 22 February 1883). — 431, 455
Page me46.531
†492 A phrase from Frederick William II's instructions of 14 August 1748 for the major-generals of cavalry. — 431
Page me46.531
†493 An allusion to Prussia's annexation of the formerly independent states — Hanover, Nassau and the Electorate of Hesse, as well as the free city Frankfurt am Main — as a result of the Austro-Prussian War of 1866 and the unification of Germany. — 432
Page me46.531
†494 During his stay in London in May 1882, Paul Singer discussed with Engels the attitude the Social-Democratic Party should take to Bismarck's policies, which probably compelled Singer to modify his stand. — 433
Page me46.531
†495 Engels compares Kautsky's book Der Einfluss der Volksvermehrung auf den Fortschritt der Gesellschaft (1880), which defended the `sound core' of Malthus' theory, with his own pamphlet Die überseeische Lebensmittel-Konkurrenz, which was an off-print from Staatswirthschaftliche Abhandlungen (Serie II, Heft IV und V, 1881). — 434
Page me46.531
†496 Engels is referring to Hegel's idea of the objectively existing dialectical contradiction in things and processes, which Dühring attacked in his book Kritische Geschichte der Nationalökonomie und des Socialismus. — 434
Page me46.531
†497 In the first part of his work Die überseeische Lebensmittel-Konkurrenz (Leipzig, 1881) (see Note 495), Kautsky makes use of the information on the forms of agriculture in Canada supplied by Rudolf Meyer to the Viennese newspaper Das Vaterland. — 437

Page Break me46.532
Page me46.532
†498 A reference to the first article, entitled `Hetärismus', from the series of Kautsky's articles Die Entstehung der Ehe und Familie in the Darwinist journal Kosmos (Stuttgart, Jg. VI, Bd. XII, October 1882-March 1883). The second article was called `Die Raubehe und das Mutterrecht. Der Clan', and the third, `Die Kaufehe und die patriarchalische

Familie'. In 1883, they were published as a separate edition under the general heading of the series. — 437, 450, 451
Page me46.532
†499 The Hutzwang (enforced partition) — under the law of ancient Germans, the duty of all members of the commune to remove the fences around their land plots for the period between the harvest and the sowing so that the land could be used as communal pasture in the meantime. — 438
Page me46.532
†500 Engels may be referring to the letter to the French Minister of Justice signed by Lafargue and Guesde and printed by L'Égalité on 16 February 1883. The letter was entitled `Deux noveaux prétendants'. In an ironic manner, Guesde and Lafargue demanded a milder punishment for themselves, equal to that reserved for royalty, for, considering the morals of the French monarchs, was anybody able to vouch that the accused did not have royal blood in their veins? — 441
Page me46.532
†501 Engels had first despatched this letter to be approved by Schorlemmer but by an oversight must have omitted to address it, and it was returned to the author. It was sent by Engels to Bernstein alongside with another letter, that of 27 February-1 March 1883 (see this volume, pp. 445-50). — 442
Page me46.532
†502 A reference to the Copenhagen Congress of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany, which took place from 29 March to 2 April 1883; originally, the congress was to be held in Zurich. — 442, 450
Page me46.532
†503 A reference to Bernstein's letter to Engels of 24 February 1883. — 445
Page me46.532
†504 On 8 March 1883, Der Sozialdemokrat reported that the publication of L'Égalité was about to be stopped, as the owner of the printing press had cancelled his contract with the editorial board. — 445
Page me46.532
†505 Viereck and Fritzsche stayed in London in the second half of January 1881 on their way to the United States (see Note 119). — 446
Page me46.532
†506 This refers to the programme approved at the Unity Congress in Gotha on 22-27 May 1875 (see also Note 381). — 447
Page me46.532
†507 In February 1883, the German socialist Moses Oppenheimer was proved guilty of secret contacts with the bourgeois press and embezzlement of party funds. — 447
Page me46.532
†508 Eduard Bernstein wrote to Engels on 24 February 1883 that as far as he knew, Georg Schumacher in Solingen was agitating for the Süddeutsche Post and urging the workers to read that newspaper and not Der Sozialdemokrat. Replying on 7 March to this letter by Engels Bernstein wrote that the things said about Schumacher were not true. — 450
Page me46.532

†509 Engels alludes to the oath taken by Liebknecht in the Saxon Landtag in November 1879, and by August Bebel in July 1881. — 454
Page me46.532
†510 The Deutsch-Amerikanische Arbeiter-Library series initiated by Hepner opened with Bebel's pamphlet Unsere Ziele, which Hepner published in 1883 in New York under another title, Die Ziele der Arbeiterbewegung, having first made a number of changes. — 455

Page Break me46.533
Page me46.533
†511 Engels' telegram to Sorge of 14 March 1883 was published in the New Yorker Volkszeitung without Engels' knowledge (the editors added the word `afternoon') to create the impression that the telegram had been addressed to the newspaper. For the telegram that Engels did send to the paper, see present edition, Vol. 24, p. 462.
Page me46.533
Engels voiced his protest at the editors' high-handedness in a letter to the New Yorker Volkszeitung of 18 April 1883 (see present edition, Vol. 24, p. 472). — 457
Page me46.533
†512 This letter was published in English for the first time in: F. Engels, On the Death of Karl Marx, Cooperative Publishing Society of Foreign Workers in the USSR, Moscow, 1933, and F. Engels, The Fourteenth of March 1883, Lawrence, London, 1933. — 458, 459, 460
Page me46.533
†513 Jenny Marx died on 2 December 1881. — 458, 461
Page me46.533
†514 Marx visited Johann Philipp Becker in Geneva on 26 September 1882 before his departure from Switzerland. — 460
Page me46.533
†515 This letter was published in English for the first time in: F. Lessner, Sixty Years in the Social-Democratic Movement, The Twentieth Century Press, London, 1907. — 463
Page me46.533
†516 Engels included the full text of the telegram from the students of the Petrovsky Academy of Agriculture in Moscow in his article `On the Death of Karl Marx' printed by Der Sozialdemokrat, 3 and 17 May 1883 (see present edition, Vol. 24, pp. 473-81). — 464
Page me46.533
†517 In a letter of 16 March 1883, Theodor Cuno asked Engels to confirm that Marx was called Mohr by his family. Cuno wanted to mention it in his article about Marx. Hepner, however, asserted that Marx had never had such a nickname and that mentioning it could only `harm' the party. — 466
Page me46.533
†518 The Communards were amnestied in July 1880. — 469
Page me46.533

†519 A reference to the mounting political tension in Ireland in the late 1870s-early 1880s engendered by the campaign for Home Rule and by the people's protest action against the landlords (see notes 124 and 139). — 471
Page me46.533
†520 Probably a reference to 4 August 1789, when, pressed by the mounting peasant movement, the French Constituent Assembly solemnly removed feudal duties and taxes, which had by that time been abolished, to all practical purposes, by the insurgent peasants. However, the laws that were later promulgated abrogated only the personal duties without redemption fees. The abolition of all feudal duties without redemption payments was not carried out until the time of the Jacobean dictatorship by the law of 17 July 1793. — 473

Page Break me46.534

NAME INDEX
Page me46.534
A

Page me46.534
Abercorn, James Hamilton, 1st Duke of (1811-1885) — English statesman, Conservative; Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1866-68 and 1874-76); opposed the adoption of the Land Bill of 1881 for Ireland. — 172
Page me46.534
Abdul Hamid II (1842-1918) — Turkish Sultan (1876-1909). — 248
Page me46.534
Adam, Juliette (née Lamber) (1836-1936) — French writer and journalist, founder and director of the Nouvelle Revue (1879-86). — 225, 230
Page me46.534
Aksakov, Ivan Sergeyevich (1823-1886) — Russian writer, Slavophile; criticised the domestic policy of tsarism (the 1850s-60s); a champion of pan-Slavism and great power chauvinism (the 1870s-80s). — 194
Page me46.534
Aleko Pasha (Vogorides, Alexandros) (c. 1823-1910) — Bulgarian-born Turkish statesman and diplomat, counsellor of the Embassy in London (1856-61), ambassador to Vienna (1876-78), governor of Eastern Rumelia (1879-84). — 373
Page me46.534
Alexander II (1818-1881) — Emperor of Russia (1855-81). — 80, 175, 288
Page me46.534
Alexander III (1845-1894) — Emperor of Russia (1881-94). — 78, 175
Page me46.534
Allsop, Thomas (1795-1880) — English democrat, Chartist; was persecuted on suspicion of being an accomplice in Orsini's attempt on the life of Napoleon III in 1858; later collaborated with Marx in helping refugees of the Paris Commune. — 114
Page me46.534

Alphand, Jean Charles Adolphe (1817-1891) — French state official, engineer; directed reconstruction works in Paris from 1854 and was in charge of the city water supply from 1878. — 337
Page me46.534
Amos, Sheldon (1835-1886) — English lawyer, barrister in Egypt from the early 1880s, judge in the Court of Appeal (local tribunal) in Alexandria (1882). — 381
Page me46.534
Arabi Pasha, Ahmed Arabi el Husseini (c. 1839-1911) — Egyptian politician and military figure; headed the national liberation movement (1879-82); a leader of the National Party; War Minister
Page Break me46.535
(from February 1882) and head (from July 1882) of the National Government; after the defeat at Tell el-Kebir (13 September 1882) was taken prisoner and banished by the English authorities to the island of Ceylon, where he was kept till 1902. — 301
Page me46.535
Argyll, George John Douglas Campbell, 8th Duke of (1823-1900) — British statesman, Peelite; Lord Privy Seal (1853-55, 1859-66 and 1880-81); Postmaster-General (1855-58 and 1860), Secretary for India (1868-74). — 86
Page me46.535
Azamat Batuk — French journalist, real name H.L. Thieblin. — 53
Page me46.535
B

Page me46.535
Bachofen, Johann Jakob (1815-1887) — Swiss historian and lawyer, author of Das Mutterrecht. — 453
Page me46.535
Bakunin, Mikhail Alexandrovich (1814-1876) — Russian democrat, journalist, participant in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany; an ideologist of Narodism (Populism) and anarchism in later years; opposed Marxism in the International; was expelled from the International at the Hague Congress of 1872 for his splitting activities. — 46, 341, 370, 375
Page me46.535
Bamberger, Louis (b. 1821) — German journalist; in the 1850s emigrated to London, where he engaged in financial operations at his father's bank; an editor of the Deutsche Londoner Zeitung (1848-51); Secretary of Charles of Brunswick; later a merchant in Zurich. — 258
Page me46.535
Bancroft, Hubert Howe (1832-1918) — American historian, author of a number of works on the history and ethnography of North and Central America. — 395, 438
Page me46.535
Barry, Maltman (1842-1909) — English journalist, socialist; member of the International, of the General Council (1871-72) and of the British Federal Council (1872-74); delegate to the Hague Congress of the International (1872); supported Marx and Engels in the struggle against Bakuninists and reformist leaders of British trade unions; contributed to several conservative newspapers in the 1870s; after the dissolution of the International continued to take part in the British socialist movement. — 83

Page me46.535
Bauer, Bruno (1809-1882) — German idealist philosopher, Young Hegelian; author of works on the history of Christianity; radical; National Liberal after 1866. — 339
Page me46.535
Bax, Ernest Belfort (1854-1926) — British socialist, historian, philosopher and journalist; one of the first exponents of Marxism in England from the early 1880s; from 1882 member of the Democratic Federation, transformed into the Social-Democratic Federation in 1884; was prominent among its left-wing members; took an active part in socialist agitation in London; maintained friendly relations with Frederick Engels from 1883; a founder and a leader of the British Socialist Party in 1911. — 163, 185
Page me46.535
Bayshawe, F. — English physician. — 420
Page me46.535
Bazin, Gustave — an active participant in the French working-class movement, socialist, member of the French Workers' Party in the 1880s, delegate to the Rheims Congress (1881), was arrested on the charge of instigation to civil war in late November 1882; Guesde's supporter. — 391, 397
Page me46.535
Bebel, August (1840-1913) — prominent figure in the German and international working-class movement; turner; member of the First International; deputy to the North German (1867-70) and to the German Reichstag (1871-81
Page Break me46.536
and from 1893); a founder and leader of the German Social-Democrats; friend and associate of Marx and Engels. — 10-12, 35, 77-79, 87-88, 99, 137-39, 154, 173, 188, 259-61, 266, 279, 280-83, 289, 291, 294, 325, 326, 328, 330, 333, 334, 349-51, 353, 357, 386, 390, 414-17, 421, 433, 442, 453-55, 469
Page me46.536
Bebel, Julie (1843-1910) — August Bebel's wife. — 417, 458
Page me46.536
Becker, Elisabeth (d. 1884) — Johann Philipp Becker's wife. — 159
Page me46.536
Becker, Johann Philipp (1809-1886) — prominent figure in the international working-class movement; brush-maker; took part in the German and Swiss democratic movements in the 1830s and 1840s and in the 1848-49 revolution; prominent figure in the First International in the 1860s, delegate to all its congresses; editor of Der Vorbote (1866-71); friend and associate of Marx and Engels. — 7-9, 23, 38, 50, 76, 80, 151-52, 159-60, 196, 197, 299, 311, 314, 404, 405, 407
Page me46.536
Beesly, Edward Spencer (1831-1915) — British historian and politician, bourgeois radical, positivist, professor at London University (1860-93); defended the International and the Paris Commune in the English press (1870-71). — 89, 118
Page me46.536
Bennigsen, Rudolf von (1824-1902) — German politician, advocate of Germany's unification under Prussia's supremacy; President of the National Association (1859-67); from 1867 leader of the Right-wing of the National Liberal Party, which defended the interests of the big industrial bourgeoisie; deputy to the German Reichstag (1871-83 and 1887-98). — 373

Page me46.536
Bernstein, Eduard (1850-1932) — German Social-Democrat from 1872; editor of Der Sozialdemokrat (1881-90); came out with a revision of Marxism after Engels' death. — 8, 58-59, 73-75, 85-87, 126-29, 137, 144-51, 152-55, 165-66, 172-74, 186-90, 203-08, 210, 244, 247-48, 250-52, 256, 260, 285, 291, 300-02, 323-26, 331-34, 335, 341, 345, 346-48, 352, 353-58, 359-62, 364, 365, 373, 377, 379, 380, 386, 389, 390, 395, 407-08, 413, 430-36, 442, 445-48, 450, 459
Page me46.536
Beust, Adolf — German physician, Friedrich von Beust's son, Engels' relative. — 26, 30, 35, 36, 39, 244, 326
Page me46.536
Beust, Friedrich von (1817-1899) — Prussian army officer, member of the committee of the Cologne Workers' Association (1848); an editor of the Neue Kölnische Zeitung (September 1848-February 1849); later a teacher; took part in the foundation of the International's section in Zurich in 1867. — 30, 76, 89, 290
Page me46.536
Bevan — Charles Roesgen's wife. — 346
Page me46.536
Bismarck (in full Bismarck-Schönhausen), Otto Eduard Leopold, Prince von (1815-1898) — statesman of Prussia and Germany, diplomat; Prime Minister of Prussia (1862-71 and 1873-90) and Chancellor of the German Empire (1871-90), author of the Anti-Socialist Law (1878). — 4, 11, 40, 43, 53, 73-75, 78, 80, 83, 112, 146, 175, 178, 182, 183, 187, 191, 192, 208, 209, 256, 261, 282, 324, 327, 348, 350, 359, 386, 415, 433, 441, 454
Page me46.536
Blanc, Jean Joseph Charles Louis (1811-1882) — French petty-bourgeois socialist, historian, member of the Provisional Government and President of the Luxembourg Commission in 1848; pursued a policy of conciliation with the bourgeoisie; emigrated to England in August 1848; a leader of the petty-bourgeois refugees in London; deputy to the National Assembly (1871), opposed the Paris Commune. — 53, 408
Page Break me46.537

Page me46.537
Bleichröder, Gerson von (1822-1893) — German financier, head of a big banking house in Berlin; Bismarck's personal banker and unofficial adviser in financial matters; in 1871 Bismarck consulted him on the question of indemnities imposed on France. — 112, 114
Page me46.537
Blind, Mathilde (née Cohen) (1841-1896) — English translator, authoress and poetess, Karl Blind's stepdaughter. — 425
Page me46.537
Blommestein — Dutch financier, owner of the French newspaper Citoyen in the early 1880s. — 343, 346-47, 356
Page me46.537

Blos, Wilhelm (1849-1927) — German journalist and politician; member of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party from 1872; deputy to the Reichstag (1877-1918, with intervals); Prime Minister of the Württemberg Government (1918-20). — 203, 259, 279, 433
Page me46.537
Blum, Robert (1807-1848) — German democratic journalist, leader of the Left in the Frankfurt National Assembly; took part in the defence of Vienna against counter-revolutionary forces in October 1848; court-martialled and executed after the fall of the city. — 281
Page me46.537
Bodenstedt, Friedrich von (1819-1892) — German poet, journalist and translator. — 235
Page me46.537
Böcker — Eduard Gumpert's wife. — 114, 117
Page me46.537
Böcker, Berta — sister of the above. — 114
Page me46.537
Bonaparte, Louis — see Napoleon III
Page me46.537
Bonaparte, Prince Napoléon Joseph Charles Paul (1822-1891) — son of Jérôme Bonaparte, cousin of Napoleon III; known under the nicknames of Plon-Plon and the Red Prince. — 53
Page me46.537
Bontoux, Paul Eugéne (1820-1904) — French engineer and financier, took part in building railways and factories in France, Austria, Hungary and Serbia; one of the founders (1878) and director of the Union générale joint-stock bank in Paris, set up on the Legitimists' and clericals' funds; was sentenced in 1882 to five-year imprisonment for speculative machinations; emigrated. — 402, 408
Page me46.537
Borkheim, Sigismund Ludwig (1826-1885) — German democratic journalist, took part in the 1849 Baden-Palatinate uprising, emigrated after its defeat; London merchant from 1851, was on friendly terms with Marx and Engels. — 6, 9, 24, 46
Page me46.537
Bouis, Casimir Dominique (1843-1916) — French journalist, Blanquist, member of the Central Committee of the National Guard and of the Paris Commune; Chairman of the Commission which investigated the activity of the Government of National Defence; after the suppression of the Commune banished to New Caledonia; member of the French Workers' Party in the 1880s, member of the editorial board of L'Égalité (1882). — 358, 389
Page me46.537
Bracke, Wilhelm (1842-1880) — German Social-Democrat; publisher of socialist literature in Brunswick; a founder (1869) and a leader of Social-Democratic Workers' Party (Eisenachers), member of the Social-Democratic group in the Reichstag (1877-79). — 294
Page me46.537

Bradlaugh, Charles (1833-1891) — English journalist and politician, radical, atheist; editor of the weekly National Reformer from 1860; opponent of Marx and the International Working Men's Association. — 52-54, 214
Page me46.537
Bradshaw — English businessman. — 29
Page me46.537
Brassey, Thomas, Lord (1836-1918) — English economist and politician; big railway and shipbuilding contractor;
Page Break me46.538
Liberal M.P., Civil Lord of the Admiralty (1880-84). — 83
Page me46.538
Braun, Heinrich (1854-1927) — German Social-Democrat, journalist; contributed to Die Neue Zeit (1883-88), took part in the publication of several other journals, later reformist. — 321
Page me46.538
Brentano, Ludwig (Lujo) (1844-1931) — German economist; one of the major representatives of armchair socialism. — 65
Page me46.538
Breuel, Ernst — German Social-Democrat, was banished from Hamburg under the Anti-Socialist Law; refugee in Copenhagen from the early 1880s; criticised the stand of the Sozialdemokrat's editors in 1882. — 259
Page me46.538
Bright, Jacob (1821-1899) — English politician, bourgeois radical, M.P., John Bright's brother. — 171
Page me46.538
Bright, John (1811-1889) — English manufacturer and politician, a leader of the Free Traders and founder of the Anti-Corn Law League; M.P. (from 1843); leader of the Left wing of the Liberal Party from the early 1860s, held several ministerial posts. — 53, 171, 473, 474
Page me46.538
Brimont — French Bonapartist, Charles Bradlaugh's acquaintance in Paris. — 53
Page me46.538
Brissac, Henri (1823-1906) — participant in the French working-class movement, socialist, journalist; member of the Paris Commune, General Secretary of the Executive Committee, then of the Committee of Public Safety, banished to New Caledonia after the suppression of the Commune; returned to France after the 1880 amnesty, member of the French Workers' Party, an editor of L'Égalité in 1882; Guesde's supporter. — 358, 389
Page me46.538
Brousse, Paul Louis Marie (1844-1912) — French physician; socialist; participant in the Paris Commune; lived in emigration after its suppression, sided with the anarchists; joined the French Workers' Party in 1879; a leader and ideologist of the Possibilists, an opportunist trend in the French socialist movement. — 11, 141, 145-47, 149, 154, 155, 173, 181, 190, 282, 289, 309, 333, 339, 341, 342, 345, 350, 374, 380, 406-07, 456
Page me46.538
Brown, John (1800-1859) — American farmer; a prominent leader of the revolutionary wing of the abolitionist movement; took an active part in the armed struggle against the slave-owners in Kansas (1854-56); attempted to organise a revolt of black slaves in Virginia in 1859; was tried and executed. — 77

Page me46.538
Brown, Willard — American socialist, journalist, Marx's acquaintance in the 1880s. — 99, 170
Page me46.538
Brunswick, Charles Frederick August William of (Braunschweig, Karl Friedrich August Wilhelm von) (1804-1873) — Duke of Brunswick from 1823, overthrown in early September 1830, emigrated; tried to return to power with the help of a number of European states; maintained contacts with democratic émigrés in the 1840s-50s; published the Deutsche Londoner Zeitung. — 258
Page me46.538
Brunswick, Ferdinand, Duke of (1721-1792) — general in the Prussian service; during the Seven Years' War (from November 1757) commander of the Prussian and Allied troops, which fought against the French and Austrian armies. — 158
Page me46.538
Bückler, Johann (1777-1803) — German robber, nicknamed Schinderhannes (Hannes the Skinflint). — 206, 281
Page me46.538
Burke, Thomas Henry (1829-1882) — British statesman, permanent Irish Under-Secretary from 1869 to 1882; killed by members of the Irish terrorist organisation `The Invincibles' on 6 May 1882. — 254, 288
Page Break me46.539
Page me46.539
Bürkli, Karl (1823-1901) — Swiss socialist, economist and journalist; took part in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany; an organiser and leader of the First International in Zurich, delegate to the Geneva (1866) and Secretary of the Lausanne (1867) congresses of the International; a founder and leader of the Swiss co-operative movement. — 177, 181, 189, 197, 209
Page me46.539
Burleigh, Bennet (1839-1914) — English journalist, one of the first directors of the Central News information agency (founded in 1870). — 37, 38
Page me46.539
Burns, Lydia (Lizzy, Lizzie) (1827-1878) — Irish working woman, Engels' second wife. — 104
Page me46.539
Burns, Mary Ellen — see Roscher, Mary Ellen
Page me46.539
C

Page me46.539
Caesar (Gaius Julius Caesar) (c. 100-44 B.C.) — Roman general, statesman and writer, author of Commentarii de bello Gallico. — 382
Page me46.539

Cafiero, Carlo (1846-1892) — participant in the Italian working-class movement, member of the First International; pursued the General Council's line in Italy in 1871; one of the leaders of the Italian anarchist organisations from 1872, abandoned anarchism at the end of the 1870s; published a summary of Volume One of Marx's Capital in Italian (1879). — 392
Page me46.539
Caird, James (1816-1892) — Scottish agriculturist, Liberal M.P. (1857-65), author of works on the land question in England and Ireland. — 31
Page me46.539
Calonne, Charles Alexandre de (1734-1802) — French statesman, Controller-General of Finance (1783-87); a leader of the counter-revolutionary émigrés during the French Revolution. — 73
Page me46.539
Candelari, Romeo — Italian journalist, contributed to the Plebe in the 1880s. — 392
Page me46.539
Carlos I — see Charles V
Page me46.539
Cartesius, Renatus (Descartes, René) (1596-1650) — French philosopher, mathematician and naturalist. — 384
Page me46.539
Cassagnac — see Granier de Cassagnac, Bernard Adolphe
Page me46.539
Casthelaz — Maurice Casthelaz's mother. — 219, 240
Page me46.539
Casthelaz, Maurice — French physician and pharmaceutist, Marx's acquaintance. — 219, 222, 224, 226, 233, 240, 246
Page me46.539
Catherine II (1729-1796) — Empress of Russia (1762-96). — 205
Page me46.539
Cavendish, Frederick Charles, Lord (1836-1882) — English statesman and politician, Liberal M.P. from 1865; appointed Chief Secretary for Ireland in May 1882; killed by members of the Irish terrorist organisation `The Invincibles' on 6 May 1882. — 254, 288

Page me46.539
Cavour, Camillo Benso, conte di (1810-1861) — Italian statesman, head of the Sardinian Government (1852-59 and 1860-61), pursued a policy of unifying Italy under the supremacy of the Savoy dynasty relying on the support of Napoleon III; headed the first government of united Italy in 1861. — 191
Page me46.539
Cazot, Théodore Joseph Jules (1821-1913) — French statesman, moderate bourgeois republican, lawyer; opposed the Second Empire regime, was in prison from 1851 to 1859; General Secretary of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the Government of National Defence (1870), deputy to the National Assembly (from 1871), Minister of Justice (1879-January 1882), Gambetta's supporter. — 117
Page Break me46.540
Page me46.540

Chamberlain, Joseph (1836-1914) — British statesman, Mayor of Birmingham (1873-76), member of William Gladstone's cabinets (1880-85 and 1886). — 171
Page me46.540
Chamisso, Adelbert von (1781-1838) — German romantic poet. — 439
Page me46.540
Charles I (1600-1649) — King of Great Britain and Ireland (1625-49), executed during the English revolution. — 69
Page me46.540
Charles III (1818-1889) — Prince of Monaco (1856-89). — 259, 262, 273
Page me46.540
Charles V (1500-1558) — Holy Roman Emperor (1519-56) and King of Spain under the name of Charles (Carlos) I (1516-56). — 240
Page me46.540
Charles X (1757-1836) — King of France (1824-30). — 175
Page me46.540
Cherbuliez, Antoine Élisée (1797-1869) — Swiss economist, wanted to combine the teaching of Sismondi with elements of Ricardo's theory. — 100
Page me46.540
Churchill, Randolph Henry Spencer, Lord (1849-1895) — British statesman, a leader of the Conservatives, Secretary of State for India (1885-86), Chancellor of the Exchequer (1886); advocate of colonial expansion, opponent of the Home Rule for Ireland. — 83

Page me46.540
Cieszkowski, August (1814-1894) — Polish philosopher and economist, owner of an estate in the Posen district from 1847; deputy to the Prussian National Assembly (Left wing) in 1848; member of the Prussian Provincial Diet (from 1852). — 177, 181, 189
Page me46.540
Cissey, Ernest Louis Octave Courtot de (1810-1882) — French general and politician; took part in the suppression of the Paris Commune, commanded the Versailles Corps; elected to the National Assembly (1871); War Minister (1871-73 and 1874-76), was accused of high treason in 1880 and resigned. — 474
Page me46.540
Claude. — 240
Page me46.540
Clemenceau, Georges Eugéne Benjamin (1841-1929) — French statesman and journalist, leader of the Party of Radicals from the 1880s; Chairman of the Council of Ministers (1906-09 and 1917-20). — 45, 61, 92, 108, 333, 339, 361-62
Page me46.540
Clowes, Norris A. — American journalist, correspondent of the New-York Star for Ireland in the early 1880s, Theodor Friedrich Cuno's acquaintance. — 105
Page me46.540
Cobden, Richard (1804-1865) — English manufacturer and politician; a leader of the Free Traders and founder of the Anti-Corn Law League; Member of Parliament (1841-65). — 171
Page me46.540
Coghill, J.G. Sinclair — English physician in Ventnor. — 366

Page me46.540
Colins, Jean Guillaume César Alexandre Hippolyte, baron de (1783-1859) — French petty-bourgeois economist, Belgian by birth. — 100-01
Page me46.540
Collet, Charles Dobson — English radical journalist and public figure, an editor of the Urquhartist newspaper Free Press (1859-65) and publisher of the journal Diplomatic Review from 1866. — 92, 471, 472
Page me46.540
Constans, Jean Antoine Ernest (1833-1913) — French statesman, moderate republican; Minister of the Interior (1880-81 and 1889-92), pursued a policy aimed at the suppression of the working-class movement. — 117
Page me46.540
Costa, Andrea (1851-1910) — prominent figure in the Italian working-class and socialist movement, a leader of anarchist organisations in Italy in the 1870s; criticised anarchism in 1879, subsequently campaigned for an independent political workers' party; a founder and leader of the Revolutionary
Page Break me46.541
Socialist Party of Romagna (1881-91); M.P. from 1882. — 358, 454
Page me46.541
Cowen, Joseph (1831-1900) — British politician and radical journalist; supported the Chartists; an organiser of the meeting in defence of Garibaldi in Newcastle in September 1862; M.P. from 1874. — 76, 423, 424
Page me46.541
Cowper, Francis Thomas de Grey, Lord (1834-1905) — British statesman, Liberal, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1880-April 1882); nephew of the following. — 251
Page me46.541
Cowper-Temple, William Francis, Baron Mount Temple from 1880 (1811-1888) — British statesman, M.P., held portfolio in a number of Liberal cabinets, Palmerston's stepson. — 251
Page me46.541
Crié — French journalist, anarchist; an editor of the Citoyen et Bataille from 1882. — 347
Page me46.541
Cromwell, Oliver (1599-1658) — leader of the English revolution, Lord Protector of England, Scotland and Ireland from 1653. — 68
Page me46.541
Cuno, Theodor Friedrich (pseudonym Capestro, Frederico) (1846-1934) — prominent figure in the German and international working-class movement, socialist; corresponded with Engels (1871-72); actively opposed the anarchists in Italy; organiser of the Milan Section of the International; delegate to the Hague Congress (1872); after the Congress emigrated to the USA and took part in the International's activities there; later participant in the American working-class and socialist movement. — 466
Page me46.541
D

Page me46.541
Da Costa, Charles Nicolas Maurice (b. 1846) — French socialist, Blanquist, took part in the Paris Commune; emigrated to England; after the defeat of the Commune sentenced in absentia to ten years' imprisonment; returned to France after the 1880 amnesty; withdrew from active political life; published a book about Blanquists (1911); Charles Longuet's friend; Eugéne François Da Costa's elder son. — 18, 19
Page me46.541
Da Costa, Eugéne François (1818-1888) — professor of mathematics in Paris. — 18, 19
Page me46.541
D'Alembert, Jean Baptiste Le Rond (1717-1783) — French philosopher and mathematician. — 380
Page me46.541
Daniels, Amalie (née Müller) (1820-1895) — wife of Roland Daniels, a leader of the Communist League. — 167, 180
Page me46.541
Daniels, Roland — son of the above. — 167
Page me46.541
Danielson, Nikolai Frantsevich (pseudonym Nikolai — on) (1844-1918) — Russian economist and writer, a theoretician of liberal Narodism (Populism); corresponded with Marx and Engels for many years; completed the translation of Volume One of Marx's Capital begun by Hermann Lopatin and also translated the second and third volumes. — 30-32, 60-64, 160, 161
Page me46.541
Dante, Alighieri (1265-1321) — Italian poet. — 291, 439
Page me46.541
D'Arsonval, Jacques Arséne (1851-1940) — French physiologist, physicist and biophysicist. — 364
Page me46.541
Darwin, Charles Robert (1809-1882) — English naturalist, founder of the theory of natural selection of species. — 251, 274, 318, 377, 437
Page me46.541
Davitt, Michael (1846-1906) — Irish revolutionary democrat, a leader of the national liberation movement in Ireland; an organiser (1879) and leader of the Land League, advocate of the Home Rule in Ireland, M.P. (1895-99);
Page Break me46.542
took part in the English working-class movement. — 301
Page me46.542
Dechend, Hermann Friedrich Alexander (1814-1890) — German statesman, Chairman of the Bank of Prussia (from 1864), then of the Reichsbank (1875-90), member of the State Council (from 1884). — 257
Page me46.542
Deinhardt, C. — a Munich engineer. — 442, 443
Page me46.542
Delachaux — a doctor and surgeon in Interlaken (Switzerland). — 253, 254
Page me46.542

Demuth, Helene (Lenchen, Nim, Nym) (1820-1890) — housemaid and friend of the Marx family. — 92, 96, 113, 115-16, 124, 132, 136, 164, 170, 174-75, 200, 215, 224, 284, 285, 297, 299, 315, 316, 319, 328, 331, 340, 345, 372, 397, 417, 426, 440, 456, 458, 462, 465, 475
Page me46.542
De Paepe, César Aimé Désiré (1841-1890) — Belgian socialist, compositor, subsequently physician; one of the founders of the Belgian Section of the International (1865); member of the Belgian Federal Council; delegate to the London (1865) Conference, the Lausanne (1867), Brussels (1868) and Basle (1869) congresses and to the London (1871) Conference of the International; following the Hague Congress (1872) supported the Bakuninists for some time; a founder of the Belgian Workers' Party (1885). — 146, 312
Page me46.542
Deprez, Marcel (1843-1918) — French physicist and electrician; worked on the problem of electric energy transmission. — 364, 374, 449
Page me46.542
Derby, Edward Geoffrey Smith Stanley, 14th Earl of Derby (1799-1869) — British statesman, Tory leader, Prime Minister (1852, 1858-59 and 1866-68). — 70
Page me46.542
Détroyat, Pierre Léonce (1829-1898) — French journalist and writer, naval officer; Bonapartist; took part in the Crimean (1853-56) and Franco-Prussian (1870-71) wars; owner and editor of several newspapers in the 1870s-80s; Émile de Girardin's relative. — 53
Page me46.542
Deville, Gabriel Pierre (1854-1940) — French socialist, active member of the French Workers' Party, journalist; author of a popular exposition of the first volume of Marx's Capital, and also of a number of philosophic, economic and historical works, delegate to the International Socialist Workers' Congress (1889), abandoned the working-class movement in the early 20th century. — 199, 282, 297, 386-87, 389, 402, 413
Page me46.542
Dietz, Johann Wilhelm (1843-1922) — German publisher; Social-Democrat, founder of the Social-Democratic publishing house, deputy to the Reichstag from 1881. — 437
Page me46.542
Dietzgen, Joseph (1828-1888) — German Social-Democrat, tanner; delegate to the Hague Congress of the International (1872). — 172
Page me46.542
Dilke, Ashton Wentworth (1850-1883) — British politician, journalist and traveller, bourgeois radical, owner and editor of the Weekly Dispatch from the early 1870s, M.P. (1880-83). — 83, 211, 214
Page me46.542
Dilke, Sir Charles Wentworth, Baronet (1843-1911) — British politician and writer; a leader of the Radical wing of the Liberal Party, Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs (1880-82), president of the local government board (1882-85). — 83, 211, 365, 373
Page me46.542

Disraeli, Benjamin, 1st Earl of Beaconsfield (1804-1881) — British statesman and author, a Tory leader; Chancellor of the Exchequer (1852, 1858-59 and 1866-68) and Prime Minister (1868 and 1874-80). — 53, 83, 90
Page Break me46.543

Page me46.543
Donkin, Horatio Bryan (1845-1927) — English physician, who treated Marx and his family between 1881 and 1883. — 82, 91, 97, 106, 110, 113, 124, 133, 134, 157, 211, 215, 218, 226, 240, 262, 340, 345, 371, 456, 458, 461
Page me46.543
Doria, Andrea (1468-1560) — Genoese admiral and politician; ruler of Genoa (1528-60); from 1528 was in the service of Charles V, Holy Roman Emperor; navy commander in an expedition against Algeria (1541). — 241
Page me46.543
Douai, Carl Daniel Adolph (1819-1888) — French-born journalist; petty-bourgeois democrat, later socialist; took part in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany, emigrated to the USA in 1852; took part in the American socialist movement; editor of several socialist papers, the New Yorker Volkszeitung (1878-88) among them; contributed to the Vorwärts. — 25
Page me46.543
Dourlen — Gustave Dourlen's wife. — 116
Page me46.543
Dourlen — Gustave Dourlen's sister-in-law. — 116
Page me46.543
Dourlen, Gustave — French physician in Argenteuil, who treated Marx and his family in 1881 and 1882. — 107, 110, 111, 113, 116, 118, 135, 200, 232, 274-75, 276, 284, 297, 308, 309, 310, 319, 326, 331, 337, 338, 339
Page me46.543
Dozon, Auguste (1822-1891) — French diplomatic official and writer; compiled and translated collections of Balkan folklore. — 207
Page me46.543
Duclerc, Charles Théodore Eugéne (1812-1888) — French journalist and politician, moderate republican; member of the National editorial board (1840-46); Minister of Finance (May-June 1848). — 339
Page me46.543
Dufferin and Ava, Frederick Temple Hamilton-Temple-Blackwood, 1st Marquis of (1826-1902) — British statesman and diplomat, Liberal, member of Gladstone's Cabinet (1868-72), big landowner in Ireland. — 424
Page me46.543
Dühring, Eugen Karl (1833-1921) — German eclectic philosopher, economist and jurist, petty-bourgeois socialist, lecturer at Berlin University (1863-77). — 434
Page me46.543
Durando — French professor of botany in Algiers in the early 1880s. — 241
Page me46.543

Duverger, Artur (real name Boégoert, Bogaert, Boégaert) — Belgian journalist, member of the Socialist Party from 1879; correspondent of the Égalité for Belgium in the early 1880s. — 312
Page me46.543
E

Page me46.543
Eccarius, Johann Georg (1818-1889) — German tailor and journalist, prominent figure in the German and international working-class movement, member of the League of the Just and later of the Communist League; a leader of the German Workers' Educational Society in London; member of the General Council of the First International (1864-72), the Council's General Secretary (1867-71); Corresponding Secretary for America (1870-72); delegate to all the International's congresses and conferences; supported Marx up to 1872; joined the leaders of the British trade unions in the spring of 1872. — 123
Page me46.543
Engels, Charlotte (née Bredt) (1833-1912) — wife of Emil Engels, Frederick Engels' brother. — 178-79
Page me46.543
Engels, Elisabeth (b. 1861) — Frederick Engels' niece, Emil Engels' daughter. — 178-79
Page me46.543
Engels, Emil (1828-1884) — Frederick Engels' brother, a partner in the Ermen & Engels firm in Engelskirchen. — 178-79
Page Break me46.544

Page me46.544
Engels, Emil (1858-1907) — Frederick Engels' nephew, Emil Engels' son. — 306-07
Page me46.544
Engels, Hermann (1822-1905) — Frederick Engels' brother, manufacturer in Barmen, a partner in the Ermen & Engels firm in Engelskirchen. — 79
Page me46.544
Epicurus (341-270 B.C.) — Greek atomist philosopher. — 462
Page me46.544
Erbslöh, Carl Alexander (b. 1854) — August Erbslöh's son, husband (from 1882) of Elisabeth Engels, Engels' niece. — 178-79
Page me46.544
Erbslöh, Carl August (1819-1894) — German businessman in Barmen, Engels' acquaintance. — 178
Page me46.544
Erlanger, Michel (1828-1892) — merchant, employee at the Rothschild banking house in France; Rothschilds' representative in Egypt in the 1880s. — 337
Page me46.544
Ermen — businessmen in Manchester, partners in the Ermen & Engels and the Ermen & Roby firm. — 307
Page me46.544

Euler, Leonhard (1707-1783) — mathematician, expert in mechanics and physicist of Swiss descent, worked at the St Petersburg (1727-41 and 1766-83) and Berlin (1741-66) Academies of Sciences. — 57, 380
Page me46.544
F

Page me46.544
Farre, Jean Joseph Frédéric Albert (1816-1887) — French general, War Minister (1879-81). — 117, 474
Page me46.544
Fermé — French lawyer, republican; was banished to Algeria during the Second Empire, later a judge of a civil tribunal in Algeria; Charles Longuet's and Paul Lafargue's acquaintance. — 200, 202, 210, 214, 217, 219, 221, 229-30, 232, 234, 238, 239, 241, 249, 264
Page me46.544
Fermé — wife of the above. — 238
Page me46.544
Feugier — French physician in Enghien, who treated Marx from June to August 1882. — 275, 276, 297, 303, 304, 308, 319, 326
Page me46.544
Fielding, Henry (1707-1754) — English writer. — 329
Page me46.544
Fitzgibbon, Gerald (1793-1882) — Irish lawyer and journalist, author of Ireland in 1868. — 70
Page me46.544
Fleckles, Ferdinand (died c. 1894) — German physician, practised in Karlsbad, Marx's acquaintance. — 36, 47
Page me46.544
Fleury. — 267
Page me46.544
Florestan I (1785-1856) — Prince of Monaco (1841-56). — 273
Page me46.544
Forster, William Edward (1818-1886) — British manufacturer and politician, Liberal M.P., Chief Secretary for Ireland (1880-82); pursued a policy of brutal suppression of the national liberation movement. — 251
Page me46.544
Fortin, Edouard — French journalist, socialist, member of the French Workers' Party. — 55
Page me46.544
Fourier, François Marie Charles (1772-1837) — French utopian socialist. — 200
Page me46.544
Frankel, Léo (1844-1896) — prominent figure in the Hungarian and the international working-class movement; jeweller; member of the Paris Commune; Corresponding Secretary of the General Council of the First International for Austria and Hungary (1871-72); delegate to the London Conference (1871) and the Hague Congress (1872) of the International; a founder of the General Workers' Party of Hungary; delegate to several congresses of the Second International; associate of Marx and Engels. — 183

Page me46.544
Frederick II (the Great) (1712-1786) — King of Prussia (1740-86). — 30
Page Break me46.545

Page me46.545
Frederick William II (1744-1797) — King of Prussia (1786-97). — 391, 432, 434-35
Page me46.545
Frederick William III (1770-1840) — King of Prussia (1797-1840). — 282
Page me46.545
Frederick William IV (1795-1861) — King of Prussia (1840-61). — 127
Page me46.545
Freeman, Edward Augustus (1823-1892) — English historian, Liberal, professor at Oxford University from 1884. — 417
Page me46.545
Freycinet, Charles Louis de Saulses de (1828-1923) — French statesman and diplomat, moderate bourgeois republican; held ministerial posts several times, Chairman of the Council of Ministers (1879-80, 1882, 1886 and 1890-92) and Minister of Foreign Affairs (1879-80, 1882 and 1886). — 298
Page me46.545
Freytag, Otto — German lawyer, Social-Democrat, deputy to the Saxon Provincial Diet. — 41
Page me46.545
Fritzsche, Friedrich Wilhelm (1825-1905) — a reformist leader of the German Social-Democratic and trade union movement; tobacco-worker; took part in the 1848-49 revolution; one of the founders (1863) and leaders of the General Association of German Workers; follower of Lassalle; joined the Eisenachers in 1869; deputy to the North German and the German Reichstag (1868-71 and 1877-81). — 75, 77, 431, 447
Page me46.545
Furnivall, Frederick James (1825-1910) — English philologist and editor; Christian socialist, founded a few literary societies, the New Shakespeare Society and the Early English Text Society among them. — 182, 372
Page me46.545
G

Page me46.545
Galliffet, Gaston Alexandre Auguste, marquis de (1830-1909) — French general; commanded a cavalry regiment during the Franco-Prussian war; was taken prisoner at Sedan but was released to fight the Commune; commanded a cavalry brigade in the Versailles army; held a number of high military posts from the 1870s. — 133
Page me46.545
Gambetta, Léon (1838-1882) — French statesman, bourgeois republican; member of the Government of National Defence (1870-71); organised in the provinces military resistance to Prussia; Prime Minister and Minister of Foreign Affairs (1881-82). — 45, 117, 126, 133, 298, 319, 333, 354, 361

Page me46.545
Garcia, Charles J. — English journalist, London correspondent of the Sozialdemokrat in the early 1880s; Hyndman's supporter. — 333, 348, 359
Page me46.545
Garibaldi, Giuseppe (1807-1882) — Italian revolutionary, democrat, took part in the revolutionary movement in South America in the 1830s and 1840s; chief organiser of the defence of the Roman Republic (April-July 1849); leader of the Italian national movement for the liberation and unification of the country in the 1850s-60s; headed the Alpine riflemen in the Italian war of 1859; supported the Paris Commune, greeted the foundation of the International's sections in Italy in the 1870s. — 274, 317
Page me46.545
Geiser, Bruno (1846-1898) — German Social-Democrat, journalist, editor of the journal Neue Welt, deputy to the Reichstag (1881-87). — 244, 259, 279, 433
Page me46.545
George, Henry (1839-1897) — American journalist, economist and politician. — 93, 99-101, 162
Page me46.545
Girardin, Émile de (1806-1881) — French journalist and politician, editor of La Presse in the 1830s-60s (with intervals) and of La Liberté (1866-70); moderate republican during 1848-49 revolution;
Page Break me46.546
deputy to the Legislative Assembly (1850-51); later Bonapartist; notorious for his lack of principles in politics. — 53, 472
Page me46.546
Gladstone, William Ewart (1809-1898) — British statesman, Tory and later Peelite, leader of the Liberal Party in the latter half of the 19th century; Chancellor of the Exchequer (1852-55 and 1859-66), Prime Minister (1868-74, 1880-85, 1886 and 1892-94). — 40, 53, 54, 75, 80, 82-84, 86, 90, 121, 172, 185, 251, 286, 288, 319, 353, 365, 373
Page me46.546
Godard — French anarchist, journalist. — 355, 383, 389
Page me46.546
Goethe, Johann Wolfgang von (1749-1832) — German poet. — 110, 126, 230, 260, 268
Page me46.546
Gorbunova (in the second marriage Kablukova) Minna Karlovna (1840-1931) — Russian statistician and economist, Narodnik writer; studied abroad the organisation of vocational training for a few years and corresponded with Engels in connection with this in 1880; studied female domestic crafts in Moscow Gubernia in the 1880s; contributed to the journal Otechestvenniye Zapiski. — 17-18, 19, 20, 21
Page me46.546
Gorchakov, Alexander Mikhailovich, Prince (1798-1883) — Russian statesman and diplomat; envoy to Vienna (1854-56); Foreign Minister (1856-82). — 83
Page me46.546

Goschen, George Yoachim, Viscount of Hawkhurst from 1900 (1831-1907) — British statesman and politician; German by birth; at first Liberal; M.P. from 1863, member of Government several times, author of a number of works on economics. — 381, 424
Page me46.546
Gould, Jay (1836-1892) — American millionaire, railway owner and financier. — 63
Page me46.546
Graham, Sir James Robert George (1792-1861) — British statesman, Whig and later Peelite; Home Secretary (1841-46), First Lord of the Admiralty (1830-34 and 1852-55). — 365
Page me46.546
Grant — English manufacturer. — 27-29, 33
Page me46.546
Granier de Cassagnac, Paul Adolph Marie Prosper (1843-1904) — French journalist and politician; known for his duels and sharp polemics. — 345
Page me46.546
Green, Lisa. — 96
Page me46.546
Grévy, François Jules Paul (1807-1891) — French statesman, moderate republican; President of the Republic (1879-87). — 117, 127
Page me46.546
Grillenberger, Carl (1848-1897) — German fitter, editor, head of a Nuremberg printing house; member of the German Social-Democratic Workers' Party from 1869, publisher and editor of Social-Democratic newspapers in Nuremberg; organised the distribution of the Sozialdemokrat in South Germany; deputy to the German Reichstag (1881-97); member of the Party leadership (1884-90); an opportunist in the 1880s. — 431, 455
Page me46.546
Grimaldi — dynasty of Monaco princes; has reigned from the 14th century up to the present (with an interval from 1793 to 1814). — 273
Page me46.546
Grimaldi, Lamberto (died c. 1494) — Prince of Monaco (1457-c. 1494). — 273
Page me46.546
Guesde, Jules (Mathieu Jules Bazile) (1845-1922) — prominent figure in the French and international working-class movement; republican at the beginning of his career; sided with the anarchists in the first half of the 1870s; later a founder of the French Workers' Party (1879) and exponent of Marxism in France; leader of the revolutionary wing of the French socialist movement for many years. — 43, 44, 128, 145-50,
Page Break me46.547
154, 173, 181, 183, 190, 199, 282, 289, 294, 297, 333, 346, 350, 355, 360, 362, 363, 370, 378, 380, 383, 385, 386, 387, 389, 397, 401, 402, 406, 441, 445, 474
Page me46.547
Guizot, François Pierre Guillaume (1787-1874) — French historian and statesman, Orleanist; Foreign Minister (1840-48), Prime Minister (1847-48); virtually determined the home and foreign policy of France from 1840 to the February 1848 revolution; expressed the interests of the big financial bourgeoisie. — 100
Page me46.547

Gumbel, Abraham — German Social-Democrat, refugee in France in the early 1880s; bank clerk in Paris (1883); author of letters to the editors of the Sozialdemokrat, in which he criticised the paper's position on the split in the French Workers' Party. — 430, 431
Page me46.547
Gumpert, Eduard (d. 1893) — German physician resident in Manchester, a friend of Marx and Engels. — 24, 114, 117
Page me46.547
H

Page me46.547
Hales, John (b. 1839) — British trade unionist; weaver; member of the General Council of the International (1866-72) and its Secretary (1871-72); delegate to the London Conference (1871) and the Hague Congress (1872) of the International; headed the reformist wing of the British Federal Council from the beginning of 1872; expelled from the International in 1873. — 52
Page me46.547
Hänel, Albert (1833-1918) — German politician, professor of history of state law, leader of the Party of Progress group in the Reichstag (1867-93 and 1898-1903), then sided with the Party of Free Thinkers. — 178
Page me46.547
Hanssen, Georg (1809-1894) — German economist; author of a few books on the history of agriculture and agrarian relations. — 403
Page me46.547
Harney, George Julian (1817-1897) — prominent figure in the English labour movement; a Chartist leader (Left wing); editor of The Northern Star, Democratic Review, Red Republican and Friend of the People; lived in the USA (1862-88); member of the International; was on friendly terms with Marx and Engels. — 77, 93, 293
Page me46.547
Harry — see Longuet, Henri
Page me46.547
Hartmann, Georg Wilhelm — German worker; member of the General Association of German Workers; from 1875 one of the two chairmen of the Executive Committee of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany; deputy to the Reichstag (1878-81). — 82, 138
Page me46.547
Hartmann, Lev Nikolayevich (1850-1908) — Russian revolutionary, Narodnik (Populist); took part in a terrorist act of the Narodnaya Volya (People's Will) group against Alexander II in 1879, following which emigrated to France; representative of the Narodnaya Volya group abroad; left London for the USA at the end of 1881. — 82, 92-94, 95, 96, 138, 278, 320, 376, 381, 391, 395, 400, 404, 413, 422, 470
Page me46.547
Haschert, Lina — Carl Hirsch's wife. — 292
Page me46.547
Hasselmann, Wilhelm (1844-1916) — one of the leaders of the Lassallean General Association of German Workers (1871-75). — 10, 43, 431
Page me46.547

Hatzfeldt, Sophie, Countess von (1805-1881) — friend and supporter of Ferdinand Lassalle. — 12
Page me46.547
Hatzfeldt-Wildenburg, Edmund, Count von — Sophie von Hatzfeldt's husband. — 15
Page me46.547
Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (1770-1831) — German philosopher. — 131, 296, 354
Page Break me46.548

Page me46.548
Heine, Heinrich (1797-1856) — German revolutionary poet. — 187, 430
Page me46.548
Helmholtz, Hermann Ludwig Ferdinand von (1821-1894) — German physicist and physiologist, author of Über die Erhaltung der Kraft (1847). — 226
Page me46.548
Henry VI (1421-1471) — King of England. — 399
Page me46.548
Henry VII (1457-1509) — King of England (1485-1509). — 399, 454
Page me46.548
Henry VIII (1491-1547) — King of England (1509-47). — 454
Page me46.548
Hepner, Adolf (1846-1923) — German bookseller and journalist; one of the founders of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party (1869); editor of Der Volksstaat (1869-73); one of the accused at the Leipzig High Treason Trial (1872); delegate to the Hague Congress of the International (1872); contributed to socialist newspapers during emigration in the USA (1882-1908). — 188, 260, 293-94, 369, 421, 422, 425, 455
Page me46.548
Herzen, Alexander Ivanovich (1812-1870) — Russian revolutionary democrat, materialist philosopher and writer; left Russia in 1847, from 1852 lived in England where he established the Free Russian Press and published the periodical Polyarnaya Zvezda (Pole Star) (1855-62, 1869) and the newspaper Kolokol (The Bell) (1857-67). — 193
Page me46.548
Hess, Sibylle (née Pesch) (1820-1903) — Moses Hess' wife. — 164
Page me46.548
Heubel, Julius Christoph — small official in Salzwedel (Prussia), Jenny Marx's grandfather. — 158
Page me46.548
Hilditch, Richard — English economist of the mid-19th century. — 100
Page me46.548
Hirsch, Carl (1841-1900) — German Social-Democrat, journalist, editor of a few Social-Democratic newspapers; expounded ideas of scientific socialism in Paris in the summer of 1879. — 5, 51, 81, 90, 96, 106, 111, 112, 114-16, 122, 126, 225, 240, 248, 271, 291-93, 299, 301, 302, 311, 330, 360, 416
Page me46.548
Hirsch, Max (1832-1905) — German economist, prominent figure in the Party of Progress; together with Franz Duncker, founded reformist trade unions in 1868; deputy to the Reichstag (1869-93). — 118, 119, 121, 123

Page me46.548
Hirsch, Moritz (1831-1896) — Austrian banker, bourgeois philanthropist; got a concession to build a railway in Turkey in 1869. — 248
Page me46.548
Höchberg, Karl (pseudonym Dr Ludwig Richter) (1853-1885) — German social reformist; son of a rich merchant; joined the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany in 1876; founded and financed a number of newspapers and journals. — 8, 42, 186, 279, 292, 448
Page me46.548
Hödel (Hoedel), Emil Heinrich Max (1857-1878) — an apprentice from Leipzig; made an attempt on the life of William I on 11 May 1878. — 288
Page me46.548
Hohenzollerns — dynasty of Brandenburg Electors (1415-1701), Prussian Kings (1701-1918) and German Emperors (1871-1918). — 282, 434, 447
Page me46.548
Honoré IV (1758-1819) — Prince of Monaco (1814-19). — 273
Page me46.548
Horace (Quintus Horatius Flaccus) (65-8 B.C.) — Roman poet. — 235
Page me46.548
Howell, George (1833-1910) — British mason, a reformist leader of the British trade unions; former Chartist; Secretary of the London Trades Council (1861-62), participant in the inaugural meeting of the International held on 28 September 1864 at St Martin's Hall, London; member of the General Council of the International (October 1864 to 1869); participant in the London Conference of the International (1865); Secretary of the Reform
Page Break me46.549
League; Secretary of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress (1871-75); opposed revolutionary tactics. — 155, 185
Page me46.549
Hugues, Clovis (1851-1907) — French poet, journalist and politician; was close to radicals; supporter of the Paris Commune; deputy to the National Assembly from 1881. — 408
Page me46.549
Hume — English physician in London. — 240
Page me46.549
Hyndman, Henry Mayers (pseudonym John Broadhouse) (1842-1921) — British socialist, reformist; founder (1881) and leader of the Democratic Federation, transformed into the Social-Democratic Federation in 1884. — 49-50, 82, 102-03, 162, 228, 234, 251, 348, 423
Page me46.549
Hyndman, Mathilda (d. 1913) — Henry Mayers Hyndman's wife from 1876. — 49, 50, 82, 103
Page me46.549
I

Page me46.549

Ignatiev, Nikolai Pavlovich, Count (1832-1908) — Russian diplomat and statesman, ambassador to Turkey (1864-77), Russia's representative at the signing of the San Stefano Peace Treaty (1878); Minister of the Imperial Domains (1881-82), then Minister of the Interior. — 194, 363
Page me46.549
Irving, Henry (1838-1905) — famous English producer and actor; played in a number of Shakespeare's tragedies. — 82, 104, 158
Page me46.549
J

Page me46.549
Jaclard, Charles Victor (1840-1903) — French socialist, Blanquist, journalist, physician and mathematician; member of the International and of the Paris Commune, following the suppression of the Paris Commune emigrated to Switzerland and then to Russia; after the 1880 amnesty returned to France, where continued to take part in the socialist movement. — 116
Page me46.549
Janson, Yuli Eduardovich (1835-1893) — Russian statistician and economist, professor at St Petersburg University, head of a statistical department of the Petersburg City Council (from 1881); author of a few works on the theory and history of statistics. — 64.
Page me46.549
Jeffrey — American engineer and inventor. — 96
Page me46.549
Jenny — see Longuet, Jenny
Page me46.549
Jervis — Lafargue's partner in publishing business in England in the early 1880s. — 28-29, 33, 34
Page me46.549
Joffrin, Jules François Alexandre (1846-1890) — French socialist, mechanic; an organiser of the Mechanics' Syndicate in Paris; took part in the Paris Commune; after its suppression refugee in England (1871-81); member of the French Workers' Party, a leader of its Possibilist wing, member of the Paris City Council from 1882. — 173, 181, 183, 190, 362
Page me46.549
Johnny — see Longuet, Jean Laurent Frédéric
Page me46.549
Jollymeier, Jollymeyer — see Schorlemmer, Carl
Page me46.549
Jonas, Alexander (d. 1912) — German-born American socialist, journalist, editor-in-chief of the New Yorker Volkszeitung from 1878. — 422
Page me46.549
Jourde, François (1843-1893) — French socialist, bank employee; member of the French Section of the International; member of the Central Committee of the National Guard and of the Paris Commune; head of the Finance Commission; banished to New Caledonia after the suppression of the Commune; escaped in 1874; returned to France in 1880. — 408

Page Break me46.550

Page me46.550
Julius II (1443-1513) — Pope (1503-13). — 399
Page me46.550
Jung — see Vezin, Jane Elisabeth
Page me46.550
Juta, Johann Carl (1824-1886) — Dutch merchant, Marx's brother-in-law, husband of Marx's sister Louise. — 65
Page me46.550
K

Page me46.550
Kablukov, Nikolai Alexeyevich (1849-1919) — Russian economist and statistician, Narodnik (Populist); professor at Moscow University. — 64
Page me46.550
Kapell, August (b. 1844) — German Social-Democrat, carpenter, Lassallean; member of the General Association of German Workers in the 1860s-early 1870s; a founder and leader of the General Association of German Carpenters; deputy to the Reichstag (1877-78), was banished from Hamburg under the Anti-Socialist Law (1880); later abandoned political activity. — 282
Page me46.550
Karl von Hohenzollern, Prince (1801-1883) — son of King Frederick William III of Prussia. — 434
Page me46.550
Katkov, Mikhail Nikiforovich (1818-1887) — Russian revolutionary journalist, editor of Moskovskiye Vedomosti (1850-55 and 1863-87). — 194
Page me46.550
Kaub — Karl Kaub's wife. — 116
Page me46.550
Kaub, Karl — German worker, a refugee in London and after 1865 in Paris; member of the German Workers' Educational Society in London; member of the Central (November 1864 to 1865) and the General (1870-71) Council of the International, participated in the London Conference of 1865. — 115, 116
Page me46.550
Kaufmann, S.F. — German refugee in London, member of the German Workers' Educational Society in London in the 1880s. — 72
Page me46.550
Kaulitz — notary in Brunswick, G. Kaulitz's father. — 37
Page me46.550
Kaulitz, G. — German Social-Democrat, refugee in London, Engels' acquaintance. — 37, 39
Page me46.550

Kautsky, Karl (1854-1938) — German Social-Democrat, journalist, economist and historian, editor of Die Neue Zeit (1883-1917); associated with Marxists in the 1880s; author of several theoretical works on Marxism; an ideologist of Centrism in the German Social-Democratic Party and the Second International. — 56-58, 77, 81, 86, 95, 99, 120, 122, 126, 129, 138, 140-43, 150, 155, 165-66, 174, 190-95, 211, 248, 292, 299, 302, 320-23, 325, 348, 376-77, 434, 435-38, 451-53
Page me46.550
Kautsky, Louise (née Strasser) (1860-1950) — Austrian socialist, Engels' secretary from 1890; delegate to the Zurich Congress of the Second International (1893); Karl Kautsky's first wife. — 377
Page me46.550
Kautsky, Minna (1837-1912) — German writer, author of a few novels on social themes; Karl Kautsky's mother. — 82, 141, 142-44
Page me46.550
Kayser, Max (1853-1888) — German journalist; member of the Social-Democratic Workers' Party of Germany; deputy to the Reichstag (1878-87), belonged to the right wing of the Social-Democratic group. — 153, 311, 431-32
Page me46.550
Keay, John Seymour (1839-1909) — big English bank official in India (1862-82), Liberal; took part in the political life of India and England. — 381
Page me46.550
Kegel, Max (1850-1902) — German journalist and poet; joined the Social-Democratic Workers' Party in 1869; contributed to various workers' press organs (the 1870s-80s) and was imprisoned for this several times during the operation of the Anti-Socialist Law; founder and editor of the Social-Democratic journals Nußknacker and Wahre Jakob (the 1880s); author of the party anthem. — 128, 137
Page Break me46.551
Page me46.551
Kerdijk, Arnold (1846-1905) — Dutch public figure and journalist, Liberal, close to armchair socialism. — 65
Page me46.551
Kiepert, Johann Samuel Heinrich (1818-1899) — German geographer and cartographer, professor at Berlin University from 1859, compiled a number of geographic atlases. — 207
Page me46.551
Kindlinger, Nikolaus (1749-1819) — German historian. — 403
Page me46.551
King, Philip Stephen — bookseller in London, corresponded with Marx from 1867. — 19, 367, 378
Page me46.551
Koch, Robert (1843-1910) — German scholar, a founder of modern microbiology; discovered the pathogens of tuberculosis and cholera in the 1880s. — 262
Page me46.551
Kolkmann — bookseller in London. — 378
Page me46.551

Kollár, Jan (1793-1852) — Slovak poet and philologist, a leader of the national movement, advocated the unity of the Slav peoples within the framework of the Austrian Empire (Austro-Slavism). — 194
Page me46.551
Korvin-Krukovskaya (Jaclard), Anna Vasilyevna (1843-1887) — Russian revolutionary, member of the Russian Section of the First International; took part in the Paris Commune; Charles Victor Jaclard's wife. — 116
Page me46.551
Kotzebue, August Friedrich Ferdinand von (1761-1819) — German writer and journalist, extreme monarchist. — 111
Page me46.551
Kovalevsky, Maxim Maximovich (1851-1916) — Russian sociologist, historian, ethnographer and lawyer; politician, Liberal; author of a number of works on the history of the primitive communal system. — 45, 295
Page me46.551
Kraus, Bernard (1828-1887) — Austrian physician, founder and publisher of the Allgemeine Wiener medizinische Zeitung (1856-87). — 6
Page me46.551
Kryloff, Wanda. — 346
Page me46.551
Kunemann (born c. 1828) — German physician in Monte Carlo, who treated Marx in May and early June 1882. — 254, 262-64, 267, 270, 273, 275
Page me46.551
L

Page me46.551
Labouchere, Henry (1831-1912) — British politician, diplomat and journalist, Liberal M.P.; an owner of the Daily News from the late 1860s. — 54
Page me46.551
Lafargue, Laura (1845-1911) — Marx's second daughter; was active in the French working-class movement; translated into French many of Marx's and Engels' works; Paul Lafargue's wife from 1868. — 23, 25, 26, 30, 35, 96, 114, 118, 164, 170, 175, 186, 200, 215, 216, 222, 228, 238, 240, 244, 245, 252, 262, 277, 296, 297, 299, 303, 304, 309, 312, 315, 318, 320, 328, 329, 331, 336, 337, 338, 339-41, 344-46, 352, 363, 369, 396-99, 401, 402, 406, 413, 417, 421, 439-41, 456-57, 465
Page me46.551
Lafargue, Paul (1842-1911) — prominent figure in the French and international working-class movement; member of the General Council of the International (from 1866); a founder of the French Workers' Party (1879); follower and associate of Marx and Engels, husband of Marx's daughter Laura from 1868. — 12, 15, 23, 25-30, 32-35, 38, 43, 61, 64, 99, 106, 118, 128, 144-45, 147, 148, 150, 155, 170, 174, 181, 183, 186, 190, 200, 220-22, 224, 240, 244, 251, 266, 271, 275, 276-78, 282, 291, 297, 299, 332, 340, 343-50, 351-52, 354, 356, 357, 358, 361, 363, 369-70, 374, 375, 378, 379, 383, 385, 387-91, 396, 398, 399, 401, 402, 404, 406,
Page Break me46.552

413, 421, 424, 426, 441, 445, 456-57, 465
Page me46.552
Laffitte, Jacques (1767-1844) — French banker and liberal politician, headed the government in the early period of the July monarchy (1830-31). — 73
Page me46.552
Lagrange, Joseph Louis (1736-1813) — French mathematician and mechanic. — 380
Page me46.552
Landor, Walter Savage (1775-1864) — English poet, writer and critic; was suspected of being an accomplice in Orsini's attempt on the life of Napoleon III in 1858. — 83
Page me46.552
Langland, William (c. 1330-c. 1400) — English poet. — 371
Page me46.552
Lankester, Sir Edwin Ray (1847-1929) — English biologist, professor from 1874. — 64, 82, 262, 461
Page me46.552
Lassalle, Ferdinand (1825-1864) — German writer and lawyer; participated in the democratic movement in the Rhine Province (1848-49); founder of the General Association of German Workers (1863); an initiator of the opportunist trend within the German Social-Democratic movement. — 12, 15, 82, 146, 158, 191, 230, 294, 324, 325, 332, 343, 354
Page me46.552
Laura — see Lafargue, Laura
Page me46.552
Laveleye, Émile Louis Victor, baron de (1822-1892) — Belgian historian and vulgar economist. — 157, 392
Page me46.552
Lavrov, Pyotr Lavrovich (1823-1900) — Russian philosopher, subjective sociologist and journalist, an ideologist of the revolutionary Narodism (Populism); emigrated in 1870; member of the International and of the Paris Commune, edited the journal Vperyod! (1873-76) and the newspaper Vperyod (1875-76). — 124-25, 184-86, 201, 211-12, 218, 235, 244, 271, 284, 295, 464
Page me46.552
Law, Harriet (1832-1897) — a leading figure in the atheist movement in England; member of the General Council (June 1867 to 1872) and of the Manchester Section of the International (1872); published the Secular Chronicle (1876-79). — 54
Page me46.552
Leibniz, Gottfried Wilhelm (1646-1716) — German philosopher and mathematician. — 380, 384
Page me46.552
Lem(c)ke, Gottlieb (c. 1844-1885) — member of the German Workers' Educational Society in London. — 79
Page me46.552
Lenchen — see Demuth, Helene
Page me46.552
Leonhardt, Gerhard Adolf Wilhelm (1815-1880) — German lawyer and statesman, Minister of Justice in Hanover (1865-66) and Prussia (1867-79). — 189

Page me46.552
Lessner, Friedrich (1825-1910) — German tailor; member of the Communist League; took part in the 1848-49 revolution; defendant at the Cologne Communist trial (1852); refugee in London from 1856; member of the German Workers' Educational Society in London; member of the General Council of the International (1864-72) and of the British Federal Council (1872-73); friend and associate of Marx and Engels. — 52, 463
Page me46.552
Liebknecht, Natalie (1835-1909) — wife of Wilhelm Liebknecht from 1868. — 137
Page me46.552
Liebknecht, Wilhelm (1826-1900) — prominent figure in the German and international working-class movement, took part in the 1848-49 revolution, member of the Communist League and of the International, deputy to the North German Reichstag (1867-70), deputy to the German Reichstag from 1874 (with intervals); one of the founders and leaders of the German Social-Democratic Party; friend and associate of Marx and Engels.
Page Break me46.553
— 3, 4, 12, 24, 35, 38, 40, 42, 50, 78, 80, 86, 99, 138, 164, 188, 261, 301, 304, 328, 334, 336, 348, 351, 370, 373, 442, 447, 455, 458, 469-70, 473
Page me46.553
Lilienthal, F.W. — German physician, refugee in New York (the 1880s), was close to socialists. — 278, 368
Page me46.553
Lingenau, Johann Karl Ferdinand (c. 1814-1877) — German-born American socialist, bequeathed his money to the German Social-Democratic Party. — 99
Page me46.553
Lissagaray, Prosper Olivier (1838-1901) — French journalist; took part in the Paris Commune, adhered to the bourgeois-democratic `new Jacobins' group, emigrated to England after the defeat of the Commune; author of the Histoire de la Commune de 1871 (1876), returned to France in 1880, published La Bataille (1882-83, 1888-93), a newspaper which opposed Guesde and Lafargue, leaders of the French Workers' Party. — 116, 134, 150, 289, 309, 343, 346, 356
Page me46.553
Littré, Maximilien Paul Emile (1801-1881) — French philosopher, philologist and politician. — 473
Page me46.553
Longuet, Charles (1839-1903) — prominent figure in the French working-class movement, journalist, Proudhonist; member of the General Council of the International (1866-67, 1871-72), Corresponding Secretary for Belgium (1866), delegate to the Lausanne (1867), Brussels (1868) and Hague (1872) congresses and the London Conference (1871); member of the Paris Commune (1871), later joined the Possibilists, member of the Paris City Council (the 1880s-90s), husband of Marx's daughter Jenny from 1872. — 19, 23, 44, 47, 52-55, 61, 81, 84, 90, 92, 96, 98, 107, 108, 109, 111, 135, 136, 157, 199, 200, 202, 212, 219, 220, 224, 230, 232, 285, 295, 303, 309, 310, 313, 316, 327, 330, 340, 364, 369, 375, 408, 424, 426, 457, 469-74, 475
Page me46.553
Longuet, Charles (Caro) (September 1873-July 1874) — son of Jenny and Charles Longuet, Marx's grandson. — 156

Page me46.553
Longuet, Edgar (1879-1950) — son of Jenny and Charles Longuet, Marx's grandson. — 3, 61, 81, 89, 90, 95, 96, 107, 110, 135, 158, 160, 164, 165, 219, 225, 230, 240, 296, 303, 316, 327, 340, 426, 470
Page me46.553
Longuet, Felicitas — Charles Longuet's mother. — 111, 113, 303
Page me46.553
Longuet, Henri (Henry, Harra, Harry) (1878-1883) — son of Jenny and Charles Longuet, Marx's grandson. — 23, 61, 81, 89, 90, 95, 107, 108, 110, 111, 135, 136, 158, 160, 164, 165, 219, 225, 230, 240, 250, 256, 303, 316, 327, 340, 371, 417, 464, 470, 475
Page me46.553
Longuet, Jean Laurent Frédéric (Johnny) (1876-1938) — son of Jenny and Charles Longuet, Marx's grandson. — 23, 61, 81, 85, 89, 90, 95, 96, 98, 107, 108, 109, 110, 115, 158, 160, 164, 165, 199, 219, 225, 230, 231, 232, 240, 250, 296, 303, 308, 312, 316, 318, 320, 328, 340, 353, 372, 378, 379, 417, 421, 424, 426, 475
Page me46.553
Longuet, Jenny (née Marx) (1844-1883) — Marx's eldest daughter, prominent figure in the international working-class movement, wife of Charles Longuet from 1872. — 23, 61, 67-70, 81-85, 89-92, 95-96, 97-98, 106, 109, 110, 111, 113, 116, 117, 134-35, 142, 143, 156-59, 160, 164-65, 169, 199, 212, 217, 218-19, 220-21, 223-25, 230, 232, 240, 250, 255, 259, 265-66, 271-72, 276, 277, 278, 284, 289, 296, 303, 309, 310, 311, 315-17, 328, 329, 330, 331, 338, 340, 345, 402, 413, 417, 419, 420, 421, 424-26, 429, 430, 434, 458, 461, 469-75
Page Break me46.554

Page me46.554
Longuet, Jenny (1882-1952) — daughter of Jenny and Charles Longuet, Marx's granddaughter. — 303, 329, 331
Page me46.554
Longuet, Marcel (1881-1949) — son of Jenny and Charles Longuet, Marx's grandson. — 89, 95, 96, 107, 110, 111, 158, 160, 164, 165, 219, 225, 230, 240, 250, 256, 303, 316, 340, 426
Page me46.554
Lopatin, Hermann Alexandrovich (1845-1918) — Russian revolutionary Narodnik, member of the General Council of the International (1870), one of the translators into Russian of the first volume of Marx's Capital, friend of Marx and Engels. — 64
Page me46.554
Loria, Achille (1857-1943) — Italian sociologist and economist. — 48, 298, 345-46, 449
Page me46.554
Louis XVI (1754-1793) — King of France (1774-92), executed during the French Revolution at the end of the 18th century. — 208
Page me46.554
Louise, Auguste Wilhelmine Amalie (1776-1810) — Queen of Prussia, wife of Frederick William III, daughter of Karl Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. — 282
Page me46.554

Lowe, Robert, 1st Viscount Sherbrooke (1811-1892) — British statesman and journalist, contributed to The Times; Whig, later Liberal, M.P., Chancellor of the Exchequer (1868-73), Home Secretary (1873-74). — 376
Page me46.554
Ludwig I (1786-1868) — King of Bavaria (1825-48). — 249
Page me46.554
Lullier, Charles Ernest (1838-1891) — French journalist, retired naval officer, took part in the insurrection of 18 March 1871, member of the Central Committee of the National Guard and its commander-in-chief (18-25 March 1871), waged propaganda against the Paris Commune, exiled to New Caledonia after the suppression of the Commune. — 150
Page me46.554
M

Page me46.554
Macaulay, Thomas Babington (1800-1859) — English historian and politician, Whig, M.P. — 83
Page me46.554
Macdonald, Alexander (1821-1881) — an English trade union leader, President of the National Miners' Union, M.P. from 1874, pursued a Liberal policy. — 3
Page me46.554
Mace — French captain of the Said. — 246, 249
Page me46.554
Maceo, Antonio (c. 1848-1896) — Cuban revolutionary, general, a leader of the liberation movement against the Spanish rule, active in the popular uprisings (1868-78, 1881 and 1895), killed in action. — 353
Page me46.554
Machiavelli, Niccoló (1469-1527) — Italian politician, historian, military theorist and writer. — 262
Page me46.554
MacLean — English house-owner in Ventnor (Isle of Wight). — 366
Page me46.554
Magnadére — Armand Magnadére's mother. — 221
Page me46.554
Magnadére, Armand (d. 1882) — bank official in Paris. — 221
Page me46.554
Mahmud Damat Pasha (Djelal Eddin) (1840-1884) — Turkish statesman, member of the war council, repeatedly War Minister, demoted (1878) and exiled; returned in 1880; sentenced (1881) to life exile for his involvement in the assassination of the Sultan Abdul-Aziz; brother-in-law of Abdul-Hamid II. — 247-48
Page me46.554
Mahmud Nedim Pasha (1810-1883) — Turkish statesman, Governor-General of Syria and Smyrna, Naval Minister (1856), Grand Vizier (1871-76, with intervals), fell under strong influence of Ignatiev, Russian Ambassador; had to resign under public pressure in 1876, Minister of the Interior (1879-83). — 247-48
Page Break me46.555

Page me46.555
Maitland — Dolly Maitland's father, acquaintance of the Marx family. — 82
Page me46.555
Maitland, Clara — Dolly Maitland's sister. — 82
Page me46.555
Maitland, Dolly — English actress, acquaintance of the Marx family. — 82, 104, 124, 177
Page me46.555
Malon, Benoît (1841-1893) — French socialist, member of the International, delegate to the Geneva Congress (1866), deputy to the National Assembly (1871), member of the Paris Commune, after the suppression of the Commune emigrated to Italy and then to Switzerland; later a leader and ideologist of the Possibilists, took part in the foundation of the Bakuninist Alliance of Socialist Democracy (1868). — 11, 12, 43, 45, 127, 145-47, 150, 154, 155, 173, 181, 190, 192, 282, 289, 309, 332, 339, 341, 342, 343, 345, 350, 352, 356, 360, 362, 363, 370, 373, 374, 380, 384, 386, 387, 388, 392, 408, 433, 456, 465
Page me46.555
Mals — French journalist, anarchist, member of the editorial board of the Citoyen et Bataille. — 346, 347
Page me46.555
Malthus, Thomas Robert (1766-1834) — English clergyman and economist, author of a theory of population. — 58
Page me46.555
Manning, Henry Edward (1808-1892) — English clergyman, converted into Catholicism in 1851, cardinal from 1875; was close to Christian socialism. — 416
Page me46.555
Maret, Henry (1838-1917) — French radical journalist, an editor of the Marseillaise, deputy to the National Assembly from 1881. — 117, 154, 383, 389
Page me46.555
Marlborough — English ducal family. — 83
Page me46.555
Marius, Gaius (c. 156-86 B.C.) — Roman general and statesman, Consul (107, 104-100, 86 B.C.). — 382
Page me46.555
Marx, Eleanor (Tussy) (1855-1898) — Marx's youngest daughter, prominent figure in the British and international working-class movement, married Edward Aveling in 1884. — 6, 36, 41, 82, 89, 91, 95, 98, 104, 108, 109, 113, 117, 120, 124, 132-33, 134-35, 137, 143, 159, 164, 165, 169-72, 175, 176, 180, 182, 184, 186, 198, 199, 215, 216, 219, 225, 227, 230, 244, 245, 262, 263-65, 266, 276, 277, 280, 295, 296, 298, 303-04, 308, 309, 312, 315, 318, 320, 328, 330, 331, 335, 340, 345, 351, 366, 371-72, 378, 379, 394, 412, 417-18, 420, 421, 422-24, 426, 456, 461, 463, 470, 475
Page me46.555
Marx, Heinrich (1777-1838) — Marx's father, lawyer, councillor of justice in Trier. — 157
Page me46.555

Marx, Jenny (née von Westphalen) (1814-1881) — Marx's wife from June 1843. — 7, 23, 24, 36, 41, 46, 47, 48, 49, 60, 61, 81, 82, 89, 91, 95, 96, 98, 101, 102, 103, 104, 107, 109, 110, 113, 115, 116, 117, 118, 124, 125, 130, 132, 135, 136, 143, 151, 155-58, 159, 160, 161, 162, 164, 170, 196, 235, 365, 458, 461, 475
Page me46.555
Mason — Lafargue's English partner in publishing business in the early 1880s. — 33, 34
Page me46.555
Massard, Émile — French socialist, journalist, member of the French Workers' Party (withdrew from it in the 1880s); secretary of the editorial board of the Égalité in the early 1880s. — 224, 355, 389, 402, 473, 474
Page me46.555
Maurer, Georg Ludwig Ritter von (1790-1872) — German historian, studied the social system of ancient and medieval Germany. — 109, 336, 395, 400, 403, 407, 416, 455
Page me46.555
Maxse, Frederick Augustus (1833-1900) — English journalist, admiral, Comtist, contributed to the newspaper Justice in the 1880s. — 84
Page Break me46.556

Page me46.556
Mayer, Karl (1819-1889) — German petty-bourgeois democrat, deputy to the Frankfurt National Assembly (1848-49); after the defeat of the revolution emigrated to Switzerland, edited the newspaper Beobachter in the 1860s. — 243
Page me46.556
Mazzini, Giuseppe (1805-1872) — leader of the national liberation movement in Italy, head of the Provisional Government of the Roman Republic (1849), an organiser of the Central Committee of European Democracy in London (1850), tried to gain an influence over the International when it was being formed (1864), opposed the Paris Commune and the International in 1871, hindered the development of the independent Italian working-class movement. — 83
Page me46.556
McGuire, P.J. — American socialist and trade union leader, reformist, member of the US Socialist Party, a leader of the Carpenters' Union in the 1880s; delegate to the international socialist congress in Chur in 1881. — 143
Page me46.556
Medici, Lorenzo (1449-1492) — statesman and poet, ruler of Florence (1469-92). — 273
Page me46.556
Mehring, Franz (1846-1919) — prominent figure in the German working-class movement, historian, journalist; became Marxist in the 1880s; author of works on the history of Germany and German Social-Democracy, biographer of Karl Marx, an editor of the Neue Zeit magazine, a leader and theoretician of the German Left-wing Social-Democrats, played a prominent part in the foundation of the Communist Party of Germany. — 292, 299, 301, 302, 330, 335, 377
Page me46.556
Meissner, Otto Karl (1819-1902) — Hamburg publisher, published Capital and some other works by Marx and Engels. — 158, 161, 423, 425
Page me46.556

Meitzen, August (1822-1910) — German statistician, economist and historian, author of works on the history of agrarian relations in Germany, an official of the statistical departments in Prussia and the German Empire in 1867-82. — 403
Page me46.556
Mesa y Leompart, José (1840-1904) — printer, prominent figure in the Spanish working-class and socialist movement, an organiser of the International sections in Spain, member of the Spanish Federal Council (1871-72) and of the New Madrid Federation (1872-73), actively fought anarchism, one of the first exponents of Marxism in Spain, a founder of the Spanish Socialist Workers' Party (1879), translated a number of works by Marx and Engels into Spanish. — 128, 150, 199, 297, 346
Page me46.556
Meyer, H. — member of the German Workers' Educational Society in London. — 9-10
Page me46.556
Meyer, Rudolf Hermann (1839-1899) — German bourgeois economist and journalist, Conservative. — 157, 416, 434, 437, 449, 465
Page me46.556
Mill, James (1773-1836) — English economist and philosopher, follower of Ricardo's theory. — 100
Page me46.556
Mill, John Stuart (1806-1873) — English economist and positivist philosopher, son of the above. — 100, 333
Page me46.556
Miquel, Johannes (1828-1901) — German lawyer, politician, banker; member of the Communist League up to 1852, later a National Liberal, deputy to the North German and the German Reichstag (1867-77 and 1887-90). — 449
Page me46.556
Mirabeau, Honoré Gabriel Victor Riqueti, comte de (1749-1791) — leading figure in the French Revolution, advocate of constitutional monarchy. — 156, 290, 434-35
Page Break me46.557

Page me46.557
Mohammed (Mahomet, Muhammed) (c. 570-632) — founder of Islam. — 242, 247, 425
Page me46.557
Moliére (real name Jean Baptiste Poquelin) (1622-1673) — French dramatist. — 164
Page me46.557
Mommsen, Theodor (1817-1903) — German historian, author of works on the history of Ancient Rome. — 178
Page me46.557
Moore, Samuel (1838-1911) — English lawyer, member of the International, translated into English the first volume of Marx's Capital (in collaboration with Edward Aveling) and the Manifesto of the Communist Party, friend of Marx and Engels. — 3, 26, 30, 35, 98, 166, 175, 215, 306, 307, 319, 378, 380
Page me46.557
Morley, Samuel (1809-1886) — English industrialist and Liberal politician, M.P. (1865, 1868-85). — 54, 359
Page me46.557

Most, Johann Joseph (1846-1906) — German anarchist, joined the working-class movement in the 1860s, deputy to the German Reichstag (1874-78), emigrated to England in 1878 after the promulgation of the Anti-Socialist Law; founder (1879) and editor of the Freiheit; as an anarchist, expelled from the German Socialist Workers' Party in 1880, emigrated to the USA in 1882 where continued his anarchist propaganda. — 7, 10, 39, 42, 43, 59, 75, 78, 80, 81-83, 86, 105, 141, 187, 260, 289, 325
Page me46.557
Müllner, Amadeus Gottfried Adolf (1774-1829) — German poet, playwright and literary critic. — 263, 437
Page me46.557
Murhard, Franz (Francis) — German refugee in the USA. — 46-47
Page me46.557
N

Page me46.557
Napoleon I Bonaparte (1769-1821) — French statesman and general, first Consul of the French Republic (1799-1804), Emperor of the French (1804-14 and 1815). — 188, 273, 327, 402
Page me46.557
Napoleon III (Charles Louis Napoleon Bonaparte) (1808-1873) — nephew of Napoleon I; President of the Second Republic (December 1848 to 1851), Emperor of the French (1852-70). — 53, 100, 191, 200, 210, 454
Page me46.557
Necker, Jacques (1732-1804) — French banker and politician, several times Director General of Finance in the 1770s and 1780s, attempted to carry out reforms. — 73
Page me46.557
Newton, Sir Isaac (1642-1727) — English physicist, astronomer and mathematician, founder of classical mechanics. — 380
Page me46.557
Nicholls — an acquaintance of the Engels family in London. — 25
Page me46.557
Nicholls, Sarah — an acquaintance of the Engels family in London, daughter of the above. — 25
Page me46.557
Nieuwenhuis, Ferdinand Domela (1846-1919) — prominent figure in the working-class movement in Holland, a founder of the Dutch Social-Democratic Party, M.P. from 1888, delegate to the international socialist workers' congresses of 1889, 1891 and 1893, went over to anarchism in the 1890s. — 16, 65-67, 166-67, 365
Page me46.557
Nikitina, Varvara Nikolayevna (née Gendre) (1842-1884) — Russian journalist, lived in Italy from the late 1860s, later in France, contributed to several French periodicals. — 157
Page me46.557
Nim, Nym — see Demuth, Helene
Page me46.557

Nobiling, Karl Eduard (1848-1878) — German anarchist, made an attempt on the life of William I (1878) which served as a pretext for the introduction of the Anti-Socialist Law. — 175, 288
Page Break me46.558

Page me46.558
Nordau, Max Simon (real name Südfeld) (1849-1923) — German-born French writer and journalist. — 112, 114
Page me46.558
Norgate — bookseller in London. — 103
Page me46.558
Novikova, Olga Alexeyevna (1840-1925) — Russian journalist, lived in England for a long time, was in fact a diplomatic agent of the Russian government under Gladstone's administration in the 1870s. — 319
Page me46.558
O

Page me46.558
O'Connell, Daniel (1775-1847) — Irish lawyer and politician, leader of the Liberal wing in the national liberation movement. — 69, 286, 288
Page me46.558
O'Donovan Rossa, Jeremiah (1831-1915) — a leader of the Fenian movement, published The Irish People (1863-65); was arrested in 1865 and sentenced to life imprisonment, amnestied in 1870, emigrated to the USA where he headed the Fenian organisation, retired from political life in the 1880s. — 287
Page me46.558
Offenbach, Jacques (1819-1880) — French composer, a founder of the classical operetta. — 268
Page me46.558
Oldenburg, Heinrich — German Social-Democrat, journalist. — 365
Page me46.558
Oldrini, Alessandro — Italian-born French socialist, fought on the side of France in the Franco-Prussian war (1870-71), lived in France in the 1870s-early 1880s, exiled from France in late 1882. — 345
Page me46.558
Oppenheimer, Moses — German Social-Democrat, was proved guilty of secret ties with the bourgeois press and embezzlement of Party funds (1883). — 447
Page me46.558
Oswald, Eugen (1826-1912) — German journalist, democrat, took part in the revolutionary movement in Baden (1848-49), emigrated to England after the defeat of the revolution. — 36-37
Page me46.558
P

Page me46.558
Palmerston, Henry John Temple, 3rd Viscount (1784-1865) — British statesman, first Tory, from 1830 Whig, Foreign Secretary (1830-41 and 1846-51), Home Secretary (1852-55) and Prime Minister (1855-58 and 1859-65). — 251, 319, 365
Page me46.558
Parker, Sarah — Engels' housemaid. — 135
Page me46.558
Parnell, Charles Stewart (1846-1891) — Irish politician and statesman, Liberal, bourgeois nationalist, M.P. from 1875, Home Rule Party leader from 1877, a founder and leader of the Irish Land League (1880-81). — 84, 86, 95, 471
Page me46.558
Parnell, Miss. — 98
Page me46.558
Parsons, William (c. 1570-1650) — English statesman, took part in the colonisation of Ireland, big Irish landowner, Lord Chief Justice of Ireland (1640-48), Privy Councillor from 1623, M.P. — 68
Page me46.558
Pauli, Ida — Philipp Viktor Pauli's wife. — 92
Page me46.558
Pauli, Philipp Viktor (1836-after 1916) — German chemist, Carl Schorlemmer's friend, was on intimate terms with Marx and Engels, was in charge of a chemical plant in Rheinau, near Mannheim (1871-80). — 92
Page me46.558
Pearson, Carl (1857-1936) — English mathematician, biologist and philosopher, professor at University College in London from 1884; champion of socialist ideas and the working-class movement. — 60
Page me46.558
Peel, Sir Robert (1788-1850) — British
Page Break me46.559
statesman, moderate Tory, Prime Minister (1834-35 and 1841-46), repealed the Corn Laws in 1846. — 69, 365
Page me46.559
Pelletan (1846-1915) — French bourgeois politician, journalist, editor-in-chief of the Justice from 1880, associated with the Left-wing Radicals. — 471
Page me46.559
Péreire, Isaac (1806-1880) — French banker, Bonapartist, deputy to the Corps legislatif; together with his brother Émile Péreire, founded the joint-stock bank Crédit Mobilier in 1852; it went bankrupt in 1867 and was liquidated in 1871; author of works on credit. — 73
Page me46.559
Péreire, Jacob Émile (1800-1875) — French banker, adhered to the Saint-Simonists (1825-31), later a Bonapartist, a founder (1852) and director of the Crédit Mobilier. — 73
Page me46.559
Perovskaya, Sofia Lvovna (1853-1881) — Russian revolutionary, prominent figure in the Narodnaya Volya (People's Will) secret society, executed for involvement in the assassination of Alexander II. — 96

Page me46.559
Philips, Antoinette (Nannette) (c. 1837-1885) — Marx's cousin. — 246
Page me46.559
Phillips, Wendell (1811-1884) — American public figure and politician, orator, a leader of the revolutionary wing in the abolitionist movement, advocated revolutionary methods in the struggle against the Southern slaveholders, joined the working-class movement in the 1870s, favoured the formation of an independent workers' party in the USA, joined the First International in 1871. — 77-78
Page me46.559
Picard, Léon — French socialist, journalist, member of the French Workers' Party, an editor of the Égalité in the early 1880s. — 352, 354, 358, 361, 389
Page me46.559
Pickering — English physician in Cannes. — 273
Page me46.559
Piquand, Édouard — French lawyer, examining magistrate in Montluçon in the early 1880s. — 397
Page me46.559
Pitt, William (1759-1806) — British statesman, a Tory leader, Prime Minister (1783-1801 and 1804-06). — 69
Page me46.559
Plon-Plon — see Bonaparte, Prince Napoléon Joseph Charles Paul
Page me46.559
Plutarch (c. 45-c. 127) — Greek moralist, writer and philosopher. — 273, 382
Page me46.559
Podolinski, Sergei Andreyevich (1850-1891) — Ukrainian public figure, politician, scientist, Darwinist, one of the first propagandists of Marx's economic theory in the Ukraine; emigrated to Austria in 1871, later to France, lived in Switzerland from the 1880s; had contacts with Russian revolutionary émigrés, an initiator of putting out socialist literature in Ukrainian in Vienna (1879); was personally acquainted with Marx and Engels, and regularly corresponded with them. — 410, 411, 412-13
Page me46.559
Poliakov, Samuil Solomonovich (1837-1888) — railway entrepreneur and financier in Russia. — 248
Page me46.559
Pollaky, Ignatius Paul — owner of a private police bureau in London in the early 1880s, contributed to the Foreign Police Gazette. — 390
Page me46.559
Prendergast, John Patrick (1808-1893) — Irish historian, Liberal, author of works on the history of Ireland. — 68
Page me46.559
Proudhon, Pierre Joseph (1809-1865) — French writer, petty-bourgeois socialist, economist and sociologist, a founder of anarchism. — 44, 93, 100, 177, 193, 472
Page me46.559
Pumps — see Rosher, Mary Ellen
Page me46.559
Puttkamer, Robert Victor von (1828-1900)

Page Break me46.560
— Minister of the Interior in the German Empire (1881-88), initiated the persecution of Social-Democrats at the time of the Anti-Socialist Law. — 88, 431, 455
Page me46.560
Pyat, Félix (1810-1889) — French journalist, playwright and politician, democrat; took part in the 1848 revolution, emigrated to Switzerland in 1849 and later to Belgium and England; opposed independent working-class movement, using the French Section in London, conducted a slander campaign against Marx and the First International; deputy to the National Assembly (1871), member of the Paris Commune (1871); emigrated to England after the suppression of the Commune, returned to France after the 1880 amnesty, published the newspaper Commune (September-November 1880). — 43, 116
Page me46.560
R

Page me46.560
Raciborski, Adam (1809-1871) — Polish physician, took part in the 1830-31 insurrection in Poland, emigrated to France after the suppression of the insurrection. — 437
Page me46.560
Rackow, Heinrich — German Social-Democrat, emigrated to London in 1879, a tobacco shop owner, member of the German Workers' Educational Society in London. — 7
Page me46.560
Radford, Ernest — English lawyer, acquaintance of the Marx family, Dolly Maitland's husband. — 82, 104, 475
Page me46.560
Rae, John (1845-1915) — English economist and sociologist, contributed to the Contemporary Review in the 1880s, author of Life of Adam Smith. — 162, 185
Page me46.560
Ranke, Johannes (1836-1916) — German physiologist and anthropologist, professor at Munich University. — 417
Page me46.560
Rasch, Gustav (d. 1878) — journalist, lawyer, took part in the 1848-49 revolution, emigrated to Switzerland and then to France after the suppression of the revolution, member of the German Social-Democratic Party from 1873. — 206
Page me46.560
Redgrave, Alexander — factory inspector in England. — 56, 368
Page me46.560
Redpath — see Redgrave, Alexander
Page me46.560
Regnard, Albert Adrien (b. 1836) — French radical journalist and historian, took part in the Paris Commune, emigrated to England after its suppression, returned to France after the 1880 amnesty. — 67-69, 117
Page me46.560
Reinhardt, Richard (1829-1898) — German poet, refugee in Paris; Heinrich Heine's secretary, friend of Marx and Engels. — 170, 172, 285
Page me46.560

Rendstone — Marx's acquaintance. — 134
Page me46.560
Reynaud — French physician in Argenteuil. — 111, 112, 113
Page me46.560
Reynaud — wife of the above. — 111, 112, 113
Page me46.560
Ricardo, David (1772-1823) — English economist. — 16, 93, 100, 230
Page me46.560
Richard III (1452-1485) — King of England (1483-85). — 399
Page me46.560
Richter, Eugen (1838-1906) — German Left-wing liberal politician, leader of the Party of Progress, member of the North German Reichstag (1867) and of the German Reichstag (1871-1906), a founder and leader of the Party of Free Thinkers (Deutsche Freisinnige Partei), opposed Bismarck, favoured free trade, fought Social-Democracy. — 178
Page me46.560
Roby, Henry John (1830-1915) — English school teacher, author of a Latin grammar; partner in the Manchester firm of Ermen & Roby (1874-94), Liberal M.P. (1890-95). — 307
Page Break me46.561

Page me46.561
Rochefort, Victor Henri, marquis de Rochefort Luçay (1831 or 1830-1913) — French journalist and politician, Left-wing republican, published the journal La Lanterne (1868-69) and the newspaper La Marseillaise (1869-70); member of the Government of National Defence (4 September-31 October 1870), exiled to New Caledonia after the suppression of the Commune, monarchist from the end of the 1880s. — 44, 47, 52, 82, 133, 309, 356
Page me46.561
Rodbertus (Rodbertus-Jagetzow), Johann Karl (1805-1875) — German economist; a leader of the Left Centre in the Prussian National Assembly (1848), subsequently a theoretician of `state socialism'. — 416, 434
Page me46.561
Roesgen, Charles — employee at the firm of Ermen & Engels in Manchester. — 346
Page me46.561
Roodhuizen, A. — pastor in Zalt-Bommel, husband of Marx's cousin Antoinette Philips. — 246
Page me46.561
Roscoe, Sir Henry Enfield (1833-1915) — English chemist, author of chemical manuals. — 446
Page me46.561
Rosher, Lilian (b. 1882) — Mary Ellen Rosher's daughter. — 280, 306, 312, 316, 320, 323-24, 331, 340, 345, 346
Page me46.561
Rosher, Mary Ellen (née Burns) (Pumps) (born c. 1860) — Lydia Burns' niece. — 25, 89, 95, 104, 108, 134, 135, 166, 174, 215, 228, 234, 280, 306, 307, 309, 316, 320, 323, 324, 328, 340, 345, 346, 372, 379, 403, 404, 414, 438, 465

Page me46.561
Rosher, Percy White — English merchant, married Mary Ellen Burns in 1881. — 316, 329, 340, 381, 391, 397, 401, 438, 465
Page me46.561
Rothaus — see Roodhuizen, A.
Page me46.561
Rothschild, Alphonse de (1827-1905) — head of the Rothschild banking house in France. — 170, 298, 337
Page me46.561
Rowsell. — 381
Page me46.561
Roy, Joseph — translator of the first volume of Marx's Capital and Ludwig Feuerbach's works into French. — 309, 310, 313, 472
Page me46.561
S

Page me46.561
Šafarik, Pavel Josef (1795-1861) — Slovak philologist, historian and archaeologist, a Liberal leader in the movement for national independence, supported the programme of Austro-Slavism. — 206, 207
Page me46.561
Saling, A. — German publisher of the Börsen-Jahrbuch, an annual for bankers and industrialists. — 359
Page me46.561
Samter, Adolph (1824-1883) — German economist, follower of Rodbertus. — 100
Page me46.561
Sax, Emil (1845-1927) — Austrian economist. — 323
Page me46.561
Say, Jean Batiste Léon (1826-1896) — French politician and statesman, economist, bourgeois republican; an editor of the Journal des Débats, deputy to the National Assembly from 1871, Minister of Finance in 1872-82 (with intervals). — 170
Page me46.561
Schäffle, Albert Eberhard Friedrich (1831-1903) — German economist and sociologist, advocated refusal from the class struggle. — 57, 73, 74, 146
Page me46.561
Scheu, Andreas (1844-1927) — prominent figure in the Austrian and English socialist movement, edited the newspaper Gleichheit, member of the First International; emigrated to England in 1874, a founder and an active member of the Social-Democratic Federation in England. — 43
Page me46.561
Schewitsch, Sergei Yegorovich (1844-1912) — Russian-born American socialist, an editor of the New Yorker Volkszeitung in the 1870s-80s. — 369
Page Break me46.562

Page me46.562

Schinderhannes — see Bückler, Johann
Page me46.562
Schmidt, Johann Karl Friedrich Elias — German secret police agent in Zurich. — 436
Page me46.562
Schneider, Catherine Jeanne Hortense (1838-1920) — French actress and singer. — 268
Page me46.562
Schneidt, Karl — German journalist, took part in publishing Social-Democratic newspapers in Hamburg, emigrated to London in the early 1880s where sided with anarchists, an editor of the Freiheit. — 105, 236, 289
Page me46.562
Schoeler, Lina — German teacher, friend of the Marx family. — 95, 96, 98
Page me46.562
Schorlemmer, Carl (1834-1892) — German organic chemist, dialectical materialist, professor at Manchester; member of the First International and of the German Social-Democratic Party, member of scientific societies in Britain, the USA and Germany; friend of Marx and Engels. — 3, 39, 104, 156, 174-75, 215, 229, 244, 291, 306, 307, 309, 311, 316, 339, 340, 345, 404, 407, 409, 412, 436, 442-46, 461, 465
Page me46.562
Schramm, Carl August (1830-1905) — German Social-Democrat, reformist, an editor of the Jahrbuch für Sozialwissenschaft und Sozialpolitik; critic of Marxism in the second half of the 1870s, abandoned the working-class movement in the 1880s. — 8, 16, 177, 181, 189, 279
Page me46.562
Schumacher, Georg (1844-1917) — German tanner, later merchant; deputy to the Reichstag (1884-98), belonged to the opportunist wing of the German Social-Democrats; sided with Liberals during the Reichstag elections of 1898; this caused his expulsion from the Social-Democratic Party. — 450
Page me46.562
Schwitzguébel, Adhémar (1844-1895) — engraver, prominent figure in the Swiss working-class movement, member of the First International, Bakuninist, a leader of the Alliance of Socialist Democracy and the Jura Federation, expelled from the International in 1873. — 129
Page me46.562
Scott, Sir Walter (1771-1832) — Scottish poet and novelist. — 206
Page me46.562
Secondigné, Achille (Boubeau) — French journalist, an editor of the Citoyen in the early 1880s. — 145
Page me46.562
Seguin, Arthur Edward Shelden (1809-1852) — English opera singer. — 95
Page me46.562
Serraillier, Auguste (1840-1878) — shoemaker, prominent figure in the French and international working-class movement, member of the First International from 1864 and of the General Council of the First International (1869-72), Corresponding Secretary for Belgium, Holland and Spain (1870), and France (1871-72), member of the Paris Commune, delegate to the London Conference (1871) and to the Hague Congress (1872) of the International, member of the British Federal Council (1873-74), associate of Marx and Engels. — 53

Page me46.562
Shakespeare, William (1564-1616) — English poet and dramatist. — 312
Page me46.562
Sherbrooke — see Lowe, Robert
Page me46.562
Shipton, George (1839-1911) — prominent figure in the English trade union movement, reformist, secretary of the Amalgamated Society of House Painters and Decorators, member of the Land and Labour League, edited The Labour Standard (1881-85), secretary of the London Trades' Union Council (1871-96). — 119-20, 122-23, 140, 143, 197, 359, 368, 393
Page me46.562
Shyman — a dentist in London. — 353
Page me46.562
Sieber, Nikolai Ivanovich (1844-1888) — Russian economist, one of the Page Break me46.563
first who defended and popularised the Marxian economic teaching in Russia. — 45, 64
Page me46.563
Siemens, Carl Wilhelm (1823-1883) — German electrical engineer, businessman; lived in London from 1859 where he was in charge of the London branch of the German Siemens & Co., President of the British Association for the Advancement of Science in 1882 and member of other scientific societies, author of works on heat and electricity. — 92, 314, 384
Page me46.563
Simon, John (1816-1904) — English physician, medical inspector in the Privy Council. — 140
Page me46.563
Simon, Jules François Simon Suisse (1814-1896) — French statesman, idealist philosopher, moderate bourgeois republican, deputy to the Constituent Assembly (1848-49), member of the Government of National Defence, Minister of Public Education in it and in Thiers' government (1870-73), deputy to the National Assembly (1871), inspired the struggle against the Commune, Chairman of the Council of Ministers (1876-77). — 140
Page me46.563
Singer, Paul (1844-1911) — prominent figure in the German working-class movement and in the Social-Democratic group in the Reichstag, active member of the Marxist wing in the Second International, member of the Board of the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany from 1887, its Chairman from 1890; deputy to the Reichstag from 1884 and Chairman of its Social-Democratic group from 1885. — 260, 261, 433
Page me46.563
Skaldin — see Yelenev, Fyodor Pavlovich
Page me46.563

Skobelev, Mikhail Dmitrievich (1843-1882) — prominent Russian general, took part in military expeditions to Central Asia (1873, 1875-76 and 1880-81) and in the Russo-Turkish war (1877-78). — 209, 235
Page me46.563
Smith, Adam (1723-1790) — Scottish economist. — 16
Page me46.563
Soetbeer, Georg Adolf (1814-1892) — German economist and statistician. — 257
Page me46.563
Solari, Jean — Swiss socialist, journalist, editor of the Précurseur in the early 1880s. — 405
Page me46.563
Songeon — French democrat, member of secret workers' revolutionary societies in Paris during the 1848 revolution, émigré in London in the 1850s, Chairman of the Paris City Council in the 1880s. — 317, 318
Page me46.563
Sophocles (c. 497-406 B.C.) — Greek dramatist. — 230
Page me46.563
Sorge, Adolph (d. 1907) — Friedrich Adolph Sorge's son, mechanical engineer, lived in the USA up to 1895; worked as an engineer in Baku oilfields in 1895-98, later moved to Germany. — 99, 161, 162, 177, 237, 280, 368
Page me46.563
Sorge, Friedrich Adolph (1828-1906) — German teacher, took part in the 1848-49 revolution in Germany; emigrated to the USA in 1852 where he organised American sections of the International, secretary of the General Council, delegate to the Hague Congress (1872), General Secretary of the General Council in New York (1872-74), a founder of the Socialist Workers' Party of North America (1876-77), friend and associate of Marx and Engels. — 24, 25, 42-47, 94, 98-101, 161-63, 177, 237, 278-80, 304-05, 368-70, 457, 460
Page me46.563
Sorge, Katharina — Friedrich Adolph Sorge's wife. — 177
Page me46.563
Soulié, Melchior Frédéric (1800-1847) — French revolutionary romantic writer and dramatist, republican;
Page Break me46.564
opposed the Restoration, took an active part in the July 1830 revolution. — 441
Page me46.564
Sparr, Berthold — German Social-Democrat, lawyer, exiled from Berlin (1881) on the strength of the Anti-Socialist Law, émigré in London in 1882 where he sided with German anarchists, followers of Most. — 236
Page me46.564
Spence, Thomas (1750-1814) — English utopian socialist, advocated abolition of private property in land and establishment of the agrarian socialism. — 228
Page me46.564
Stansfeld, James (1820-1898) — English statesman and Liberal politician, M.P. (1859-95), held responsible government posts, Mazzini's friend. — 83
Page me46.564

Stephann — German-born physician in Algiers in the 1880s, treated Marx (second half of February-late April 1882). — 214, 215, 217, 218, 219, 221, 223, 224, 226, 230, 232, 233, 235, 240, 241, 243, 245-47, 249, 250, 254, 262-63, 267, 274
Page me46.564
Stephann — father of the above. — 247
Page me46.564
Stiebeling, George — German-born American statistician and petty-bourgeois journalist, member of the Central Committee of the sections of the First International in the USA, was expelled from the International for his splitting activities, member of the Socialist Workers' Party of North America, wrote several economic articles. — 369
Page me46.564
Stieber, Wilhelm (1818-1882) — chief of the Prussian political police (1850-60), an organiser of and principal witness for the prosecution at the Cologne Communist trial (1852), together with Wermuth wrote Die Communisten-Verschwörungen des neuenzehnten Jahrhunderts. — 65
Page me46.564
Stoecker, Adolph (1835-1909) — German clergyman and politician, founder (1878) and leader of the Christian-Social Party close to the extreme Right wing of the Conservatives, opposed the working-class socialist movement, preached anti-Semitism, deputy to the Reichstag from 1881. — 73-74, 434
Page me46.564
Strasser, Louise — see Kautsky, Louise
Page me46.564
Strousberg, Bethel Henry (real name Baruch Hirsch Strausberg) (1823-1884) — German-born English railway entrepreneur, ruined in 1875. — 382
Page me46.564
Swan, Joseph Wilson (1828-1914) — English physicist, an inventor of the electric lamp. — 391, 395
Page me46.564
Swinton, John (1830-1901) — Scottish-born American journalist, editor of several major New York newspapers, among them The Sun (1875-83), founder and editor of the weekly John Swinton's Paper (1883-87). — 22-23, 40-41, 43, 77, 93, 99
Page me46.564
T

Page me46.564
Tacitus, Publius Cornelius (c. 55-c. 120) — Roman historian, orator and politician. — 382, 383, 394
Page me46.564
Talleyrand-Périgord, Charles Maurice de (1754-1838) — French diplomat, Foreign Minister (1797-99, 1799-1807 and 1814-15), represented France at the Vienna Congress (1814-15). — 273
Page me46.564
Tanner, Henry S. (b. 1830) — American physician. — 133
Page me46.564

Taylor, Ellen M. — 333
Page me46.564
Taylor, Helen (1831-1907) — English public figure and politician, participated in the movement for women's political rights; supported the demand for Ireland's autonomy in 1880-85, took part in the foundation of the Democratic Federation (1881); follower of Hyndman; John Stuart Mill's stepdaughter. — 333
Page me46.564
Terence, (Publius Terentius Afer) (c. 190-159
Page Break me46.565
B.C.) — Roman author of comedies. — 147
Page me46.565
Terry, Ellen Alicia (1847-1928) — English dramatic actress, famous performer of Shakespearean roles. — 104
Page me46.565
Theisz, Albert Frédéric Jules (1839-1881) — metal-worker, prominent figure in the French working-class movement, Proudhonist, member of the Paris Commune, emigrated to England after the suppression of the Commune, member of the General Council of the International (1871). — 44
Page me46.565
Thierry, Jacques Nicolas Augustin (1795-1856) — French liberal, historian of the Restoration. — 414
Page me46.565
Thiers, Louis Adolph (1797-1877) — French historian and statesman, Prime Minister (1836 and 1840), head of the Orleanists after 1848, Chairman of the Council of Ministers (1871), organised the suppression of the Paris Commune (1871), President of the Republic (1871-73). — 52
Page me46.565
Tissot, Victor (1845-1917) — French writer and journalist, lived in Switzerland up to 1874, later in France; contributed to the Gazette de Lausanne et Journal Suisse from 1868 and edited it during the Franco-Prussian war, an editor of the Figaro in 1891-93. — 112
Page me46.565
Trouchu, Louis Jules (1815-1896) — French general and politician, Orleanist, took part in the conquest of Algeria (the 1830s-40s), the Crimean (1853-56) and Italian (1859) wars; head of the Government of National Defence, commander-in-chief of the Paris armed forces (September 1870-January 1871), sabotaged the defence of the city, deputy to the National Assembly (1871). — 469
Page me46.565
Tupper, Martin Farquhar (1810-1889) — English writer, author of Proverbial Philosophy. — 96
Page me46.565
Turgot, Anne Robert Jacques, baron de l'Aulne (1727-1781) — French economist and statesman, Physiocrat, Controller-General of Finance (1774-76). — 73, 230
Page me46.565
Tussy — see Marx, Eleanor (Tussy)
Page me46.565
V

Page me46.565
Vallés, Jules Louis Joseph (1832-1885) — French writer, politician and journalist, republican; was imprisoned several times for his struggle against the Second Empire; member of the First International and of the Paris Commune, member of the Commission of Education and Foreign Relations; edited the Cri du Peuple (1871), was close to the Blanquists and Proudhonists; emigrated to England after the suppression of the Commune; edited the Cri du Peuple in France from October 1883. — 127
Page me46.565
Vezin, Jane Elisabeth (1827-1902) — English actress, performed Shakespearean roles, acquaintance of the Marx family. — 176
Page me46.565
Viereck, Laura — Louis Viereck's wife. — 99, 141, 442
Page me46.565
Viereck, Louis (1851-1921) — German publisher and journalist, a leader of the Right wing in the Socialist Workers' Party of Germany at the time of the Anti-Socialist Law; deputy to the Reichstag (1884-87); dismissed from all responsible Party posts by decision of the 1887 St Gallen congress; emigrated to America in 1896 and withdrew from the socialist movement. — 75, 77, 93, 99, 139, 141, 259, 279, 350, 430, 431, 442-44, 445-47, 449, 450
Page me46.565
Virchow, Rudolf (1821-1902) — German naturalist, founder of cellular pathology; politician, a leader of the Party of
Page Break me46.566
Progress; opposed Darwinism in the late 19th century. — 317
Page me46.566
Virgil (Publius Vergilius Maro) (70-19 B.C.) — Roman poet. — 235
Page me46.566
Vischer, Friedrich Theodor (1807-1888) — German Hegelian philosopher, author of a voluminous treatise on aesthetics. — 235
Page me46.566
Vivanti, Anna — sister of the German journalist and writer Paul Lindau; acquaintance of the Marx family. — 165
Page me46.566
Vogt, Karl (1817-1895) — German naturalist, petty-bourgeois democrat, deputy to the Frankfurt National Assembly (Left wing) in 1848-49; one of the five imperial regents (June 1849), emigrated to Switzerland in 1849, received subsidies from Napoleon III in the 1850s and 1860s, slandered proletarian revolutionaries, exposed by Marx in his pamphlet Herr Vogt. — 280
Page me46.566
Vollmar, Georg Heinrich von (1850-1922) — German Social-Democrat, a leader of the opportunist, reformist wing of German Social-Democracy, edited the Sozialdemokrat (1879-80), was repeatedly elected deputy to the German Reichstag and Bavarian Landtag. — 332, 336, 342, 349, 350, 352, 357, 360, 363, 373, 379, 386, 388, 408
Page me46.566

W

Page me46.566
Wagener, Hermann (1815-1889) — German journalist and politician, ideologist of Prussian Junkers, edited the Neue Preußische Zeitung (1848-54), a founder of the Prussian Conservative Party, Privy Councillor in the Bismarck government (1866-73), favoured `state socialism'. — 393
Page me46.566
Waldhorn — see Walstone, Charles
Page me46.566
Walstone (Waldstein), Charles (1856-1927) — English archaeologist, acquaintance of the Marx family. — 5, 82
Page me46.566
Walter — German worker. — 321
Page me46.566
Warren, Joseph (1741-1775) — American politician, a leader of the American revolution of the 18th century, killed in action at Bunker Hill in 1775. — 78
Page me46.566
Weerth, Georg (1822-1856) — German proletarian poet and journalist, shop assistant; member of the Communist League, an editor of the Neue Rheinische Zeitung (1848-49), friend of Marx and Engels. — 59
Page me46.566
Weiler, Adam (1841-1894) — German émigré, member of the British Federal Council of the International (1872-73), supported Marx and Engels in their struggle against English reformists, later joined the Social-Democratic Federation. — 118
Page me46.566
Westphalen, Caroline von (née Heubel) (1780-1856) — Jenny Marx's mother. — 158
Page me46.566
Westphalen, Christian Heinrich Philipp von (1724-1792) — secretary and friend of the Duke of Brunswick, took part in the Seven Years' War, author of a work on its history, Jenny Marx's grandfather. — 158
Page me46.566
Westphalen, Ferdinand Otto Wilhelm Henning von (1799-1876) — Prussian statesman, Minister of the Interior (1850-58), half-brother of Jenny Marx. — 158
Page me46.566
Westphalen, Gerhard Julius Oscar Ludwig Edgar von (1819-1890) — Jenny Marx's brother, member of the Brussels Communist Correspondence Committee (1846), lived in America in 1847-65, and in Berlin in the early 1880s. — 159
Page me46.566
Westphalen, Jeanie von (née Wishart of Pittarow) (1746-1811) — wife of Christian Heinrich Philipp von Westphalen from 1765, mother of Johann Ludwig von Westphalen, Jenny Marx's grandmother. — 158
Page me46.566
Westphalen, Johann Ludwig von (1770-1842)
Page Break me46.567

— Jenny Marx's father, Privy Councillor in Trier. — 158
Page me46.567
Wilhelm — see Liebknecht, Wilhelm
Page me46.567
William I (1743-1821) — Elector of Hesse-Cassel (1803-07 and November 1813 to 1821). — 273
Page me46.567
William I (1797-1888) — Prince of Prussia, King of Prussia (1861-88), Emperor of Germany (1871-88). — 78, 175, 178, 234-35, 441
Page me46.567
William II (1859-1941) — King of Prussia and Emperor of Germany (1888-1918). — 208
Page me46.567
Williams — bookseller in London. — 103
Page me46.567
Williamson — James M. Williamson's wife. — 423
Page me46.567
Williamson, James M. — English physician in Ventnor, treated Marx from November 1882 to early January 1883. — 366, 371, 372, 375, 392, 399, 419, 420, 429
Page me46.567
Willich, Johann August Ernst (1810-1878) — Prussian officer who left the service on political grounds, member of the Communist League, participant in the Baden-Palatinate uprising of 1849, one of the leaders of the sectarian group that split away from the Communist League in 1850, emigrated to the USA in 1853, took part in the American Civil War on the side of the North. — 281, 329
Page me46.567
Wilson, Charles Rivers (1831-1916) — big English state and colonial official, head of the English Public Debt Administration (1874-94), Minister of Finance in the national government of Egypt (1878-79). — 365, 376, 381
Page me46.567
Windthorst, Ludwig (1812-1891) — German politician, Minister of Justice in Hanover (1851-52 and 1862-65), deputy to the Reichstag and a leader of the Party of the Centre. — 189
Page me46.567
Wishart of Pittarow, Jeanie — see Westphalen, Jeanie von
Page me46.567
Wolf — see Longuet, Edgar
Page me46.567
Wolff — German merchant, brother of Ferdinand Wolff. — 425
Page me46.567
Wolff, Ferdinand (Red Wolff) (1812-1895) — German journalist, member of the Brussels Communist Correspondence Committee in 1846-47, member of the Communist League, an editor of the Neue Rheinische Zeitung in 1848-49, left Germany after the 1848-49 revolution, supported Marx during the split in the Communist League (1850), later withdrew from political life. — 425
Page me46.567

Wolseley, Garnet Joseph (1833-1913) — English general, commanded English troops in Egypt in 1882. — 313, 317, 327
Page me46.567
Wróblewski, Walery (1836-1908) — Polish revolutionary democrat, a leader of the Polish liberation insurrection of 1863-64, general of the Paris Commune, emigrated to London after the suppression of the Commune, sentenced to death in absentia, member of the General Council of the International and Corresponding Secretary for Poland (1871-72), delegate to the Hague Congress (1872), actively fought the Bakuninists, headed the Polish revolutionary society Zwiazek Ludu Polskiego in London in 1872, advocated the idea of the Polish-Russian revolutionary union, returned to France after the amnesty, maintained contact with Marx and Engels. — 183, 311, 314
Page me46.567
Y

Page me46.567
Yelenev, Fyodor Pavlovich (pseudonym Skaldin) (1827-1902) — Russian writer, journalist, liberal; Secretary of the Editorial Commissions for the Preparation of the Peasant Reform of 1861 (1859-61); author of essays V zaholust'i i v stolits(In the Backwoods and in the Capital); member of the Council for the Press Affairs in 1868-96 and simultaneously, from 1890, member of the Council of the Ministry of the Interior; took a reactionary stand from the 1870s. — 109
Page Break me46.568
Page me46.568
Z

Page me46.568
Zanardelli, Tito — Italian-born French socialist, took part in the Franco-Prussian war (1870-71), lived in France in the 1870s-early 1880s, member of the International, contributed to the Égalité, exiled from France in late 1882. — 346
Page me46.568
Zasulich, Vera Ivanovna (1849-1919) — took part in the Narodnik (Populist) movement (from 1868) and later in the Social-Democratic movement in Russia, a founder (1883) and active participant in the Marxist Emancipation of Labour group. — 71-72
INDEX OF LITERARY AND MYTHOLOGICAL NAMES
Page me46.568
Anthony — Christian saint, hermit in Nubian desert. — 182
Page me46.568
Christ, Jesus (Bib.). — 235
Page me46.568
Dogberry — a character in Shakespeare's comedy Much Ado About Nothing. — 82
Page me46.568
Don Quixote — the title character in Cervantes' novel. — 95, 213
Page me46.568
Gumpelino — character in Heine's Reisebilder, 2nd part. — 430, 431

Page me46.568
Isis — one of the most worshipped Egyptian goddesses, later her cult spread to Greece and Rome. — 256
Page me46.568
John Bull — the main character in John Arbuthnot's book The History of John Bull (1712); the name is often used to personify England or the English. — 40, 90, 172, 252, 287
Page me46.568
Mary (Bib.). — mother of Jesus Christ. — 256
Page me46.568
Moloch — a Sun-God in Carthage and Phoenicia, his worship was accompanied by human sacrifice. — 234
Page me46.568
Obadiah — Jewish prophet. — 171
Page me46.568
Oerindur — a character in Amadeus Müllner's Die Schuld. — 437
Page me46.568
Pecksniff — a character in Charles Dickens' novel Martin Chuzzlewit, an unctuous hypocrite talking much of benevolence and other kindly virtues. — 84
Page me46.568
Pickwick, Samuel — the hero of Dickens' novel The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club. — 431-32
Page me46.568
Rinaldo Rinaldini — robber, title character in the chivalrous romance by Christian August Vulpius. — 206
Page me46.568
Roland (Orlando) — the hero of the French epic Chanson de Roland. — 79

Page Break me46.569

INDEX OF QUOTED AND MENTIONED LITERATURE

WORKS BY KARL MARX AND FREDERICK ENGELS

Marx, Karl
Page me46.569
Capital. A Critique of Political Economy. Vol. I, Book One: The Process of Production of Capital (present edition, Vol. 35)
— Das Kapital. Kritik der politischen Oekonomie. Erster Band, Buch 1: Der Produktionsprocess des Kapitals. Hamburg, 1867. — 16, 44, 56, 103, 140, 162, 163, 189, 257, 294, 298, 310, 369
— Das Kapital. Kritik der politischen Oekonomie. Bd. I, Buch 1: Der Produktionsprocess des Kapitals. Zweite verbesserte Auflage. Hamburg, 1872. — 225, 423, 425

— Kapital. Kritika politicheskoj ekonomii. Sochinenie Karla Marksa. Perevod s nmetskago. Tom pervyj. Kniga I. Protsess proizvodstva kapitala. S.-Peterburg, 1872. — 45
— Das Kapital. Kritik der politischen Oekonomie. Herausgegeben von Friedrich Engels. Erster Band. Buch 1: Der Produktionsprocess des Kapitals. Dritte vermehrte Auflage. Hamburg, 1883. — 158, 161, 162, 225, 347, 359, 368, 423, 425, 434
— Le Capital. Traduction de M.J. Roy, entiérement revisée par l'auteur [Vol. 1.], Paris [1872-75]. — 40, 41
Page me46.569
Capital. A Critique of Political Economy. Vol. II, Book Two: The Process of Circulation of Capital (present edition, Vol. 36)
— Das Kapital. Kritik der politischen Oekonomie. Zweiter Band, Buch 2: Der Cirkulationsprocess des Kapitals. Hamburg, 1885. — 16, 158, 161, 465
Page me46.569
Capital. A Critique of Political Economy. Vol. III, Book Three: The Process of Capitalist Production As a Whole (present edition, Vol. 37)
— Das Kapital. Kritik der politischen Oekonomie. Dritter Band, Theile I-II.

Page Break me46.570
Buch 3: Der Gesammtprozess der kapitalistischen Produktion. Hamburg, 1894. — 16, 158, 161, 465
Page me46.570
The Civil War in France. Address of the General Council of the International Working Men's Association [London], 1871 (present edition, Vol. 22). — 52
Page me46.570
Introduction to the French Edition of Engels' `Socialism: Utopian and Scientific' (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Avant propos. In: Engels, F. Socialisme utopique et socialisme scientifique. Paris, 1880. — 15, 332
Page me46.570
Matematicheskie rukopisi. Moskva, 1968. — 130
Page me46.570
The Poverty of Philosophy. Answer to the `Philosophy of Poverty' by M. Proudhon (present edition, Vol. 6)
— Misére de la philosophie. Réponse á la philosophie de la misére de M. Proudhon. Paris, Bruxelles, 1847. — 93, 100
Page me46.570
Preamble to the Programme of the French Workers' Party (present edition, Vol. 24) — Programme électoral des travailleurs socialistes. In: L'Égalité, 2e Série, No. 24, 30 juin 1880. — 148, 342
Page me46.570
Reply to Brentano's Article (present edition, Vol. 23)
— An die Redaktion des Volksstaat. In: Der Volksstaat, Nr. 44, 1. Juni 1872. — 65
Page me46.570
Reply to Brentano's Second Article (present edition, Vol. 23)
— An die Redaktion des Volksstaat. In: Der Volksstaat, Nr. 63, 7. August 1872. — 65

Page me46.570
To the Editor of `The Eastern Post' (present edition, Vol. 23). In: The Eastern Post, No. 169, 23 December 1871. — 52
Page me46.570
To the Editor of `The Eastern Post' (present edition, Vol. 23). In: The Eastern Post, No. 173, 20 January 1872. — 52
Page me46.570
To the Editor of `The Eastern Post' (present edition, Vol. 23). In: The Eastern Post, No. 174, 28 January 1872. — 52
Page me46.570
Workers' Questionnaire (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Enquête ouvriére. In: La Revue socialiste, No. 4, 20 avr. 1880. — 43
— Enquête ouvriére. Paris [1880]. — 43

Engels, Frederick
Page me46.570
American Food and the Land Question (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Labour Standard, No. 9, July 2, 1881. — 105, 197
Page me46.570
Anti-Dühring. Herr Eugen Dühring's Revolution in Science (present edition, Vol. 25)
— Herrn Eugen Dühring's Umwälzung der Wissenschaft. Philosophie. Politische Oekonomie. Sozialismus. Leipzig, 1878. — 56, 325, 335, 369
Page me46.570
Bismarck and the German Working Men's Party (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Labour Standard, No. 12, July 23, 1881. — 140, 197
Page me46.570
Bruno Bauer and Early Christianity (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Bruno Bauer und das Urchristenthum. In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 19 und 20, 4. und 11. Mai 1882. — 250, 256, 282, 292

Page Break me46.571
Page me46.571
The Condition of the Working-Class in England. From Personal Observation and Authentic Sources (present edition, Vol. 4)
— Die Lage der arbeitenden Klasse in England. Nach eigner Anschauung und authentischen Quellen. Leipzig, 1845. — 190, 294
Page me46.571
Cotton and Iron (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Labour Standard, No. 13, July 30, 1881. — 140, 197
Page me46.571
Dialectics of Nature (present edition, Vol. 25). — 348, 350, 377
Page me46.571
Draft of a Speech at the Graveside of Karl Marx (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Discours de Frédéric Engels. Under the general heading: Obséques de Karl Marx. In: La Justice, No. 27, 20 mars 1883. — 465
Page me46.571

A Fair Day's Wages for a Fair Day's Work (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Labour Standard, No. 1, May 7, 1881. — 140, 197
Page me46.571
The French Commercial Treaty (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Labour Standard, No. 7, June 18, 1881. — 140, 197
Page me46.571
Jenny Marx, neé von Westphalen (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Jenny Marx, geb. v. Westphalen. In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 50, 8. Dezember 1881. — 282
Page me46.571
Karl Marx's Funeral (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Das Begräbniß von Karl Marx. In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 13, 22. März 1883. — 465
Page me46.571
The Mark (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Die Mark. In: F. Engels, Die Entwicklung des Sozialismus von der Utopie zur Wissenschaft. Hottingen-Zürich, 1882. — 331, 390, 395, 399, 403, 407, 409, 410, 416, 432, 454
Page me46.571
Outlines of a Critique of Political Economy (present edition, Vol. 3) — Umrisse zu einer Kritik der Nationalökonomie. In: Deutsch-Französische Jahrbücher, Paris, 1844. — 58
Page me46.571
Preface to the First German Edition of `Socialism: Utopian and Scientific' (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Vorwort. In: F. Engels, Die Entwicklung des Sozialismus von der Utopie zur Wissenschaft. Hottingen-Zürich, 1882. — 331, 358
Page me46.571
Social Classes — Necessary and Superfluous (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Labour Standard, No. 14, August 6, 1881. — 140, 197
Page me46.571
The Socialism of Mr. Bismarck (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Le socialisme de M. Bismarck. In: L'Égalité, 2e Série, Nos. 7 et 10, 3 et 24 mars 1880. — 149
Page me46.571
Socialism: Utopian and Scientific (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Socialisme utopique et socialisme scientifique. Traduction française par Paul Lafargue. Paris, 1880. — 15, 300, 331, 335-36, 352, 369 — Le socialisme utopique et le socialisme scientifique. In: La Revue socialiste, Nos. 3, 4, 5, 20 mars, 20 avril et 5 mai 1880. — 15, 300

Page Break me46.572
— Die Entwicklung des Sozialismus von der Utopie zur Wissenschaft. Hottingen-Zürich, 1882. — 300, 324, 331, 334, 335, 336, 344, 352, 358, 390, 432, 433, 454
Page me46.572
Trades Unions (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Labour Standard, Nos. 4 and 5, May 28 and June 4, 1881. — 140, 197

Page me46.572
Two Model Town Councils (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Labour Standard, No. 8, June 25, 1881. — 140, 197
Page me46.572
The Vicar of Bray (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Der Vikar von Bray. Aus dem Englischen von Friedrich Engels. In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 37, 7. September 1882. — 302, 326, 331
Page me46.572
The Wages System (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Labour Standard, No. 3, May 21, 1881. — 140, 197
Page me46.572
The Wages Theory of the Anti-Corn Law League (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Labour Standard, No. 10, July 9, 1881. — 140, 197
Page me46.572
A Working Men's Party (present edition, Vol. 24). In: The Labour Standard, No. 12, July 23, 1881. — 140, 197

Marx, Karl, and Engels, Frederick
Page me46.572
The Alliance of Socialist Democracy and the International Working Men's Association. Report and Documents Published by Decision of the Hague Congress of the International (present edition, Vol. 23)
— L'Alliance de la Démocratie Socialiste et l'Association Internationale des Travailleurs. Rapport et documents publiés par ordre du Congrés International de la Haye. Londres-Hambourg, 1873. — 129, 375
Page me46.572
Circular Letter to August Bebel, Wilhelm Liebknecht, Wilhelm Bracke and Others (present edition, Vol. 24). — 279, 281
Page me46.572
Fictitious Splits in the International. Private Circular from the General Council of the International Working Men's Association (present edition, Vol. 23)
— Les prétendues scissions dans l'Internationale. Circulaire privée du Conseil Général de l'Association Internationale des Travailleurs. Genéve, 1872. — 129
Page me46.572
Manifesto of the Communist Party (present edition, Vol. 6)
— Manifest der Kommunistischen Partei, London, 1848. — 100, 278, 293, 422, 425
— Manifest kommunisticheskoj partii. Perevod s nyemetskago izdaniya 1872. S predisloviem avtorov. ZHeneva, 1882. — 184, 295
Page me46.572
To the Meeting in Geneva Held to Commemorate the 50th Anniversary of the Polish Revolution of 1830 (present edition, Vol. 24)
— Do meetingu w Genewie, zwolanego na pamiatke 50-ej rocznicy Rewolucyi Polskiej 1830. In: Sprawozdanie z miedzynarodowego zebrania zwolunego w 50-letnia rocznice listopadowégo powstania przez redakcyje Równo&sa;ci w Genewie. Genewa, 1881. — 195
Page me46.572

Preface to the 1872 German Edition of the `Manifesto of the Communist Party' (present edition, Vol. 23)

Page Break me46.573
— Vorwort. In: Marx, K., Engels, F. Das kommunistische Manifest. Neue Ausgabe mit einem Vorwort der Verfasser. Leipzig, 1872. — 422, 425
Page me46.573
Preface to the Second Russian Edition of the `Manifesto of the Communist Party' (present edition, Vol. 24). — 244
— Predislovie, napisannoe K. Marksom i F. Engel'som k predprinyatomu `russk. sots.-revolyuts. bibliotekoj' perevodu Manifesta kommunisticheskoj partii. In: Narodnaya volya, No 8/9, 5 fevralya, Spb., 1882. — 184, 244, 247, 425
— Vorrede zu der zweiten russischen Auflage des Manifestes der Kommunistischen Partei. In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 16, 13. April 1882. — 247
Page me46.573
Review, May to October [1850] (present edition, Vol. 10)
— Revue, Mai bis Oktober. London, 1. November 1850. In: Neue Rheinische Zeitung. Politisch-ökonomische Revue, Nr. 5-6, 1850. — 189

WORKS BY DIFFERENT AUTHORS

Page me46.573
Amos, Sh. `“Spoiling the Egyptians”: Revised Version.' In: The Contemporary Review, Vol. XLII, October 1882. — 381
Page me46.573
The Arabian Nights. — 219
Page me46.573
Auer, I. [Speech in the Reichstag on 30 March 1881.] In: Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Reichstags. 4. Legislaturperiode. IV. Session 1881. Band I. 25. Sitzung am 30. März 1881. Berlin, 1881. — 85, 86
Page me46.573
Bachofen, J.J. Das Mutterrecht. Eine Untersuchung über die Gynaikokratie der alten Welt nach ihrer religiösen und rechtlichen Natur. Stuttgart, 1861. — 453
Page me46.573
Bancroft, H.H. The Native Races of the Pacific States of North America. Volume I. Wild Tribes. New York, 1875. — 394, 438
Page me46.573
Bax, E.B. Leaders of Modern Thought. XXIII — Karl Marx. In: Modern Thought, Vol. III, No. 12, December 1, 1881. — 163, 165, 184
Page me46.573
Bazin, G. Á Monsieur le commissaire de police. In: L'Égalité, 4e Série, No. 38, 30 novembre 1882. — 391
Page me46.573
B[ebel, A.] Aufhebung des Sozialistengesetzes? In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 42, 12. Oktober 1882. — 357
Page me46.573

Bebel, A. Polizei-Orgien in Berlin unter dem Belagerungszustand. In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 11, 14. März 1880. — 10
— [Speech in the Reichstag on 31 March 1881.] In: Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Reichstags. 4. Legislaturperiode. IV. Session 1881. Band I. 26. Sitzung am 31. März 1881. Berlin, 1881. — 85, 86, 87 — [Speech in the Reichstag on 4 April 1881.] In: Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Reichstags. 4. Legislaturperiode. IV. Session 1881. Band I. 29. Sitzung am 4. April 1881. Berlin, 1881. — 85, 86, 87, 433
— Unsere Ziele. Eine Streitschrift gegen die `Demokratische Correspondenz'. Leipzig, 1870. — 454, 455
— Die Ziele der Arbeiterbewegung. Nach der sechsten Auflage vom Jahre 1877 kritisch revidirt und herausgegeben von Ad. Hepner. New York, 1883. — 454, 455

Page Break me46.574
Page me46.574
[Bernstein, E.] Bekennt Farbe! Signed: Leo. In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 16, 13. April 1882. — 244
— Entweder — oder! Signed: Leo. In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 51, 15. Dezember 1881. — 173, 203
— Ein Gedenktag. Signed: Leo. In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 4, 23. Januar 1881. — 59
— Es fehlt uns an Intelligenzen. Signed: Leo. In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 31 und 33, 28. Juli und 11. August 1881. — 127, 137
— Die Situation in Ireland. Signed: Leo. In: Der Sozialdemokrat, Nr. 21, 18. Mai 1882. — 301
Page me46.574
Bible. — 70
The Old Testament. — 274, 349
The New Testament. — 251, 278, 395
Page me46.574
Bismarck, O. von [Speech in the Reichstag on 9 January 1882.] In: Stenographische Berichte über die Verhandlungen des Reichstags. V. Legislaturperiode. I. Session 1881/82. [Band I.] 20. Sitzung am 9. Januar 1882. Berlin, 1882. — 183
Page me46.574
Bracke, W. Der Lassalle'sche Vorschlag. Ein Wort an den 4. Congreß der socialdemokratischen Arbeiterpartei. (Einberufen auf den 23. August 1873 nach Eisenach.) Braunschweig, 1873. — 294
— `Nieder mit den Sozialdemokraten!', Braunschweig, 1876. — 294
Page me46.574
Brentano, L. Wie Karl Marx citirt. In: Concordia, Nr. 10, 7. März 1872. — 65
— (anon.) Wie Karl Marx sich vertheidigt. In: Concordia, Nr. 27, 4. Juli 1872. — 65
Page me46.574
Bürkli, K. Abschüttelungs halber. In: Arbeiterstimme, 7. und 14. Januar 1882. — 177
— Demokratische Bank-Reform. Oder: Wie kommt das Volk zu billigerem Zins? Sieben Fragen und Antworten über die Reorganisation der Kantonalbank. Zürich, 1881. — 209, 210
Page me46.574

Caesar, G.J. Commentarii de bello Gallico. In: Die Geschichtschreiber der deutschen Vorzeit in deutscher Bearbeitung. Bd. 1: Die Urzeit. Hrsg. v. G.H. Pertz, J. Grimm u.a. Berlin, 1847-1849. — 382
Page me46.574
Cafiero, C. Polemica. In: La Plebe, Num. 17, 5 Novembre 1882. — 392
Page me46.574
Candelari, R. Ancora sulla teoria del valore secondo Marx. In: La Plebe, Num. 18, 12 Novembre 1882. — 392
— Carlo Marx. In: La Plebe, Num. 15, 22 Ottobre 1882. — 392
— La critica dell'economia radicale moderna. In: La Plebe, Num. 13, 8 Ottobre 1882. — 392
— De Laveleye e Rodbertus. In: La Plebe, Num. 14, 15 Ottobre 1882. — 392
— Il Salario. In: La Plebe, Num. 17, 5 Novembre 1882. — 392
— La teoria del valore secondo Marx. In: La Plebe, Num. 16, 29 Ottobre 1882. — 392
Page me46.574
Chamisso, A. von. Salas y Gomez. — 439
Page me46.574
Cieszkowski, A. Du Crédit et de la circulation. Paris, 1839.
— Prolegomena zur Historiosophie. Berlin, 1838. — 177, 189
Page me46.574
Colins, J.G. L'économie politique. Source des révolutions et des utopies prétendues socialistes. Tome I-III. Paris, 1856-1857. — 100

Page Break me46.575
Page me46.575
[Danielson, N.F.] Ocherki nawego poreformennago obshchestvennago hozyajstva. Signed: Nikolaj — on. In: Slovo, Spb., oktyabr' 1880. — 31, 61, 62, 64
Page me46.575
Dante, Alighieri. La Divina commedia. — 291
Page me46.575
Darwin, Ch. The Formation of Vegetable Mould, through the Action of Worms, with Observations on Their Habits. London, 1881. — 274
Page me46.575
Die deutsche Geheimpolizei im Kampfe mit der Sozialdemokratie. Aktenstücke und Enthüllungen auf Grund authentischen Materials dargestellt. Hottingen-Zürich, 1882. — 390, 436
Page me46.575
Deville, G. Il y a cinq ans. In: L'Égalité, 4e Série, No. 27, 19 novembre 1882. — 387
— Le travail. In: L'Égalité, 4e Série, Nos. 57 et 58, 19 et 20 décembre 1882. — 413
Page me46.575
[Dozon, A.] Blgarski narodni psni. Chansons populaires bulgares inédites. Paris, 1875. — 207
Page me46.575
Dühring, E. Kritische Geschichte der Nationalökonomie und des Socialismus. Zweite, theilweise umgearbeitete Auflage. Berlin, 1875. — 434
Page me46.575

[Eccarius, J.G.] A German Opinion of English Trade Unionism. In: The Labour Standard, No. 14, 6 August 1881. — 118, 120, 121, 123
Page me46.575
[Eckardt, J.] Berlin und St. Petersburg. Preussische Beiträge zur Geschichte der Russisch-Deutschen Beziehungen. Leipzig, 1880. — 193
Page me46.575
Epicurus [Letter to Menoeceus]. — 462
Page me46.575
Fielding, H. The History of the Adventures of Joseph Andrews and His Friend Mr. Abraham Adams. — 329
Page me46.575
The Financial Reform Almanach. For 1882. London. — 211
Page me46.575
Fitzgibbon, G. Ireland in 1868, the Battle-Field for English Party Strife; its grievances, real and factitious; remedies, abortive or mischievous. London, 1868. — 70
Page me46.575
Freeman, Ed. A. History of Europe. London, 1876. — 417
Page me46.575
Friedrich II. Aus der Instruction für die Generalmajors von der Cavallerie (14. August 1748). In: Die Werke Friedrichs des Großen, Bd. 6: Militärische Schriften, hrsg. von Gustav Berthold Volz, deutsch von Friedrich v. Oppeln-Bronikowski. Berlin, 1913. — 431
Page me46.575
George, H. The Kearney Agitation in California. In: The Popular Science Monthly, Vol. XVII, August 1880. — 101
— Progress and Poverty: an inquiry into the cause of industrial depressions and of increase of want with increase of wealth. The Remedy. New York, 1880. — 93, 99-101
Page me46.575
Die Geschichtschreiber der deutschen Vorzeit in deutscher Bearbeitung. Bd. 1: Die Urzeit. Herausgegeben von G.H. Pertz, J. Grimm, u.a. Berlin, 1847-1849. — 382
Page me46.575
Goethe, J.W. von. Das Göttliche. — 230
— Faust. — 110
— Der Fischer. — 126
— Reineke Fuchs. — 95

Page Break me46.576
— Der Schatzgräber. — 260
— Zahme Xenien. — 268
Page me46.576
